[22] It is on this point that both Benedict Anderson and Mark Juergensmeyer need to be corrected. The former speaks only about religion as a weakened social variable, a once dominant purveyor of values now in decline at the moment that nationalism enters its most virulent phase, i.e., late nineteenth century Western Europe (Anderson, Imagined Communities, 12f). Anderson never considers religion as a social force that did not weaken for all citizens of the major European nations (and the United States), nor does he recognize religion as a residual symbol world still important to so-called secular elites. Juergensmeyer, on the other hand, is overly concerned to see how religious actors and secular nationalist leaders can merge their common concerns in a future step-down from Armageddon. His is a prescriptive rather than descriptive task. The continuing incommensurability of religion and nationalism is for him an obstacle to be overcome rather than a scenario to be monitored, yet his work has the singular value of charting the numerous instances of that oxymoronic phenomenon called religious nationalism, pleading against current evidence for its peaceful advance into the next century; see Mark Juergensmeyer, The New Cold War? Religious Nationalism Confronts the Secular State (Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1993), esp. 193–202.

[23] It is a mark of how thoroughly secular the debate about civil society has become that religion enters not as an independent variable but rather as a substratum of trust, justice, benevolence. From Kant to Strauss to Habermas, one can trace the effort to invoke a transcendent morality without positing the need for a Transcendent Being, and the chief debate becomes why nationalism produced one kind of civil society in Western Europe and a very different kind in Eastern Europe. While there is much of value to pursuing this debate in its own terms, it ignores the larger shift from metaphysical to instrumental notions of truth; see Adam B. Seligman, The Idea of a Civil Society (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1992), esp. 156–66.

[24] Harold Bloom, The American Religion: The Emergence of a PostChristian Nation (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1992), 16–17.

[25] Abdallah Laroui, The Crisis of the Arab Intellectual: Traditionalism or Historicism? (Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1976), 174.

[26] Liah Greenfeld, Nationalism: Five Roads to Modernity (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1993).

[27] Among several exponents of this view, three stand out: Ernest Gellner, Nations and Nationalism (Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1983) and Conditions of Liberty: Civil Society and Its Rivals (New York: Allen Lane/The Penguin Press, 1994); Eric Hobsbawm, Nations and Nationalism since 1870 (London: Canto Press, 1991); and Frances Fukuyama, The End of History and the Last Man (New York: Free Press, 1992).

[28] Richard Falk, The Endangered Planet (New York: Vintage/Random House, 1971), 227.

[29] See, e.g., Basil Davidson, The Black Man’s Burden: Africa and the Curse of the Nation-State (New York: Times Books/Random House, 1992), for a particularly strong critique of the postcolonial legacy in subSaharan Africa.

[30] Ranajit Guha, Subaltern Studies (Delhi: Oxford University Press, 1985), 4:vii.

[31] All the volumes of Subaltern Studies articulate this viewpoint, as do Gayatri Spivak, In Other Worlds: Essays in Cultural Politics (New York: Methuen, 1987), and Robert Young, White Mythologies: Writing History and the West (London and New York: Routledge, 1990).

[32] The political theorist Kenneth Waltz, for instance, treats the four P’s as but four flashpoints in an argument for the danger posed by interdependence in a convergent world system; see Kenneth N. Waltz, Theory of International Politics (New York: McGraw-Hill, 1979), 139.

[33] See Juergensmeyer, The New Cold War? 193–202.

[34] Ibid., 50.

[35] For the clearest exposition of this theory, see Bryan Turner, Marx and the End of Orientalism (London: George Allen Unwin, 1983), 67f. But equally damning of the absence of social change among Muslim nation-states, using the Universal Declaration of Human Rights as a yardstick, or rather a bully club, is Martin Kramer, “Islam versus Democracy,” Commentary 95.1 (Jan. 1993): 35–42. Overlooking the differentiation within and between Muslim societies is not only short-sighted, it also reinforces the cultural stereotypes invoked by such glibly ahistorical commentators as Fukuyama and Huntington in order to stoke the prospect of a “New Cold War.”

[36] Jalal Al-i Ahmad, Occidentosis: A Plague from the West (Berkeley: Mizan Press, 1984), 33–34.

[37] With these few words I am sidestepping moves to privilege insider above outsider use of referents to the transcendent. One such move is to isolate God as the real object of reflection for prophets, saints, and lesser believers, while marking God as merely the theoretical object of consideration for theologians and other academics. A parallel move, common even before Max Weber but dominant in much academic writing about religion since his time, is to separate interpretation from explanation, claiming for one discipline (the history of religions) the sole ability to explain religious phenomena while allowing the social sciences the related but less exalted task of interpreting these same phenomena. Robert Segal has exposed how this move has played out in the dominant branch of history of religion; especially in Religious Studies Review 20.3 (July 1994): 197–201. Another move, which has gained prominence among neo-Tillichians in mainline Protestant circles, is to distinguish between first-order and second-order discourse, as does George Lindbeck, The Nature of Doctrine: Religion and Theology in a Postliberal Age (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1984).

The problem with all these moves, whether polemical or apologetic or both, is their implicit ranking of those who engage in God-talk while ignoring the major issue: is there or is there not a nonmaterial force influencing, perhaps even directing, human activity? The realm of the imagination has not hesitated to say YES, and even though the voices do not accord the Other the same name, it is necessary to accent the common ground that they occupy vis-a-vis rank materialists, closet atheists, or scientizing triumphalists, all of whom deny the very existence of the Other, except, of course, as “a figment of the imagination.”

[38] Muhammad Qutb, Islam: The Misunderstood Religion (Damascus: The Holy Koran Publishing House, 1977), 52.

[39] Sayyid Qutb, Ma’Alim fi’t-Tariq (Milestones on the Path) (Cairo: Dar ash-Shuruq, 1964), 146. One of Sayyid Qutb’s most popular tracts, it has often been translated into English, and the above quotation can be found also in Sayyid Qutb, Milestones (Cedar Rapids, Iowa: Unity Publishing, n.d.), 126. On the rhetoric of hakimiyya, there now exists the unprecedented and invaluable two-part study of Islamic fundamentalism in a comparative context by Sadik al-Azm; see “Islamic Fundamentalism Reconsidered.”

[40] Ahmad Moussalli, Radical Islamic Fundamentalism: The Ideological and Political Discourse of Sayyid Qutb (Beirut: American University of Beirut, 1992), 241.

[41] Raimundo Panikkar, “Religion or Politics: The Western Dilemma” in Ninian Smart and Peter Merkl, eds., Religion and Politics in the Modern World (New York: New York University Press, 1983), 46.

[42] Jacob Landau, The Politics of Pan-Islam: Ideology and Organization (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1990), 311.

[43] James Piscatori, Islam in a World of Nation-States (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1986), 77. Not only on this point but in his general approach, Piscatori highlights the need for constant vigilance in separating rhetoric from outcome, polemics from pragmatic action. His book confirms a hopeful, long-range view of Muslim polities that is at variance with most media assessments even as it is consonant with the arguments here advanced. For a useful update of his approach, see the analysis forged with Dale Eickelman in Muslim Politics (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1996).

[44] Albert Hourani, Islam in European Thought (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991), 73.

[45] Bassam Tibi, Arab Nationalism: A Critical Enquiry (New York: St. Martin’s Press, [1981] 1990), 87.

[46] Leonard Binder, Islamic Liberalism (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1988), 280.

[47] Marilyn Waldman, “The Islamic World,” Encyclopaedia Britannica Macropaedia (Chicago: Britannica Publishing, 1987), 130.

[48] The most egregrious examples of this approach are James Bill and Carl Leiden, Politics in the Middle East (Boston: Little, Brown, 1979), and Edward Mortimer, Faith and Power: The Politics of Islam (New York: Random House, 1982). More nuanced, balancing Islam as world view with attention to numerous, often competing Muslim ideologies, especially in the introduction and conclusion, is James Piscatori, ed. Islam in the Political Process (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1983).

[49] The most subtle example of this approach is Clifford Geertz, Islam Observed: Religious Development in Morocco and Indonesia (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1968), though one must quickly add in defense of Geertz’s approach that he tries to retrieve a cultural boundedness for all social existence that earlier analysts of Muslim history largely ignored. Other scholars, less sensitive than Geertz to the colonial optic, include Christopher Harrison, France and Islam in West Africa, 18601960 (New York: Cambridge University Press, 1988), and Ian Talbot, The Punjab and the Raj, 1849–1947 (Riverdale: Riverdale Company, 1988).

[50] David Laitin, Hegemony and Culture: Politics and Religious Change among the Yoruba (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1986), 164–69, has detailed the similarities and differences in a West African context.

[51] Richard Fox, “East of Said,” in Richard Fox, ed. Nationalist Ideologies and the Production of National Cultures (Washington, D.C.: American Anthropological Association, 1990).

[52] For a broad global view of this protracted rivalry, see Geoffrey Barraclough, ed., The Times Atlas of World History (Maplewood, N.J.: Hammond, 1982), 207–95. For a region-specific view that takes account of all of Asia, see Rhoads Murphey, A History of Asia (New York: HarperCollins, 1992).

[53] Huri Islamoglu-Inan, ed., The Ottoman Empire and the WorldEconomy (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1987), and Resat Kasaba, The Ottoman Empire and the World Economy: The Nineteenth Century (Albany: State University of New York Press, 1988).

[54] Turner, Marx and the End of Orientalism, highlights this argument, especially in chaper 4.

[55] Delacroix’s thesis is restated in Lisa Anderson, “Obligation and Accountability: Islamic Politics in North Africa,” Daedalus 120.3 (1991): 93–121.

[56] Georges Corm, Fragmentation of the Middle East: The Last Thirty Years (London: Hutchinson, 1988), 137.

[57] For a thorough, often critical review of these trends, one can do no better than Hooshang Amirahmadi, Revolution and Economic Transition: The Iranian Experience (Albany: State University of New York Press, 1990).

[58] Marshall Hodgson, The Venture of Islam: Conscience and History in a World Civilization (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1979), 3:176–222.

[59] Michael Gilsenan, Recognizing Islam: Religion and Society in the Modern Arab World (New York: Pantheon, 1982), 215.

[60] Charles Barone, Marxist Thought on Imperialism: Survey and Critique (Armonk, N.Y.: M. E. Sharpe, 1985), 115f, provides a keen exposition and broad-scale critique of Marxist theory on this point.

[61] The degree of influence can be overstated, however, as is the case with the unidirectional and triumphalist thesis of Theodore Van Laue in The World Revolution of Westernization (New York: Oxford University Press, 1987).

[62] For the Iranian case, there is much evidence of global patterns impinging on local contexts, often with unanticipated consequences. See especially Paul Vieille and Farhad Khosrokhavar, Le Discours populaire de la revolution iranienne, 2 vols. (Paris: Contemporaneite, 1990), and also Erika Friedl, Women of Deh Koh: Women’s Lives in an Iranian Village (Washington, D.C.: Smithsonian, 1989), the companion study to Reinhold Loeffler, Islam and Practice: Religious Lives in a Persian Village (Albany: State University of New York Press, 1988).

[63] I agree with James Piscatori that we cannot absolutize successive stages of Muslim protest, implying that the rhythm of history explains all social change and potential development; see his critique of Hamid Enayat in Islam in a World of Nation-States, (1986) 36.

Yet it still seems valuable to differentiate the sequence of public responses to British, French, and Dutch colonial empires. The unexpected has happened and will continue to happen, but sketching patterns of possibility can help understand a long-term process, even when the next turn in the road remains invisible, and the road itself very bumpy.

[64] Osman Bakar, “Towards a Positive World-view of Islam,” in Abdul Monir Yaacob and Ahmad Faiz Abdul Rahman, Towards a Positive Islamic World-View: Malaysian and American Perspectives (Kuala Lumpur: Institute of Islamic Understanding 1994), 38.

[65] See, e.g., Immanuel Wallerstein, The Capitalist World-System (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1979), though the best summary of his work and its impact remains Charles Ragin and Daniel Chirot, “The World System of Immanuel Wallerstein: Sociology and Politics as History,” in Theda Skocpol, ed., Vision and Method in Historical Sociology (New York: Cambridge University Press, 1984), 276–312.

[66] Eric Hoffer, “Islam and Modernization,” The Spectator (Spring 1980): 1.

[67] Corm, Fragmentation of the Middle East, 133. I am indebted to Corm’s insightful book for many of the revisionist, often radical interpretations of Middle Eastern society reflected in these pages.

[68] Ibid., 90.

[69] The boldest articulation of the either-or thesis concerning Islam and modernization comes from the political scientist Bassam Tibi, The Crisis of Modern Islam: A Preindustrial Culture in the Scientific-Technological Age (Salt Lake City: University of Utah Press, 1989), and Islam and the Cultural Accommodation of Social Change (Boulder: Westview Press, 1990).

[70] For a broad delineation of the postcolonial dilemmas faced by many Middle Eastern and North African societies, see Philip S. Khoury and Joseph Kostiner, eds. Tribes and State Formation in the Middle East (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1990). The most persuasive review of democracy as an element of Muslim political discourse, despite occasional lapses into economic determinist arguments, is provided in Ghassan Salame, ed., Democracy without Democrats? The Renewal of Politics in the Muslim World (London: I.B. Tauris, 1994).

[71] On the specific problems of nomenclature for Islamic fundamentalism, see my chapter “Muslim Fundamentalist Movements: Reflections toward a New Approach,” in Barbara F. Stowasser, ed., The Islamic Impulse (London: Croom Helm, 1987), 15–36; and also chapter 4 in Defenders of God. Similar points have been made by Sadik al-Azm in his two-part essay noted above.

[72] Ihab Hassan, “The Culture of Postmodernism,” in Monique Chefdor et al., Modernism: Challenges and Perspectives (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1986), 307.

[73] Norma Salem, “Tunisia,” in Shireen T. Hunter, ed., The Politics of Islamic Revivalism (Bloomington: University of Indiana Press, 1988), 167, n. 7. Elsewhere I deal with a similar set of issues about terminology, arguing that to choose and defend specific cross-cultural constructs is the only way that comparative studies can finally produce some explanatory yield (see Defenders of God, 90–96). Sadik al-Azm is even more emphatic about the need for cross-cultural categories when he declares: “I would like to argue broadly for the epistemological legitimacy, scientific integrity and critical applicability of such supposedly modern Western and Christian-derived concepts as ‘Fundamentalism’ and ‘Revivalism’ in the study of the contemporary Islamist phenomenon.” “Islamic Fundamentalism Reconsidered,” 95.

[74] A recapitulation of both the Arabian Wahhabis and the Indian revivalists sometimes confused with them, the Barelwis and Faraidis, is set forth in Ira M. Lapidus, A History of Islamic Societies (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1988), 673–75, 720–22.

[75] Much scholarship still routinely considers the Padris, like the Barelwis, Faraidis, and, of course, Wahhabis, as prototypical fundamentalists. The Padris were said to represent “the intensification of Islamic fundamentalism evident elsewhere in the [Southeast Asian] region” during the early nineteenth century. See A. C. Milner, “Islam and the Muslim State” in M. B. Hooker, ed., Islam in South-east Asia (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1983), 47. It is just such an uncritical reading of all Islamically motivated protest as fundamentalist that mandates a reconsideration of recent Muslim history.

[76] This level of critique against reformers has been especially associated with the leading advocate of cultural or Althusserian Marxism in Morocco, Abdallah Laroui, whose views are etched in The Crisis of the Arab Intellectual, esp. 153–77.

[77] Youssef M. Choueiri, Islamic Fundamentalism (Boston: Twayne, 1990), 35. I am indebted to Choueiri for his clear exposition of Islamic fundamentalism, demarcating it from both revivalism and reformism in a diachronic sequence that mirrors my own approach. I do, however, disagree with Choueiri on the label denoting the last phase. He prefers “radicalism,” glossing the term fundamentalism as applicable to all three phases of recent Islamic protest. The term “radical,” unlike revivalism and reformism, has no positive referent. It presupposes some other norm. That norm, in an Islamic context, is a strict religious code or sense of inalterable, all-encompassing fundamentals; hence I use “fundamentalism” in preference to “radicalism” to denote the last and most significant phase of Islamic protest in recent history.

[78] Jean Leca, “Democratization in the Arab World,” in Salame, ed. Democracy without Democrats?, 61. I use the phrase in a more general sense than does Leca, who confines it to the nonmonarchical states of the Arab world, even though the practice of citizen surveillance among the monarchies differs little from that of their “republican” counterparts.

[79] Gellner, Nations and Nationalism, 138. Put even more starkly in subsequent essays is Gellner’s view that what characterizes the modern Middle East and, by extension, the whole Muslim world is “a kind of tribalism in a new milieu and idiom ... strong religion, strong state, weak civil society, and the fragile ideological power (’asabiyya) of quasi-kin, quasi-territorial patronage—that seems to be the heritage (of Islam in the modern world).” Ernest Gellner, “Tribalism and State in the Middle East” in Khoury/Kostiner, Tribes and State Formation, 125–26. The problem with this view is its parochialism: it prejudges the future of all Muslims by one, limited reading of the Islamic past. There are other options possible, if the current economic order does not inscribe the same or greater inequities on Africa and South/Southeast Asia as it has in the immediate past.

[80] Kenneth Cragg, The House of Islam (Belmont, Calif.: Dickenson, 1982), 96.

[81] Richard W. Bulliet, Islam: The View from the Edge (New York: Columbia University Press, 1994), 205, though Bulliet is principally concerned with the coercive redirection of education and curbing of the power base of the ulama, intentionally or unintentionally, through “Europeanization.”

[82] Even when allowance is made for Fanon’s emotive appeal to undifferentiated masses, whom he lauded as the sole harbingers of cultural authenticity, it is his posthumous classic, Les Damnes de la terre, translated as The Wretched of the Earth (New York: Grove, 1961/1963), that augured the grim irony of postcolonial dependence more clearly than any other writing of the nationalist resistance period, just as his Sociologie d’une revolution translated as A Dying Colonialism (New York: Grove, 1964/1965), highlighted the crucial role of gender analysis and the new woman in forging an autonomous space of freedom in postcolonial Muslim societies. See also Ato Sekyi-Otu, Fanon’s Dialectic of Experience (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1996), 211–35.

[83] See Carl E. Pletsch, “The Three Worlds, or the Division of Social Scientific Labor, circa 1950–1975,” Comparative Studies in Society and History 23 (October 1981): 565–90, for the best explanation of how these terms, rather than some alternative rubrics, came to define the socioeconomic gradient dividing the modern capitalist world system.

[84] Fouad Ajami, “In the Pharaoh’s Shadow: Religion and Authority in Egypt,” in Piscatori, ed., Islam in the Political Process, 1983.

[85] Abd al-Aziz Khayyat, Minister of Religious Endowments, the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan, lecture delivered at Duke University on 8 October 1982.

[86] World Link 3 (Spring 1991): 12–13. I am indebted to Dr. Paul Hoff for this reference, and for his reflections on how Islam is perceived by nonspecialists in today’s world.

[87] Roy Mottahedeh, “The Islamic Movement: The Case for Democratic Inclusion,” Contention 4.3 (Spring 1995): 111.

[88] For Pakistan, as for every other country considered, there are numerous dates that could be selected for mention. I provide only those that are registered most often and reverberate most widely when the subject of discussion is changes in the public sphere during the transition from anticolonial protest to postcolonial hopes merging into new points of resistance. There are many other dates to consider for the analysis of noncentrist issues crucial to civil society; some of these dates are set forth in chapter 5 for the purpose of addressing the current and future status of women in three majoritarian Muslim states—Iran, Egypt, and Pakistan.

[89] My friend has asked to remain anonymous, but his sentiments are echoed by numerous Indian Muslims to the present day, as one recent account makes clear; see Rafiq Zakaria, The Struggle within Islam (London: Penguin, 1989), 1. Though I do not agree with the overly determined bifurcation of fundamentalism and secularism in Zakaria's sweeping account, the book does have the singular merit of presenting in lucid English both a learned Indian Muslim's view of Islamic history and a skillful weaving together of indigenous with Euro-American scholarship on that same history.

[90] Hamid Enayat, Modern Islamic Political Thought (London: Macmillan, 1982), 102.

[91] S. Barakat Ahmad, "Maududian Concept of Islamic State," Islam and the Modern Age 14 (November 1983): 10.

[92] Mumtaz Ahmad, "Islamic Revival in Pakistan," in J. W. Bjorkman, ed., Fundamentalism, Revivalists and Violence in South Asia (Riverdale, Md.: The Riverdale Company, 1988), 93. Ahmad makes the analytic error of conflating the essentially nonpolitical Tablighi Jama'At with the very political Jama'At-i Islami. He also calls both groups grass-roots revivalist movements, when, in fact, neither was grass-roots or revivalist. Their appeal was urban and often elitist; their program was fidelity to scriptural norms within the modern nation-state. Despite its analytic shortfall, Ahmad’s essay contains many valuable source citations.

[93] Seyyed Vali Reza Nasr, The Vanguard of the Islamic Revolution: The Jama’At-i Islami of Pakistan (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1994), 59. “The Jama’At’s rivals, from ulama parties to Israr Ahmad’s Tanzim-i Islami and Tahiru’l-Qadri’s Minhaju’l-Qur’an, with some changes in titles and functions, have reproduced it [the Jama’At’s organizational model] in their own organizations.” Nasr’s study provides the best single overview in English of both the aims and limits of Mawdudi’s organizational legacy.

[94] Albert Hourani, A History of the Arab Peoples (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1991), 338, 393. Hourani, the premier Arab historian of the late twentieth century, documents this point, as so many others, with crystal clarity.

[95] Adducing the significance of Nasser and his successors, Sadat and Mubarak, is a delicate task that has occupied many political scientists. For the latest effort suggesting that their achievements were more monumental than the forces constraining them, see Raymond W. Baker, Sadat and After: Struggles for Egypt’s Political Soul (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1990). My approach emphasizes recurrent features of political culture rather than the psychology or mystique of particular Egyptian leaders. A boldly comprehensive study that takes account of class and economic variables in assessing the major Muslim politics of West Asia and North Africa, including Egypt, is Alan Richards and John Waterbury, A Political Economy of the Middle East: State, Class and Economic Development (Boulder: Westview Press, 1990). Especially valuable is the authors’ effort to show how the internal differentiation of the middle class complicates any roseate picture of development in the Arab Muslim world, as also in its Iranian and Turkish neighbors.

[96] According to Joel Migdal, Nasser’s was essentially a top-down strategy of survival. Through nationalization of key industries, he precluded the development of centrifugal economic groups and structures that were necessary for the long-range viability of the Egyptian economy. The virtue of Migdal’s broadly comparative study is to illustrate that the dilemma of Nasserist overcentralization was neither his nor the Middle East’s alone; see Joel S. Migdal, Strong Societies and Weak States: StateSociety Relations and State Capabilities in the Third World (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1988), esp. 229–32.

[97] See Hourani, Islam in European Thought, 401–15, for an adroit analysis of the 1967 war as the nearly inevitable outcome of a perilous experiment with Arab socialism cast in the mold of Nasser’s Egypt.

[98] John Waterbury, Hydropolitics of the Nile Valley (Syracuse: Syracuse University Press, 1979).

[99] Morroe Berger, Islam in Egypt; Social and Political Aspects of Popular Religion (New York: Cambridge University Press, 1970), 47, quoted by Daniel Crecelius in D. E. Smith, ed., Religion and Political Modernization (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1974), 90.

[100] Quoted in Richard P. Mitchell, The Society of Muslim Brothers (New York: Oxford University Press, 1968), 244.

[101] Sayyid Qutb, Ma’Alim fi’t-Tariq, 26.

[102] This detail, along with countless others, is provided in the thoroughly sympathetic biography of Asad by Patrick Seale (see 437). Titled Asad: The Struggle for the Middle East (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1988), it is accurately called by the author himself a “chronicle.” It is a chronicle that he concludes by asking Asad how he wants it to conclude. Unsurpisingly, Asad quips: “Say simply that the struggle continues” (495).

[103] The best presentation of the socioeconomic issues and class struggle evident in Hama is offered by Fred Lawson, “Social Bases for the Hamah Revolt," Middle East Reports in Progress (MERIP) 12.9 (Nov.-Dec. 1982): 24–28. The alternative explanation of modern Syrian history as a clash of competing religious ideologies has been set forth in Umar F. Abd-Allah, The Islamic Struggle in Syria (Berkeley: Mizan Press, 1983).

[104] Fouad Ajami, "In the Pharaoh's Shadow," in J. Piscatori, ed., Islam in the Political Process, 34.

[105] Thomas L. Friedman, From Beirut to Jerusalem (New York: Farrar Straus Giroux, 1989), 101. While this quote from Friedman is valuable, his analysis of Hama is seriously flawed by overschematization and psychological projection. Is Asad a schizophrenic three-faced Jekyll-and-Hyde, unable or unwilling to declare himself as (1) tribal leader, (2) brutal autocrat, or (3) modernizing president? Such is Friedman's cynical surmise, yet equally plausible is the opposite surmise, namely, that Asad is a wily pragmatist ruling Syria in almost the only way that one could rule a postcolonial artifice, with almost no historical tradition as a nation-state, threatened by fissiparous forces within and beyond its borders. Friedman eschews comparative analysis in order to tell a good story, but it is not the whole story, and it may cloak the long-range historical lessons emerging out of modern-day Ba'Athist Syria.

[106] Norma Salem, "Tunisia," in Hunter, ed., The Politics of Islamic Revivalism, 158. Not only for this insight but for an imaginative theoretical overview of Islamism, applying Bourdieu's categories with analytic adroitness, I am indebted to Norma Salem's chapter.

[107] Norma Salem, Habib Bourguiba, Islam and the Creation of Tunisia (London: Croom Helm, 1984), 38.

[108] Salem, "Tunisia," 154.

[109] Ibid., 155, summarizing a spate of publicity and criticism that went well beyond Tunisia during the early 1960s.

[110] Clement H. Moore, Tunisia since Independence: The Dynamics of a One-Party System (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1965), 52n.

[111] Salem, “Tunisia,” 155.

[112] The Economist (13 Jan. 1996) provides the details of a rising tide of hope for Tunisian women: “A girl born today stands a 95% chance of learning to read, and is likely to live to 71—13 years longer than one born ten years ago”(41).

[113] Salem, “Tunisia,” 165.

[114] See North Africa News 2/1 (Jan.-Feb. 1991): 6. While this periodical is published by North African Students for Freedom and might be expected to tilt toward extreme conclusions, in fact this is one of the rare instances where its editorials verge on the alarmist rather than the pragmatic side of predicting the unpredictable, namely, the future of Maghribi politics.

[115] Susan Waltz, “Islamist Appeal in Tunisia,” Middle East Journal 40 (Autumn 1986): 669.

[116] Choueiri, Islamic Fundamentalism, 75.

[117] Ibid., 75.

[118] Dilip Hiro, Holy Wars: The Rise of Islamic Fundamentalism (New York: Routledge, 1989), 116.

[119] Ibid., 119.

[120] James P. Piscatori, “Ideological Politics in Saudi Arabia,” in Piscatori, ed., Islam in the Political Process, 71. On Saudi foreign policy, see Cary Fraser, “In Defense of Allah’s Realm: Religion and Statecraft in Saudi Foreign Policy,” in a book co-edited by Piscatori and Susan H. Rudolph, Transnational Religion & Fading States (Boulder: Westview, 1996), 212–40. Fraser acknowledges indebtedness to Piscatori both for reviewing the above essay and for an earlier article, “Islamic Values and National Interest: The Foreign Policy of Saudi Arabia,” in Adeed Dawish, ed. Islam in Foreign Policy (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1983), 33–53. Piscatori further explores the limits of Saudi ability to out-maneuver religious opponents of the state in Dale F. Eickelman and James Piscatori, Muslim Politics (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1996); espec. 157–59.]

[121] Fouad Ajami, “In the Pharaoh’s Shadow,” in Piscatori, ed., Islam in the Political Process, 32, asks this question about Egypt; it applies with equal force to Saudi Arabia.

[122] This ludicrous but apt anecdote comes from Olivier Roy, The Failure of Political Islam, trans. Carol Volk (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1994), 116. In general, Roy highlights the distinctions within the Islamist movements and articulates the consequences of what he terms “a new world-space,” one so permeated with commercial and communicative links to the global market that “triumphant neofundamentalism will be incapable of ensuring the insularity of Islamic societies” (202). As such, his thesis has many similarities to the principal argument of this book about diversity and accommodation, though Roy’s accent is concerned mainly with political currents.

[123] The first chapter title is from Shireen Hunter, The Politics of Islamic Revivalism; the other, from Dilip Hiro, Holy Wars.

[124] Choueiri, Islamic Fundamentalism., 70.

[125] Ibid., 77.

[126] The stress on Carter’s human rights policy is best set forth by Henry Munson, Jr., in Islam and Revolution in the Middle East (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1988), 126–28. The use of cassettes was reported widely in the news media at the time, though it escaped mention in many later commentaries on the Islamic revolution.

[127] Ruth Ann Willner, The Spellbinders (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1984), 82.

[128] Turner, Marx and the End of Orientalism, 67, and Gellner, Conditions of Liberty. See also this volume’s introduction, note 35.

[129] The best overview of the manifold economic problems facing the Islamic Republic of Iran is set forth by Hooshang Amirahmadi in Revolution and Economic Transition, 70–82. Amirahmadi provides a rare and valuable class analysis of the debate on development planning, discussed more fully below.

[130] For the best assessment of this volatile issue, see Shaul Bakhash, The Reign of the Ayatollahs: Iran and the Islamic Revolution (New York: Basic Books, 1984), 195–216. For a case study of the controversial land cultivation bill, see his “Land, Law and Social Justice in Iran,” The Middle East Journal 43.2 (Spring 1989): 186–201.

[131] For a full review of the status of minorities during the most recent phase of the Islamic Republic of Iran, see John L. Esposito and John O. Voll, Islam and Democracy (New York: Oxford University Press, 1997), 69–74.

[132] For more on Shari’Ati, see particularly Hamid Dabashi, Theology of Discontent: The Ideological Foundation of the Islamic Revolution in Iran (New York: New York University Press, 1993), 102–46.

[133] Amirahmadi, Revolution and Economic Transition, 121. All the qualified brackets come from the author, except the last, which are mine.

[134] Eric Hooglund, “The Pulse of Iran Today,” Middle East Insight 11.5(July-Aug. 1995): 40–47. The quotation is adapted from p. 41, but the entire article expounds on the role of free speech and open debate in 1990s’ Iran. On the special importance of Abdul Karim Sorush, see Yann Richard, “Clercs et intellectuels de la Republique islamique d’Iran,” in Gilles Kepel and Yann Richard, eds., Intellectuels et militants de l’islam contemporain (Paris: Le Seuil, 1990), 29–70. Alas, the window of freedom has not remained untainted, or wide open: Sorush was forced to cease teaching at Tehran Unveristy after a radical theocratic faction, Ansar-i Hizbullah, staged political confrontations against him in the mid-1990s. However, he continues to argue publicly with leading officials of the Iranian government; in most other West Asian Muslim countries, with the exception of Turkey, such open debate about the nature and role of Islam would be unthinkable.

[135] The immensity of the Iranian diaspora since 1978 and the significant presence of Iranians in the United States are nowhere more evident than in Los Angeles. For a marvelous pictorial overview of the many strands of the Iranian exile community in southern California, see Ron Kelley, Jonathan Friedlander, and Anita Colby, eds., Irangeles: Iranians in Los Angeles (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1993).

[136] The quotation comes from Paul B. Henze and S. Enders Wimbush, “A New Policy for a New Middle East,” Wall Street Journal, 31 Jan. 1997, with a sequel by Robert D. Kaplan, “Why the U.S. and Iran Will Be Friends Again,” Wall Street Journal, 10 Feb. 1997. Despite the hopeful tone of both articles, most policy pronouncements still tend to echo the dismal logic, and bleak pessimism, of Samuel P. Huntington, The Clash of Civilizations and the Remaking of World Order (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1996). As I argue below, Chandra Muzaffar, a Malay intellectual, has pinpointed the solipsistic futility of Huntington’s thesis with a deftness that has escaped most Washington globe watchers: they remain mired in Cold War nostalgia even while talking of a post-Cold War future.

[137] Asef Bayat, “The Coming of a Post-Islamist Society,” Critique 9 (Fall 1996): 43–52.

[138] Sekyi-Otu, Fanon’s Dialectic of Experience, 214.

[139] Hisham Sharabi, Neopatriarchy: A Theory of Distorted Change in Arab Society (New York: Oxford University Press, 1988).

[140] New York: Columbia University Press, 1991, esp. 142–63.

[141] The one, oft noted “exception” is the Egyptian founder of the Society of Muslim Women, Zaynab al-Ghazali. Her prison memoirs have been reprinted and reprinted, yet her life as an activist abounds in contradictions, not the least of which is her self-defined independence from her husband. See Valerie J. Hoffman, “An Islamic Activist: Zaynab al-Ghazali,” in Elizabeth W. Fernea, ed. Women and the Family in the Middle East: New Voices of Change (Austin: University of Texas Press, 1985), and Miriam Cooke, “Prisons: Women Write about Islam,” Religion and Literature 20.1 (Spring 1988).

[142] Roy, The Failure of Political Islam, 59.

[143] Most of these figures are taken from the superb summary provided by Mahnaz Afkhami in “Iran: A Future in the Past—The Prerevolutionary Women’s Movement,” in Robin Morgan, ed., Sisterhood is Global (New York: Anchor-Doubleday, 1984), 335. No woman who writes about Iran writes in a vacuum. Afkhami has her own personal history of involvement in the events she describes: she served as secretary-general to the Women’s Organization of Iran under Muhammad Reza Shah, and for some that involvement leads to accusations of class-blindness and overreliance on state-sponsored or top-down feminism (Haideh Moghissi, review of Mahnaz Afkhami and Erika Friedl, eds., In the Eye of the Storm: Women in Post Revolutionary Iran [Syracuse: Syracuse University Press, 1994], in International Journal of Middle East Studies 28.2 [May 1996]: 293–95). But insofar as there exists a viable umbrella movement known as global feminism, Afkhami remains one of its most articulate Iranian advocates.

[144] These seeming contradictions are outlined by Freda Hussain and Kamelia Radwan in “The Islamic Revolution and Women: Quest for the Quranic Model,” in Freda Hussain, ed., Muslim Women (New York: St. Martin’s Press, 1984), 48–51.

[145] Motahhari, like every other figure in the inner circle of Iranian Islamic ideologues, has a contested history. Abrahamian, in particular, is dismissive of Motahhari as a thinker, labeling his critique of Marxism and his class analysis as “half-baked and third-hand conservative arguments designed to preserve the socioeconomic status quo while implicitly questioning the political power structure” (review of Dabashi, in International Journal of Middle East Studies 28.2 [May 1996]: 300). Yet Motahhari’s range of reinterpretation is impressive, and his views on women more compelling than his digest of Marxist ideology.

[146] Motahhari, Sexual Ethics in Islam (Muslim Student Association— Persian Speaking Group, n.d.), 33–45.

[147] Ibid., 20–21.

[148] Abdelwahab Bouhdiba, Sexuality in Islam (London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1985), 19.

[149] For a biography of Nazira Zayn al-Din and brief excerpts from two of her writings, see Margot Badran and Miriam Cooke, eds., Opening the Gates: A Century of Arab Feminist Writings (London and Bloomington: Virago and Indiana University Press, 1990), 270–78.

[150] Barbara F. Stowasser, “The Status of Women in Early Islam,” in Hussain, ed., Muslim Women 37. The concluding section of Stowasser’s chapter highlights Nazira Zayn al-Din’s writings and their significance for reevaluating women’s status in Islam.

[151] For actual statistics on marriage and literacy, see the entry “Iran” in Morgan, ed., Sisterhood Is Global, 326. Yet these statistics, especially on literacy, are subject to challenge, and in need of upward revision. Valentine Mogadham, “Women, Work and Ideology in Post-Revolutionary Iran,” Michigan State University Working Paper #170 (May 1988), 24, n. 15, cites the literacy rate of urban women as 55 percent now, which means that the figure for rural women at best hovers around 25 percent.

[152] See Friedl, Women of Deh Koh, 110–19. In the introduction Friedl notes: “The ultimate motivation for the many suicide attempts of women in Deh Koh is quoted as a wish ‘to be at rest, quiet, out of it forever.’ ”

[153] Hussein/Radwan, “The Islamic Revolution and Women,” 65.

[154] Eric Hooglund, “Islamic Feminism,” in Middle East Insight 11.5: 70–71, quotes extensively from his interview with Shala Sherkat, the editor of Zanan, who claims it is “the first Islamic feminist magazine in Iran.” Even allowing for a self-serving dose of hyperbole, one has to underscore the significance of a widely read literary forum directed at urban professional women in 1990s’ Iran. Nor is its influence limited to Iran: a recent issue of Critique: Journal for Critical Studies of the Middle East featured an article by the Egyptian sociologist, Asef Bayat, in which she argued that Iran may well witness the first post-Islamist society. Her evidence derives from the popularity of a new brand of Islamic modernism emerging under a self-consciously Islamic state, namely, the Islamic Republic of Iran, and among the harbingers of this change Bayat cites women advocates writing in major journals such as Zanan. See Asef Bayat, “The Coming of a Post-Islamist Society,” Critique 9 (Fall 1996): 43–52.

One example supporting Bayat’s optimism is the prominence recently accorded a Qum-based cleric, Mohsen Sa’idzadeh, who directly challenges the premise of Mutahhari’s approach to exegesis. Instead of assuming the complementarity of rights for men and women as the axial outlook of the Qur’an, “Sa>idzadeh contends that Islam grants women the same rights as men in all matters, including the right to become leaders, both religious and political, and to serve as judges.” See Ziba Mir-Hosseini, “Stretching the Limits: A Feminist Reading of the Shari’A in Post-Khomeini Iran,” in Mai Yamani, ed. Feminism & Islam: Legal and Literary Perspectives (New York: New York University Press, 1996), 305. Mir-Hosseini’s entire essay, drawing on articles from Zanan, reflects some of the latest and most engaging scholarly efforts to reclaim Shi<i Islam for a new generation of Iranian women.

[155] Of the many, sources that could be cited, see especially Azar Tabari and Nahid Yeganeh, eds., In the Shadow of Islam. The Woman’s Movement in Iran (London: Zed Press, 1982); Guity Nashat, Women and Revolution in Iran (Boulder: Westview Press, 1983); Farah Azari, ed. Women of Iran: The Conflict with Fundamentalist Islam (Ithaca: Ithaca Press, 1983); and Afkhami and Friedl, eds., In the Eye of the Storm.

[156] George A. Nader, “Interview with President Ali Akbar Rafsanjani,” Middle East Insight 11.5:14. The opposite interpretation, of course, has been offered by some Iranian women in exile; see, e.g., Haideh Moghissi, IJMES 28/2 [May 1996]: 293: “the clerics have tried to co-opt and silence women through various means, including a retreat from their initial exclusionary educational and employment policies and the reintroduction of pre-revolutionary Family Law under an Islamic rubric.” By this reading, there are no sources of power possible for women in a patriarchal society, and so “it can hardly be said [as Erika Friedl among others has tried to say] that in the Islamic Republic of Iran, women exert much power” (295).

[157] See Nemat Guenena, “The Jihad: An Islamic Alternative in Egypt,” Cairo Papers in Social Science 8.2 (Summer 1986): 81–87.

[158] Nadia Hijab, Womanpower: The Arab Debate on Women at Work (New York: Cambridge University Press, 1988), 81.

[159] See Margot Badran, “Competing Agenda: Feminists, Islam and the State in Nineteenth-and Twentieth-Century Egypt,” in Deniz Kan-diyoti, ed., Women, Islam & the State (Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1991), 222–23. Badran’s article provides a rare and comprehensive overview of Egyptian women’s movements under the shadow of the colonial, then postcolonial, state. Also see her recent history of Muslim women and feminism in Egypt, which goes beyond any comparable study of women in a majoritarian Muslim country and sets a high standard for all future analysis of Muslim women and the state: Margot Badran, Feminists, Islam, and Nation: Gender and the Making of Modern Egypt (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1995).

[160] Badran, “Competing Agenda,” 219.

[161] Nayra Atiya, Khul-Khaal: Five Egyptian Women Tell Their Story (Syracuse, Syracuse University Press, 1982), viii. The statement has been modified to reflect the reality that even government employment is no longer guaranteed since 1974.

[162] Ibid., xv-xvi.

[163] Ayesha Jalal, “The Convenience of Subservience: Women and the State of Pakistan,” in Kandiyoti, Women, Islam, & the State, 105.

[164] Quoted in ibid., 77.

[165] Miriam Habib, “Pakistani Women: A Fractured Profile,” in Morgan, ed., Sisterhood Is Global, 531.

[166] Ibid.

[167] Jalal, “The Convenience of Subservience,” 79.

[168] Ibid., 108.

[169] Tabari and Yaganeh, In the Shadow of Islam, 24.

[170] Nawal el-Saadawi, The Hidden Face of Eve (Boston: Beacon, 1982), 180.

[171] Hijab, Womanpower, 93.

[172] The details of the court case concerning Shah Bano are summarized, or paraphrased, from the version of the judgment that appears in Asghar Ali Engineer, ed., The Shah Bano Controversy (Hyderabad: Orient Longman, 1987), 23–34. I also benefited from a close reading of my earlier essay on Shah Bano by Lucy Carroll Stout, herself an expert and prolific author on Muslim Personal Law in South Asia.

[173] Danial Latifi, who appeared before the Supreme Court on behalf of Shah Bano, notes that of the three forms of divorce possible under Islamic law, this is the most reprehensible, even though it is still technically “allowed by the present interpretation of the Hanafi school of law,” which is the school that applies for most Muslims throughout the subcontinent. See Danial Latifi, “The Muslim Women Bill,” reprinted in ibid., 104–105.

[174] Madhu Kishwar, “Pro-Women or Anti-Muslim? The Furore over Muslim Personal Law,” Manushi 32 (1986): 8.

[175] Cited in Engineer, ed., The Shah Bano Controversy, 24.

[176] For an India-specific review of how much remains to be done, merely to describe the circumstances of all women, but especially the agrarian poor, without even considering how to redress these same seemingly intractable circumstances, see Niroj Sinha, ed., Women and Violence (New Delhi: Vikas, 1989). Though many of these essays suffer from both lack of editing and strident advocacy, they do contain numerous insights into the actual circumstances of Muslim as well as Hindu women. For instance, Shahnaz Bano, “Violence on Women in Muslim Society: The Case of Divorced Women” (148–54), evokes the horror and desperation that a Muslim divorcee feels, not only due to rejection by her former husband, but also from the lack of sympathy or support within her agnatic family.

[177] I am indebted to the excellent analysis of Muslim Personal Law that was provided by Gregory C. Koslowski in “Muslim Personal Law and Political Identity in Independent India,” a paper given at the University of Iowa conference on Religion and Law in South Asia, fall 1991.

[178] The relevant passage is set forth in Engineer, 24.

[179] Amrita Chhachhi, “Forced Identities: The State, Communalism, Fundamentalism and Women in India,” in Kandiyoti, ed., Women, Islam and the State, 153.

[180] See Afsaneh Najmabadi, “Interview with Gayatri Spivak,” Social Text 28. 9/3 (1991): esp. 132–34.

[181] For the ideological efforts either to deny history or to retell it from a “Hindu” viewpoint, see the comprehensive study by Peter van der Veer, Gods on Earth: The Management of Religious Experience and Identity in a North Indian Pilgrimage Centre (London: Athlone Press, 1988). “Ayodhya’s rise as a supra-regional place of pilgrimage is relatively recent. Only during the eighteenth century did Ramanandi sadhus start to build their institutions there, while many of the buildings we see today were built in the second half of the nineteenth or the first part of the twentieth century” (36). In other words, the cult of Rama at Ayodhya is more a countermemory of Hindu revivalism than a historical reflection of ancient Indian practice.

[182] Quoted from Zakia Pathak and Rajeswari Sunder Rajan, “ ‘Shah-bano,’ ” in Micheline Malson et al., eds., Feminist Theory in Practice and Process (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1989), 252–53. Pathak and Rajan provide a clear articulation of the several paradoxes in press coverage and subsequent ideological invocation of Shah Bano, even though they stress one aspect of Shahbano, namely, her subjectivity, to the exclusion of other, equally salient aspects.

[183] The full text of this extraordinary bill is set forth in Engineer, ed., The Shah Bano Controversy, 85–88.

[184] For this quotation, a paraphrase of Chief Justice Chandrachud's opinion, and also for many insights into the juridical and political maneuvering that surrounded the Shah Bano case, see Ainslie T. Embree, Utopias in Conflict: Religion and Nationalism in Modern India (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1990), esp. 96–101. The significance of Chief Justice Chandrachud's intervention has also been discussed at length in Erin E. O'Donnell, "Muslims in Modern India and Political Identity: The Shah Bano Case (1985) and the Muslim Women (Protection of Rights on Divorce) Act (1986) and the Elite Use of Symbols," Annals of the Southeast Conference Association for Asian Studies 13 (17–19 Jan. 1991): 89–102.

[185] The controversy is reviewed and analyzed in Embree, Utopias in Conflict, 107–11.

[186] For the full text of Shah Bano's demurral, see Engineer, ed., The Shah Bano Controversy, 211.

[187] For this observation I am indebted to Professor Morris H. Abrams of Cornell University. In one of several gatherings of the Fundamentalism Project, sponsored by the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, he asked: "To what extent may one fundamentalist movement be generated to oppose an inimical fundamentalism?" (Fundamentalisms Compared, Spring Conference 1991, summary notes, 12). What follows here is an attempt to respond to the pertinent question he raised, and to trace that response in the specific context of 1980s' India.

[188] A full expose of these later developments is tracked from a feminist perspective in the above cited article by Amrita Chhachhi.

[189] For instance, in Engineer, ed., The Shah Bano Controversy, one finds numerous essays of value as well as the text of the original judgment (23–34), but no essay sets forth the Pakistani point of view. Only a brief piece critical of the Indian ulema is included in Janak Raj Rai, ed., Shah Bano (New Delhi: Rajiv Publications, 1986); see Rafiullah Shahab, “A Pak View of Muslim Law,” 121–24.

[190] It is from this South Asian perspective that Benedict Anderson’s much touted thesis about nationalism as an imaginary construct, inducing cohesion where none was intrinsically available, is in need of correction: the colonial manipulation of difference persists beyond independence and often precludes the possibility of cohesion on some superseding criterion even after independence has been achieved.

[191] See Gregory Koslowski, “Shah Bano’s Case and Indian Politics,” in Malik and Vajpeyi, eds., Law, Politics and Society in India, 106.

[192] Richard F. Nyrop, ed., India: A Country Study (Washington, D.C.: Foreign Area Studies, 1985), 394–95.

[193] Naila Kabeer, “The Quest for National Identity: Women, Islam and the State in Bangladesh,” in Kandiyoti, ed., Women, Islam & Society, 123. One of the few studies of Bangladesh to appear in collective volumes on Islam, Kabeer’s is the sole attempt to give voice to the condition of Bangladeshi women under the repressive Ershad regime.

[194] John Burns, “Bangladesh Hopes Trial Shows a Nation of Laws,” New York Times, 4 May 1997: 14.

[195] Kabeer, “The Quest for National Identity,” 128.

[196] James Heitzman and Robert L. Worden, eds., Bangladesh: A Country Study (Washington, D.C.: Area Handbooks, 1989), 158.

[197] Richard F. Nyrop, Pakistan: A Country Study (Washington, D.C.: Foreign Area Studies, 1984), 303. For the contention that Zia was trying to unify the laws of Pakistan, fusing Muslim law with general law, see David Pearl, A Textbook on Muslim Personal Law, 2d ed. (London: Croom Helm, 1987), 40, 238–45.

[198] The degradation of women was also linked to the denigration of minorities, as is outlined in Esposito and Voll, Islam and Democracy, 112–14.

[199] The Safia Bibi case, and other cases involving women tried under the Hudood Ordinance, are reviewed in Khawar Mumtaz and Farida Shaheed, eds., Women of Pakistan: Two Steps Forward, One Step Back? (London: Zed Press, 1987), 103–105.

[200] The irony of this move has been lost on some legal scholars. David Pearl provides a detailed and seemingly comprehensive treatment of the subject, especially with reference to Pakistan and especially with reference to the post-1979 decrees of Zia. Yet nowhere does he mention the Safia Bibi case, and, in discussing another case, he observes that Aftab Hussain, then chief justice of the Federal Shari’At Court, refused to review a case because it concerned Muslim personal law, which was “excluded from examination by the court as a result of Article 203(b) of the (Pakistani) Constitution” (Muslim Personal Law, and p. 114, n. 23, 244). Why the same restriction did not apply to the Safia Bibi case remains a puzzle that admits only of political expediency as its explanation.

[201] While Pakistani feminism does not enjoy rural support, neither does its ideological enemy, Islamic fundamentalism. On the alienation of Pakistani villagers, male and female, from the mechanisms of Islamization, as also the scriptural claims of its urban agents, see the insightful essay by Richard Kurin, “Islamization: A View from the Countryside,” in Anita Weiss, ed., Islamic Reassertion in Pakistan: The Application of Islamic Laws in a Modern State (Syracuse: Syracuse University Press, 1986), 115–28.

[202] See, for instance, Ayesha Jalal, “The Convenience of Subservience: Women and the State of Pakistan,” in Kandiyoti, ed., Woman, Islam & Society, esp. 103–109, and also Mumtaz and Shaheed, eds. Women of Pakistan, 150–60.

[203] Nikki R. Keddie, “Ideology, Society and the State in Post-Colonial Muslim Societies,” in Fred Halliday and Hamza Alavi, eds., State and Ideology in the Middle East and Pakistan (London: Macmillan, 1988), 26.

[204] Aftab Hussain, chief justice of the Federal Shari’At Court during the early 1980s, is often viewed as a supporter of women’s rights because of his opinion on Safia Bibi and other personal law matters. See Mumtaz and Shaheed, eds., Women of Pakistan, 112, n. 25 and 155.

[205] The failure of Islamists to have the offensive article (203B) of the constitution deleted has been documented in Charles H. Kennedy, “Islamization and Legal Reform in Pakistan, 1979–1989,” Pacific Affairs 63.1 (Spring 1990): 66–67. Kennedy provides a close reading of all the legal maneuvers attendant on Islamization but is content to argue a single point, to wit, that Zia’s policies did not significantly alter the institutional mechanisms of statecraft in Islamabad. The inadequacy of other branches of government to provide a counterbalance to the executive is not considered, and hence the issues of concern to marginal groups, such as professional women and rural dwellers, are either downplayed or ignored.

[206] See ibid., 67 for a full expose of all the parliamentary procedures that resulted in its not so quiet demise.

[207] Despite its sometimes polemical tone, Fatima Mernissi, Le harem politique, 1987; trans. as The Veil and the Male Elite: A Feminist Interpretation of Women’s Rights in Islam (Reading: Addison-Wesley, 1991), makes a compelling case for the novelty of Qur’anic dicta about women. Less passionate in tone but fuller in its range of references to both Qur’anic passages and early Islamic traditions (hadith) about women is Barbara Stowasser, “The Status of Women in Early Islam,” in Hussain, ed. Muslim Women, 11–43.

[208] Stowasser, “The Status of Women,” 30.

[209] See especially his Islam (2d ed., Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1979), chap. 14, and also his Islam and Modernity: Transformation of an Intellectual Tradition (Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1982).

[210] Muhammad Iqbal, The Reconstruction of Religious Thought in Islam (London, 1934; reprinted Lahore: Sh. Muhammad Ashraf, 1982), 164.

[211] Jacques Waardenberg, “Muslim States, Islamic Norms and Secular Realities,” ms., ca. June 1990. Waardenberg goes on to distinguish between two kinds of Islamists, the more reflective being “fundamentalists”; the more political, “activists.” However, in what follows it is apparent that one of the defining characteristics of fundamentalists is their insistence on implementing religious ideals in the political sphere; fundamentalists are invariably political rather than reflective. It is on this crucial point, as also on the essentialist tone of his arguments about the concept of Islam, that I differ from another of Waardenberg’s wide-ranging essays: “Islam as a Vehicle of Protest,” in Ernest Gellner, ed., Islamic Dilemma: Reformers, Nationalists and Industrialization. The Southern Shore of the Mediterranean (The Hague: Mouton, 1985), 22–48.

[212] On the question of counting Muslims in America, there has been more heat than light generated, especially by the telejournalist Andy Rooney. Claiming that all Islam is inherently violent, Rooney has alleged that Muslims are the fastest growing religious community in America, already surpassing Episcopalians and closing in on Methodists. Such hyperbole stokes people’s fears. It needs to be deflated, as Jonathan D. Sarna has tried to do in a recent article, “The Rise of Islam in America,” Moment (June 1991): 34–55, where he quotes the 1990 survey by Barry A. Kosmin and Jeffrey

Scheckner, “Estimating the Muslim Population of the United States in 1990,” City University of New York (April 1991). Its authors, after extensive research and tabulation, deduce that in 1990 the total Muslim population in America numbered 800,000 immigrants, 400,000 indigenous Muslims, and less than 100,000 students. “Certainly,” they conclude, “it cannot exceed 1.5. million.”

The myth of demography once exploded does not lessen the need for dealing with Muslims in a religiously plural society; it simply makes the basis for such an undertaking more realistic and, one hopes, more fruitful.

[213] One of the favorite images of headline chasers combines the two groups, representing modern-day Muslim warriors as black-garbed women in chadors sporting guns, often in combat pose. While that makes for an electric image, it is far from the ground-level truth: Muslim military planners are less ready to admit women warriors as regular combatants than are their counterparts in the Pentagon, that bastion of patriarchal leadership for the United States armed services which, even after the superb performance of women in Operation Desert Storm in spring 1991, would not allow female officers to fly combat missions or to serve as unit commanders in the marine corps.

[214] Michel Vovelle, Ideologies and Mentalities (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1990), 11.

[215] See several works but most recently Rethinking Islam: Common Questions, Uncommon Answers (Boulder: Westview, 1994).

[216] The Second Message of Islam (Syracuse: Syracuse University Press, 1987).

[217] See particularly the detailed and valuable study of Gail Minault, The Khilafat Movement: Religious Symbolism and Political Mobilization in India (New York: Columbia University Press, 1982).

[218] Binder, Islamic Liberalism, 131–46. The criticism of Hourani that begins Binder’s analysis (129–30) is disingenuous, as is the omission of Arabic Thought in the Liberal Age from the bibliography, since Hourani opened the larger discussion of Islamic liberalism to which Binder’s own book is a sequel contribution, but otherwise Binder lays out the major issues in luxuriant detail; see also Eickelman and James Piscatori, Muslim Politics, 52–53, for a summary of ‘Ali ‘Abd ar-Raziq’s provocation.

[219] See Rethinking Islam, ca. 75.

[220] Binder, Islamic Liberalism, 169.

[221] I am using these terms in the sense that they are introduced and refined by Marshall Hodgson, following Karl Jaspers. See The Venture of Islam, 1: 50–52.

[222] On Motahhari’s contribution to the Shi’ite reformulation of ideology, see Defenders of God: The Fundamentalist Revolt Against the Modern Age, 2d ed. (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1995), 221–24.

[223] The practical face of corporate culture is not the same as the large-scale, conceptually moribund industries focusing on the Islamization of Knowledge, including the Islamization of Economics. While one may find some Malay proponents of this approach, it remains a minor voice in Malay intellectual circles.

[224] There is no space to explore the complications inherent in the formation and strategy-planning of the G-15, but suffice it to say that as of the fall 1995 meeting in Buenos Aires, Mahathir had clearly projected Malaysian participation in this body as equivalent to, or exceeding, Malaysian participation in the biennial meeting of Commonwealth heads of government.

[225] The Asian Wall Street Journal, 10–12 November 1995: 7.

[226] Chandra Muzaffar in private conversation in Penang, Malaysia, on 6 November 1995.

[227] Mukhtar Abdullah, “Historical Developments of Quality and Productivity Movements: Japan vs. The West,” in Alhabshi and Nik Hassen, eds., Quality and Productivity, 61–77.

[228] Mottahedeh,“The Islamic Movement,” 111. Alas, Mottahedeh’s voice is scarcely heard beyond Harvard Yard, while Huntington, though also at Harvard, is trying to become the benchmark for all international policy planning. He is often invoked, without even being cited, as in The Economist, where an article on Russia and China suddenly veers toward the Muslim world, noting that “in 20 or 30 years’ time, a Muslim power could arise to join the ranks of world powers. There would then be half a dozen of them, including America and Europe, possibly Japan, probably Russia. Of this number, China might well reckon that the Islamic power would be the one most likely to help it counterbalance what it will see as its chief rivals, America and Europe” (The Economist, 26 April 1997:20). Such sabre rattling and Islam bashing is exactly what Huntington’s so-called thesis promotes, but its factual basis in the lived experience of most Muslim polities, including those of Southeast Asia, is thin and vacuous.

[229] R. L. Schuyler’s phrase as developed by J. H. Hexter in “The Historian and His Day,” Reappraisals in History (New York: Harper & Row, 1961), 1–13. I am indebted to Douglas Streusand for this reference and also for elaborating its significance in Islamic historiography.

[230] James Fallows, Looking at the Sun: The Rise of the New East Asian Economic and Political System (New York: Vintage Books, 1995), 299.

[231] Ibid., 308.

[232] See Mahathir's statement on 45–46, paraphrased, in Quality and Productivity. The technical conversation has shifted from the evils of riba, or usury, to the benefits of zakat, or almsgiving, as in Nik Mustapha Nik Hassan, "Economic Significance of Zakat," in Hamiza Ibrahim and Hasnan Hakim, eds., Quest for Excellence (Kuala Lumpur: IKIM, 1994), 115–20. Still others, like M. Umer Chapra, try to chart a path for Islamic economic theory that goes beyond any single measure. Too often the high-level theorists substitute platitudinous generalities for specific guidelines, ignoring the very real gap between Islamic economic theory and the actual practice of Muslim banking. See, e.g., Chapra's critique of the pragmatic approach by Timur Kuran in Islam and the Economic Challenge (Herndon, Va.: International Institute of Islamic Thought, 1995), 225–27.

[233] M. S. Dobbs-Higginson, a former chief executive officer of Merrill Lynch Asia, is unequivocal about the role of India. "The real need for Mahathir, and ASEAN, is to review the question of India's and Australasia's participation in this vision [of regional economic growth]. Pursuing it without them will, I suspect, prove unfruitful in the long run." Asia Pacific: Its Role in the New World Disorder (London: Mandarin, 1994), 322.

[234] One of the most unabashed Malaysia boosters is John Naisbitt, who used his fellowship at the Institute for International and Strategic Studies in Kuala Lumpur to write his recent futurist book: Megatrends Asia (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1996), in which he features Malaysia as trendsetter for an Asian economic boom. Like too many forecasters, his crystal ball reflects more Pollyanna than critical thinking.

[235] Zam (Zainuddin Maidin), The Other Side of Mahathir (English trans. Kuala Lumpur: Utusan Publications & Distributors, 1994), 242–43.

[236] While the basic book on this theme in a Christian context remains H. Richard Niebuhr, Christ and Culture (New York: Harper & Brothers, 1951), several authors have noted the tension between religion and culture in Muslim history, including Izetbegovic in his classic work, Islam between East and West; Vincent J. Cornell, “Towards a Cooperation among People of Different World Religions,” in Yaacob and Abdul Rahman, eds. Towards a Positive Islamic World-View, 90–98; and, with reference to juridical norms for women, Amina Wadud-Muhsin, Qur’an and Woman (Selangoor: Faja Bakti Sdn. Bhd., 1992), and her excellent contribution to Norani Othman and Cecilia Ng Choon Sim, eds., Gender, Culture and Religion (Kuala Lumpur: Persatuan Sains Sosial Malaysia, 1995). Titled “Gender, Culture and Religion: an Islamic Perspective,” it makes clear in brief strokes how “the cultural inflections of the Islamic teachings” are not the same as first principles (30–38).

[237] Syed Othman Alhabshi, Jurnal IKIM/IKIM Journal 2.2 (1994): 8.

[238] Syed Othman Alhabshi, “Mental Change to Cope 2020” Jurnal IKIM/IKIM Journal 1.1 (1993), which reads more like a pep talk for Mahathir’s 2020 speech than a systematic analysis.

[239] See the brief reference to this incident in the often helpful, always majesterial overview of Malaysian life provided by M. S. Dobbs-Higginson, Asia Pacific, 317.

[240] Other non-Muslim, non-Malay groups had already been alert to the danger posed by increasing resort to religious rhetoric as the instrument of political jockeying in Malaysia. See Far Eastern Economic Review, 22 January 1987: 25. “Non-Muslims and the more secular-minded Muslims fear that Pas and Unmo, by trying to outdo each other on the Islamic chessboard ... may have introduced or tried to introduce Islamic reforms much too fast for the party leaders themselves to cope with in terms of fulfillment of promises—and for society to absorb. Heightened expectations and unrealistic demands by radical youths are potentially fertile soil for religious tensions, especially given the moral righteousness of religious aspirations." Despite its journalese, this summary statement better catches the generational problem in Malaysia than the full-length article by Shamsul A.B., "Religion and Ethnic Politics in Malaysia: The Significance of the Islamic Resurgence Phenomenon," in Keyes, Asian Visions of Authority, 99–116; the latter, perhaps due to the author's involvement in one branch of Islamic resurgence in Malaysia, Pusat Islam, reads too much like a bulletin board monitoring religious traffic on the peninsula. Though it cites a volume highlighting the bases for interreligious tensions in Malaysia, it undervalues the limits of Islam as a politically dominant religion, as do the coauthors of that volume, especially in their consideration of state policies toward Chinese religious practices. See Susan Ackerman and Raymond Lee, Heaven in Transition: NonMuslim Religious Innovation and Ethnic Identity in Malaysia (Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press 1988), 51, 120–53.

[241] Wadud-Muhsin, Qur'an and Woman. While it is debatable that her approach is as new as she claims, her double effort to read the Qur'an directly from a woman's viewpoint, sidestepping all medieval exegesis (largely by men), and also to "demonstrate the relevance of the Qur'an to the concerns of the modern woman" (95), has produced a book with wide-ranging application to the issue of Muslim norms.

[242] A 1993 Malay-German conference, featuring a speech by Mahathir, addressed a wide range of social dimensions and uses of religion, yet it lacked a single woman contributor. See Syed Othman Alhabshi and Syed Omar Syed Agil, eds. The Role and Influence of Religion in Society (Kuala Lumpur: IKIM, 1994).

[243] All three citations from Mahathir's speeches are indebted to Maidin, The Other Side of Mahathir, 138–40.

[244] Jan Goodwin, Price of Honour (London: Warner, 1994), 205.

[245] Of all the critiques of Huntington's banal, simplistic, and ahistorical thesis, the one that applies especially to Southeast Asia comes from the Islamicist Frederick Denny. Quoting from Huntington's original 1993 Foreign Affairs article (the 1996 book of the same title had not yet appeared), Denny notes that "Huntington speaks only of 'the crescentshaped Islamic bloc of nations from the bulge of Africa to central Asia' (32). What about Southeast Asia, where about a fifth of the world's Muslims live? Surely the author knows about Indonesia and Malaysia. Don't they count or do they simply provide an inconvenient set of conditions contrary to his argument about the clash of civilizations?" See Frederick Denny, "American Perceptions of Islam and Muslims," in Yaacob and Abdul Rahman, eds., Towards a Positive Islamic World-View, 71–72.

[246] Chandra Muzaffar, Just Viewpoints (Penang: Just World Trust, 1994), 17. There is, of course, a danger in this argument, as also in much of Muzaffar's writing, that it/he becomes susceptible to a variant of the conspiracy theory: they are all out to get us, we must resist, only resistance works, even if it brings, a la Fanon, death. Yet Muzaffar does fluctuate between an outright condemnation of others' bad faith and the advocacy of new strategies for a just use of resources on the part of dominating actors (G-7 but also Scandinavian countries). See especially his Human Rights and the New World Order: (Penang: Just World Trust, 144–76.

[247] Alhabshi and Nik Hassan eds., Quality and Productivity, 45.

[248] Teik, Hoo Boo, Paradoxes of Mahathirism, 166.

[249] Muzaffar, Just Viewpoints, 13.

[250] Teik, Hoo Boo, Paradoxes of Mahathirism (Kuala Lumpur: Oxford University Press, 1995), 186.

[251] See K. George, “Malaysia’s Economic Progress: The Other Side of the Coin,” Aliran Monthly (1995): 10–17.

[252] For the range of homologies that apply to Arabic fitna, usually rendered into English as “sedition” or “disorder,” see the lexical display mounted by E. W. Lane, Arabic-English Lexicon (reprinted Cambridge: Islamic Texts Society, 1974), 2:2335–36.

[253] Etan Kohlberg, “The Development of the Imami Shi’i Doctrine of Jihad,” Zeitschrift der Deutschen Morganlandischen Gesellschaft 126 (1976), 1:68. Peters (Jihad in Mediwal and Modern Islam [Leioten: E. J. Brill 1977]) cites Kohlberg’s article in his bibliography but seems to have ignored its content otherwise.

[254] The 17 November 1995 issue of the weekly political journal Al-Hawadith, for instance, discusses at length the Palestinian Jihad group from the West Bank. Fathi Shaqaqi, their leader in exile in Syria, was assassinated while in Malta, presumably by Israeli agents, in late October 1995, and his successor, Ramadan ‘Abdallah Shalah, has vowed revenge (intiqam), declaring that “our jihad is not only military but also religious, for our project is the establishment of Islam.” At the same time, he, a Sunni Muslim, acknowledges that he could not hope to carry on the struggle without the assistance of others, especially the Iranian-backed Hizbollah in southern Lebanon, who “provide humanitarian aid, especially for the families of martyrs” (citations from 26 November issue of Al-Hayat, a Saudi daily published from London, then syndicated elsewhere).

Even as the cycle of violence never stops in the Middle East, but merely spins into newer episodes of riposte or retaliation, so it is necessary to recognize its cultural limits. Details on the latest invocation of jihad are less important than the index of symbolic capital it provides to the continuous engagement with military-political jihad in West Asia, an engagement not found in Southeast Asia.

[255] Fouad Ajami, “In the Pharaoh’s Shadow: Religion and Authority in Egypt,” in Piscatori, ed., Islam in the Political Process, 34.

[256] See Emmanuel Sivan, “The Arab Nation-State: In Search of a Usable Past,” Middle East Review 19.3 (Spring 1987): 29. Sivan develops his views on jihad in a subsequent article, confirming my view that the dominant force in Muslim politics has been what he calls “adamant nation-state egotism,” but unlike me, he surmises that a turn to Islamic radicalism (the term he prefers over “fundamentalism”) has become pronounced and irreversible. He even predicts that “the anti-apostate (murtadd) Jihad is bound to be the norm towards the end of this century.” But with what result, and also with what alternatives from polities put on the defensive? These are questions that beg to be answered, yet are omitted from an otherwise deft essay. See “Jihad: Text, Myth, Historical Realities,” in Evelyne Patlagean and Alain Le Boulluec, eds. Les Retours aux ecritures: Fondamentalismes presents et passes (Peeters: Louvain-Paris, 1994), 83–99.

[257] Muhammad Shahrur, Dirasat Islamiyat Mu’asirat (fi’d-dawla wal-mujtama’) (Al-Ahali: Damascus, 1994), 341–69.

[258] Morteza Motahhari, Jihad: The Holy War of Islam and Its Legitimacy in the Quran, trans, Mohammad S. Tawheedi (Albany, Ca.: Moslem Student Association [Persian Speaking Group], n.d.), 35.

[259] Ibid., 32.

[260] Ibid., 36–37.

[261] Ibid., 52–53.

[262] Jihad, for Shaykh Fadlallah, is directly linked to da’wa, and the crucial discussion of jihad in his book takes place in the subchapter titled “The Instrumentality of jihad in Da’wa.” Since jihad, like da’wa, is linked to the requirements of actualizing power, its invocation becomes justified, or legalized, by the quest for power. Hence Shaykh Fadlallah declares that “the legalization of jihad emanates from the need of Islam for power” (wa-hiya inna tashri’A ’l-jihad intalaqa min hajati ’l-Islam ila quwwat). Yet the actual steps by which this gambit is deployed are not spelled out. See Muhammad Husayn Fadlallah, Al-Islam wa-mantiq al-quwwat (Beirut: Dar al-Islamiya, 1981), 204.

[263] Quoted from Sahifah-i Nur: Majmu’ah-i Rahnimud’ha-yi Imam Khomeini (Tehran: Vizarat-i Irshad-i Islami, 1362/1983), v. 13:92–93, as cited in Heidar Ghajar Azodanloo, “Discourses of Mobilization in PostRevolutionary Iran,” (Ph.D. dissertation, University of Minnesota, 1992), 42. As a counterpoint to the narratives from Reinhold Loeffler cited in what follows, one should consult all of Azodanloo’s study, but especially chapters 4 and 5 dealing with discourses of martyrdom on the battlefront, followed by strategies for consoling, as well as maintaining the loyalty, of veterans’ families.

I am indebted to Professor Bruce Lincoln for providing me with a copy of Azodanloo’s dissertation, completed under his supervision while he was still at the University of Minnesota.

[264] Loeffler. Islam in Practice, 229.

[265] Ibid., 235.

[266] Ibid., 237.

[267] Ibid., 240.

[268] Eric Hoogland, “The Pulse of Iran Today,” 45–46.

[269] One could elaborate on the theme of striving for justice as a modern ideological appeal, exceeding its traditional formulations while still connoting jihad, to the Imami Shi<is of Iran. For instance, the influential anti-Pahlavi pamphleteer ‘Ali Shari’Ati formulated an “order of unity” (nezam-i tawhid) that harked back to the martyrdom of Imam Hussein. Hussein’s sacred sacrifice became, in Shari’Ati’s view, not only the historical model for continuous opposition to persistent evils, but also the existential catalyst for “striving toward justice, equity, human brotherhood, public ownership of wealth, and, most important of all, a classless society” (Ervand Abrahamian, Iran between Two Revolutions [Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1982]: 466).

[270] Fallows, Looking at the Sun, 309–14.

[271] Riduan Wu Chia Chung Ibn Abdallah, “The Chinese Muslims of Singapore: Their Positions and Contributions,” paper delivered at a Seminar on Islam and Confucianism: Universality of Islam in Kuching, Sarawak (Malaysia), 17–18 Nov. 1995: 6–8.

 Bibliography

<biblio>

Abd-Allah, Umar F. 1983. The Islamic Struggle in Syria. Berkeley: Mizan Press.

Abdullah, Mukhtar. 1995. “Historical Developments of Quality and Productivity Movements: Japan vs. the West,” in Syed Othman Al-habshi and Nik Mustapha Nik Hassan, eds., Quality and Productivity: Creating a Difference in Modern Industry and Corporations. Kuala Lumpur: Institute of Islamic Understanding.

Abrahamian, Ervand. 1982. Iran between Two Revolutions. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

-- 1988. “Ali Shariati: Ideologue of the Iranian Revolution,” in Edmund Burke, III, and Ira M. Lapidus, eds. Islam, Politics and Social Movements. Berkeley: University of California Press, 289–97.

-- 1993. Khomeinism: Essays on the Islamic Republic. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Ackerman, Susan, and Raymond Lee, eds. 1988. Heaven in Transition: Non-Muslim Religious Innovation and Ethnic Identity in Malaysia. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press

Afkhami, Mahnaz, and Erika Friedl, eds. 1994. In the Eye of the Storm: Women in Post-Revolutionary Iran. Syracuse: Syracuse University Press.

Al-Azm, Sadik. 1993–94. “Islamic Fundamentalism Reconsidered: A Critical Outline of Problems, Ideas and Approaches,” South Asia Bulletin: Comparative Studies of Southern Asia, Africa and the Middle East. Part 1, 13.1 and 2 (1993): 93–121; Part 2. 14.1 (1994): 73–98.

Alhabshi, Syed Othman, and Syed Omar Syed Agil, eds. 1994. The Role and Influence of Religion in Society. Kuala Lumpur: IKIM.

Alhabshi, Syed Othman, and Nik Mustapha Nik Hassan, eds. 1995. Quality and Productivity: Creating a Difference in Modern Industry and Corporations. Kuala Lumpur: Institute of Islamic Understanding.

Ali, Rabia, and Lawrence Lifschultz, eds. 1993. Why Bosnia? Writings on the Balkan War. Stoney Creek: The Pamphleteer's Press.

Al-i Ahmad, Jalal. 1984. Occidentosis: A Plague from the West. Trans. R. Campbell. Berkeley: Mizan Press.

Amirahmadi, Hooshang. 1990. Revolution and Economic Transition: The Iranian Experience. Albany, State University of New York Press.

Anderson, Benedict. 1983. Imagined Communities: Reflections on the Origin and Spread of Nationalism. London: Verso. Reprinted 1991.

Anderson, Lisa. 1991. "Obligation and Accountability: Islamic Politics in North Africa." Daedalus 120.3: 93–112.

Arkoun, Mohammed. 1987. Rethinking Islam Today. Georgetown: Center for Contemporary Arab Studies.

-- 1994. Rethinking Islam: Common Questions, Uncommon Answers. Boulder: Westview Press.

Armstrong, John. 1982. Nations Before Nationalism. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

Atiya, Nayra. 1982. Khul-Khaal: Five Egyptian Women Tell Their Story. Syracuse: Syracuse University Press.

Azari, Farah, ed. 1983. Women of Iran: The Conflict with Fundamentalist Islam. Ithaca: Ithaca Press.

Azodanloo, Heidar Ghajar. 1992. “Discourses of Mobilization in PostRevolutionary Iran.” Ph.D. dissertation, University of Minnesota.

Badran, Margot, and Miriam Cooke, eds. 1990. Opening the Gates: A Century of Arab Feminist Writings. London and Bloomington: Virago and Indiana University Press.

Badran, Margot. 1995. Feminists, Islam, and Nation: Gender and the Making of Modern Egypt. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

Baker, Raymond W. 1990. Sadat and After: Struggles for Egypt’s Political Soul. Cambridge: Harvard University Press.

Bakhash, Shaul. 1984. The Reign of the Ayatollahs: Iran and the Islamic Revolution. New York: Basic Books.

Barone, Charles A. 1985. Marxist Thought on Imperialism: Survey and Critique. Armonk, N.Y.: M. E. Sharpe.

Barraclough, Geoffrey, ed. 1982. The Times Atlas of World History. Maplewood, N.J.: Hammond.

Bill, James, and Carl Leiden. 1979. Politics in the Middle East. Boston: Little, Brown.

Binder, Leonard. 1988. Islamic Liberalism. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Bjorkman, J. W., ed. 1988. Fundamentalism, Revivalists and Violence in South Asia. Riverdale, Md.: The Riverdale Company.

Bloom, Harold. 1992. The American Religion: The Emergence of the Post-Christian Nation. New York: Simon & Schuster.

Bouhdiba, Abdelwahab. 1985. Sexuality in Islam. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul.

Brown, Norman O. 1991. Apocalypse and/or Metamorphosis. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Bulliet, Richard W. 1994. Islam: The View from the Edge. New York: Columbia University Press.

Calhoun, Craig. 1992. “Why Nationalism? Sovereignty, Self-Determination and Identity in a World-System of States.” Ms.

Casanova, Jose. 1994. Public Religions in the Modern World. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Chapra, M. Umer. 1995. Islam and the Economic Challenge. Herndon: International Institute of Islamic Thought.

Chefdor, Monique, et al. 1986. Modernism: Challenges and Perspectives. Urbana: University of Illinois Press.

Choveiri, Youssef M. 1990. Islamic Fundamentalism. Boston: Twayne.

Cooke, Miriam. 1995. “Ayyam min hayati: The Prison Memoirs of a Muslim Sister.” Journal of Arabic Literature 26.1–2.

Corm, Georges. 1988. Fragmentation of the Middle East: The Last Thirty Years. London: Hutchinson.

Cragg, Kenneth. 1992. The House of Islam. Belmont: Dickenson.

Dabashi, Hamid. 1993. Theology of Discontent: The Ideological Foundation of the Islamic Revolution in Iran. New York: New York University Press.

Davidson, Basil. 1992. The Black Man’s Burden: Africa and the Curse of the Nation-State. New York: Times Books/Random House.

Dobbs-Higginson, M. S. 1994. Asia Pacific: Its Role in the New World Disorder. London: Mandarin.

Eickelman, Dale F. and James Piscatori. 1996. Muslim Politics. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

Embree, Ainslee T. 1990. Utopias in Conflict: Religion and Nationalism in Modern India. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Enayat, Hamid. 1982. Modern Islamic Political Thought. London: Macmillan.

Engineer, Ashgar Ali. ed. 1987. The Shah Bano Controversy. Hyderabad: Orient Longman.

Esposito, John L., and John O. Voll. 1997. Islam and Democracy. New York: Oxford University Press.

Fabian, Johannes. 1986. Language and Colonial Power: The Appropriation of Swahili in the Former Belgian Congo 1880–1938. New York: Cambridge University Press.

Fadlallah, Muhammad Husayn. 1981 Al-Islam wa-mantiq al-quwwat (Islam and the logic of power). Beirut: Dar al-Islamiya.

Falk, Richard. 1971. The Endangered Planet. New York: Vintage/Random House.

Fallows, James. 1995. Looking at the Sun: The Rise of the New East Asian Economic and Political System. New York: Vintage Books.

Fanon, Frantz. 1961/1963. The Wretched of the Earth, trans. Constance Farrington. New York: Grove Press. Reprinted 1991 by Grove Weidenfeld.

-- 1964/1965. A Dying Colonialism, trans. Haakon Chevalier. New York: Grove Press.

Feuer, Lewis S. 1975. Ideology and the Ideologists. New York: Harper & Row.

Fox, Richard, ed. 1990. Nationalist Ideologies and the Production of National Cultures. Washington, D.C.: American Anthropological Association.

Friedl, Erika. 1989. Women of Deh Koh: Women’s Lives in an Iranian Village. Washington, D.C.: Smithsonian.

Friedman, Thomas L. 1989. From Beirut to Jerusalem. New York: Farrar Straus Giroux.

Fukuyama, Francis. 1992. The End of History and The Last Man. New York: Free Press.

Geertz, Clifford. 1968. Islam Observed: Religious Development in Morocco and Indonesia. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Gellner, Ernest. 1983. Nations and Nationalism. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.

-- , ed. 1985. Islamic Dilemma: Reformers, Nationalists, and Industrialization. The Southern Shore of the Mediterranean. The Hague: Mouton.

1994. Conditions of Liberty: Civil Society and Its Rivals. New York: Allen Lane/The Penguin Press.

Giddens, Anthony. 1985. The Nation-State and Violence. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press.

Gilsenan, Michael. 1982. Recognizing Islam: Religion and Society in the Modern Arab World. New York: Pantheon.

Goodwin, Jan. 1994. Price of Honour: Muslim Women Lift the Veil of Silence on the Islamic World. London: Warner.

Goody, Jack. 1961. “Religion and Ritual: A Definition Problem.” British Journal of Sociology 12:142–64.

Gouldner, Alvin W. 1976. The Dialectic of Ideology and Technology. New York: Seabury Press.

Greeley, Andrew M. 1982. Religion: A Secular Theory. New York: Macmillan.

Greenfeld, Liah. 1993. Nationalism: Five Roads to Modernity. Cambridge: Harvard University Press.

Guenena, Nemat. 1986. “The Jihad: An Islamic Alternative in Egypt.” Cairo Papers in Social Science 8.2 (Summer).

Guha, Ranajit, ed. 1982. Subaltern Studies. Vol. 1. Delhi: Oxford University Press.

-- 1983. Subaltern Studies. Vol. 2. Delhi: Oxford University Press.

-------- 1984. Subaltern Studies. Vol. 3. Delhi: Oxford University Press.

-------- 1985. Subaltern Studies. Vol. 4. Delhi: Oxford University Press.

Gutmann, Roy. 1993. Witness to Genocide. New York: Macmillan.

Halliday, Fred, and Hamza Alavi, eds. 1988. State and Ideology in the Middle East and Pakistan. London: Macmillan.

Harrison, Christopher. 1988. France and Islam in West Africa, 18601960. New York: Cambridge University Press.

Hijab, Nadia. 1988. Womanpower: The Arab Debate on Women at Work. New York: Cambridge University Press.

Hiro, Dilip. 1989. Holy Wars: The Rise of Islamic Fundamentalism. New York: Routledge.

Hobsbawm, Eric J. 1962. The Age of Revolution 1789–1848. New York: Mentor.

-- 1991. Nations and Nationalism since 1870. London: Canto Press.

-- 1993. “The New Threat to History.” The New York Review of Books 16 December 1993: 62–64.

Hodgson, Marshall G. S. 1979. The Venture of Islam: Conscience and History in a World Civilization. 3 vols. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

-- 1993. Rethinking World History. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Hollis, Martin, and Steven Lukes, eds. 1982. Rationality and Relativism. Cambridge: MIT Press.

Hooker, M. B., ed. 1983. Islam in South-east Asia. Leiden: E. J. Brill.

Horowitz, Donald L. 1985. Ethnic Groups in Conflict. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press.

Horton, Robin. 1967. “African Traditional Thought and Western Science.” Africa 38:50–71, 155–87.

Hourani, Albert. 1991a. A History of the Arab Peoples. Cambridge: Harvard University Press.

-- 1991b. Islam in European Thought. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Hunter, Shireen T., ed. 1988. The Politics of Islamic Revivalism. Bloomington: University of Indiana Press.

Huntington, Samuel P. 1993. “The Clash of Civilizations?” Foreign Affairs 72.3 (Summer): 22–49.

-- 1996. The Clash of Civilizations and the Remaking of World Order. New York: Simon & Schuster.

Hussain, Freda, ed. 1984. Muslim Women. New York: St. Martin’s Press.

Iqbal, Allama Muhammad. 1934/1982. The Reconstruction of Religious Thought in Islam. Lahore: Sh. Muhammad Ashraf.

Islamoglu-Inan, Huri, ed. 1987. The Ottoman Empire and the WorldEconomy. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Issawi, Charles. 1988. The Fertile Crescent, 1800–1914: A Documentary and Economic History. New York: Oxford.

Izetbegovic, ‘Alija ‘Ali. 1984. Islam between East and West. Indianapolis: American Trust Publications.

Juergensmeyer, Mark. 1993. The New Cold War? Religious Nationalism Confronts the Secular State. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press.

Kandiyoti, Deniz, ed. 1991. Women, Islam & the State. Philadelphia: Temple University Press.

Kapferer, Bruce. 1991. “Nationalist Ideology and a Comparative Anthropology,” Ethnos 54.3–4: 161–99.

Kasaba, Resat. 1988. The Ottoman Empire and the World Economy: The Nineteenth Century. Albany: State University of New York Press.

Kelly, Ron, Jonathan Friedlander, and Anita Colby, eds. 1993. Irangeles: Iranians in Los Angeles. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Kepel, Gilles, and Yann Richard, eds. 1990. Intellectuels et militants del’islam contemporain. Paris: Le Seuil.

Keyes, Charles F., et al. 1994. Asian Visions of Authority: Religion and the Modern States of East and Southeast Asia. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press.

Khoury, Philip S., and Joseph Kostiner, eds. 1990. Tribes and State Formation in the Middle East. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Kliever, Lonnie D., ed. 1987. The Terrible Meek: Religion and Revolution in Cross-Cultural Perspective. New York: Paragon.

Kramer, Martin. 1993. “Islam versus Democracy.” Commentary 95.1: 35–42.

Lacapra, Dominick. 1983. Rethinking Intellectual History. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.

Laitin, David D. 1986. Hegemony and Culture: Politics and Religious Change among the Yoruba. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Landau, Jacob. 1990. The Politics of Pan-Islam: Ideology and Organization. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Lapidus, Ira M. 1988. A History of Islamic Societies. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Laroui, Abdallah. 1976. The Crisis of the Arab Intellectual: Traditionalism or Historicism? Trans. Diarmid Cammell. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press.

Lawrence, Bruce B. 1989. Defenders of God: The Fundamentalist Revolt against the Modern Age. San Francisco: Harper & Row. (2d edition, Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1995.)

-- 1991. “The Religious Idiom of Violence: A View from Indonesia.” In Mark Juergensmeyer, ed. Violence and the Sacred in the Modern World, a special edition of Terrorism and Political Violence 3.3: 82–100.

Lawson, Fred. 1982. “Social Bases for the Hamah Revolt,” Middle East Reports in Progress (MERIP) 12.9 (Nov.-Dec.): 24–28.

-- . 1987. “Muslim Fundamentalist Movements: Reflections toward a New Approach,” in Barbara F. Stowassar, ed., The Islamic Impluse. London: Croom Helm.

Lindbeck, George A. 1984. The Nature of Doctrine: Religion and Theology in a Postliberal Age. Philadelphia: Westminster.

Loeffler, Reinhold. 1988. Islam and Practice: Religious Lives in a Persian Village. Albany: State University of New York Press.

MacLeod, Arlene. 1991. Accommodating Protest: Working Women, the New Veiling, and Change in Cairo. New York: Columbia University Press.

Malcolm, Noel. 1994. Bosnia: A Short History. New York: New York University Press.

Malson, Micheline, et al. 1989. Feminist Theory in Practice and Process. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Migdal, Joel S. 1988. Strong Societies and Weak States: State-Society Relations and State Capabilities in the Third World. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

Minault, Gail. 1982. The Kilafat Movement: Religious Symbolism and Political Mobilization in India. New York: Columbia University Press.

Moghadam, Valentine M., 1993. Modernizing Women: Gender and Social Change in the Middle East. Boulder: Lynne Rienner.

-- . ed. 1994a. Gender and National Identity: Women and Politics in Muslim Societies. London: Zed Books.

-- . ed. 1994b. Identity Politics and Women: Cultural Reassertions and Feminisms in International Perspective. Boulder: Westview Press.

Moore, Barrington, Jr. 1966. Social Origins of Dictatorship and Democracy: Lord and Peasant in the Making of the Modern World. Boston: Beacon Press.

Moore, Clement H. 1965. Tunisia since Independence: The Dynamics of a One-Party System. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Morey, Robert. 1992. The Islamic Invasion: Confronting the World’s Fastest Growing Religion. Eugene, Ore.: Harvest House.

Morgan, Robin, ed. 1984. Sisterhood is Global. New York: AnchorDoubleday.

Mortimer, Edward. 1982. Faith and Power: The Politics of Islam. New York: Random House.

Motahhari, Mortaza. n.d. Sexual Ethics in Islam. Muslim Student Association—Persian Speaking Group.

Mottahedeh, Roy P. 1995. “The Islamic Movement: The Case for Democratic Inclusion,” Contention 4.3: 107–27.

Mottahedeh, Roy P. 1996. “The Clash of Civilizations: An Islamicist’s Critique,” Harvard Middle Eastern and Islamic Review 2.2:1–26.

Moussalli, Ahmad S. 1992. Radical Islamic Fundamentalism: The Ideological and Political Discourse of Sayyid Qutb. Beirut: American University of Beirut.

Mumtaz, Khawar, and Farida Shaheed, eds. 1987. Women of Pakistan: Two Steps Forward, One Step Backward. London: Zed Press.

Munson, Henry, Jr. 1988. Islam and Revolution in the Middle East. New Haven: Yale University Press.

Murphey, Rhoads. 1992. A History of Asia. New York: HarperCollins.

Muzaffar, Chandra. 1993. Human Rights and the New World Order.

Penang: Just World Trust.

-------- . 1994. Just Viewpoints. Penang: Just World Trust.

Nagata, Judith. 1984. The Reflowering of Malaysian Islam. Vancouver: University of British Columbia Press.

Naisbitt, John. 1996. Megatrends Asia. New York: Simon and Schuster.

Nashat, Guity. 1983. Women and Revolution in Iran. Boulder: Westview Press.

Nasr, Sayyed Vali Reza. 1994. The Vanguard of the Islamic Revolution: The Jama’at-i Islami of Pakistan. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Niebuhr, H. Richard. 1951. Christ and Culture. New York: Harper & Brothers.

Ninian Smart and Peter Merkl eds. Religion and Politics in the Modern World. New York: New York University Press.

Othman, Norani and Cecilia Ng Choon Sim, eds. 1995. Gender, Culture and Religion. Kuala Lumpur: Persatuan Sains Sasial Malaysia.

Panikkar, Raimundo. 1983. “Regional Politics: The Western Dilemma,” in Niniam Smart and Peter Merkl, eds., Religion and Politics in the Modern World. New York: New York University Press.

Patlagean, Evelyne, and Alain Le Boulluec, eds. 1994. Les Retours aux ecritures: Fondamentalismes presents et passes. Peeters: Louvain-Paris.

Paz, Octavio. 1985. One Earth, Four or Five Worlds: Reflections on Contemporary History. New York: Harcourt, Brace, Jovanovich.

Pearl, David. 1987. A Textbook on Muslim Personal Law. London: Croom Helm.

Perinbaum, B. Marie. 1982. Holy Violence: The Revolutionary thought of Frantz Fanon. Washington, D.C.: Three Continents Press.

Peters, Rudolph, 1977. Jihad in Medieval and Modern Islam. Leiden: E. J. Brill.

Pick, Daniel. 1993. War Machine: The Rationalisation of Slaughter in the Modern Age. New Haven: Yale University Press.

Piscatori, James, ed. 1983. Islam in the Political Process. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

-- 1986. Islam in a World of Nation-States. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Pletsch, Carl E. 1981. “The Three Worlds, or the Division of Social Scientific Labor, circa 1950–1975,” Comparative Studies in Society and History 23: (October): 565–90.

Qutb, Muhammad. 1977. Islam: The Misunderstood Religion. Damascus: The Holy Koran Publishing House.

Qutb, Sayyid. 1964. Ma’Alim fi’t-Tariq (Milestones on the path). Cairo: Dar ash-Shuruq.

Rahman, Fazlur. 1979. Islam. 2d ed. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

-- . 1982. Islam and Modernity: Transformation of an Intellectual Tradition. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Rai, Janak Raj, ed. 1986. Shah Bano. New Delhi: Rajiv Publications.

Richards, Alan, and John Waterbury. 1990. A Political Economy of the Middle East: State, Class and Economic Development. Boulder: Westview Press.

Roy, Olivier. 1994. The Failure of Political Islam, trans. Carol Folk. Cambridge: Harvard University Press.

Rudolph, Susan, and James Piscatori, eds. 1997. Transnational Religion & Fading States. Boulder: Westview Press.

Saadawi, Nawal El. 1982. The Hidden Face of Eve. Boston: Beacon Press.

Sabagh, George, ed. 1989. The Modern Economic and Social History of the Middle East in Its World Context. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Sagiv, David. 1995. Fundamentalism and Intellectuals in Egypt 19731993. London: Frank Cass.

Said, Edward. 1983. “Opponents, Audiences, Constituencies and Community.” In Hal Foster, ed. The Anti-Aesthetic: Essays on Postmodern Culture. Port Townsend, Wash.: Bay Press, 135–59.

Salame, Ghassan, ed. 1994. Democracy without Democrats? The Renewal of Politics in the Muslim World. London: I. B. Tauris.

Salem, Norma. 1984. Habib Bourguiba, Islam and the Creation of Tunisia, London: Croom Helm.

Seale, Patrick. 1988. Asad: The Struggle for the Middle East. Berkeley: University of California Press.

Segal, Robert. 1994. “Joachim Wach and the History of Religions.” Religious Studies Review 20.3: 197–201.

Sekyi-Otu, Ato. 1996. Fanon’s Dialectic of Experience. Cambridge: Harvard University Press.

Seligman, Adam B. 1992. The Idea of a Civil Society. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

Sharabi, Hisham, 1988, Neopatriarchy: A Theory of Distorted Change in Arab Society. New York: Oxford University Press.

Shahrur, Muhammad. 1994. Dirasat Islamiya Mu’asira (fi’d-dawla wal-mujtama<) (Contemporary Islamic studies on the state and society). Al-Ahali: Damascus.

Sinha, Niroj, ed. 1989. Women and Violence. New Delhi: Vikas.

Skocpol, Theda, ed. 1984. Vision and Method in Historical Sociology. New York: Cambridge University Press.

Smart, Ninian, and Peter Merkl, eds. 1983. Religion and Politics in the Modern World. New York: New York University Press.

Smith, Anthony D. 1979. Nationalism in the Twentieth Century. New York: New York University Press.

Smith, Jonathan Z. 1982. Imagining Religion: From Babylon to Jonestown. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Smith, Wilfred C. 1957. Islam in Modern History. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

-- 1962. The Meaning and End of Religion. New York: Macmillan.

-- 1981. On Understanding Islam. Mouton: The Hague.

Snyder, Louis L. 1982. Global Mini-Nationalisms: Autonomy or Independence. Westport, Conn.: Westport Press.

Spivak, Gayatri Chakravorty. 1987. In Other Worlds: Essays in Cultural Politics. New York: Methuen.

Tabari, Azar, and Nahid Yeganeh, eds. 1982. In the Shadow of Islam. The Woman’s Movement in Iran. London: Zed Press.

Taha, Ustad Mahmoud. 1987. The Second Message of Islam. Syracuse: Syracuse University Press.

Talbot, Ian. 1988. The Punjab and the Raj, 1849–1947. Riverdale: Riverdale Company.

Tamimi, Azzam, ed. 1993. Power-sharing Islam? London: Liberty for Muslim World Publications.

Teik, Hoo Boo. Paradoxes of Mahathirism. 1995. Kuala Lumpur: Oxford University Press.

Tibi, Bassam. 1981. Arab Nationalism: A Critical Enquiry. New York: St. Martin’s Press. Reprinted 1990.

-- 1989. The Crisis of Modern Islam: A Preindustrial Culture in the Scientific-Technological Age. Salt Lake City: University of Utah Press.

-- 1990. Islam and the Cultural Accommodation of Social Change. Boulder: Westview Press.

Turner, Bryan. 1983. Marx and the End of Orientalism. London: George Allen and Unwin.

Van der Veer, Peter. 1988. Gods on Earth: The Management of Religious Experience and Identity in a North Indian Pilgrimage Centre. London: Athlone Press.

Van Laue, Theodore. 1987. The World Revolution of Westernization. New York: Oxford University Press.

Vieille, Paul, and Farhad Khosrokhavar. 1990. Le Discours populaire de la revolution iranienne. 2 vols. Paris: Contemporaneite.

Vovelle, Michel. 1990. Ideologies and Mentalities. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

Wadud-Muhsin, Amina. Qur’an and Woman. 1992. Selangor Penerbit Fajar Bakti Sdn. Bhd, and Kuala Lumpur: Oxford University Press.

Waldman, Marilyn. 1987. “The Islamic World.” Encyclopaedia Britannica Macropaedia. Chicago: Britannica Publishing, 112–33.

Wallerstein, Immanuel. 1979. The Capitalist World-System. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Waltz, Kenneth N. 1979. Theory of International Politics. New York: McGraw-Hill.

Waterbury, John. 1979. Hydropolitics of the Nile Valley. Syracuse: Syracuse University Press.

Weiss, Anita, ed. 1986. Islamic Reassertion in Pakistan: The Application of Islamic Laws in a Modern State. Syracuse: Syracuse University Press.

Willner, Ruth Ann. 1984. The Spellbinders. New Haven: Yale University Press.

Woodward, Mark R. 1989. Islam in Java: Normative Piety and Mysticism in the Sultanate of Yogyakarta. Tucson: University of Arizona Press.

Yaacob, Abdul Monir, and Ahmad Faiz Abdul Rahman, eds. 1994. Towards a Positive Islamic World-View: Malaysian and American Perspectives. Kuala Lumpur: Institute of Islamic Understanding.

Yamani, Mai, ed. 1996. Feminism & Islam: Legal and Literary Perspectives. New York: New York University Press.

Young, Robert. 1990. White Mythologies: Writing History and the West. London and New York: Routledge.

Zakaria, Rafiq. 1989. The Struggle within Islam. London: Penquin.

Zam (Zainuddin Maidin). 1994. The Other Side of Mahathir. Eng. trans. Kuala Lumpur: Utusan Publications & Distributors.

</biblio>

 Index

[Page numbers don’t correspond to this version.]

<biblio>

‘Abd al-’Aziz, 86

‘Abd ar-Raziq, ‘Ali, 153–55

‘Abduh, Muhammad, 24, 63

abrogation, 172

Accommodating Protest (MacLeod), 111

adultery, 144

Afghanistan, 90, 92

Aflatun, Inji, 121

Africa, 43

aggression, 176

Ahmad Khan, Muhammad, 131–32, 135

Ahmad Khan, Sayyid, 147–48

Ahmad, Dr. Israr, 60–61, 125

Ajami, Fouad, 174

al-Asad, Basil, 71

al-Asad, Hafiz, 70–71

al-Asad, Rifaat, 70, 72

Alawi, 72

Alawites, 71, 75

al-Azm, Sadik, 11

Aleppo, 72

Algeria, 33, 45–46, 91–92, 129, 160

Alhabshi, Othman, 166, 167

Ali, Amir, 147–48

Al-i Ahmad, Jalal, 19–20

Ali Khan, Begum Liaqat, 125, 126

All India Criminal Procedure Code, 133

All India Muslim Personal Law Board, 134, 135

All Pakistan Women’s Association

(APWA), 125, 126

Anderson, Benedict, 18

Arab-Israeli War, 51

Arab Women’s Solidarity Association, 121

Arkoun, Mohammed, 153, 154–55

Asian Wall Street Journal, 159

authoritarianism, 39, 74–75

Ayodhya mandir/Babri masjid dispute, 135

Ayub Khan, General Mohammad, 143, 59

Azimi, Hosain, 102

Baath party, 70–74

Badran, Margot, 123

Bahais, 43–44

Bahrain, 92

Balkan conflict, 162, 170

Bangladesh, 6, 28, 35, 58, 92, 138–42, 149

Banna, Hasan al-, 63–64

Bano, Shah, 6, 131–38, 140

Barelvis, 42–43

Ben Ali, Zayn al-Abidin, 76, 84

Ben Youssef, Salah, 76–77

Bhutto, Benazir, 60, 61, 128, 146–47

Bhutto, Zulfikar Ali, 60, 143

Bibi, Safia, 144–45

Bill of Retribution, 114

Binder, Leonard, 154

al-Bishri, Tariq, 25

Bosnia, 7–8, 162

Bourguiba, Habib, 76–79, 84

bread riots, 79

Bulliet, Richard W., 49

Burma, 165

Cairo, 111

calendar, 8, 88

Caliphate, 153–54

Camp David accords, 66

capitalism, 21, 27, 44, 50, 129, 164–65

Carter, Jimmy, 93

Casanova, Jose, 12

China, 167–68

Christianity, 13, 16, 161–65

class, 127–28, 145–46, 171. See also middle class clerics, 94, 97–98, 173

Code of Personal Conduct, 77, 78, 80, 84

coeducation, 111, 114

colonialism, 10, 13, 41–44; French, 74, 75; and Islamic reformers, 45–50; legacies of, 47–50; and Muslim history, 23–25; and national boundaries, 47–48; and nationalism, 26–29

communism, 21

Congress-I, 134–37

Constitution of 1971 (Egypt), 123

Constitution of 1972 (Pakistan), 141

Constitution of 1979 (Iran), 115

Constitutional Revolution (1905–1911), 96

Corm, Georges, 27, 37

corporate culture, 156; vs. corporate ethics, 166–67; defined, 157; in Malaysia, 15965, 171; as sequel to jihad, 182–84

“Corporate Ethics in the Management of Organisations” (Alhabshi), 166 corporatization, 129

Council of Guardians, 98

Cragg, Kenneth, 49

Criminal Procedure Code of 1973, 132, 137 cross-cultural assessments, 11–12, 93 cultural modernity, 158

Cyrenaica region, 43

da<wa (calling the world to Islam), 178

Daughters of the Nile Union (DNU), 121 democracy, 17, 45, 47

Destourian Socialist party, 76

Dirasat Islamiyat Mu’Asirat (Shahrur), 175 dissent, 179 diversity, 151–53, 162, 168

divine revelation, 21

divorce, 77, 84, 125, 131, 132–33, 144, 147

Dowry Prohibition Act, 125 dress code, 105, 118–19

economic determinism, 27

economic development, 35–38, 109–10, 159 education, 38, 45, 77, 110, 111, 113, 114; religious, 78–79; of women, 121, 124, 127, 129. See also coeducation

Egypt, 24, 36, 91, 160, 174; and colonialism, 45; and postcolonial period, 25; Muslim population of, 33; women in, 120–24

Egyptian Feminist Union (EFU), 121

L’Egyptienne, 121 elites, 25–26, 28, 68, 94

Emir of Kuwait, 47

endowments, charitable, 77

English language, 184–85

Ershad, Husain, 141–42 ethics, corporate, 166–67 Europe, 25–29, 81. See also colonialism; postcolonialism

Facing the Future (OECD), 35

Fadlallah, Shaykh Muhammad Husain, 169, 178

Fahd, King, 47, 87

Fallows, James, 162, 170, 182

Family Law Ordinance of 1961, 143–44 family law, 77 family planning, 121, 127

Family Protection Law, 113, 114

Fanon, Frantz, 49–50, 109

Faraidis, 43

al-Farida al-Gha’iba, 174

Farrakhan, Louis, 6

Faruq, King, 63 fasting, 53, 54, 77–79 Federal Shari’At Court, 145, 146^7 feminism, 126–30, 145–46 15/21, 80, 84 food, 53–54

Fox, Richard, 27

France, 45, 69, 74, 75, 85

Fukuyama, Frances, 9, 162, 170, 171

Fulani-Qadiris, 43 fundamentalism, changing connotation of, 40; contradictions of, 89–90; difficulties faced by, 80–81; in Egypt, 62–68; future of, 149–56; identification of, 66–67; impact of oil on, 51–52; in India, 136–38; in Iran, 90–105; and media, 163; and nationalism, 49, 53–56; in Pakistan, 56–62; and protest, 74; recruitment for, 80; rise of, 33; in Saudi Arabia, 85–90; in South Asia, 148–49; in Syria, 59–75; in Tunisia, 75–85

G-15, 159, 160, 165

G-7, 159, 160, 162, 171

Gafsah revolt, 79

Gandhi, Indira, 134

Gandhi, Rajiv, 134, 136

Gellner, Ernest, 18, 48, 97

gender differences, 5–6, 38, 84, 105, 110

al-Ghannouchi, Rachid, 79, 81 gharbzadegi (excess of the West), 94 al-Ghazali, Zaynab, 122 governance, Islamic, 55–56; models of, 47

Grand Mosque (Mecca), 79

Great Britain, 42, 45, 63–64

Great Western Transmutation, 28

Gulf States, 36, 129

Gulf War, 170

hakimiyya (divine lordship), 22

Hama rebellion, 70–74

Hamas, 174

Hanafi school of law, 131

Hasan, Ihab, 40

Hassan II, King, 46–47

High Council of Women, 113

Hindus, 42–43, 134, 138

Hodgson, Marshall, 28

Hoffer, Eric, 36

Holland, 45

holy war. See jihad

Hudood Ordinance, 125, 128, 144–45 human rights, 93, 165, 182

Huntington, Samuel P., 9, 162, 170, 171

Hussain, Aftab, 145

Hussein, King, 47

Hussein, Saddam, 39, 47, 151

Ibn ‘Abd al-Wahhab, 42

Ibn Abdullah, Riduan Wu Chia Chung, 183

Ibn Baz, Shaikh ‘Abd al-’AziZ, 88

Ibn Sa’ud, King ‘Abd al-’Aziz, 42, 88

Ibrahim, Anwar, 165, 171 identity, 21 ideology, 9, 10; and religion, 157, 165

IKIM, 161, 169

imagination, 21

Imami Shi<is, 173

India, 35; and colonialism, 42–43, 45; and Partition, 57–58; Supreme Court, 13237, 140; women in, 131–38, 140, 149.

See also Bano, Shah

Indonesia, 19, 35, 36, 92, 160, 183 industrialization, 92, 129 inheritance, 84, 133, 147

International Islamic University, 161

International Women’s Decade, 132

Iqbal, Muhammad, 148, 153

Iran, 36, 90–105; and colonialism, 44;

European influence on, 47; and fundamentalism, 91–92; Islamic Republic of, 81, 99–105, 114, 117, 178–82;

and oil, 28; popular sentiment on, 17981; revolution, 19; and Saudi Arabia, 53, 89–90, 104; and United States, 104; viewed as threat, 19; women in, 105, 112–20

Iraq, 36, 91, 165, 169, 182

Islam in Practice (Loeffler), 179

Islam: as ideology, 9, 22; and nationalism, 9–10; pluralism of, 9, 20–29; political, 22–26, 67–68; as religion, 9, 12–21; as symbolic force, 13; and trade, 41–42; and violence, 4–7

Islam: The Misunderstood Religion (Qutb), 21

al-Islam wa usul al-hukm (‘Abd ar-Raziq), 154

Islambouli, Khalid, 66

Islamic Front, 73

Islamic identity, 60

Islamic Ideology Council, 145

Islamic Liberalism (Binder), 154

Islamic Retribution Bill, 98

Islamic revolution, 37–38, 94, 96–98, 100

Islamic Society (Pakistan), 68

Islamic Students of North America (ISNA), 104

Israel, 65, 66, 71

Izetbegovic, ‘Alija, 7–9, 14–15 jahiliyya (ignorance, perversity), 22

Jalal, Ayesha, 127

Jamaat-e Islami, 59–62, 126

Jamiat-e Tulaba, 126

Japan, 157, 161

jihad, changing relevance of, 181–85; and colonialism, 161; and corporate culture, 156, 172, 182–84; defined, 157; economic, 181; and Iran, 178–81; as modern ideology, 158; Motahhari on, 175–78;

jihad (cont.)

among Shi<i Muslims, 175–78, 182;

among Sunni Muslims, 174–75, 181–82

Jihad (Motahhari), 176

Jihad Sazendegi, 181

Jinnah, Muhammad ‘Ali, 59

Jordan, 47, 53–55, 92

judicial review, 149 judiciary in Bangladesh, 138–42, 149; in India, 131–38, 149; in Pakistan, 138–49

Juergensmeyer, Mark, 18

Juhayman ibn Sayf al-<Utayba, 88–89 justice, 14–15, 22. See also social justice

Kairouan, 78

Kapferer, Bruce, 10

Kazim, Safinaz, 122

Keddie, Nikki, 146

Kessler, Clive, 158

Khayyat, ‘Abd al-’Aziz, 53–54

Khilafat movement, 125

Khomeini, Ayatollah, 92–93, 96–98, 101

3, 115, 176, 178, 182

Kuwait, 47, 92

land reform, 98

Last Imam, 179–80

Law of Evidence, 126, 128, 144

League of University and Institutes’ Young Women (LUIYW), 121

Lebanon, 72, 92, 178

Libya, 36, 43, 91–92

literacy, 72, 80, 109

Loeffler, Reinhold, 179 loyalty, 24–25

MacLeod, Arlene, 111

Mahathir, 159–60, 165, 167–71, 182, 184

mahdi (messianic figure), 88

majlis, 98, 114

Majlis-e Khawatin, 126

Malaysia, 19, 36, 92, 157–61, 163–72, 182–84

Malaysian Chinese Association, 167–68

male supremacy, 117

marginality, 38–39

Al-Ma<rifa, 79

marriage, 54, 115, 121, 124, 125, 133, 144, 147

Married Women’s Property Act, 125

Mawdudi, Mawlana Abu’l-’Ala, 58–61, 67

Mecca, 87–89

Mecca Mosque incident, 87–89

media, 61, 79, 102, 135, 137, 159–60, 163, 170–71 middle class, 19, 38, 65, 67, 80, 97, 99–100

Middle East, 4–5, 28, 33

military, 49, 110, 142

Mixed courts, 64

mobilization, 159–60

modernization, 17, 73–74, 92

Mogadishu, 43

monarchies, 46–47

monotheism, 54

Morocco, 33, 45–46, 92

Moslem Family Laws Ordinance, 125

Mossadegh (Prime Minister), 94

Motahhari, Ayatollah Mortaza, 100, 11517, 158, 175–78

Mottahedeh, Roy P., 55–56, 162

Mountbatten, Lord, 57

Mouvement de tendace islamique (MTI), 79, 80–81, 84

Mubarak, Hosni, 122, 124

Muhajirs, 61–62

Mujib, Sheikh, 140–41

Muslim Brethren, 22

Muslim Brothers, 55, 63–65, 67–68, 70–74

Muslim Ladies’ Association (MLA), 121, 122

Muslim law. See shari’A

Muslim League, 59, 125

Muslim Personal Law, 132, 133–35, 137

Muslim Women’s Bill, 136–37, 140

Muzaffar, Chandra, 169, 171

Myanmar, 165

Najdis, 42

Nasr, Seyyed Vali Reza, 61

Nasser, Gamal ‘Abd al-, 22, 64–66

National Feminine Party (NFP), 121 national liberation movments, 46–47 nationalism, Arab, 22, 25; ethnic, 23–24, 61–62, 159; and fundamentalism, 49, 53–56; and Islam, 9–10, 68; mimetic, 47, 49; and Muslim history, 23–25; regional, 24, 25; and religion, 13–18, 25, 51–52; secular, 33, 45–50; traits of, 48

New York Times, 4

Nigeria, 33, 35, 43, 92, 160

No Revolutions thesis, 97

nomenclature, 40–41

Numeiri, General, 155

Nun, 121

oikumene (Afro-Eur-Asian), 25

oil: impact of, 51–52; and Iran, 94, 95,

98; and Muslim state formation, 27

28; and Saudi Arabia, 36–37, 86; and Syria, 72

Oman, 47, 92

Open Door (infitah) policy, 123

Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD), 35

Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC), 51, 87

Ottoman Empire, 27, 69

Padris, 43

Pakistan, 35, 36, 56–62, 92; and oil, 28; and Shah Bano case, 6; Supreme Court, 142, 143, 145, 146; women in, 125–30, 138–49

Palestinians, 92, 176–77

pan-Arabism, 52, 63

Pan-Islamism, 23–24, 26, 52

Panikkar, Raimundo, 23

Partition (of India and Pakistan), 57–58

PAS, 167

patriotism, 25

patronage, 92

Paz, Octavio, 12–13

Peasant Union, 74

Personal Status Law, 121, 123

Pick, Daniel, 13

Piscatori, James, 89

pluralism, 4, 8, 33, 150; Chinese, 158, 168.

See also diversity political participation, 38, 105 politics, 14–15; divine, 22–26

polygyny, 54, 77, 84, 117, 125, 144 postcolonialism, 10, 24–25, 68 power, 163–64

Prabhasa Malay, 184

preservations, divinely mandated, 53–54 profit, 164–65, 171 protest, 41, 49, 74, 81, 84, 110

Provisional Constitutional Order of 1981, 143

Qabus of Oman, 47

Qaddafi, Muammar, 151

Qardaha, 71

Qazi Courts, 145

Qisas and Diyat Ordinance, 144

Qunaitra, 71

Qur’an and Woman (Wadud-Muhsin), 169

Qur’an, 22, 59; and corporate culture, 161; and fundamentalism, 136; as law, 139; and myth, 154; and power, 164; and principle of abrogation, 172–73; as state constitution, 86; and women, 117, 126, 147–48, 169

Qutb, Muhammad, 21–22

Qutb, Sayyid, 22, 68, 122

radicalism. See fundamentalism

Rafsanjani, 100–101, 119

Rahman, Fazlur, 148

Ramadan, 77–79

rape, 144

reform and reformers, 33, 45–50, 148–49 religion, 12–20, 78; and ideology, 157, 165;

Islam as, 66; as a mask, 85 revivalism, 33, 40–44, 152 Reza Shah, Mohammed, 95

Rights of Women in Islam, The (Motahhari), 115

Rushdie, Salman, 162

el-Saadawi, Nawal, 121, 128–29

Sadat, Anwar, 65–66, 122, 123, 174

Sakr, Dr. Mohamed, 54–55

Salafiya (Islamic advocacy), 45–46

Salem, Norma, 40

Sanusis, 43

Satanic Verses, The (Rushdie), 162 al-Sa’ud, 87

Saudi Arabia, 25, 92, 129; dependence on others, 52; European influence on, 47; founding of, 42; and Iran, 53; and media, 170; and oil, 36–37; stereotypes of, 36

science, 52

Segal, Robert, 11

self-presenta tion, 11

Senegal, 160

Sexual Ethics in Islam and in the Western World (Motahhari), 115–17

sexuality, 115–16

Sha<rawi, Huda, 121

Shah of Iran, 92–93, 95–96

Shahabuddin, Syed, 136

Shahrur, Muhammad, 175

Sharabi, Hisham, 109

al-Sha<rawi, Muhammad Mitwalli, 123

24

shari’A (Muslim law), 53–54, 64, 77, 88, 133

Shari’Ah Ordinance of 1988, 147

Shari’Atallah, Hajji, 43

Shari’At Law, 133

Shari’Ati, ‘Ali, 100, 153, 158

Sharif of Mecca, 42

Sharif, Nawaz, 57, 60, 146–47

Sharifian Kingdom, 46

al-Shati, Bint, 124

Shi<i Muslims, 43, 87, 95–96,114–17, 158, 172–73, 175–78, 182

Shouri, Arun, 137

Sidi Zaynab, 75

Sikhs, 42–43, 138

Sisters in Islam, 169

Sivan, Emmanuel, 175

slavery, 21–22

social justice, 98–99, 159, 181, 182

social modernity, 18–19

social responsibility, 165, 171 socialism, 52, 65, 128, 129

Somalia, 43

Sorush, Abdul Karim, 102

South Asia, 35, 43

Southeast Asia, 156

Spivak, Gayatri, 12, 135

state, centralized authority of, 150–51 stereotypes, 4–5, 36, 120

Stowasser, Barbara, 117, 147

Subaltern School, 17–18

Sudan, 36, 92, 155

Suez Crisis, 64

Sufi brotherhoods, 54

Suharto, 183

Sumatra, 43

Sunni Muslims, 72, 153, 172–74, 182; antinationalism of, 53; and colonialism, 43;

and <ulama, 68

surveillance (mukhabarat), 47

Syria, 69–75, 91

Tabari, Azar, 128–29

Taha, Mahmoud, 153, 155

Tahtawi, Rifa’A al-, 25

Taliban, 90

Tanzim-i Islam, 61

Tehran University, 112

Thailand, 162

theocracy, 18, 48, 68, 86, 95

Third World, 35–36, 38, 48, 50, 94–97

trade, 41–42, 80

Treaty of Jiddah, 86

tribalism (jahiliyya), 68, 86

Tunis, 76, 79

Tunisia, 19, 45–46, 75–85, 91–92

Turkey, 19, 27, 33, 36, 44, 45

Turner, Bryan, 97

Twelver Shi<i, 43, 173

<ulama, 68, 78, 87, 89

Umayyad Mosque, 71

umma (Muslim community), 24, 26

unemployment, 110, 122

United Arab Emirates, 92

United Press International, 170

United States, 157, 161

unity, Arab, 65

UNMO, 159, 167

veiling, 79, 111, 112, 114, 117, 118

violence; as aberration, 6–7; Izetbegovic’s views on, 7–8, 14–15; and political figures, 7–9; as stereotype, 4–5; structural, 8; against women, 110

Vision 2020, 160, 167, 169–70, 184

Wadud-Muhsin, Amina, 169

Wafd party, 63

Wahhabis, 42–43, 86, 90

Waldman, Marilyn, 25

Wazed, Hasina, 141, 142 wealth, 51–52, 54, 87, 95 Westernization, 115

White Revolution, 94, 96, 113

Women’s Action Forum (WAF), 125, 126, 145

Women’s Organization of Iran, 113 Women’s Union, 71–72

Women in Development (WID), 141 Women of Deh Koh (Friedl), 118 women (Muslim); American perceptions of, 5; clerical views on, 114–17; dress code of, 118–19; and economic underdevelopment, 109–10; and education, 110, 111, 113, 124, 127; in Egypt, 120–24; exclusion of, 5–6; as feminists, 126–30; as fundamentalists, 111, 122, 126–30; in India, 131–38, 140, 149; in Iran, 105, 112–20; and judicial system, 131–49; in labor force, 113, 118, 122, 123, 128; in Malaysia, 168, 169; marginality of, 109; in Pakistan, 61, 125–30; and Personal Status

Laws, 123; and the Qur’an, 147–48, 169; rights of, 116–17; roles of, 45, 112; rural, 117–18, 120, 124; seclusion of, 61; in Syria, 71–72; in Tunisia, 81, 94; scholarship on, 110–11; urban, 119, 120, 12728; and veiling, 79, 111, 112, 114, 117, 118; as vessels of honor, 127; and voting rights, 77 work force, 113, 122, 123, 129

World Muslim Council, 104

World of Islam Festival, 37 world view, 162; Chinese, 158, 168; Muslim, 153–56

world wars, 46

Yahya Khan, General Mohammad, 57, 60

Zaghlul, Sa<d, 63

Zakaria, Rafiq, 137

Zanan, 119

Zayn al-Din, Nazira, 117

Zaytuna mosque, 76, 77

Zia, Begum Khaleda, 141, 142

Zia al-Haq, General, 57, 60, 61, 125, 126, 143

Zia ar-Rahman, 141

</biblio>

#title The Palestinian Refugees

#subtitle Old Problems--New Solutions

#author Edward J. Perkins and Joseph Ginat

#authors Joseph Ginat, Edward J. Perkins, Yoav Gelber, Mohamed Hawary, Menachem Klein, Manuel Hassassian, Joshua Landis, Don Peretz, Emanuel Marx, Moshe Ma’oz, Donna E. Arzt, Dale F. Eickelman, Mohanna Haddad, Taisir Amre, Norma Masrieh-Hazboun, Kais M. Firro, Shlomo Gazit, Munther S. Dajani, Hussein Ramzoun, Abraham Badran, Rateb Amro, Bahieldin Elibrachy, Tahseen Basheer, Onn Winckler, Ephraim Yuchtman-Yaar, Tamar Hermann

#date

#source <[[https://archive.org/details/palestinianrefug0000unse_l9f2] [https://archive.org/details/palestinianrefug0000unse_l9f2]]>

#isbn 9780806133935

#publisher University of Oklahoma Press. <[[https://www.oupress.com/9780806133935/the-palestinian-refugees/] [oupress.com/9780806133935/the-palestinian-refugees/]]>

#lang en

#pubdate 2024-08-01T07:28:50

#authors HRH Prince El Hassan bin Talal of Jordan, David L. Boren

#notes Footnote 70 was missing from the end of chapter 24, so simply added next to footnote 69.

#cover e-j-edward-j-perkins-and-joseph-ginat-the-palestin-5.jpg

#DELETED temporarily

 [Front Matter]

 [Synopsis]

As violence escalates in the Middle East, a peace agreement between Israel and Palestine seems more elusive than ever. Yet one thing remains clear: without constructive dialogue such an agreement cannot occur. This timely volume presents just such a dialogue. It brings together opinions, perspectives, and research focused on one of the region’s most complex and volatile problems: the Palestinian refugee situation.

Based on a 1999 conference at the University of Oklahoma International Program Center, The Palestinian Refugees combines contributions from Israelis, Palestinians, Jordanians, Egyptians, Americans, and Europeans. In addition to focusing on the Palestinian refugees, the essays present various proposals for solving the Palestinian problem.

Organized in two parts, the volume presents both scholarly essays and position papers. The scholarly essays place current issues in historical context and explore the Palestinian belief in the “right of return” and questions of appropriate compensation. The position papers focus on policy and offer a variety of perspectives. Concluding the volume is a special essay on public polls that gauge how Palestinians and Israelis view the circumstances of Palestinian refugees and what they feel about possible solutions. Also featured in this book are a foreword by His Royal Highness Prince Hassan of Jordan, a preface by former U.S. Senator David L. Boren, and an introduction by volume editors Joseph Ginat and Edward Perkins.

 [Title Page]

THE PALESTINIAN REFUGEES

OLD PROBLEMS — NEW SOLUTIONS

Edited by

JOSEPH GINAT AND EDWARD J. PERKINS

Foreword by

HRH Prince El Hassan bin Talal of Jordan

Preface by

David L. Boren, President of the University of Oklahoma

University of Oklahoma Press : Norman

 [Copyright]

<right>

U.S. edition ©2001

</right>

University of Oklahoma Press, Norman, Publishing Division of the University, by special arrangement with

SUSSEX ACADEMIC PRESS

PO Box 2950

Brighton BN2 5SP, UK.

All rights reserved. Except for the quotation of short passages for the purposes of criticism and review, no part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted, in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording or otherwise, without the prior permission of the publisher.

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data has been applied for.

ISBN 0-8061-3393-7

Typeset and designed by G&G Editorial, Brighton, UK.

Printed by Bookcraft, Midsomer Norton, Bath, UK.

This book is printed on acid-free paper.

 Contents

Foreword

HRH Prince El Hassan bin Talal ofJordan

Preface

David L. Boren, President of the University of Oklahoma

Acknowledgments

Introduction: Traditional Positions and New Solutions

Joseph Ginat and Edward J. Perkins

PART I

The Historical Background and the “Right of Return ”

2

The Historical Background

Yoav Gelber

3 Between the Right of Return and Attempts of Resettlement 34
Mohamed Hawary

4 From a Doctrine-Oriented to a Solution-Oriented Policy: The PLO’s “Right of Return,” 1964–2000 46

Menachem Klein

5

The Political Refugee Problem in the Light of the Peace Process

Manuel Hassassian

6 Early US Policy toward Palestinian Refugees: The Syria Option 77
Joshua Landis

Comprehensive Solutions

7 Refugee Compensation: Responsibility, Recipients, and Forms and Sources 88

Don Peretz

8 Refugee Compensation: Why the Parties Have Been Unable to Agree and Why it is Important to Compensate Refugees

for Losses 102

Emanuel Marx

9

Traditional Positions and New Solutions

Moshe Ma’oz

10

Actual Repatriation: A Minimal Israeli Gesture

Donna E. Arzt

Regional Context Perspectives

11

From Refugees to Citizens: A Regional Proposal

Joseph Ginat and Dale F. Eickelman

12

Palestinian Refugees in Jordan and National Identity,

Mohanna Haddad

13

Final Status Negotiations and Regional Cooperation

Taisir Amre

14 Refugee Resettlement in the Gaza Strip: Israeli Policy Revisited 179
Norma Masrieh-Hazboun

15

Palestinian Refugees in Lebanon since

Kais M. Firro

16

The Future of Palestinian Refugees in Lebanon

Laura Drake

PART II

Policy Positions and Solutions

17

Solving the Refugee Problem — An Israeli Point of View

Shlomo Gazit

18

A Predicament in Search of an Innovative Solution

Munther S. Dajani

<right>

19

The Historical Development of the Refugee Camps in Jordan

</right>

Hussein Ramzoun

20

The Role of UNRWA: Refugee Statistics and UN Resolutions

Abraham Badran

21

A Jordanian Perspective

Rateb Amro

22

The Refugee Question and Human Rights

Bahieldin Elibrachy

23

Obstacles and Opportunities: The Ideological Dimensions

Tahseen Basheer

24 The Economic Capacity of the Palestinian State to Absorb the Refugees: The Employment Perspective 282

Onn Winckler

Public Opinion Polling

25 How the Palestinian and Israeli-Jewish Publics Perceive the Issues 303

Ephraim Yuchtman- Yaar and Tamar Hermann

Concluding Remarks

Joseph Ginat and Edward J. Perkins

The Contributors

Index

 Foreword

HRH Prince El Hassan bin Talal of Jordan

This book on the Palestinian refugee problem is timely: it draws attention to the need to examine “Traditional Positions,” and to make suggestions for “New Solutions.” In recent attempts by the Palestinian National Authority and the Israeli Government to reach a settlement of their outstanding differences, the problem of the Palestinian refugees was marginalized: in exchange for a territorial arrangement which it was hoped would satifsy the Palestinian claim to a viable state, they were asked to give up the refugees’ “right of return.”

Foreseeably this was something which no Palestinian, whether in “authority” or in opposition, could accept. Without any accompanying proposals to address their problems, the refugees were being told that they had to give up the only thing they feel they still have: the right to return, however theoretical, remains a dream which if shattered removes their last and only hope.

There has never been a more urgent need for “new solutions” than now. With time the refugee problem will not fade away or die: without positive and realistic proposals which are compatible with international and moral law, and political, economic and social realities, it will only become more difficult to resolve, and more potentially explosive.

With the likely prospect of a vast increase in population inside Israel and its neighboring countries in the next fifty years, it is clear that sovereignty, statehood, and security are concepts that will have to be redefined. Existing frontiers no longer take into account demography, land or water resources, any more than they will be able to provide security against the development of weaponry technology. In this context the problem of refugees, of displaced persons, and of population movements voluntary or involuntary, will have to be addressed with new ideas and new proposals.

To be valid and viable these new ideas and proposals must embody a basic human and humanitarian set of principles: the right of all individuals to have access to natural resources and to knowledge: to community and conviviality: to liberty of thought, conscience and speech, and the practice of belief.

 Preface: David L. Boren, President of the University of Oklahoma

Welcome to this informative and, we hope, useful book. Palestinian Refugees: Old Problems — New Solutions brings together the history and the creative thinking of the world’s foremost scholars on what has been one of the two most intractable issues in Middle East peace negotiations: solutions for the Palestinian refugees and the status of Jerusalem. This book provides information that would be useful both in reaching a solution on refugees and in the implementation of any settlement upon which there is agreement. The book is the product of a conference sponsored by the Center for Peace Studies of the International Programs Center of the University of Oklahoma (OU).

The Center for Peace Studies focuses upon urgent issues of international relationships by drawing on analytic tools from the social sciences, humanities, sciences and technology, and business administration. It fosters a multidisciplinary discussion of contemporary conflicts among societies, cultures, and political entities. Studies and conferences sponsored by the Center have initially concentrated on the pressing issues of the Arab-Israeli peace process but will subsequently address other conflicts around the globe. The Center is creating an international community of scholars and advisors. Symposia held under the leadership of the Center attempt to identify solutions to the critical disputes that stand in the way of a lasting peace in the Middle East and elsewhere throughout the world. As governments around the world struggle to find the bases for building peace, their citizens must develop mechanisms that support those efforts. The Center serves this process by contributing to and influencing new policies as they are conceived and implemented.

An example of the potential impact of this approach can be seen in a series of conferences funded by the Rockefeller Foundation. In January 1999, Ambassador Edward J. Perkins, former United States Permanent Representative at the United Nations and now Executive Director of the International Programs Center at OU, and Professor Joseph Ginat, OU visiting professor from the University of Haifa, participated in a conference on “The Status of Jerusalem,” held in Amman, Jordan. This meeting was a follow-on to an earlier session held in the summer of 1998 in Bellagio, Italy. The initial conference included Jordanian, Palestinian, Saudi Arabian, Egyptian, Moroccan, and Israeli scholars representing various disciplines. These scholars discussed a range of historical and contemporary questions concerning the status of Jerusalem, a critical topic for the Middle East peace process. Participants in the Bellagio workshop agreed the dialogue should be continued in Jordan in early 1999 and scholars from the United States of America should also be included.

These scholars met again in January 2000 in Amman, Jordan and Jerusalem for a third and final conference. This conference was again funded by the Rockefeller Foundation, but organized by the University of Oklahoma. The conferees recommended a set of principles governing the future status of Jerusalem and these principles were delivered to governments involved in the peace process.

The University of Oklahoma’s involvement in these conferences provided the vision for the establishment of the Center for Peace Studies. The Center currently consists of a quadrilateral consortium among the University of Oklahoma in the United States, the University of Haifa in Israel, Palestinian Bethlehem University and Horizon Center for Studies & Research in Jordan. The Horizon Center provides linkage to Jordanian universities and scholars, and has excellent relations throughout the Arab world. The University of Haifa, with a 20 percent Arab student population, has the highest ratio of Arab students and the largest Arab faculty among Israeli universities. The current Academic President at Haifa. Professor Gad Gilbar, is a specialist in Middle Eastern economies and is well respected in the Middle East. Bethlehem University, under the Palestinian Authority, serves as the Palestinian partner for this initiative. Professor Manuel Hassassian, the Executive Vice President of Bethlehem University, is a noted authority on Middle East social and political structure. Joseph Ginat, a well-known Israeli scholar, is uniquely qualified to direct the Center for Peace Studies and he works under the guidance of Dr. Perkins, a distinguished diplomat and experienced academician, at the University of Oklahoma. The Center is already taking steps to include universities from other Middle East countries, and will add universities from other regions as the geographic scope of its work expands. The Center also has a Board of Directors with representation from each participating institution, as well as other distinguished scholars and practitioners. His Royal Highness Prince El Hassan bin Talal of the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan honors the Center by serving as Chairman of the Board of Advisors.

It is appropriate that The Center for Peace Studies began at the University of Oklahoma for several reasons. The University is located in the middle of the United States and provides a much-needed voice from this region in international education and policy matters. Internationally marketed agricultural products, manufactured goods, and oil and gas resources originate in the American heartland, as do internationally significant research and development. Since conflicts in one troubled area of the world affect others worldwide, helping form the path to peace in the Middle East will also have a positive and significant impact on Oklahoma.

Regional conflicts around the world concern the global community. Academic study and research on these matters, which culminate in identified applied solutions, are the aim of the Center. In addition to the conferences with the Rockefeller Foundation, the Center hosted two additional conferences on issues crucial to a lasting peace in the Middle East. The first conference addressed the Palestinian refugee diaspora and proposed solutions. It was held on November 30-December 2, 1999 on the campus of the University of Oklahoma. The solution to the problems of the Palestinian refugees is critical for the continuation of the entire peace process and for building the basis for a lasting peace in the region. The gathering of some 30 academics and intellectuals primarily from the Middle East on the University’s campus was significant. First, it permitted the participants to experience a university and its environment in the middle of the United States. Secondly, it gave the University and its community an opportunity to be involved in an element of the Middle East peace process. Moreover, it was an occasion to air the practical issues which must be addressed in making operational a future settlement amongst Israelis, the Palestinians, and Israel’s neighbors in the Middle East.

The International Programs Center, in cooperation with The University of Haifa, sponsored a second conference on “The Peace Process in the Middle East,” in Haifa, Israel on March 13–15, 2000. Over 30 academics and practitioners exchanged views on the peace process and relations between Israel Palestinian Authority; Syria-Israel; Jordan-Israel; and Israel-Iraq, Iran, and Persian Gulf and Mediterranean countries. Attention was also given to Israeli Arabs. Future conferences planned for the Center include such topics as nationality, ethnicity and minorities in the Middle East, and water resources and their effects on the peace process and the future development of the region.

Governments have expressed keen interest in the findings and conclusions of this unique group of academics and informally the group is in touch with those respective governments. The participants unanimously agreed that no formal links to their respective governments, including the U.S., should be established. By so doing, the group maintains credibility as an independent body of experts, unencumbered in its analysis of the issues. Participants are well placed to engage the broader academic communities and to shape public opinion and public policy.

To complement the conferences discussed above, the Center will sponsor seminars, visiting scholars, and scholarly publications that analyze contemporary conflicts and assess possible solutions in the Middle East as well as elsewhere around the world. Recent events in European and Asian countries indicate the importance of developing a program that could influence the resolution of other conflicts affecting the global community.

The Center for Peace Studies offers to the international community the fruits of scholarly research and discussion on contemporary world conflicts combined with guidance for achieving lasting solutions. Awareness of the past will help direct future generations in achieving a peaceful, prosperous future. It is in this spirit that The University of Oklahoma is proud to share with you this volume, Palestinian Refugees: Old Problems — New Solutions.

 Acknowledgments

The editors would like to express their gratitude to the following individuals, without whom publication of this book would not have been possible.

The President of the Board of the Center for Peace Studies, His Royal Highness Prince El Hassan bin Talal, for writing the foreword. The support of the President of the University of Oklahoma, David L. Boren, for writing the preface and his support for the Center for Peace Studies.

Ambassador Edwin G. Corr, Associate Director, International Programs Center, for his administrative coordination, advice and assistance in editing throughout this project. The editors would like to acknowledge the devotion and care taken by Ambassador Corr in liaising between the editors, contributors, and the two publishing offices, in Oklahoma and Brighton.

At the University of Oklahoma Press, Director John Drayton, for advising on the volume series and facilitating publication. Jean Hurtado, Acquisitions Editor, and Alice Stanton, Managing Editor, for their advice and assistance.

To staff members Julie Horn, Kathy Shahan, Garrold Mills, and Donna Kline of The International Program Center, where the idea of Studies in Peace Politics in the Middle East was first broached. The editors gratefully acknowledge Danny Kolker for his editing of the articles, and the assistance provided by his colleague Susan Schmidt.

Lastly, the editors would like to thank the contributors for their scholarship in addressing the Palestinian refugee problem. The contributors have suggested sound measures to help the parties to the conflict resolve the refugee issue, which is vital to reaching a comprehensive Middle East peace agreement.

 1. Introduction: Traditional Positions and New Solutions

[[Joseph Ginat and Edward]] J. Perkins

The Palestinian refugee problem started as a result of the war in 1948 over the creation of the State of Israel. Resolution of the Palestinian refugee issue is one of the three crucial elements — the others being the status of Jerusalem and the division of territory — needed to reach a comprehensive peace agreement between the Palestinians and the Israelis. Other elements have to be agreed upon by both parties such as the settlements in the West Bank and water. But Jerusalem, division of land and the issue of refugees remain the biggest obstacles to peace in the Middle East. Each is made more difficult because of its emotional dimension. Even though the Oslo agreement of 1993 between the Palestinians and Israelis was an important breakthrough in the peace process, little tangible progress has been made on the Palestinian refugee issue. Progress on this matter is critical if Middle East peace is to be more than an illusion.

Scholars and institutes have conducted studies on Palestinian refugees for many years. Many of these studies were politically oriented or biased; others were quality fieldwork studies conducted within the refugee camps. Very few studies have put forward suggestions for permanent solutions. The Palestinian Refugees: Old Problems New Solutions includes applied studies that contain a variety of insightful solutions.[1]

This Introduction addresses the Palestinian refugee problem and solutions, reviews past and current non-governmental efforts to grapple with the refugee issue challenge, briefly describes the enormity of the problem and the plight of the refugees, and provides a brief synopsis of the chapters of this book, which are contributed by recognized experts and scholars on the subject and region. However, before outlining the purposes and content of the book, it is important to review some of the recent good work that is being conducted outside of governmental channels to promote and reach a solution to the refugee problem.

Many institutes, groups, and individual scholars are concerned with the Palestinian refugee issue. Some deal with Palestinian refugees as part of the larger Palestinian question. Others deal with them under the headline of refugees only. A dialogue of Palestinians and Israelis at Harvard’s Weatherhead Center for International Affairs resulted in a 1998 jointly-written paper, The Palestinian Refugee Problem and the Right oj Return. The paper explores the divergent points of view and narratives of both sides and proposes four possible solutions to the problem. Two of these take the traditional approach, while the other are compromise solutions proposed by each side.[2]

The Refugee Studies Centre at Oxford University in conjunction with Oxford University Press issued a special edition of the Journal of Refugee Studies in 1997 on Palestinian refugees in Lebanon.[3] The Norwegian Fafo Institute for Applied Social Science has done extensive research and data collection on the Palestinian refugees.[4]

Canada is a leading country in providing infrastructure and institutional support to address the refugee issue. McGill University is part of the InterUniversity Consortium for Arab Studies (Montreal) and maintains the Palestinian Refugee ResearchNet (PRRN), a worldwide web site devoted to the Palestinian refugee issue.[5] Many of the institutes listed there have produced academic articles, position papers, press releases, or other relevant publications for study and research of the topic.[6] “Shaml,” the Palestinian Diaspora and Refugee Centre in Ramallah, is but one example of a Palestinian institute that addresses the political issues and human needs of the Palestinian refugees.

The Institute for Global Conflict and Cooperation dedicated a special portion of its 1994 conference in Vouliagmeni, Greece, to the Palestinian refugee issue. In 1999, in Ottawa, the Palestine Refugee ResearchNet and the International Development Research Centre hosted the Workshop on Compensation as Part of a Comprehensive Solution to the Palestinian Refugee Problem.

A conference at UNESCO headquarters in Paris in 2000 was organized by the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People in cooperation with the Organization of the Islamic Conference and the League of Arab States. During the same year, the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars sponsored a symposium in which the sessions were off the record in order to create a more frank discussion of the various refugee issues. For further information on the topic, several of the better known books of the many that have been published are listed in the notes.[7]

The Center for Peace Studies, which produced the material for this book, has an inter-academic structure that currently includes the University of Oklahoma in the United States, Bethlehem University in the Palestinian Authority, the University of Haifa in Israel, and the Horizon Institute for Study and Research in Amman, Jordan. The aim of the Center is to integrate an applied dimension to its member institutions’ traditional academic research. Many studies present important theories; many conferences deal with theoretical issues. The idea of the Center is to combine theory with reality — for academics to do scholarly work, be realistic, and to produce practical, applicable work. Scholars from the four corners of the Center, joined by others, approach a specific subject, attempt to stay close to the real issues involved and to suggest, if not one solution, several possible solutions to a particular problem from which policy-makers and negotiators can consider and choose.

The research, the studies, and the outcome of the Center's conferences have been and will be presented to the governments and political leaders involved in the conflict being examined, and even to the public. It is hoped that all parties to the conflict might be open to conference results and conclusions, and benefit from new ideas that they can introduce at the negotiation table.

In deciding to address the topic of Palestinian refugees, the Center chose one of the most difficult issues on the road to peace. There has been little progress on this subject because of official Palestinian public positions and other Arab countries' approach to the "right of return" of all Palestinian refugees, and the contrasting Israeli public policy of not allowing any refugees to come back to live in Israel. Such polar-opposite approaches can never reach an agreement. By working collectively, conference participants from Arab countries, the Palestinian Authority, Israel, Europe, and the United States attempted to reach realistic proposals for solving the Palestinian refugee problem.

The participants at this conference developed a chessboard of proposed solutions, as is evident in the different individual essays presented in this book. Although some essays reflect the polarization that exists on the issue, others move away from the political slogans of both sides. One contributor proposes that Israel should adopt the "right of return" in principle, but, in reality, accept only a symbolic number of refugees. Another conference participant suggests that Israel should accept "the right of return," but that the return should be to the future Palestinian state, not to Israel. Some of the scholars' essays focus on an Israeli gesture to accept tens of thousands of refugees without referring to "the right of return." Others deal with reparations and the rehabilitation of the refugees in the countries where they reside. In some essays there are proposals for a regional solution in which the refugees would be settled in different countries, not only in countries where they now reside.

The conference took place on the first and second of December 1999. The participants at the conference were mostly from the four member institutions of the Center, but experts in the subject from other Middle Eastern, American and European universities participated. The small, selected audience included guests who deal with the refugee problem for the governments of the region. Perhaps it is no mere coincidence that Prime Minister Ehud Barak of Israel in his meeting with President William Clinton in the White House on April 11, 2000 told him that the Canadian government had expressed interest in leading an international effort by absorbing 15,000 Palestinian refugees in Canada.

More importantly, for the first time since the Oslo agreement, an Israeli prime minister declared that Israel would accept refugees for humanitarian concern and for uniting families.[8] This declaration is a breakthrough that reflects the proposed solutions of the Center for Peace Studies conference. If implemented, it will allow tens of thousands of refugees, if they desire, to reunite with their families in Israel. Barak's move from Israel's previous polarizing position improves the chance for successful negotiations on the Palestinian refugee issue.

The Palestinians are fully aware that there are limitations on the number of persons that can be brought to Israel and to the Palestinian Authority. According to recent statistics of the Palestinian Authority's Central Bureau of Statistics headed by Ghasan Abu-Libdeh, by mid-2000 the Palestinian population in the West Bank and Gaza Strip will reach 3.2 million. The population growth rate in 1999 was 4.18 percent and was predicted at 4.27 percent for 2000. It is estimated that thereafter there will be a decline in the increase.[9] Fifty-three percent of the total population is less than 18 years of age. Twenty-four percent of the children are living in poverty. In the Gaza Strip 37.2 percent are in poverty versus 16.1 percent in the West Bank. These statistics reveal that there is much to do in developing the economy and improving living conditions for the populations that exist in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. It is urgent to find an economic solution and employment opportunities for Palestinians. This reality must be the basis for the discussions and proposals for a permanent solution to the refugee problem.[10]

A study carried out by the Norwegian institute Fafo among the 300,000 Palestinian refugees in 12 refugee camps in Lebanon pointed out that the Lebanese government does not provide services to the camps. In addition, whereas the Lebanese exercise tight military control around the camps, inside the camps the Palestinian militias are in control. The study found that 20 percent of the adult male population are illiterate and that 40 percent of the students drop out of school by age 11. The sanitation situation is very poor, and there is a high incidence of disease and malnutrition.[11]

It is imperative to address more effectively the tragic situation of the refugees living in poverty. There is no justification for delaying the solution to the plight of these poor people who have suffered for so many years. His Royal Highness Prince Faisal, brother of King Abdallah, and the head of the Jordanian General Intelligence Department, emphasized in a meeting in April 2000 in Amman that solving the problem of the Palestinian refugees was vital. As part of their discussion at the meeting, the participants suggested that while a large majority of Palestinian refugees are ready to forgo actually returning, they are not willing to give up their right to do so.[12]

This book is organized into two parts, each of which is further subdivided. Part I contains three sections — The Historical Background and the “Right of Return,” Comprehensive Solutions, and Regional Context Perspectives. Scholars put forth two general approaches for comprehensive solutions that include proposals for compensation. One avenue is to focus on specific countries; the second avenue encompasses proposals on a regional basis. Part II contains two sections — Policy Positions and Solutions and Public Opinion Polling. The essays present different perspectives and a variety of solutions. The public opinion polling essay (chapter 25) shows how the Palestinians and Israelis view the circumstances of the Palestinian refugees and their feelings toward a solution.

Part I, The Historical Background and the “Right of Return” comprises chapters 2–6.

Yoav Gelber, in “The Historical Background,” presents the Palestinian refugee issue in the context of the history of the Arab-Israel conflict, and focuses on the 1948 war that gave rise to the problem. Gelber argues against revisionist historians who adopt or justify the traditional Arab point of view. He says that, historically, like other societies east of Egypt and west of Iran, the Palestinians had no historical experience with national war or an understanding of its essence. Their social structure tumbled, he says, because of economic hardship and administrative disorganization. Gelber concludes that the Israeli effort to solve the problem of refugees through resettlement is geo-culturally out of context. He closes by contrasting the Israeli idea of accommodation with the Palestinian idea of justice.

Mohamed Hawary, in “Between the Right of Return and Attempts of Resettlement,” explores the background of the Palestinian refugee problem, covering population statistics and United Nations resolutions. After providing a list of certain inalienable rights for the Palestinian refugees, and discussing the “right of return” and resettlement, Hawary outlines the conditions of Palestinian refugees living in the host Arab states. He concludes by stating that any final solution must contain the principle of choice for the refugees between repatriation and rehabilitation while considering Israel’s requirements for security.

Menachem Klein, in “From a Doctrine-Oriented to a Solution-Oriented Policy: The PLO’s ‘Right of Return,’ 1964–2000.” researches the history and evolution of the PLO’s “right of return” policy. He analyzes the meaning of this phrase within the framework of a settlement. The Palestinian Liberation Organization’s position had been based on the belief that the “right of return” equalled liberation. Later, the relevance of the the “right of return” came into doubt among the PLO ranks. Klein brings forward four attitudes toward the relevance of the “right of return” in the context of a political settlement with Israel: disregard, word-for-word acceptance of UN Resolution 194, full rights within pre-1967 borders, and a “differential realization” separating the realities of the 1967 border versus 1948 borders. As a solution he presents five guiding principles of an Israeli-Palestinian agreement concerning the refugees.

Manuel Hassassian, in “The Political Refugee Problem in the Light of the Peace Process,” looks directly at problems and solutions. He starts by identifying the hurdles that derive from the enormous variegated socioeconomic conditions under which Palestinians live in their respective host countries. He points out the deep-seated emotions which continue to overshadow the effort to rectify the basic economic, social, and political situations of the refugees. He lists logistical problems that must be dealt with, such as issues relating to the transfer of jurisdiction from the United Nations Works and Relief Agencey (UNWRA) to the Palestinian National Authority and the naturalization of Palestinians in their current country of asylum. Hassassian endorses specific recommendations for resolving the claims of the refugees, including that the “right of return” cannot be literally exercised inside 1948 Israel and will have to be exercised in the State of Palestine.

Joshua Landis, in “Early US Policy toward Palestinian Refugees: The Syria Option,” documents the attempt by the United States to resettle Palestinian refugees in Syria after the 1948 war. He researches this little- known aspect of the history of the Middle East conflict and US foreign policy. Landis tells the complete story and discovers that US policy was motivated by a variety of factors. Syria’s refusal to accept the American proposal led to the decision of the US government to throw its support behind the Israeli policy on the Palestinian refugee issue.

Part I, Comprehensive Solutions comprises chapters 7–10.

Don Peretz, in “Refugee Compensation: Responsibility. Recipients, and Forms and Sources,” provides an in-depth study of the problems of refugee compensation. Using historical statistics from a variety of sources, he reviews land and property holdings and points out the difficulties in applying those statistics today for levels of compensation. The most authoritative source in Israel for statistics would be the Israel Custodian of Absentee Property. He suggests several alternative scenarios for compensation. In all cases, Israel would assist financially, but funding for compensation would have to come from outside to afford the substantial amounts involved by all estimates.

Emanuel Marx, in “Refugee Compensation: Why the Parties have been Unable to Agree and Why it is Important to Compensate Refugees for Losses,” asks two questions. The first is why the parties have so far been unable to formulate polices on refugee compensation. The second is why it is so important to compensate individual refugees for losses sustained half a century ago. He explains that set attitudes are not likely to change, because they have never been thoroughly examined by either of the parties or discussed by both parties. For Marx, compensation will provide a basis on which Israeli-Palestinian relations will grow and thrive. To keep that relationship strong, however, he recommends that the Palestinian state throw up high tariff walls in order to protect itself against the inroads of the Israeli economy.

Moshe Ma’oz, in “Traditional Positions and New Solutions,” looks at the two compromise solutions resulting from the Harvard’s Weatherford Center for International Affairs meeting of Palestinian and Israeli scholars. Using the four principles stated in the joint concept papers, he outlines the advantages and disadvantages for both Israelis and Palestinians. He looks at the differing historical narratives and uses them as bases to judge how various solutions will fare with the different groups. Ma’oz discusses the problems and possible benefits of linkages in negotiations for both sides. He is of the opinion that the refugee issue is probably less difficult than other permanent settlement issues. Finally he discusses the components of a solution.

Donna E. Arzt, in “Actual Repatriation: A Minimal Israeli Gesture,” proposes the establishment of an exact number of refugees (75,000) to return to Israel and how this can logically proceed as a compromise for all concerned. She suggests that a symbolic gesture of repatriation is the lynchpin of the refugee issue. She states categorically that both sides will have to accept the fact that the Israelis will never accept a peace that implies the return of all the refugees and that the Palestinians will never accept a peace without return of some refugees. Arzt explains how not to get bogged down in semantic distinctions. She also recommends enlisting outside help in implementation, including the UN High Commission for Refugees and the Refugee Project of the Lawyers Committee for Human Rights, which has issued a set of ten General Principles Relating to the Promotion of Refugee Repatriation.

Part I, Regional Context Perspectives comprises chapters II 16.

Joseph Ginat and Dale F. Eickelman, in “From Refugees to Citizens: A Regional Proposal,” stress the importance of involving the Palestinian refugees in the implementation of decisions that affect their status. They believe this reality supersedes any public policy slogan toward an actual solution. Ginat interviewed three generations of refugees as to how they see the future for themselves. The refugees’ directly and indirectly expressed preferences regarding housing and residence patterns in refugee camps that suggest issues requiring resolution as part of the peace process. The authors propose that existing refugee camps be turned into permanent towns or annexed to local municipalities. They outline a plan for resident involvement in collective decision making for housing construction based on economy of scale.

Mohanna Haddad, in “Palestinian Refugees in Jordan and National Identity, 1948–1999,” gives a detailed overview of Palestinians in Jordan. He uses historical demography to show changes in the Jordanian population. Haddad separates the “Palestinian identity” into four phases during the twentieth century. He says that after 1974, Jordan served as an umbrella covering the Palestinians, including their presence at the Madrid conference. He feels that since the majority of Palestinian refugees are integrated into Jordanian society, they do not manifest much difference with that society at large. He questions whether they could be included into Jordan in non-refugee terms versus the situation of those who are still living as refugees in the camps.

Taisir Amre, in “Final Status Negotiations and Regional Cooperation,” presents ideas about the Palestinian refugee problem for the final status negotiations. He states that there is a consensus that the problem of Palestinian refugees is of a distinct political nature. He says that United Nations Resolution 194 will not be implemented without a political solution to the Palestinian national cause. As a starting point, he wants Israelis to refrain from ignoring the Palestinians’ plight and legitimate rights. At the same time, he recognizes that Palestinians must be open to the idea that it is not possible politically or practically to repatriate all their refugees. He proposes instead that the Palestinian state take on the responsibility of the displaced persons of 1967.

Norma Masrieh-Hazboun, in “Refugee Resettlement in the Gaza Strip: Israeli Policy Revisited,” deals with the Israeli policy of resettlement versus the Palestinian idea of “right of return.” She explains that resettlement is a policy of liquidation while return means resolution. She rejects the Israeli-Western approach of an economic solution because it neglects the political aspects of the problem. She also sees attempts at resettlement of Palestinian refugees in the Gaza Strip as consolidating the collective identity among them and promoting their adherence to their “right of return.”

Kais M. Firro, in “Palestinian Refugees in Lebanon since 1982,” looks at the situation of the Palestinian refugees in Lebanon. He shows that the marginalization of refugees in Lebanon began in 1948. At one time, between 1969 and 1982, the PLO was empowered to administer the camps. However, the PLO office was closed in 1982, and the “War of the Camps” between 1985 and 1987 further undermined the PLO. By 1996, unemployment among Palestinians reached 50 to 65 percent. Kais Firro gives examples showing the difficulties the refugees have faced recently and how the Lebanese rejectionist position is unlikely to change.

Laura Drake, in “The Future of Palestinian Refugees in Lebanon,” presents the issue from a Lebanese perspective as well as from those in the camps in Lebanon. She reviews and proposes alternative solutions for the refugees. These solutions include a proposed survey ofcamp residents to find out what they desire. Suggested solutions range from recognition and reconciliation of all properties within Israel to a resettlement option in Iraq. She states that the Lebanese do not want the refugees to stay in Lebanon, and that the Israeli-Palestinian talks create the fear of permanent settlement there. She predicted correctly that the announcement of a unilateral Israeli withdrawal from South Lebanon would cause strong negative reaction among the Arabs.

Part II, Policy Positions and Solutions comprises chapters 17–24.

Shlomo Gazit, in ‘Solving the Refugee Problem — An Israeli Point of View,” sees the issue as a tragedy in which both sides are right. His stated priorities are the continued existence of a Jewish state, the security of Israel, and the beginning of a comprehensive settlement. He believes Israel should not have to admit responsibility for the refugee problem, yet it should compensate the refugees for the properties they have left behind. His recommended solution is that the law of return apply only to the Palestinian state, that refugees have the right to citizenship of their host countries, and that Israel and the international community help in compensating, resettling, and rehabilitating the refugees.

Munther S. Dajani, in “A Predicament in Search of an Innovative Solution,” attempts to coerce a solution from the Israelis and the Palestinians. He clearly recognizes the reality that the most complex issue is how to create trust and confidence between the two parties. He pulls no punches when he says that all parties must concede on what they thought was non-negotiable at one time or another. He suggests that the Palestinian issue is seen within Israel as an exclusive Israeli concern, which leaves the Palestinians out of the dialogue. He uses his family’s own personal history as an analogy to the entire history of the conflict.

Hussein Ramzoun, in “The Historical Development of the Refugee Camps in Jordan,” reports on the development of the Palestinian refugee camps in Jordan. He shows the active role of the Jordanian government in the care of refugees while UNRWA offers just basic services. He says that such care constitutes 22 percent of the Jordanian budget. He also includes tables showing the distribution of the population of refugee camps in Jordan, contrasting the original capacity with the present number of residents.

Abraham Badran, in “The Role of UNRWA: Refugee Statistics and UN Resolutions,” reviews the refugee problem and the United Nations resolutions. He uses tabular material to contrast reports of refugee number estimates. He recommends various principles for a proposed solution, including the observation that people become tolerant of others once they themselves are recognized and their rights are acknowledged. He sees Israel’s granting of rights to the Palestinians as a major step toward a permanent peace. Along the same lines, he proposes that 30 percent of current Middle Eastern military budget be used to pay for implementing peace issues instead of war preparations.

Rateb Amro, in “A Jordanian Perspective,” contrasts recent promising Jordanian-Israeli relations with the thorny issue of the Palestinian refugees of 1948 and 1967. He explores the legal issues before addressing the Jordanian angle on the refugee issue. He states that the Palestinian community in Jordan has the dual role of being typically Jordanian while, nevertheless, remaining typically Palestinian. He says that Jordanians believe that the stabilility of each country in the region is an integral component for peace. If nearly half the population of Jordan — the Palestinians — remain restless because of expectations for a solution of their final identity and status, then real economic, social, and political stability in Jordan will be forever compromised.

Bahieldin Elibrachy, in “The Refugee Question and Human Rights,” looks back and then forward to the policy of refugee compensation. He believes that the solution needs to be a regional one. He proposes as an alternative solution that certain countries in the area could integrate refugees into the hosting countries. Egypt’s plan to expand from 4 percent to 25 percent the amount of culturable land creates an enormous opportunity. Other countries such as Sudan and Iraq have the same opportunities even though they are not yet politically ready.

Tahseen Basheer, in “Obstacles and Opportunities: The Ideological Dimensions,” argues optimistically that a negotiated agreement is possible but that ideological differences create a clouded negotiating atmosphere and psychological roadblocks. Each side has recast history to explain and justify its goals and this has led to irreconcilable claims. The Palestinian dimension is the cornerstone of the conflict between Palestinians and Israelis and between Israelis and Arabs. The refugee problem centers on the people-to-people level. Seminars and simulations cannot replace governmental negotiations. A sustainable peace will be achieved only if the people accept a successfully negotiated complex package of compromise solutions that respond to human needs and create a structure in which there is neither victor nor vanquished. There must be a win-win arrangement that can grow in symmetry and synergy. An international fund established before an accord is possible could help remove some road blocks and promote cooperation that could facilitate successful negotiations.

Onn Winckler, in “The Economic Capacity of the Palestinian State to Absorb the Refugees: The Employment Perspective,” addresses the socioeconomic factors that will affect the possibility of absorption of Palestinian refugees into the future Palestinian state. The subject of employment receives a historical and demographic overview. He traces the peaks and valleys of employment opportunities for Palestinians and looks to the future with the enormous number of young people coming into the workforce in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. Looking at the current lack of employment growth in these areas, he discusses the problems and strategies for the return of refugees as additional members of the workforce.

Part II, Public Opinion Polling comprises chapter 25.

Ephraim Yuchtman-Yaar and Tamar Hermann, in “How the Palestinian and Israeli-Jewish Publics Perceive the Issues,’’ present a picture of public opinion about the issues concerning Palestinian refugees. This is an important contribution, as it demonstrates the application of scholarship to reality. The authors present polling data showing that both the Israeli and Palestinian publics tend to view the problem of Palestinian refugees from their own national narrative and national interests. However, they also show that a sizable percentage of both Israelis and Palestinians do not accept their own national narrative, specifically about the historical circumstances behind the refugee problem. They found that 31 percent of Israeli respondents accept the view that the Palestinian refugees were forced to leave by the Israeli army, while nearly 30 percent of the Palestinians see encouragement by Arab leaders or voluntary departure as at least a contributing factor to the refugee problem.

This volume and its distinguished contributors offer firm ground upon which to conduct timely and rational discourse that can lead to a negotiated settlement on refugees, but only if those involved in the dispute have the will to truly compromise for the sake of a peaceful, prosperous Middle East with soverign Israeli and Palestinian states.

[1] The Center for Peace Studies conducted three conferences in the academic year 1999 2000. One was on the refugee issue, one was on the status of Jerusalem, and the third was dedicated to the peace process. This volume is based on the November 30-December 2, 1999 conference at the University of Oklahoma on the refugee problem. The editors are preparing a second volume to be published that will include papers from the conferences on the peace process and the status of Jerusalem. As to the conference on the status of Jerusalem, it was a unique kind of conference where a document of eleven points was produced and accepted by all participants except one. The document, as a guideline for negotiation, was presented to the Israeli government, the Palestinian Authority, King Abdullah of Jordan and President Mubarak of Egypt. The document was released at a press conference one hour after delivering it to the governments on January 23, 2000.

[2] The working group at Harvard University has been discussing the Israeli-Palestinian conflict for several years. The group comprises five Palestinian and six Israeli scholars. It is headed by Dr. Herbert C. Kelman of Harvard University. Group members have written many papers as part of a Working Papers series. The paper referred to here, The Palestinian Refugee Problem and the Right of Return, was edited by Joseph Alpher and Khalil Shikaki, May 1998. See also Moshe Ma’oz’s paper in this book and footnote 6 for the names of the participants in the Harvard group.

[3] Journal of Refugee Studies 11 (25).

[4] Fafo Institute for Applied Social Science is an institute for commissioned research. In 1999, it did an additional survey of camps and “gatherings” of Palestinian refugees.

[5] Lists of projects, papers and organizations involved in researching questions on Palestinian refugees can be found at:

[[http://www.arts.mcgill.ca/MEPP/PRRN/prfront.html][http://www.arts.mcgill.ca/MEPP/PRRN/prfront.html]].

[6] The following is a more extensive list of other institutions dealing with Palestinian refugees:

BADIL — Alternative Information Centre (Bethlehem)

CEDEJ (Cairo)

Center for Palestine Research and Studies (Nablus)

Center for Policy Analysis on Palestine (Washington, D.C.)

Council on Foreign Relations (New York)

Human Rights Watch/Middle East (New York)

Institute for Global Conflict and Cooperation (University of California — San Diego)

Institute for Jerusalem Studies (Jerusalem)

Institute for Social and Economic Policy in the Middle East (Harvard University)

Israel/Palestine Centre for Research and Information (Jerusalem)

Jaffee Center for Strategic Studies (Tel Aviv University)

Lebanese Center for Policy Studies (Beirut)

<br’al-Najah University (Nablus)

Near and Middle East Information Project (Berlin)

Palestinian Academic Society for the Study of International Affairs (Jerusalem)

Palestinian Diaspora and Refugee Centre/“Shaml” (Ramallah) RAND (US) Royal Institute of International Affairs (London)

Washington Institute for Near East Policy (Washington, D.C.)

Source: Palestinian Refugee Research.Net

[7] Donna Arzt, Refugees Into Citizens: Palestinians and the End of the Arab-Israeli Conflict (Council on Foreign Relations Press, 1996); Shmay Cahana, Differing and Converging Views on solving the Palestinian Refugees' Problems (Jerusalem: Hebrew University, Davis Institute for International Relations, 1997); Shlomo Gazit, The Palestinian Refugee Problem, Final Status Issues: Israelis-Palestinians, Study No. 2 (Tel Aviv: Jaffee Center for Strategic Studies, Tel Aviv University, 1995); Sami Hadawi, Palestinian Rights and Losses in 1V48: A Comprehensive Study (London: Saqi Books, 1998); Ruth Lapidoth, The Right of Return in International Law (Jerusalem: The Jerusalem Institute for Israel Studies [in Hebrew]); Benny Morris, The Birth of the Palestinian Refugee Problem, (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1987); Don Peretz, Palestinians, Refugees and the Middle East (Washington, D.C.: United States Institute for Peace, 1993); Ramzi Rabah. Palestinian Refugees, Displaced, and the Final Status Negotiations (Beirut: Arab Progress House, 1996); Danny Rubinstein, The People of Nowhere: The Palestinian Vision of Home (New York: Times Books/Random House); Salim Tamari, "Adaptation" in the West Bank and Gaza. Prepared for RWG intersessional. April, 1996; Elia Zureik, Palestinian Refugees and the Peace Process (Beirut: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1996); UNRWA, Annual Reports of the Commissioner Generals and other publications.

[8] Aluf Ben, Ha'aretz, April 13, 2000.

[9] Personal communication from Dr. Manuel Hassassian, see also Amira Hass, Haaretz, 12 April, 2000.

[10] Ibid.

[11] Fafo Institute for Applied Social Science, unpublished study

[12] Personal communication from Rateb Amro. See also Ha’aretz, April 10, 2000.

* Part I: The Historical Background and the “Right of Return”: Comprehensive Solutions Regional Context Perspectives

 2. The Historical Background

[[Yoav Gelber]]

The Israeli-Arab war of 1948 has been thoroughly researched. However, lasting interest in this encounter has not emanated from its significance to military history. Scholarly curiosity derives mainly from its wider historical repercussions that have changed the face of the Middle East. Among the war’s outcomes were the emergence and shaping of Israel; its persistent existence as a spearhead of western civilization in the region; the protracted Arab-Israeli conflict and the unsolved Palestinian problem. Other processes have significant links to this war as well. These include the vanishing of the ancient Jewish communities in Muslim countries through emigration to Israel and elsewhere; political and social upheavals in the Arab states and frequent changes of their global orientations. All have stemmed from the strategy and the outcome of the 1948 war.

The end to the fighting in 1949 through the armistice agreements did not resolve the causes of the war. For a long time, the threat of a “second round” hung over the Middle East. Incessant skirmishing along Israel’s borders, and continuing political and economic warfare, naturally influenced the war’s historiography. Writings reflected the contenders’ deep conviction of their own righteousness and hatred of their antagonists for the evils their adversary inflicted upon them.

Propaganda, memoirs, journalistic writing, and early historiography have enveloped the war in a thick cloak of stereotypes, myths, polemics and apologies. Younger generations — Jews and Arabs alike — have grown up under their shadow forming their respective images of each other in accordance with these conceptions.

The opening of official archives in the late 1970s has changed the scene. Yet, archival material at the disposal of scholars has been Israeli, British, and American. No Arab parallel documentation has been made accessible to date. Studying the Arab perspective of the war is still confined mainly to British and American diplomats’ reports from Arab capitals, British and Israeli intelligence material (reflecting also — although indirectly — important Arab documentation), and Arab apologetics and denunciations. Several Israeli scholars have studied the Arab side of the war. No parallel interest in the Jewish perspective has developed among their Arab colleagues.[13]

A significant new feature in scholarly works on the war written in the late 1980s was the emergence of a school of inquiry by scholars who diverted the focus of attention from Israel’s accomplishments to the Palestinians’ grim fate. These studies portrayed the Palestinians as the hapless objects of violence and oppression (Israeli), collusion (Israeli-Transjordanian), and a treacherous diplomacy (British and Arab).[14]

This was not a mere coincidence. The new trend paralleled a widespread reversal of attitudes in the western world toward Israel. From May 1948 until the mid-1970s, Israel’s encounters with the Arab states stood at the crux of the Arab-Israeli conflict. Israeli historiography, emphasizing the triumph over the Arab armies, was compatible with conventional views of the conflict.

Stabilization of Israel's relations with the Arab states after the 1973 Yom Kippur war shifted attention to the Palestinian problem.

The self-proclaimed title "new historians" that these scholars have adopted — implying possession of objectivity and open-mindedness that was not the province of "old" historians, alleged to harbour a partisanship and involvement — has been particularly irritating.[15] This school's emergence has not brought about a scholarly breakthrough, neither in revealing new horizons nor in methodological originality. It has, however, generated a questionable revision of accepted standards of presentation, based on incomplete use of the newly accessible source material that has been open to professional criticism no less than its predecessors.[16]

Awarding the revisionist historians' standing as impartial and free from ideological bias is equally unwarranted. Some of them adopt the Arab standpoint after 1948, while others justify the Arabs' denial of the 1947 Partition Resolution and identify themselves with the Palestinian basic argument against Zionism — its being a colonialist movement accompanying the occupation of the Middle East by the imperialist powers. Although the fashionable tendency to exhibit Israel as "conceived in sin" had not necessarily been the motivation fueling all revisionist scholars, they have rendered this charge a valuable service by sketching the Palestinians as innocent victims of others' conspiracies and atrocities. In their works, the Israelis emerge as having no other worry in the most difficult time in their history than cynically plotting their enemies' expulsion from their own homeland. This double simplicity appears unconvincing to anyone familiar with the sources, who has studied that period — unless the reader is utterly prejudiced.

Since, in the eyes of revisionist historians, the primordial sin was Jewish statehood — seemingly at the Palestinians' expense — they treat the previous chapters of Zionist-Arab relations superficially, almost ignoring Palestinians' violent opposition to the Zionist enterprise prior to 1948. Apparently, they consider this irrelevant, or perhaps even avoid it because a proper examination might contradict their theories.

In their handling of the 1948 war, the revisionists have bypassed elementary facts in order to underscore the particular issue of the Palestinians' ordeal. A simple and yet undisputed fact of common knowledge is that the Palestinians and the Arab League — not the Yishuv - promptly rejected the UN resolution on partition following the vote in the General Assembly on November 29, 1947. Immediately and intentionally, they embarked on frustrating implementation of partition by violence. At first, they instigated disturbances and gradually escalated them to a full- scale war. The Arab League backed the Palestinians' campaign from the beginning and the Arab states joined in the fighting upon termination of the mandate, invading the newly established Jewish state. The Arabs stubbornly repudiated any compromise that provided for a Jewish state, no matter what its borders were. Only in the wake of their military defeat did the Arabs make UN resolutions a cornerstone of their case and demand their strict fulfillment.

Any study describing solely Palestinian suffering is one-sided and incomplete without properly weighing this plain truth: As victims of war, the Palestinians' own conduct gives adequate cause to deny them the adjective "innocent. " Truly, they have paid a heavy price in this war — and ever since. They have been victims — but to a large extent they are the victims of their own follies and pugnacity, as well as the incompetence of their Arab allies.

The following modest contribution to the historical debate of this war is a continuation of several previous works that I have published in Hebrew. These studies have treated the creation of the Israeli Defense Force (IDF) and accompanying military and political domestic controversies in Israel; the earlier development of the Arab-Jewish conflict, and the Jews' relations with Transjordan. Other forthcoming books examine the development of the Israeli intelligence services during the war and the emergence of the refugee problem.[17]

Israel's War of Independence — the equivalent to the Palestinians' Al-Naqaba (Arabic for "Holocaust") — consisted of two distinct, consecutive, but separate campaigns fought by different enemies, under dissimilar circumstances, each phase under different rules. The first encounter commenced early in December 1947 and lasted until the British mandate in Palestine expired. It was a civil war between Jews and Palestinians that took place under British sovereignty and in the presence of British troops. The second contest began with the invasion of Palestine by the regular Arab armies on May 15. 1948 and continued intermittently until the conclusion of armistice agreements during the first half of 1949. This was a war between Israel and a coalition of Arab states, fought by armies using methods of regular warfare.

Throughout the civil war, the characteristic tactics were urban guerrilla, raids, or shooting attacks on isolated rural settlements and ambushes on the opponent’s transportation lines. No territory could be gained — even temporarily, and decisive determination of an outcome of hostilities was impossible. Lacking proper military objectives, the antagonists carried out their attacks on non-combatant targets, subjecting civilians to deprivation, intimidation, and harassment. Consequently, the weaker, less cohesive and backward Palestinian society collapsed under a not-overly-heavy strain. An increasing flow of refugees to the heart of Arab-populated areas and into adjacent countries underscored the defeat.

During this period, the principal Jewish paramilitary organization — the Haganah — was reshaped as a regular fighting force, based on conscription. A territorial militia of armed settlers backed the emerging army. Simultaneously, the network of autonomous Jewish national institutions that had been established by the Yishuv during the mandatory era were transformed into a system of independent and sovereign government that controlled and directed the Yishuv s war effort.

The patriarchal Palestinian society lagged behind. Spontaneously, “national committees” emerged in the principal towns to deal with essential preparations for war on the local level. Yet, the Palestinians failed to establish central political, financial, administrative, and military facilities. This failure resulted in a rapid deterioration of local institutions and eventually led to complete anarchy. The Arab League contributed to the chaos by being able neither to determine Arab Palestine’s political future nor to let the Palestinians shape their own destiny.

On the eve of the war, the Arab Higher Committee (AHC) and its associates in neighboring countries — the committees for defending Filastin — recruited hundreds of volunteers: exiled Palestinians, Syrians, Iraqis, and fascist Bosnians. In December 1947, they infiltrated Palestine and formed the nucleus of Jihad al-Mukadas (“Holy Fighters”). Several thousand indigenous youngsters joined their ranks. After the invasion, the regular armies employed these volunteers, augmented by other native recruits, as auxiliaries and garrisons in non-essential front sectors.

Following the outbreak of hostilities, the Palestinians improvised local militias for defending their towns and villages. Members of the prewar paramilitary organizations Najada and Futuwa, ex-soldiers of the British army, former policemen and defectors from the Transjordan Frontier Force — all joined these “national guards,” but their role remained limited and passive.

From the outset, the Palestinian combatants had a secondary role in the framework of the Arab war effort. In December 1947, the League undertook to raise the Arab Liberation Army (ALA) that should have carried the main burden of the Palestine campaign. This force hastily assembled and drilled in Syria, and during January-March 1948 moved into the country. Originally, the mission of the ALA should have been defending Arab areas until the end of the mandate, meanwhile avoiding incidents with the British and major clashes with the Jews. Yet, rapid escalation of the civil war dragged the foreigners into an untimely involvement in combat. Several abortive attacks on Jewish settlements exposed the ALA’s incompetence and revealed numerous tactical and organizational deficiencies.

The evacuation’s progression and the British army’s preoccupation with safeguarding its lines of withdrawal enabled the adversaries to change their tactics. Early in April, the Haganah took the initiative and during the next six weeks launched several large-scale operations across the country. By contrast, the Arab forces remained dispersed and disarrayed, clinging to their traditional patterns of warfare and organization that were anachronistic under prevailing circumstances. The Haganah soon pushed the Arab forces onto the defensive. Between early April and mid-May 1948 the nascent Jewish army crushed the Palestinian irregulars and the League’s expedition, although at the price of heavy losses.

Culminating in the last days of the mandate, this civil war between rival ethnic communities set a precedent. Hitherto, the civilized world had known very few such examples. The American civil war was too remote, while the Russian and Spanish civil wars were fought by armies using methods and means of regular warfare. All three armed conflicts were fought between members of the same nation and society. The war of 1948 was the first modern civil war fought between competing ethnic communities. It was also the first national contest in the post-Ottoman Middle East. In the 1970s and 1980s, the civil war in Lebanon might have given some perspective and a better insight into the brutal nature of this kind of feud. Recent feuds in the Balkans or in the former Soviet Empire have further revealed the cruel essence of inter-communal flare-ups and their immense impact on civilian populations.

Encounters between akin societies such as Serbs, Croats, and Bosnians; Armenians and Azeris; or Georgians and Ossetians are often indecisive. The rapid and decisive tipping of the scales in favor of one side in the civil war in 1948 — once the British left the rivals to themselves, rather than a protracted stalemate — was exceptional. The Palestinians’ swift downfall surprised all concerned: Arabs, British, and Jews.

In six weeks of fierce fighting, the Haganah occupied most of the area that the UN partition plan allotted to the Jewish state. In some regions, the Jews extended their control even beyond this line. They took over five Arab or mixed towns and 200 villages; between 250,000 to 300,000 Palestinians escaped (so far they were not driven out) to Palestine’s Arab sectors and to neighboring countries. The Palestinian irregulars and the League s army disintegrated, becoming militarily immaterial.

The Palestinians’ rapid and almost total collapse astonished their Jewish opponents. It was unbelievable that plain defeatism lacking any ulterior motives had provoked their mass flight. The Yishuv suspected the flight was nothing but a conspiracy concocted by the AHC to embroil the Arab states in the war. Later, this hypothesis would become the official line of Israeli diplomacy and propaganda. Originally, the allegations emanated from popular hearsay claiming that the Mufti's followers encouraged running away by promising the escapees a quick return in the footsteps of the triumphant Arab armies. Often, fugitives from the fighting invented and disseminated these stories to exonerate their defection.

However, all the documentary evidence clearly shows that the AHC (though not local leaders in certain places), the ALA, and the Arab League did not countenance flight. On the contrary, they tried in vain to stop it.

Like other societies in the area east of Egypt and west of Iran, the Palestinians had no historical experience with national war or an understanding of its essence. For centuries, wars in this region had been fought either between foreign empires and rulers or between local lords competing for power. Napoleon and Muhammad Ali's wars against the Supreme Porte, or Britain's campaign against Turkey in the First World War, were irrelevant to a populace that did not associate itself with either of the antagonists. Throughout the ages, the people of this region developed their own avenues of survival in others' wars. They were accustomed to evading the fighting by finding temporary havens nearby until the tempest had passed and they could safely return to their homes.

Many thousands of Palestinian fallahin (villagers) fled to Hauran (in today's Syria) during the First World War to evade conscription and forced labor or to escape drought and famine in Palestine. They mostly returned after the British army occupied the country. During the rebellion of 1936/9, approximately 25,000 Palestinians moved to adjacent countries because they were hard pressed either by the British or by the rebel gangs. Most fugitives and exiles returned openly or clandestinely during and after the Second World War.

Unaware of the different historical circumstances, at the beginning of the civil war in 1948 the Palestinians reacted similarly. Their fragile social structure tumbled because of economic hardships and administrative disorganization. From the outset of fighting, those who could afford to had sent their families to neighboring countries and joined them later, when the situation deteriorated. Others moved from the vicinity of the front lines to less exposed areas of the Arab sector, particularly if they had relatives there to receive them. Thousands of foreign Arab immigrants and temporary residents — Egyptians, Lebanese and Syrians — returned to their home countries to avoid the hardships of war. First-generation emigrants from rural hamlets to urban centers — mostly day laborers who were the first to lose their jobs because of the economic chaos — returned to their villages.

They all set a model and created an atmosphere of desertion that soon embraced wider circles. Between half to two-thirds of the Arab inhabitants in cities such as Haifa or Jaffa had abandoned their homes before the Jews discharged the final blow and occupied the towns.

Dependence on towns that had fallen to the Jews, the impossibility of maintaining the agricultural routine, and rumors of atrocities exacerbated mass flight to the countryside. Many hamlets that the Haganah stormed in April-May 1948 were empty. Under the pressure of the fighting, their tenants had gradually left during the campaign’s earlier stages.

At this point in time, running away was, for the most part, voluntary. So far, the Haganah’s use of intimidation and other methods of psychological warfare was sporadic. Quantitatively, most of the Palestinian refugees fled under these circumstances of an inter-communal civil war. The Arab armies’ invasion on May 15, 1948 terminated this phase of the flight. In certain places, escapees who had not gone far returned to their deserted homes in the wake of the invading troops.

During the civil war, the Palestinians’ behavior stood in sharp contrast to the Yishuv’s performance. Not a single Jewish settlement was deserted before the invasion. Only a dozen kibbutzim in the Galilee and in Gush Etzion near Jerusalem sent mothers and children to safer places in the interior. In all other instances, the central leadership took measures to reinforce vulnerable posts and secure their capacity to survive. Unlike the Palestinians, the Yishuv’s main centers displayed a proven solidarity with its periphery.

The next waves of Palestinian escapees and deportees were the result of the Israeli Defense Force’s (IDF) counter-offensives against the invading Arab armies. By July 1948, the Israelis’ previous restraints about crossing the UN partition line disappeared. They also considered expulsion of the Palestinians who had summoned the invaders morally legitimate. These later refugees were sometimes literally deported across the lines. In certain cases, IDF units terrorized them to hasten their escape and a few isolated massacres expedited their flight.

When they ran away, the refugees were confident of their eventual repatriation at the end of hostilities. This term could mean a cease-fire, a truce, an armistice, or a peace agreement. The return of escapees had been customary in the Middle East’s wars throughout the ages. When the first truce began in June 1948, many tried to resettle in their hamlets or at least to gather the crops. However, they were fated for a surprise.

Their Jewish adversaries belonged to an alien European civilization whose historical experience and concepts of warfare were different. Three years after the end of the Second World War, it was inconceivable that Sudeten, Pomeranian, or Silesian Germans who had been expelled by the Czechs, Poles, and Russians would ever return to their former dwelling places. People still remembered the war between Turkey and Greece in the early 1920s that had ended with an exchange of populations between these two countries. Europe was full of White Russians who had left their homeland after the revolution and the subsequent civil war. The vast majority of the Yishuv did not think that the Palestinians should fare better.

In Europe, war refugees seldom returned to their former places of residence if the victorious enemy had occupied their homes. Usually, they resettled and began life anew elsewhere. This was particularly true after the Second World War. Hailing mostly from Europe, the Israelis applied this principle to the Middle East. They forcibly blocked the returning infiltrators during the truces and after the war. Concurrently, they seized their lands and their dwellings were used to accommodate evacuees from Jewish settlements that had been occupied by the invading Arab armies, such as Gush El Hon and the Jewish quarter of Jerusalem’s Old City. Later, they settled new immigrants and demobilized soldiers in deserted Arab towns and on lands formerly cultivated by Arab villagers. Thus, the presumably temporary flight turned into a permanent, almost eternal, problem of refugees.

Israel deemed the Arab League responsible for the refugees’ fate and expected the Arab governments to resettle them in their countries as Germany had absorbed Volksdeutsche after the Second World War. Surrounding Arab culture — the refugees, the non-refugee Palestinians, and the Arab states and people — refused to accept this alien code and have insisted on the refugees’ “right of return” as a precondition for any reconciliation with Israel.

Late in April 1948, it seemed that without outside intervention to stop the Haganah’s offensive, the Jews might take over the entire country. This implied the imminent demise of Arab Palestine and more escapees pouring into the adjacent states. The British evaded the Arab League’s demands to rescue the Palestinians. They refused to prolong the mandate temporarily — pending finding a solution, or imposing a cease-fire. Last-minute efforts by the UN mission, foreign consuls, and the International Red Cross to stop the fighting, at least in Jerusalem, failed. Thus, the Palestinians’ debacle in the civil war activated the regular armies’ invasion and the Arab-Israeli war.

The Palestinians’ collapse occurred when the British were still masters of Palestine. Britain had sufficient air and land forces in the country to stop the Haganah had the British authorities wanted to employ them. Determined to complete their withdrawal according to schedule, the British were reluctant to intervene. They also rejected Abdullah’s plea to deploy the Arab Legion in Palestinian Arab hamlets and cautioned neighboring states against any thoughts of premature invasion to hold back the Jewish offensive.

In April-May 1948, the British looked on while the Haganah crushed the Palestinians and the ALA. They passively witnessed the storming of Tiberias, Haifa and Safed, as well as many Arab villages. All the British did in the face of the Palestinians' mass flight was occasionally provide escapees with transport and escort them to the closest place of asylum. The only exception was Jaffa where the British intervened with vigor to stop the /ZL (Jrgun Zvai Leumi [National Military Organization]) assault. Contrary to the other three towns, Jaffa was within the boundaries of the partition plan's Arab state.

Britain's disposition did not stem from any particular sympathy with the Jewish cause. Its main objective was preparing the ground for Abdullah's seizure of the country's Arab areas after termination of the mandate. Already in February 1948, the British had reached the conclusion that annexing Arab Palestine to Transjordan was the only way to fill the vacuum and avoid chaos in the region at the end of the mandate. They decided to endorse the king's ambition although it violated the UN resolution to establish a Palestinian state. Yet, Abdullah's aspirations were unpopular among the Palestinians and other Arab states; all the League's members except Iraq were likely to oppose their implementation. The Palestinians' defeat should have made them, and the Arab states as well, more amenable to annexation — in the absence of any practical alternative.

This was the only plot against the Palestinians if there was any at all. It was British, and not Israeli-Transjordanian. Between February and August 1948 the Jews and Abdullah had no political contacts except Golda Meyerson's (later, Meir) futile interview with the king in Amman on the eve of the invasion. Although the Arab Legion did not invade the territory of the Jewish state as the partition plan delineated it, the battles in Latrun and around Jerusalem were far from being faked or simulated. In Israeli eyes, the Legion was the principal enemy until July 1948.

Military intervention in Palestine had been a feasible contingency since the Arab League's conference at Bludan in June 1946. Nonetheless, the Arab governments had hesitated for a long time before deciding to employ their armies for that purpose. The Arab armies were young, untrained, inexperienced and poorly equipped with pre- or early Second World War types of armaments. A singular exception was the small Arab Legion that was commanded, modeled, and trained by British officers. None of these armies took any significant part in the Second World War. Their principal task was defending their respective regimes against domestic subversion. Dispatching them to Palestine was likely to expose the rulers to internal dangers. The expeditions' possible failure might have triggered further risk when embittered troops would return from the battlefields and possibly endanger political stability — precisely what happened after the war. In four years, all Arab regimes that had gone to war in 1948 collapsed, and their leaders were either murdered or exiled. Only in Iraq, the Regent and Nuri Sa'id managed to survive longer — until the revolution of 1958.

Despite the Arab League's resolutions at Bludan, the member states had done nothing to prepare for a military intervention in Palestine until late in September 1947. When Britain announced its determination to withdraw from Palestine, the League's conference at Alia in Lebanon nominated a "technical" committee to examine the military implications of the new situation. Its chairman, the Iraqi retired General Isma'il Safwat, estimated the balance of power between the Palestinians and the Jews, and rightly concluded that the former had no chance. Urging the quick mobilization of volunteers, arms and money to help the Palestinians, Safwat stressed that this aid would only enable the Palestinians to endure. Frustrating Jewish statehood was feasible solely through the participation of regular armies, and then only after making essential preparations.

Competition and animosity within the Arab League made creation of a military coalition a difficult task. Aware of their domestic necessities and military defects, the Arab premiers discarded Safwat's advice. As a substitute, they embarked on the hasty formation of the ALA as a common enterprise of the League as a whole.

In April 1948, the ALA's setbacks and the Palestinians' defeat thrust the issue again into the Arab leaders' laps. Under pressure of public opinion aroused by news from Palestine and incited by wild rumors spread by Palestinian refugees, they reluctantly decided to invade the country. Yet, their hesitation persisted. Egypt delayed its decision to join the invading coalition until 12 May, three days before the mandate expired. Abdullah restricted his role to occupying the Arab areas in Judea and Samaria; he also contemplated the rescue of the holy places in Jerusalem, although his British advisors tried to dissuade him from undertaking such a mission. Lebanon was active in forming the political coalition, but ultimately abstained from military participation, presumably owing to the still influential Christians' opposition, encouraged by Jewish bribes.

Miracles rarely, if ever, occur in wars. The stronger belligerent wins and the Israeli War of Independence was no exception. A detailed examination of the balance of power reveals that throughout most of the 1948 war, the Jews were superior in personnel, equipment, and organization. The sole exception to this rule was the transition period between the two stages of the war — from the outset of the invasion up until the first truce in June 1948, the Arab armies enjoyed a considerable superiority over the IDF in the air, in artillery, and light armor. Moreover, Jewish troops were exhausted after six months of combat and had already sustained heavy losses. By contrast, the invading formations were all fresh and complete. Nonetheless, even at this stage, the expeditionary forces and their local auxiliaries were quantitatively inferior to the scope of the Yishuv's mobilized personnel.

Throughout the rest of the war, the Haganah and the IDF were stronger in magnitude of military personnel although neither they nor their enemies fully realized this fact. At the beginning of hostilities, the Palestinians had nothing that might resemble the Haganah, with all its shortcomings, or compete with it. The Palestinian's mobilized power never exceeded a few thousand, while during December 1947 alone the Yishuv enrolled 10,000 full-time recruits. The Haganah absorbed them and embarked on their training and organization in new and larger formations. Conscription according to age and marital status increased the number to 35,000 by midMay 1948. Although the ALA and other foreigners simultaneously enhanced Arab power by a few more thousand fighters, the disparity grew in favor of the Jews.

Continuing enlistment of additional age groups, volunteers from abroad and new immigrants, brought the IDF peak for the duration of the war to 117,500 recruits. Owing to casualties and early discharges, however, there were never more than 90,000 on active duty at any one time. The Arab expeditionary forces at their utmost height did not reach half that number. To this number one should add a few thousand Palestinian auxiliaries. This statistic, however, is somewhat misleading, and the disparity was not as big as it appears. The Israeli figures included the IDF’s entire logistic infrastructure that lacked a parallel among the invaders whose supply depots remained at home. Nonetheless, there was still a considerable difference in the IDF’s favor.

Jewish material superiority was also significant, though never admitted. Only one of the Haganah’s experts on Arab affairs (“Arabists”) claimed as early as January 1, 1948: “Our appreciation of the Arab armed forces is highly pretentious. They don’t have as many weapons as we think.” This correct statement held in question a deep-seated belief that was as old as the British reign in Palestine. A prevalent myth assumed that the Arabs enjoyed a considerable superiority of armaments over the Haganah.

During the civil war, the Palestinians’ performance and the information on available arms in various places did not support the orthodox evaluation of the arsenal at their disposal. The shortage of arms and munitions was their principal source of anxiety, fuelled both by scarcity inside the country and difficulties of obtaining weapons abroad. The ALA brought a certain number of support arms and a few artillery pieces and armored vehicles. Although the gap narrowed, the picture did not materially change, and the Haganah continued to maintain its relative edge.

Most Arab armies depended on Britain for supply of arms, munitions, spare parts, and other war materiel. Hence, they suffered heavily from the embargo that the UN Security Council imposed in May 1948. Only toward the end of the war did Arab governments find alternative sources of supply on the free European arms market and means of shipping purchased armaments to Arab ports. By contrast, the Israelis — endowed with long-time experience in clandestine purchase of weapons — efficiently circumvented the embargo. By July, the IDF had balanced the initial superiority of the Arab armies in heavy equipment, later regaining the lead in several types of weaponry.[18]

Yet, military superiority was insufficient to explain the final outcomes of the war. The quantitative advantages in personnel and equipment, as well as the qualitative gaps in training, organization, technical skills, battle experience, unity of purpose, and unified command were not sufficient on their own to cause the Arabs' — and particularly the Palestinians' — unprecedented rout. On a man-to-man basis, the Palestinian urban garrison, the raiders in the countryside, and the fighters in ambush along the roads were not significantly inferior qualitatively to their Jewish opponents. Ultimately, the enormous Jewish advantage lay in the social, cultural, moral, organizational, and technical infrastructure behind the warriors, and successful transformation and application of these factors in the military sphere. The disparity between a modern but still not pampered society and a traditional-patriarchal community was a principal factor in deciding the outcome of the war.

The military triumph notwithstanding, the war of 1948 was the most costly that Israel has ever fought. Lack of preparedness, dilettantism, and mistaken conceptions — not Arab might — were the main reasons for the high death toll. Until the war, the Yishuv's political and military leadership believed that the Great Powers would safeguard implementation of the partition solution adopted by the General Assembly against any outside onslaught. Ben-Gurion was the only exception to this view. His colleagues, however, did not share Ben-Gurion's vision of the approaching war and consistently objected to his demands to prepare the Yishuv for a total war and modify or transform the Haganah accordingly. Before the outbreak of hostilities, this organization conceived its responsibility only in terms of overcoming the likelihood of local Palestinian opposition. It prepared for an enhanced repetition of the Palestinian revolt of 1936/9, ignoring potential dangers from across the border. Various setbacks that the Haganah sustained in the course of the early phase of the civil war demonstrated that it had not been properly prepared even for that contingency. Response and reorganization in the midst of battle took time, and a high proportion of casualties paid the price for this lack of preparedness. Several myths surrounding the war have masked guilt-feelings about this lack of preparedness and were circulated to vindicate the leadership for any responsibility in the enormous number of casualties.

All these reservations notwithstanding, the 1948 war was Israel's most prominent campaign against the Arabs. It was the only war in which Israel succeeded in translating a military victory into a political settlement. Despite all the difficulties, this settlement survived eighteen crucial years during which the State of Israel consolidated its position through the admission of millions of immigrants and development of the infrastructure necessary to absorb and integrate them into a cohesive and vibrant society.

The armistice agreements of 1949 ended the fighting, but neither addressed the causes of the war nor solved its consequences. At first, Israel regarded these accords as an interim phase leading to talks about a permanent settlement of the Arab-Israeli conflict and the signing of peace treaties. These hopes were not consummated. The armistice regime persisted until the Six Day War in 1967, and the permanent settlement still seems to be far from near at hand even at the time of writing this essay, in the closing days of the twentieth century.

Transforming the armistice into peace was the task of the Palestine Conciliation Commission. Late in April 1949, the PCC convened the parties at a conference in Lausanne (Switzerland) that ended inconclusively in August of the same year. The PCC failed to bridge the enormous gaps between the adversaries and could not even bring them together. Subsequently, it embarked on reviewing the conditions of the Palestinian refugees and devising solutions for their temporary rehabilitation. Two more rounds of talks — at the beginning of 1950 and in the fall of 1951 — ended in failure and the PCC disappeared into oblivion. Attempts at mediation and direct talks between Israel on the one hand, and Jordan, Egypt and Syria (separately) on the other, also proved futile.

During this period — from 1949 to 1967 — the Palestinians receded from the political scene. Those who remained in Israel, as well as those who returned legally or illegally in the first year after the war, became Israeli citizens. The indigenous Palestinians on the West Bank and the refugees on both banks were incorporated into Jordan, which granted them full citizenship. There were also "Egyptian" Palestinians in the Gaza Strip as well as "Syrian" and "Lebanese" Palestinians in refugee camps in Syria and Lebanon — all without recognized citizenship. The concept “Palestinian” as such vanished, unless it was linked to the word “refugee.”

Only in the wake of the Six Day War did the Palestinians return to the political arena under their own banner. Since Israel occupied the West Bank and Gaza Strip but did not annex them, the inhabitants of these areas ceased to be “Jordanian” and “Egyptian” but did not become “Israeli.” They reappeared as simply “Palestinians” — a term that had been forgotten for 18 years. After relations between Israel and the Arab states stabilized in the wake of the Yom Kippur war in 1973, the Palestinian question returned to the center of the Israeli-Arab conflict.

Four issues have curtailed all ventures to reconcile the Arab states and the Palestinians with Israel after the war of 1948. These four issues still constitute an insurmountable hindrance to any permanent settlement.

The first issue has been territorial. Israel inherited Mandatory Palestine’s international borders with the adjacent Arab states. The Arab armies violated these lines by their invasion of Palestine in May 1948 and — except the Arab Legion — violated the borders of the Jewish state according to the UN resolution of November 29, 1947. Nevertheless, Israel accepted the international borders and in 1949 withdrew its forces from Egyptian and Lebanese territories in preparation for or in the wake of the armistice negotiations. Until 1967, Egypt demanded a corridor through the Negev that separated it from the rest of the Arab world as a precondition for any settlement with Israel. As part of the Camp David peace treaty with Egypt, Israel again evacuated all Egyptian territories that had been occupied in 1967. In return, Egypt recognized the legitimacy of its international border with Israel, but not Israel’s other borders.

Israel’s border with Syria has posed a different problem. Unlike the other Arab states, Syria has never recognized its international border with Palestine whose demarcation had been determined by an Anglo-French pact in December 1920 and modified later — in 1923, during the process of setting up border markers in the field. In 1949, Syria refused to withdraw its army behind this line. The compromise that the UN mediator devised — defining the controversial area between the former Syrian lines on Jordan River's western bank and the international border as a "demilitarised zone," was open to contradictory interpretations by the adversaries. For all intents and purposes, partitioned in practice by Syria and Israel in 1951–3, this "demilitarized" area remained a constant source of friction until the Israeli occupation of the Golan Heights in 1967.

The most crucial territorial problem, however, has been the border between Israelis and Palestinians. The armistice lines of 1949 separated between Israel on the one hand, and Egypt and Jordan on the other. From a Palestinian standpoint, the armistice lines (in popular parlance the "Green Line," as designated on maps) have been meaningless and noncommitting. Continuous infiltration into Israel manifested this attitude. The only internationally recognized line separating Israelis from Palestinians has been the 1947 partition borders. At the PCC talks in Lausanne, the Arab states insisted that this line be a starting point for discussion of the territorial issue. Under heavy American pressure and fears that Israel would not be admitted as a member to the UN, the Israeli delegation succumbed to this demand (presented by the PCC as its own). After Ben-Gurion ignored their request for instructions, the delegates signed the document known as "The Lausanne Protocol," which accepted the principle of the 1947 lines as the basis for territorial discussions, although it allowed the parties to suggest modifications. Subsequently, the PCC dismissed the scheme of border amendments submitted by Israel as going far beyond what the commissioners had meant by the term "modifications." The PCC even refused to hand the Israeli proposals over to the Arab delegations. Thus, the territorial discussion reached a stalemate at the very beginning of the conference and has remained such ever since.

The Arabs also linked the claim for Israel's withdrawal to the partition lines with the refugee issue. In Lausanne and elsewhere, Arab delegates maintained that the more territory Israel would cede, the less would be the scope of the remaining refugee problem after the return of some to the vacated area.

Apparently, the second issue, which has been posed by the Palestinian refugees, is the most crucial. Several other major refugee problems have emerged in the world during the twentieth century — in Germany, Poland, Czechoslovakia, the Balkans, India and Pakistan, Vietnam, and various countries in Africa. Most have found their solution long ago. Only the eternal Palestinian refugee problem has endured, affecting all parties concerned. More than any other single factor of the Israeli-Arab conflict, the Palestinian refugee problem manifests its unique features as a confrontation between opposing civilizations, extending beyond the ordinary national or religious level of other historical encounters.

Israel's efforts to convince the Palestinians, the Arab states, and the entire world that this problem should be solved by resettlement have been sincere, but geo-culturally out of context. The Israeli approach derived from the European experience, particularly after the Second World War. The mass repatriation of millions after the war concerned only the Allies' nationals. Refugees or deportees of the defeated belligerents resettled to begin life anew elsewhere. Germany absorbed millions of deportees from the Sudeten in Czechoslovakia and from Silesia. Poles, whom the Russians had driven out of Galicia, resettled in Silesia. Chetnik and Ustacha refugees did not go back to Yugoslavia. Israel wanted to apply this principle to the Middle East — to a large extent oblivious of the deep-seated difference in historical experience.

In the fifty years that have transpired since the 1948 war, the Arab world has not absorbed the refugees, although various states — especially in the Arab Peninsula — exploited their skills. A partial exception was Transjordan. While individual refugees settled to begin life anew in and outside the region, the majority barely mixed with their hosts neither in the W'est Bank and Gaza Strip nor in the Arab countries. They have remained aloof from the indigenous population — socially and geographically — living in their separate camps and expecting their return.

The Arab world the refugees themselves, other Palestinians, and the Arab states — rejected forthwith the Israeli approach to the problem and Israel's proposals to resolve the problem. The implied message has been unequivocal: (I) the Palestinian refugees are Israel's creation and responsibility, and it should not expect the Arab world to help solving the problem or share the responsibility for their ultimate fate. (2) the Arabs have not been able to crush Jewish statehood, but Israel should not expect them to comply with its alien code of behavior. Unlike Europe, the pattern in the Middle East has been that war refugees return to their homes when hostilities end, and do not resettle elsewhere. Israel has to reckon with this twofold message. Yet, unless the Jewish state is ready to commit national suicide with a demographic Damoclean sword — allowing the abolition of Israel's Jewish character and its hegemony as a social and political entity — it is difficult to foresee how the problem can be solved

A third focal issue has been Jerusalem. In Arab eyes, Jerusalem embodies the whole conflict because apart from its religious and historical significance, the fate of the holy city also concerns the territorial and refugee issues. Although Jerusalem has had a Jewish majority since the middle of the nineteenth century, the town was also the seat of the Arab elite in Palestine and the traditional center of Arab political life.

In Jewish eyes, Jerusalem is primarily the historical capital of the Jewish people, the holy city, for generations the focal point for historical yearnings (i.e., "Next Year in Jerusalem") for a return to Zion. The town's fate in 1948 symbolized the UN's failure to implement the partition plan. Israel therefore preferred sharing the city with Jordan rather than internationalization as the least of all evils, and both states cooperated in frustrating UN attempts to revive internationalization. With Jordan's disappearance from the West Bank in 1967, Israel annexed Jerusalem. Ever since it has tried hard to deny the Palestinians any political foothold in the town, claiming that they have neither historical nor political status in Jerusalem. Once more, this seems to be an unbridgeable gap.

The fourth issue concerns Arab reconciliation with Israel. After their defeat in 1948, the Arab states adopted a series of UN resolutions — to which they had vehemently objected prior to their military debacle — as the cornerstone of their political case against Israel. These resolutions concerned the aforementioned issues of the partition and borders, the refugees, and Jerusalem. While insisting on their strict fulfillment, the Arab states refused to commit themselves to recognition of, and peaceful and friendly relations with, their new neighbor. Political and economic relations with Israel, they asserted, were their own business and should not be linked to implementing UN resolutions, which should be an international commitment.

This attitude persisted until Anuar Sadat’s peace initiative in 1977 and has considerably transformed in recent years across most of the Arab world, although genuine acceptance of the “legitimacy” of a non-Muslim entity such as the State of Israel in their midst remains fundamentally unresolved. The basic issues concerning Israeli-Palestinian relations have not been tackled yet and continue to cast a shadow on Israel’s relations with the Arab states as well.

The Israeli-Palestinian dialogue since the Oslo pact has been conducted on two different levels which, unfortunately, do not seem to be converging: Ultimately, the vast majority of Israelis seeks coexistence with the Arabs and understands that such coexistence requires compromise and concessions on Israel’s part. Apart from marginal groups on both extremes, domestic controversies among Israelis do not concern the principle of compromise and concession, but its implementation: How far to compromise and what should be the limit of accommodation. The Palestinians strive for neither coexistence nor compromise but for justice’. The final and permanent settlement with Israel should remedy the wrongs that have allegedly been done to them, at least since the UN partition plan if not since the Balfour Declaration of 1917. Justice as framed by the Palestinians is an absolute: pure — recognizing no compromises, exclusive — with no apparent leeway for reciprocity in the pursuit of “righting historical wrongs.” As long as Israeli concessions meet the Palestinians’ conceptions of justice — the dialogue persists. When Israel stops conceding and insists on any of its positions calling for compromise — the Palestinian struggle for what they perceive as their “just rights” is likely to erupt again.

[13] Avraham Sela, “The Arab League and the Palestine Question, 1945–1948,” Ph.D. thesis submitted to the Hebrew University, Jerusalem, 1982; H. Levenberg, The Military Preparations of the Arab Community in Palestine, 1945–1948 (London: Frank Cass, 1993); and Y. Nevo, “The Arabs of Palestine, 1947 1948: Military and Political Activity,” Middle Eastern Studies 23 (1987): 3–38.

[14] Simcha Flapan, Zionism and the Palestinians (London, 1979), and The Birth of Israel: Myths and Realities (London, 1987); A. Shlaim, Collusion Across the Jordan — King Abdullah, the Zionist Movement, and the Partition of Palestine (Oxford, 1988); Ilan Pappe, Britain and the Arab-Israeli Conflict, 1948 -1951 (New York, 1988); Benny Morris, The Birth of the Palestinian Refugee Problem (Cambridge, 1988); B. Kimmerling and J. Migdal, Palestinians: The Making of a People (New York, 1993).

[15] Benny Morris, “The Eel and History: A Reply to Shabtai Tevet.” Tikkun 5(1) (1990): 19–22, 79–86.

[16] Shabtai Tevet. “The Palestinian Refugee Problem and Its Origin,” Middle Eastern Studies 26 (2) (1990): 214–49, and E. Karsh, Fabricating Israeli History (London, 1997).

[17] Yoav Gelber, Gar’in LeTzava ‘Ivri Sadir (in Hebrew: The Emergence of a Jewish Army) (Jerusalem: Yad Izhak Ben-Zvi, 1986); Lama Pirku Et HaPALMAH (in Hebrew: Why the PALM AH was Disbanded) (Tel Aviv: Shocken, 1986); Shorshei HaHavazelet (in Hebrew: Growing a Fleur-de-Lis), 2 vols. (Tel Aviv: Ministry of Defense Publications. 1992); Jewish- Transjordanian Relations, 1921 1948 (London and Portland: Frank Cass, 1996); Nitzanei HaHavazelet (in Hebrew: The Buds of the Fleur-de-Lis), 2 vols. (Tel Aviv: Ministry of Defense Publications, forthcoming); Palestine 1948: War, Escape and the Emergence of the Palestinian Refugee Problem (Brighton and Portland: Sussex Academic Press, 2001).

[18] Amitzur Ilan, Embargo, Otzma VeHachra’a BeMilhemet Tashah (in Hebrew: Embargo, Power, and Military Decision in the 1948 Palestine War) (Tel Aviv: Ma’arachot, 1995).

 3. Between the Right of Return and Attempts of Resettlement

Mohamed Hawary

Aside from the land problem, the issue of the refugees is the cornerstone of the Palestinian national question at the present time. For the Palestinian refugee problem lies at the heart of the Arab-Israeli and Palestinian—Israeli conflict.

Estimates vary of the number of Palestinian refugees displaced from within what became the borders of Israel in 1948. In 1949, the United Nations Conciliation Commission put the number at 726,000; the newly- established United Nations Relief and Works Agency (UNRWA) subsequently put the number at 960,021 in June 1950.[19] The Israeli government has, in the past, suggested numbers as low as 520,000, while Palestinian researchers have suggested up to 850,000. It was estimated that, before the outbreak of the Arab-Israeli war on May 15, 1948, the number of Palestinian refugees had reached about 300.000.[20] This figure rose. In October 1948 it was 472,000; in November, 600,000; in March ,700,000; in April, 900,000; in June, 1,000,000; in June, 1958, the number had reached 1.053,628, and 1,344.576 in May, 1967. By the late 1960s, it was estimated that the number of Palestinian refugees had grown to 2 million.[21] The early figures were probably exaggerated and certainly dropped back when fighting stopped. [22]

It was estimated that over 410,000 Palestinians were displaced in 1967, some of them for the second time.[23] According to the Report of the Commissioner-General of UNRWA submitted to the Twenty-second Session of the UN General Assembly, 234,000 Arabs were refugees from Jordan, Syria, and the Sinai Peninsula following the crisis of June 5, 1967. This is in addition to the 100,000 “old” refugees who lied their refugee camps (where they were registered with UNRWA) when these were overrun by the Israeli army. The refugee population continued to grow, and these numbers increased day by day.[24]

Estimates put the Palestinian population at approximately 6.6 million in 1995. In 1995, UNRWA data indicated some 3,172,641 registered refugees in its “area of operation” (West Bank, Gaza, Jordan, Syria, Lebanon), plus an estimated 335,000 non-registered “displaced persons.”[25]

The political weight and dimension of the Palestine refugee problem is underlined by the fact that Palestinians in exile make up 58 percent of the total Palestinian population (over six million) and that they also make up 56 percent of the population inside the Occupied Territories. There are three million Palestinian refugees registered with UNRWA: 37.8% live in the West Bank and Gaza, 39.7% in Jordan, 11.2% in Lebanon, 10.9% in Syria.

 UN Resolutions

The “right UN Resolutions of return” was endorsed and ratified by the UN General Assembly in 1948. It reads as follows:

<quote>

The right of the Arab refugees to return to their homes in Jewish controlled territory at earliest possible date should be affirmed by the UN, and their repatriation, resettlement and economic and social rehabilitation, and payment of adequate compensation for property of those choosing not to return, should be supervised and assisted by the UN Conciliation Commission.[26]

</quote>

On May 14, 1948, Count Folke Bernadotte was appointed Mediator pursuant to a resolution of the General Assembly. In his report to the Third Session of the General Assembly, he stated:

<quote>

No settlement can be just and complete if recognition is not accorded to the right of the Arab refugee to return to the home from which he has been dislodged by the hazards and strategy of the armed conflict between Arabs and Jews in Palestine. The majority of these refugees have come from territory which, under the Assembly resolution of 29 November, was to be included in the Jewish state.... It would be an offence against the principles of elemental justice if these innocent victims of the conflict were denied the right to return to their homes while Jewish immigrants flow into Palestine, and, indeed, at least offer the threat of permanent replacement of the Arab refugees who have been rooted in the land for centuries.[27]

</quote>

The UN established the “right of return” of Palestinians in Resolution 194(111) on December 11, 1948, which has become the foundation of all subsequent United Nations’ pronouncements on the question of the Palestinian Refugees. Paragraph 11 of this resolution reads:

<quote>

Resolves that the refugees wishing to return to their homes and live at peace with their neighbors should be permitted to do so at the earliest practicable date, and that compensation should be paid for the property of those choosing not to return and for loss of or damage to property which, under principles of international law or in equity, should be made good by the Governments or authorities responsible.[28]

</quote>

Resolution 194 upheld the right of the refugees to repatriation to Palestine. It also upheld the right of every Palestinian who may not opt to return to full compensation.[29]

Resolution 194 instructed the UN Conciliation Commission for Palestine “to facilitate the repatriation, resettlement and economic and social rehabilitation of the refugees ... ”[30] Israel refused to implement the General Assembly resolution.[31] In its Third Progress Report, the Conciliation Commission stated that it had not succeeded in achieving the acceptance by Israel of the principle of the repatriation of the Palestine refugees. This resolution has been reiterated every year since, and the UN is legally and morally bound to carry it out.

Following the 1967 war, several UN resolutions called for the return of the Palestinian refugees. On June 14, 1967, Resolution 237 was endorsed by the General Assembly, which declared: that essential and inalienable human rights should be respected even during the vicissitudes of war.

<quote>

calls upon the government of Israel to facilitate the return of those inhabitants who have fled the areas since the outbreak of hostilities.[32]

</quote>

However, Resolution 242 of November 22, 1967, called “for achieving a just settlement of the refugee problem.” So far, the UN has not been successful in securing Israel’s acknowledgment of the right of return for the Palestinians. The Assembly explicitly called upon Israel to “take effective and immediate steps for the return without delay of those inhabitants who had fled the areas since the outbreak of hostilities.”

Israel has persistently refused to implement the two resolutions and has adopted further illegitimate measures against the civilian population left in the occupied territories.[33]

Israel was required to cooperate in the return of the second wave of Palestinian refugees to their homes. The combined efforts of the International Red Cross, UNRWA, and the Great Powers succeeded in securing the repatriation of only 14,000 of the Palestinian refugees displaced in June 1967. However, at the same time as this token repatriation. Israel forced 17.000 Palestinians to leave the occupied territories and to seek refuge on the East Bank of the Jordan River.[34]

It is clear that the Palestinian refugees have certain inalienable rights:

- The “right to return” to their homes and lands in accordance with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and related Geneva Conventions. This includes refugees who were uprooted from Palestine in 1948 and those who were displaced in the wake of the 1967 Israeli invasion of the West Bank and Gaza.

- The right to be compensated for individual property, as well as property arbitrarily expropriated or taken by force. Proper compensation should be paid to all refugees who choose to return, and to those who choose to be naturalized in the host countries.

- The provision of humanitarian assistance and basic services without prejudice to the right of return.

- The right to self-determination without external interference.

- The right to national independence and sovereignty.

- The right to nationality — the Palestinian nationality.

- Civil and religious rights.

- The right of visitation to holy places.[35]

 Human Rights and the Right of Return

According to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, everyone has a right to freedom of movement and residence within the borders of each state. Everyone has the right to leave any country, including his own, and to return to his country. All human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights. [36]

On May 7, 1968, the International Conference on Human Rights “affirmed the inalienable rights of all inhabitants who have left their homes as a result of the outbreak of hostilities in the Middle East to return home, resume their normal life, recover their property and homes, and rejoin their families according to the provisions of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.”[37]

It is evident that many universally recognized human rights are directly applicable to refugees. These include the right to life, protection from torture and ill-treatment, the right to a nationality, the right to freedom of movement, the right to leave any country, including one’s own, and to return to one’s country, and the right not to be forcibly returned.

* The right of return

Between 1949 and 1967, Israel consistently argued that the return of the refugees would undermine its national security and dilute the Jewish character of the state.[38] To complete the uprooting of the Palestinians and to make difficult a reversal of the situation, Israel not only refused their repatriation, but it took two other measures:

- In 1950 Israel enacted the Law of Return, which granted to every Jew in the world potential citizenship and enabled any Jew who desired it to immigrate to Israel and settle there. Millions of Jews have immigrated to Israel and have been given the lands and the homes of the Palestinian refugees.[39]

- The Israeli Government destroyed a great number of Arab villages to prevent their inhabitants, who had fled or had been forced to evacuate, from returning to their homes.[40]

In July 1949, a conference representing refugees in Jordan, Egypt, Lebanon, and Syria adopted the following resolution “The Arabs of Palestine insist upon the return of the refugees to their homes in accordance with the resolutions of the General Assembly, including the provisions thereof for compensation and guarantees of property, rights, and personal security. They reject any scheme or plan calling for their resettlement in the Arab countries.[41] In 1965, the Commissioner-General of UNRWA pointed out that the refugees “use every opportunity to stress the intensity of their aspirations and hopes to return to their former homelands.”[42]

The right of an individual to return to his home in his native country is an integral part of an individual’s fundamental rights. In cases where people have been forced to leave their country because of war and hostilities, the right of return is unquestionable. In 1971, twelve million refugees left Bangladesh. However when the India Pakistan war came to an end, they all returned to their homes.[43] In Palestine itself, 40,000 Arabs fled during the Arab rebellion of 1936–9. But they came back when peace was restored.[44] The same has happened in all other wars: When the war comes to an end, the refugees return to their homes. But not so in the case of the Palestinians, who were displaced to make room for Jewish immigrants. They were expelled from their country to seek refuge in adjacent Arab lands and were denied the right of return on political and legal grounds.

For almost two decades, from 1953 to 1973, the Palestinian question was essentially treated as a “refugee problem.” This problem didn’t remain a purely economic or social issue, but became a political one as well. And, in 1974, the UN General Assembly acknowledged the Palestinians’ right to self-determination, and reaffirmed their inalienable right of return.

The attitude of the refugees has been clear since 1948. They are unwilling to accept anything short of a free choice to return to their homes and resume possession of their own property. This expression of desire has not altered during the years and has been conveyed annually to the General Assembly by the director of the agency responsible for the relief of the refugees (UNRWA).[45]

The right of return is expressed in terms of both the moral claims of refugees to return to homes from which they have been displaced, and by reference to a number of UN resolutions. It is important to distinguish between the “right of return” as a principle, and the exercising of that right by literally returning to Palestine as a national homeland (and to that same home or piece of land which a Palestinian owned before 1948),[46]

In any negotiated settlement it must be accepted that all Palestinian refugees and their descendants have a right to return to their homes in principle. Return to Palestinian National Authority areas is not a substitute for the “right of return” of the refugees of 1948.[47] At the very least, Israel should take into its territory several tens of thousands of refugees, particularly those who have family members living inside Israel.[48]

* Resettlement

From 1948 to the early 1990s Israel has attempted to ignore the existence of the Palestine problem. Israel’s official attitude since 1948 has been that there is no Palestine problem, only a refugee problem, which should be resolved by resettlement of the Palestinians outside their own country. Israel offered to assist in the resettlement of the refugees elsewhere, and offered to compensate for their property destroyed or requisitioned during the war.[49] Having succeeded in displacing and dispersing the Palestinians in various parts of the Middle East, the Israelis thought they had put an end to the Palestinian entity and had thereby, solved the Palestine problem.[50]

In 1961, at the request of the Conciliation Commission, Dr. Joseph E. Johnson, President of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, made a new study of the refugee problem. He proposed that “refugee heads of families, insulated by the United Nations from pressure from any source, should be allowed to choose voluntarily between a return to Palestine and compensation."[51]

Johnson's proposals were rejected by the Israeli government in January 1962, with a reiteration of a Knesset resolution of November 1961, which asserted that Arab refugees could not return to Israel and that the only solution to the problem was Palestinian settlement in the Arab states.[52]

Well-meaning people who suggest that the Palestinians should have a homeland either in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip or elsewhere outside their own homeland are the victims of Israeli-Zionist propaganda. This view points to the vastness of the Arab world and suggests that the Palestinians should not begrudge the Israelis for taking the small land of Palestine when the Palestinians can live in some other corner of the Arab world. But the vast expanses of the Arab world — mostly arid desert — are not their homeland, and the Palestinians have neither the right nor the intention to live in any country other than their own, whether it be Transjordan, Syria, Saudi Arabia, or elsewhere.[53]

Many solutions to the Palestinian refugee issue have been proffered, but all invariably ignore the United Nations resolutions and the Palestine

Arabs' legitimate right to return to their country. Perhaps the most persistent proposed solution is that the refugees should be resettled in Arab countries. The answer to this suggestion may be found in the Secretary- General's report for 1959. He warned: "No reintegration would be satisfactory, or even possible, were it to be brought about by forcing people into their new positions against their will. It must be freely accepted, if it is to yield lasting results in the form of economic and political stability."[54]

It is difficult to see how those states which support Israel's right to exist can honestly deny to the Palestinians their own natural right to exist and to live in peace and freedom in their own homeland.[55]

 Palestinian Refugees in the Host Arab States

Some scholars and politicians, especially in Israel, have maintained that the Palestinian refugee issue would gradually be eliminated by utilizing the Arab host countries. The last five decades have proven this view wrong. In fact, the conditions of Palestinian refugees in the host Arab countries, especially those who live in camps, are very miserable.

The dispersal of the Palestinians in 1948 deprived them of the basic right to citizenship. Arab states do not grant foreigners full residency status, which includes either naturalization or permission to remain indefinitely.

Marriage to a female citizen of a country does not constitute grounds for naturalization or special residency rights either for the husband who is not a national or the resulting children. Very few Palestinians in Syria and Egypt managed to obtain citizenship; and those who did were mainly from families who had settled there before 1948. Although Palestinians in Syria receive equal treatment to Syrians, they do not have citizenship rights. In Saudi Arabia and other Gulf States, a few families were granted nationality as acknowledgment of their long and special service to these countries. In Lebanon, about fifty thousand Palestinians, mainly Christians or those having family connections, acquired Lebanese nationality in the 1950s and 1960s. Thus, the majority of Palestinians scattered in various Arab countries, except for those in Jordan, have refugee documents (RDs). But RDs in most Arab states do not confer secure residency status.

In Lebanon, not long after the expulsion of the PLO in 1982, the Lebanese authorities embarked on a policy to reduce the number of Palestinian refugees. Thousands of refugees were forced to leave. A diplomatic row broke out between Lebanon and Jordan in the early 1990s when Lebanon began to expel Palestinians to Jordan. In Kuwait, few Palestinians were granted Kuwaiti citizenship. After the PLO failed to condemn Saddam Hussein for his invasion of Kuwait in August 1991, the Kuwaiti-Palestinian relationship collapsed. After the eviction of the Iraqi army, Palestinians were expelled, arrested, and, on occasion, killed. Despite this, some were allowed to stay in Kuwait. However, they no longer have a public or political profile in the country.

Some Palestinians who fled from Kuwait went into exile in Yemen in 1991. Many of them continue to live in Iraq, suffering and living in miserable conditions. Like most Iraqis, they were middle class and are now sliding down on the economic ladder as sanctions diminish the economic value of their education.

At the time of the Gulf War most of the roughly thirty thousand stranded in Kuwait were originally from Gaza; there were also some Egyptian RDs. Similarly, many of the five thousand Palestinian workers expelled from Libya in August 1995, who became stranded at the Salloum camp on the Egyptian-Libyan border, were Egyptian RD holders but were denied entry into Egypt.

Palestinian refugees considered Libya as one of the most liberal Arab states as far as allowing entry and work. Many Palestinians found refuge in Libya after losing their right of residency in Palestine, due to the Israeli occupation, or in other Arab host countries, because of political or administrative reasons. Recently, residency in Libya is not as secure as many Palestinians had hoped. In 1995, the Libyan government expelled hundreds of Palestinians as a means of demonstrating its political control.[56] The Libyan government expressed its intention to reduce the number of foreign workers in the country and since 1995 has deported many thousands. However, unlike other foreign laborers, who can return to their countries, the Palestinians often have no country to which they can go.[57] For example, the Lebanese government announced they would not allow any ships carrying Palestinians expelled from Libya entry to Lebanese ports, and they were closing the shipping routes between the two countries. These are tragic circumstances for the individual refugee concerned. This attitude toward Palestinian refugees could occur on an even greater scale, for some Arab host governments have attempted to reduce the number of Palestinians by changing the requirements for the right of residency and by putting limits on the validity of their current documents.

The 30,000 Palestinians who were stranded in Kuwait during the Gulf War, and the majority of those in Libya, are part of the quarter million Palestinians in this world who have no country in which to seek refuge.

Since 1948, Palestinians have probably been in the majority in Jordan. In the camps, they suffer from miserable living conditions.[58] The refugees have lived in these camps since the Arab-Israeli war of 1948. Almost all Palestinians in Jordan have been granted citizenship and have full rights. Though given citizenship by the Jordanian government, most of them have been categorically opposed to resettlement in any of the Arab countries.[59] Their representation in the Jordanian parliament is, however, limited. Their role and identification as Palestinians has sometimes been a source of tension. In 1970, a leftist Palestinian party proclaimed the desire to depose the king and set up a republic; an ugly civil war ensued. A few months after these events, Yasser Arafat said: “What took place in Black September was not simply an attack by the Jordanian military regime against the revolution but an attempt of genocide against the Palestinian population as a whole.”[60]

The Palestinians of Lebanon have been, in many ways, both the most successful and the most discriminated against. When compared with other Palestinians living in Arab host countries, such as Jordan and Syria, Palestinians in Lebanon are the most marginalized and least assimilated into Lebanese society. Recently some 30,000 Palestinians, Christians, and Muslims were granted citizenship. The issue in Lebanon is the fate of the 352,700, most of whom are banned from almost any kind of work and are restricted in movement, enjoying almost no rights whatsoever. This group lives in refugee camps.

Although Palestinians have been in Lebanon for nearly 50 years, and despite the fact that two or three generations have been born in Lebanon, Palestinians are still treated as foreigners and have been denied basic human rights. Successive Lebanese governments have denied the Palestinians civil, social, and economic rights since the Palestinians took refuge in Lebanon in 1948. Palestinians are not allowed to work in the public sector or in governmental institutions; neither are they allowed to engage in many professions. They are also required to obtain an official permit to work in the private sector. Obtaining work permits is very difficult, almost impossible. [61] Palestinians in Lebanon are banned from seeking education in Lebanese public schools. The Lebanese argue that this group, which is almost exclusively Sunni Muslim and poor, would completely destroy Lebanon’s sectarian balance.

 Conclusion

The existence of more than five million Palestinian refugees, many of them still living in camps in the Palestinian territory, Jordan, Syria and Lebanon, fifty years after the events of 1947–8 is a constant and very human reminder that the issue remains unresolved to this day, despite the passage of so many resolutions by the UNGA and by the Security Council. Indeed, it is one of these resolutions, 242, which affirms, amongst other things, the necessity of a just solution to the refugee issue — which was the basis for the Madrid Conference in 1991.

Any final solution to the problem must pay more than lip service to the principle of choice for the refugees — choice between repatriation and rehabilitation. Of course, Israel’s requirements for security would have to be met, but Israel has to date never accepted that the refugees have the right of choice.[62]

The only legal and valid framework for a just and legitimate settlement is General Assembly Resolution 181, on the establishment of a Palestinian state and of an Israeli state within secure, defined, and recognized boundaries; Resolution 194, on the right of Palestinian refugees to return to their homeland and live in peace with their neighbors; and Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338, which are general formulations, complementary to the other valid resolutions.[63]

With regard to the Palestine Question, the only way to restore right and justice in Palestine is for the UN, with the assistance of the International

Court of Justice, if necessary, to reappraise the situation and, regardless of conditions created by force, to lay down a new formula for peace. Such a peace formula should restore peace and bring about “justice.” “Justice” requires the return of the Palestinian refugees to their homes, and the restoration of the human rights and fundamental freedoms.[64]

This problem — which in essence is the Middle East problem — will not go away without a fair and just solution to the refugee problem. The alternative is continuing economic and political instability.

Finally, let us imagine that only 5 percent of the Palestinian refugees who live in exile reject the suggested solution of resettlement; this means that more than 250.000 Palestinians will fight to restore their rights by force, generation after generation.

It is important to understand that “compensation” does not mean that this compensation should be paid to “all refugees” as a price for their forgotten homeland. A “homeland” is not for sale. Palestinians of this generation have no right to sell their homeland. They are not the only owners; it is not just a piece of land in a field, or a tree in a garden. It is a great value which they have inherited from their ancestors, and should be bequeathed to their descendants.

[19] See: Louise W. Holborn, “The Palestine Arab Refugee Problem,” in The Arab-Israeli Conflict, ed. John Norton Moore. Vol. I: Readings (New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1974), p. 670; George J. Tomeh, “Legal Status of Arab Refugees,” in The Arab Israeli Conflict, ed. John Norton Moore, Vol. I: Readings (New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1974), p. 679; Hadawi, The Arab-Israeli Conflict, p. 19.

[20] Henry Cattan, Palestine and International Law, The Legal Aspects of the Arab-Israeli Conflict (London: Longman, 2nd edn., 1976), p. 138; Charles Douglas-Home, The Arabs and Israel (London: The Bodley Head Ltd, 1970), p. 38: Hadawi, The Arab-Israeli Conflict, p. 19; Holborn, “The Palestine Arab Refugee Problem,” p. 670; Tomeh, “Legal Status of Arab Refugees,” p. 679.

[21] Ritchie Ovendale, The Origins of the Arab-Israeli Wars (London: Longman, 2nd edn., 1992), p. 138.

[22] Douglas-Home, The Arabs and Israel, p. 38.

[23] Cattan, Palestine and International Law, p. 139.

[24] Tomeh, “Legal Status of Arab Refugees” p. 680.

[25] Displaced Persons are those individuals and their families and descendants who left their homes in the West Bank and Gaza, or were unable to return to their homes, as a consequence of the 1967 war.

[26] Progress Report of the United Nations Mediator on Palestine Submitted to the Secretary-General for Transmission to the Members of the United Nations, UN GAOR, Supp. 11, at 17–19, UN Doc. A/648 (1948). See John Norton Moore, The Arab-Israeli Conflict, Vol. Ill: Documents (New Jersey: Princeton University Press, 1974), p. 371.

[27] Progress Report of the United Nations Mediator on Palestine, 3 UN GAOR, Supp. 11, at 14, UN Doc. A/648 (1948) See Tomeh, “Legal Status of Arab Refugees,” p. 685.

[28] General Assembly Resolution 194 (III) Concerning the Progress Report of the United Nations mediator, December 11, 1948. 3 UN GAOR, Resolutions, at 21–25, UN Doc. A/810; See Moore, Vol. Ill: Documents, p. 376; Sami Hadawi, Palestine in the United Nations (New York:

The Arab Information Center, 1964), p. 47; Holborn, “The Palestine Arab Refugee Problem,” pp.668–9.

[29] Hazem Zaki Nuseibeh, Palestine and the United Nations (London: Quartet Books, 1982), p. 52.

[30] UN Document AI927, June 21, 1949. See Cattan, pp. 136, 231; Nuseibeh, Palestine and the United Nations, p. 52; Douglas-Home, The Arabs and Israel, p. 41; Hadawi, The Arab-Israeli Conflict, pp. 23–4.

[31] Moore, Vol. Ill: Documents, p. 1035.

[32] General Assembly Resolution 2452 A (XXIII) of December 19, 1968. See Moore, Vol. Ill: Documents, p. 836.

[33] Tomeh, “Legal Status of Arab Refugees,” pp. 680–1.

[34] Cattan, Palestine and International Law, p. 139.

[35] Tomeh, “Legal Status of Arab Refugees,” p. 681.

[36] See: Moore, The Arab-Israeli Conflict, Vol. Ill: Documents, pp. 833–4.

[37] Ibid., p. 834.

[38] Karen A. Feste, Plan for Peace, Negotiation and the Arab-Israeli Conflict (Connecticut: Greenwood Press, 1991), p. 68.

[39] In 1946 the number of Jews in Palestine amounted to 608,000. See: Cattan, Palestine and International Law, p. 137; Nuseibeh, Palestine and the United Nations, p. 58; Douglas-Home, The Arabs and Israel, p. 40.

[40] See: Cattan, Palestine and International Law, p. 137; Nuseibeh, Palestine and the United Nations, p. 32.

[41] Naseer H. Aruri, Jordan: A Study in Political Development (1921–1965) (The Hague: Martinus Nijhoff, 1972), pp. 45–6.

[42] Report of the Commissioner-General of UN R WA for Palestine. Refugees in the Near East, July 1,1965. See: Aruri, Jordan, p. 46.

[43] Cattan, Palestine and International Law, p. 139; see: Hadawi, The Arab-Israeli Conflict, p. 22.

[44] Douglas-Home, The Arabs and Israel, p. 38.

[45] Hadawi, Palestine in the United Nations, p. 20.

[46] Ziad Abu Zayyad, “The Palestinian Right of Return: A Realistic Approach,” Palestine-Israel Journal! (Spring 1994): 77.

[47] See: “CommentaryA in Shaml Newsletter No. 3, June 1996, p. 4.

[48] Cf. Douglas-Home, The Arabs and Israel, p. 48.

[49] Cattan, Palestine and International Law, p. 238; Douglas-Home, The Arabs and Israel, p. 40.

[50] Dr. Johnson served as Special Representative of the Commission from August 1961 to January 1963.

[51] Holborn, “The Palestine Arab Refugee Problem,” p. 675.

[52] Ibid., p. 675.

[53] Cattan, Palestine and International Law, p. 217.

[54] Hadawi, Palestine in the United Nations, p. 20 (UN Document A/4121).

[55] Cattan, Palestine and International Law, p. 217.

[56] Abbas Shiblak, “A Time of Hardship and Agony: The Case of Palestinian Refugees in Libya,” article in Shand Newsletter No. I (December 1995).

[57] Ibid.

[58] Aruri, Jordan, pp. 27, 45; Douglas-Home, The Arabs and Israel, p. 44.

[59] Aruri, Jordan, p. 45; Douglas-Home, The Arabs and Israel, p. 44.

[60] Fatah’s view was presented through an interview with Yasser Arafat published in its official English language organ, Fateh, on March 23, 1971. See: Russell Stetler (ed.), Palestine The Arab-Israeli Conflict (San Francisco: Ramparts Press, 1972), p. 261.

[61] “A Policy of Marginalization and Covert Deportation Facing Palestinian in Lebanon,” article in Shand Newsletter No. 6 (February 1997).

[62] Douglas-Home, The Arabs and Israel, p. 48.

[63] Nuseibeh, Palestine and the United Nations, pp. 55–6.

[64] Cattan, Palestine and International Law, p. 241.

 4. From a Doctrine-Oriented to a Solution-Oriented Policy: The PLO’s Right of Return, 1964–2000

Menachem Klein

In its early years (1964–8) the PLO did not separate the idea of the return of the refugees from the notion of “liberation.” In the first version of the Palestinian National Charter (1964) the issue of return was only mentioned implicitly as a self-explanatory outcome of liberating Palestine. In this context, “liberation” was identified with Palestinian identity and return.[65] While the term “return” appeared in the first Palestinian National Council (PNC) decisions in 1964, the PLO used it in a narrow sense. As part of a program of reorientation directed from above, the PLO ordered that the term “returnees” replace that of “refugees” in its publications.[66] Because in its early stages the PLO had a single-issue orientation and ideology, the idea of liberating Palestine was a central one; all other goals were seen as its mere outcomes. The hope for return did not disappear; rather it was as great as the dream of liberating Palestine entirely.[67]

 The Fundamental Meaning of “Return”

The 1967 war forced the PLO to grapple with UN Security Council Resolution 242, which stressed the need for a just solution of the Palestinian refugee problem but without seeing it as a question of national self- determination as the PLO claimed. In response to this resolution, in 1968 the Palestinian Charter was amended to refer for the first time to the issue of return. The Palestinian National Charter set forth a series of absolute goals. The 1968 version of the charter described the Palestinian people and land as two organic entities that must be reunited. Article 9 of the Charter emphasized that the armed struggle is the only way to liberate Palestine ... The Palestinian Arab people assert their absolute determination and firm resolution to continue their armed struggle and to work for an armed popular revolution for the liberation of their country and their return to it.[68]

In the formative years that followed, the PLO was occupied in rebuilding national institutions and ideology, and return was defined as a national collective task. The PLO sought, then, to realize the return after liberating Palestine either by regular Arab armies, as the PLO hoped between 1964 and 1968, or by its own armed struggle as a vanguard of the Arab armies as it advocated after 1968. In the case of the PLO, the ideology during the formative period was clearly fundamental and reflected a concrete vision of total liberation. Such pressures as the civil war in Jordan in 1970 (“Black September”), Jordan’s federation program comprising of East and West Bank (1972), the 1973 war, and the political process which followed, all wrought changes on the operative level during the first half of the 1970s. Consequently, after 1974 the PLO also developed an operative ideology that served to justify a policy that was implemented. This policy’s political effect contradicted the overall vision and the means of its fulfillment as delineated by the fundamental ideology, in addition to developing a middle ground between the fundamental and operative ideology.[69]

The first significant change in the PLO s doctrine of liberation occurred in 1974 when the 12th PNC adopted a political program implying that the liberation of Palestine would be divided into two consecutive phases. In establishing the base for an operative ideology, the PLO's first aim was to build "the people's national, independent and fighting authority on every part of Palestinian land to be liberated,"[70] and, thereafter, to complete its mission of liberation. In addition to legitimizing the use of political means, the program used the idiom the "right of return" (Haq al-'Awda) and put it at the forefront of the Palestinian rights. In the first paragraph of its platform, the PLO declared its rejection of UN Resolution 242, because "it obliterates the patriotic (wataniyah) and national (qawmiyah) rights of our people and deals with our people's cause as a refugee problem." In the third paragraph the PLO obligated itself to struggle against any plan for the establishment of a Palestinian entity the price of which is recognition, conciliation, secure borders, renunciation of the national right and our people's deprivation of their right to return and their right to determine their fate on their national soil.[71]

With these words the PLO changed the ideological status of the right of return from an undefined outcome of complete liberation to a necessary means which would assure the liberation. Yet the PLO's 1974 program was aimed implicitly at Israel's destruction, although later it became the first step in making peace with it. While Resolution 194 conditioned return with living at peace under Israeli sovereignty, the PLO used it as a means of fighting. By demanding to fulfill the right of return the PLO reaffirmed its commitment to the total liberation of Palestine.[72] Since then the right of return has been the first component in PLO s political-ideological "trinity" of "rational rights" or "inalienable rights": the right of return, the right of self-determination, and the right of establishing an independent state.[73]

The right of return, then, became an important factor in PLO's call for recognition that the Palestinians are a nation to which an injustice has been done. According to this formula any rejection of the right of return was tantamount to a denial of Palestinian collective identity, and constituted another form of deportation and expulsion. Contrary to Resolution 194 which advocates the return of individual refugees who wished “to live in peace with their neighbors,” the PLO stood for a national-collective return. Moreover, by declaring that national rights may not be forfeited, the PLO stood against the option that Resolution 194 gives to 1948 Palestinian refugees to choose between return or compensation.[74]

 The Right of Return as a Political Tool

Between 1985 and 1993, which is to say, from the Amman Agreement for joint political action between Jordan and the PLO to the Declaration of Principles (DoP) with Israel, doubt among PLO ranks arose regarding the relevance of the right of return. This paralleled the mainstream PLO’s reconciliation with Israel and the distinguishing between Palestinian self-determination and Israel’s right to exist. In the PLO’s 1986 document titled “Proposals for a Legal Formula to Convene the International Conference for Peace in the Middle East,” the right of return was not mentioned explicitly.[75] Therefore, the right of return in its 1974 meaning became a testing point in the eyes of PLO’s “hawks,” and they demanded its frequent mention in PLO’s official documents. The political statement of the 19th PNC (1988) pointed to the right of return five times, but only once in the context of living in peace with Israel.

The middle ground developed by the PLO since the mid-1980s holds both the older and the newer meanings of the right of return. For despite the way of new understanding of the right of return that the Amman Agreement reflects, the PLO also continued to give expression to the 1974 program. The most remarkable use of the conservative formula by the PLO is seen in the documents issued at the 19th PNC in 1988. The Declaration of Independence of the State of Palestine stressed that the UN’s Charter and resolutions recognized the Palestinian Arab people’s national rights including the right of return, the right to independence, the right to sovereignty over territory and homeland.[76]

During that period, the PLO leaders displayed four attitudes toward the relevance of the right of return in the context of a political settlement with Israel: utter disregard of the concept, acceptance of Resolution 194 word tor word, calling for full realization of the right of return in a Palestinian state whose borders correspond to those before 1967, and a differential realization aiming to implement a collective return with the foundation of the Palestinian state over 1967 territories. In the last case the individual return to 1948 borders remained either unfulfilled or as a right to be exercised voluntarily. Each of these options had limits and costs vis-a-vis the tension between the classic formula of the right of return and maximizing any chance to achieve acceptance for Palestinians to implement this right. Often PLO leaders expressed more than one of those four attitudes as well as declaring their commitment to the old 1974 conservative formulation, thereby attempting to establish and maintain a purposely ambiguous stance typical of a middle-ground position. Unlike my previous detailed and theoretical analyses of these attitudes,[77] the theoretical discussion below will be shorter. Based on these attitudes, however, I will suggest a reasonable solution that fits current interests and policies of both Israel and the PLO.

 The PLO’s Disregard of the “Right of Return”

The right of return is absent from some of the most important statements made by senior PLO officials. It does not appear in Basam Abu-Sharif’s June 1988 article about the prospects of a Palestinian-Israeli settlement.[78] Nor did Arafat mention it in his speech to the UN General Assembly in December 1988. Contrary to the documents from the 18th PNC calling for the right of return, of which Arafat would inform the UN General Assembly, here Arafat spoke only of “the implementation of the Palestinian-Arab people’s right to self-determination political independence and sovereignty on their soil.” Arafat’s emphasis on the rights of self-determination and sovereignty as the foundations of the Declaration of Independence ignored the third wing of the 1974 formula that the Declaration was based upon.[79]

By choosing the option to disregard the right of return, the PLO leadership tried to avoid confronting a sensitive problem which threatened to halt its coalition-building; namely, the contradiction between its ideological imperative of return and actual policy. However, the practical utility of this policy, i.e., disregarding the right, was limited. The serious gap between the classical meaning of the right of return and the PLO s politics since 1988 still needed to be bridged.

 Acceptance of Resolution 194

Since its inception the PLO had rejected UN Resolution 194 which proclaimed the right of each individual Palestinian refugee to choose between return or compensation. The organization claimed the Palestinian problem to be a national one, and, therefore, a collective return should be realized. Even when the PLO moved forward on its political track, it did not accept Resolution 194 expressly. The political statement of the 18th PNC invoked the right of return four times in its conservative sense. It only then hinted at Resolution 194 by calling for “the question of the Palestinian refugees [to be settled] in accordance with the relevant UN resolutions.”[80] In his speech to the UN General Assembly in December 1988, Arafat repeated this formula as well as ignoring the right of return.[81]

Clear acceptance of Resolution 194 was declared by the 20th PNC in September 1991, the session in which the PNC confirmed Palestinian participation in the Madrid Peace Conference. The weak position of the PLO in the international arena, stemming from Palestinian support for Saddam Hussein’s invasion of Kuwait during the Gulf War, forced it to accept the invitation to participate in the Madrid Conference although the framework of the conference sharply limited the organization’s position. Thereafter, in its efforts to regain international recognition and legitimization, the PLO leadership accepted Resolution 194.

At the 20th PNC it was declared that one of the aims of the Madrid conference should be to solve the problem of Palestinian refugees driven out of their homeland by force and against their will ... in accordance with UN resolutions, especially Resolution 194 issued by the UN General Assembly.[82]

It should be noted that by allowing the refugees to choose between return and compensation, the PLO situated itself as a mediator but not as the patron of the way the problem should be solved. Moreover, in choosing to actualize this option, the PLO sees itself responsible for bringing Israel to accept Resolution 194, which it had totally rejected since 1948.

 Full Realization but only in 1967 Territories

This policy has two meanings. The first is that the achievement of national independence in the pre-1967 territories by a fully sovereign Palestinian state may be considered a realization of the right of return. Furthermore, the Palestinians may establish this small entity as the state of all the Palestinians wherever they may be, granting them the automatic right to return. As Faisal al-Husaini, one of the PLO political leaders in the occupied territories, formulated:

the right to return to the Palestinian state is not negotiable. It’s a natural right tor every Palestinian to return to the Palestinian state because the very idea behind creating the state is the establishment of a homeland where the Palestinian people can feel secure, where they can fulfill their goals, hopes, and national aspirations. Any Palestinian who lives in exile who wants to come to the Palestinian state, where he can raise children in an Arab Palestinian atmosphere, must be able to do so.[83]

In other words, the complete collective return demanded by the PLO in its formative period is no longer a matter of the whole of Palestine but of total independence.

 Differential Realization

Contrary to the preceding option, in this method of interpreting the right of return, PLO spokesmen distinguish between the collective fulfillment of the right of return and the individual one. The collective realization lies in the establishment of the Palestinian state in 1967 borders, while the right to return to 1948 territories remains variously as an unfulfilled right or as a right to be exercised individually by each Palestinian refugee who chooses to do so. This approach was used by Arafat in his February 1990 letter to the International Conference of World Jewish Leaders. Arafat expropriated from each Palestinian refugee the option of negotiating over the implementation of Resolution 194 as well as the power to choose between return or compensation. Furthermore, Arafat linked the right of return to Palestinian self-determination in a way which understands Palestinian self-determination as the essence of this people's return. Resolution 194, relating to territories beyond the Palestinian state's borders, is open to further negotiation, but Arafat did not clarify exactly what the framework of such negotiations would really be.[84] According to Dr. Elias Sanbar, the head of the Palestinian delegation to the multilateral workshop on the refugee problem at the Madrid Peace Conference, Resolution 194 does not offer the Palestinian refugees compensation in exchange for the right of return but rather the choice between two ways of implementing the right of return.[85] Similarly, Faisal al-Husseini, a member of the PLO's Executive Committee, and Radwan Abu-A'yyash, head of the Palestinian Broadcasting Authority and himself a 1948 refugee, described the options given in Resolution 194 as two poles between which everything is open to negotiation. In other words, the acceptance of Resolution 194 is not a package deal but rather could be implemented differentially.[86]

Of the four approaches to the right of return, it should be noted that disregard and literal acceptance of Resolution 194 — primarily the latter — became the official attitudes expressed by the PLO in its formal documents. The other two options, full realization of the right of return within a 1967 border Palestinian state and differential realization, are still informal attitudes expressed privately by senior PLO officials. By emphasizing Resolution 194, the PLO leaders can stress their commitment to international legitimacy, the common ground on which they strive to operate politically.

 Solution-Oriented Policy

Until the Israeli-Palestinian Declaration of Principles (DoP) was signed in September 1993, the PLO related to the right of return as a principle, rather than being a policy or a program. As Rashid Khalidi has noted, “there is no authoritative Palestinian definition of what constitutes the right of return.”[87] The PLO has never turned its attention to describing in detail how this right is to be realized. This is despite the fact that its leaders moved from seeing the conflict with Israel as an existential zero-sum game to a conflict over borders and equality of rights. Ironically, this lack, together with the PLO’s 1974 policy of linking the right of return to the right of self-determination and with the PLO’s demand for official recognition as the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people, helped the organization to maneuver and reach an interim agreement with Israel.

In absence of any concrete program for realizing the right of return, the PLO and Israel agreed in the DoP to divide the issue into two parts. The problem of 1948 refugees is to be discussed later among issues relating to the permanent solution. As for the people displaced from the West Bank and Gaza Strip in 1967, Israel agreed in principle to let them return. According to the DoP, a standing committee of the Palestinian Authority, Israel. Egypt, and Jordan will be formed in order to decide “on the modalities of admission of persons displaced from the West Bank and Gaza Strip in 1967, together with necessary measures to prevent disruption and disorder.”[88]

For the first time in its history, the PLO was forced by its agreement with Israel to begin dealing with one dimension of the refugee problem — those displaced in 1967. First and foremost, in absence of a reliable database, the PLO is conscious of the need to define who and how many such refugees there are. Several spokesmen mentioned the figure of 800,000,[89] but the heads of the PLO concur that this is an estimate that still needs to be proven. The PLO and governments of Egypt and Jordan have agreed to conduct a registration of the 1967 displaced inhabitants in the area. Such a population census has not been carried out, but at least the bilateral Jordanian-Palestinian committee agreed to define as displaced anyone who on June 4, 1967 was officially registered as resident in the West Bank or anyone who descended from such an individual. Both sides also agreed upon the formulation of the questions in this population census.[90]

Furthermore, Palestinian leaders expressed their awareness of the need to coordinate between the return of the 1967 displaced persons and the building of infrastructure within areas administrated by the Palestinian Authority, lest systems and public services such as education, health, and housing collapse. “The only consideration that may suspend this return is the problem of capacity,” declared Abu-Mazin, while Dr. Elias Sanbar suggested that the quota of return and its rate will be determined by the quadrilateral committee (the PA, Israel, Egypt, and Jordan) agreed upon in the DoP.[91] Elowever, other than acknowledging their awareness of the current limited abilities of the Palestinian Authority, PLO leaders have taken no further step, nor have they suggested any policy of absorption.

Nothing tangible has ever resulted from the quadrilateral committee.[92] The first meeting of the four-sided committee was not until March 1995, fully 30 months after signing the DoP. Beside the real needs to improve social and economic conditions surrounding the Palestinian Authority and its infrastructure, there are three reasons why the actions taken by the PA to further the return of 1967 displaced were so unimpressive since the signing of the DoP in September 1993. First, while transferring the PLO infrastructure and personnel from abroad to Gaza, the PA leaders concentrated on building their new political institutions and personal power bases. They aimed to balance the power of Israel and Jordan — the PLO counterparts to negotiate over the refugees and displaced problems — rather than operate the new institutions effectively in order to improve the quality of life of the local population. Secondly, the various opposition groups failed to politically mobilize the dissatisfied refugees as a pressure group toward the PA leadership. Thus, the PA leaders were free to decide their own agenda. The opposition’s inability to gather support among the refugees is connected to the third factor, which is the growing fragmentation among the refugees. In addition to former geographical and economic divisions between different refugee communities, the DoP created new subdivisions: 1948 refugees whose status will be discussed only later, and 1967 displaced persons whom Israel would allow to return; those in the West Bank and Gaza Strip who hope to enjoy the investments promised by several foreign countries and international organizations, and those outside who must continue relying on the limited support of UNRWA. Finally, among the refugees staying outside, the older generation will find great difficulties in immigrating “inside” due to deprivation in terms of education, occupation, economic class and social status, in contrast to the younger generation which is more capable of adjusting itself to new environments and careers.

 Towards a Solution: Guiding Principles of Israeli-Palestinian Agreement

Although the PLO leadership has not yet developed any detailed program for realizing the right of return, it has the political means to negotiate over the issue and reach a compromise. In addition to its official policy of calling upon Israel to realize every word of Resolution 194, the PLO also developed informal attitudes regarding the right of return of which the differential approach is the most promising. Accordingly, hereafter are five principles suggested as a framework of a declaration on principles between Israel and the PLO on the refugee issues:

1. Israel has to acknowledge its part in creating the 1948 refugee problem as shown in academic historical research. It should be noted that by acknowledging its partial responsibility in creating the refugee problem, Israel can easily tackle the Arab argument that its very existence is illegitimate and based on a sin. An Israeli-Palestinian peace accord in itself will recognize the legitimacy of both parties.

1. Israel is to be committed to help reaching a solution based on what I call, following Rashid Khalidi,[93] realistic justice. Realistic justice means that in accordance with its obligation from 1948–9 to absorb 75,000 refugees, Israel will agree to let certain number of 1948 refugees return to Israel within the framework of family reunification on individual humanitarian basis, and only for those whose home villages still exist, have family living there, and are willing to become citizens of the State of Israel with all that citizenship entails. Realistic justice also means that Israel will join an international effort aimed to mobilize the needed financial resources necessary to compensate the refugees collectively and individually, and help the poor Arab host states to absorb refugees. In addition, the Israeli effort will include a symbolic compensation achieved with the resettlement of Palestinian refugees in evacuated settlements in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. Finally, in exchange for Israeli settlements in the West Bank that will be annexed to Israel, the Palestinians shall receive areas adjacent to the Gaza Strip now under Israeli sovereignty in order to resettle there returnees and refugees.

1. With the creation of a Palestinian state and the realization of the collective return, refugees already living on its soil, as well as those who might return to it, will be rehabilitated. Refugee camps in the State of Palestine shall be reconstructed and the new Palestinian country’s absorptive capacity developed.

A comprehensive solution to the problem calls upon the involvement of other partners, in particular Arab host countries. The host Arab countries will contribute to the solution refugees preferring to reside in their sovereign territory.

In cases where Palestinians prefer to maintain their right of return, or as a result of Israel’s refusal to allow them to do so, or of the dis appearance of their homes and villages in Israel, their right will remain unrealized. The final status agreement, however, shall put an end to any claims pertaining to realizing this aspect of the conflict in the future.

[65] Menachem Klein, “Between Right and Realization: The PLO Dialectics of ‘The right of Return,’” Journal of Refugee Studies 11 (1) (1998): 1–19.

[66] Y. Harkabi, ed., The Arabs and Israel (Tel Aviv: Am-Oved, 1975), pp. 23–45; R. Khalidi, “Observations on the Right of Return,” Journal of Palestine Studies 21 (1992): 29–40.

[67] Klein, ‘‘Between Right and Realization/’

[68] H. Cobban, The PLO, People, Power and Politics (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984), appendix 2; Harkabi, The Arabs and Israel, p. 94.

[69] M. Seliger, Ideology and Politics (London: Allen and Unwin, 1976), pp. 176–265: M. Seliger, “Fundamental and Operative Ideology: The Two Principal Dimensions of Political Argumentation,” Policy Science, vol. 1 (1970), pp. 325 38; Menachem Klein, “The PLO as a Methodological Problem for Israeli Researchers 1985 1993,” The British Journal of Middle Eastern Studies 20 (YEAR): 164–73; Klein, “Between Right and Realization.”

[70] Y. Lukacs, ed., Documents on the Israeli Palestinian Conflict 1967–1983 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984), p. 157; H. Cobban, “The PLO, People, Power and Politics,” p. 62, prefers to translate the term sulta as “sovereignty.”

[71] Lukacs, Documents, pp. 156–7.

[72] Klein, “Between Right and Realization.”

[73] M. Steinberg, “The PLO’s Solution: The Meaning of a Triangular Formula,” in Is There a Solution to the Palestinian Problem? Israeli Positions, ed. Alouph Hareven (Jerusalem: Van Leer Insitute, 1982) pp. 151–71 (in Hebrew).

[74] Klein, “Between Right and Realization.”

[75] Sh un Filastiniyya, pp. 108–9; 1986: 82–6; Klein, “Between Right and Realization.”

[76] Journal of Palestine Studies 18 (1989): 214; al-Dustur, November 16, 1988.

[77] Klein, “Between Right and Realization.”

[78] B. Abu-Sharif, “Prospects of a Palestinian Israeli Settlement,” Journal of Palestine Studies 18 (1988): 272–5; The Middle East Mirror, June 2, 1988; Haaretz, July 8, 1988.

[79] Journal of Palestine Studies 18 (1989): 167; Ha’aretz, December 14, 1988; George P. Shultz, Turmoil and Triumph: My Years as Secretary oj State (New York: Scribner’s, 1993), pp. 1041–2.

[80] Journal of Palestine Studies 18 (1989): 220; Ha’aretz, November 16, 1988.

[81] Journal of Palestine Studies 18 (1989): 161–71; Ha’aretz, December 14, 1988.

[82] Journal oj Palestine Studies 21 (1992): 152; al-Quds, September 29, 1991.

[83] Faisal al-Husaini, Journal of Palestine Studies 18: 7 13, 1989: 11; see also N. Sh’ath, “Challenges of 1992 — The Palestinian Situation,” Middle East Policy I (1992): 41.

[84] Journal of Palestine Studies 19 (1990): 160; Filastin al-Thaura. March 11, 1990.

[85] Filastin al-Thaura, May 1, 1994.

[86] Ha’aretz, July 25, 1994, August 5, 1992.

[87] Khalidi, “Observations on the Right of Return,” p. 29.

[88] Israel, Ministry of Foreign Affairs: 1993. “Declaration of Principles on Interim Self-Government Arrangement.”

[89] al-Dustur, January 27, 1994; Abu-Mazin in al-Quds, July 1, 1994; Filastin al- Thawra, February 13, 1994; Dr. Elias Sanbar in Filastin al-Thawra, May 1, 1994.

[90] Saut al-Sha’ab, January 27, 1994.

[91] Abu-Mazin in al-Quds, January 7, 1994; The political report presented by Abu- Mazin to the 21th PNC, Gaza, April 1996, in al-Quds April 24, 1996; Elias Sanbar in Filastin al-Thawra, May 1, 1994; al-Sharq al-Awsat. February 8, 1994; al-Dustur, January 27, 1994; Saut al-Sha’ab, January 27, 1994.

[92] al-Quds. January 1, 1997; Ha’aretz, March 5, 1995; March 8, 1995; Davar. March 10, 1995.

[93] Khalidi, “The Palestinian Refugee Problem,” pp. 72–5.

 5. The Political Refugee Problem in the Light of the Peace Process

[[Manuel Hassassian]]

Resolving the Palestinian refugee problem is of the utmost importance to an enduring and comprehensive peace in the Middle East. The issue is one of significant complexity involving multiple variables on multiple levels, and high emotional volatility. For over forty-five years the question of the refugees was overshadowed by the Arab-Israeli wars over territorial and political disputes. Yet with the advent of the peace process, the refugee question emerged as an integral part of the multilateral talks. It was evident from the start, however, that many hurdles lay in the path of a just and satisfactory solution, primarily arising from the breadth of the parties involved and the enormous variegated socioeconomic conditions under which Palestinians live in their respective host countries. The deep-seated emotions of historical injustice also continue to overshadow the effort to rectify the basic economic, social, and political lives of the refugees. To add to this, the lack of consensus on how to analyze the costs, benefits, and ramifications to all parties involved continues to plague the effort to arrive at a solution. This essay provides a basic history of the Palestinian refugees and international efforts to secure them justice, and then analyzes the effects within the context of the current peace process.

 The Refugee Condition

Any attempt to arrive at a solution to the refugee problem must first seek to understand the complexity of the situation itself. This is by no means a simple task. The following will convey the dizzying nature of the surfeit of variables involved.

Two-thirds of the entire Palestinian population were made refugees after the war of 1948. Almost 40 percent of Palestinian refugees (an estimated 1.05 million) live in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, either inside or outside refugee camps. About another 40 percent reside in Jordan as citizens (Jordan being the only country that had a policy of openly awarding citizenship to the refugees). The remaining 20 percent are roughly divided equally between Syria and Lebanon; in both these countries they are denied access to opportunities of employment and ownership of land. About 38 percent of Palestinians registered as refugees still live in refugee camps receiving charitable aid and funds from the United Nations Refugee and Works Administration (UNWRA). They number approximately 2.250,000. About one million refugees have no form of identification outside of their UNWRA identification card, meaning they are not legally the responsibility of, nor under the protection of, any individual state. It is such precariousness of existence that has all too often elicited the egregious behavior Palestinian refugees have become renowned for.

Aside from these demographic realities, it is also important to understand the extent to which Palestinian refugees lost their properties, belongings, and livelihoods as a consequence of the various wars and subsequent expulsion. UN commissions have roughly estimated the value of property lost by the refugees. The agricultural example (table 5.1) adequately demonstrates the extent to which Palestinian refugees lost financial assets as a consequence of their diaspora. Considering that more than 80 percent of the Palestinian economy revolved around agriculture, the figures in table 5.1 paint a bleak picture concerning the utter debasing effect the diaspora had. Stripped of livelihood, camp life hardly offered a solution to the basic problems that now plagued the Palestinians. From this nest, the “right of return” of the refugees to their lands and homes was born, as viable and sustainable alternatives could hardly be seen in camp life.

Table 5.1 Palestine agricultural assets lost through refugeesim

| Type of Land (in dunams) | Amount of land (in US$ millions) | Value in 1993 |

| Irrigated | 1.48 | 1330 |

| Fallow | 3 | 900

| Citrus | 260,000 | 780 |

| Olive | 78,000 | 265 |

| Vineyards | 53,000 | 53 |

| Unexploited | 700,000 | 105 |

More thorough accounts of the travails of refugees can be found in various books and journals. I do not wish to attempt to match their scholarship here, but only use them to further the point that the refugee problem is steeped in a morass of fundamental problems as a consequence of their displacement. On top of these are a series of problems that have arisen as a consequence of the political situation between Arabs and Jews, and between the Palestinians and their Arab host countries. Likewise, I do not wish to add to the sizable scholarship that has been applied in this field. Rather, my aim is to portray these problems within the context of a possible solution.

There are, however, problems that must be foreseen as particular impediments to a solution outside of the basic problems previously outlined. Such basic impediments further complicate the issues but also reveal the latent complexity brought about by the fundamental problems. Future solutions must attempt to grasp them or risk creating more problems than solutions. These problems are:

- The question of the absorptive capacity of the West Bank and Gaza Strip and its effects upon the socioeconomic structure if a mass return of refugees were permitted.

- The question of the transfer of UNRWA functions to Palestinian National Authority jurisdiction.

- Consideration of questions regarding naturalization, integration, resettlement, and long-term residency of Palestinians in their current countries of asylum.

- Assessments of the relative costs of various options for resolving the refugee problem, including consideration of the compensation issue and a formula for the burden sharing.

- The question of family reunification.

- The question of Jerusalem and the refugee question.

Such issues and others are likely to raise ultimate questions over not just the resolution of the Palestinian refugee problem, but also the issue of justice itself, as a construct of human moral conscience, and the role it will play, if at all, in the chasms between ideology, reality, and pragmatism.

 The Historic Evolution of the Palestinian Refugee Problem

Having briefly outlined the root problems plaguing the refugee question, it is now necessary to outline the international communities' attempts at a solution. A historical perspective will provide a framework within which attempted solutions in the current peace process can be contextualized.

* The principle of "Right of Return"

From the very inception of the refugee problem, Palestinians based their case on what became known as the “right of return.” The right of an individual to return to his home in his native land is an integral part of an individual’s fundamental rights, and is guaranteed by a slew of international conventions (see below). In cases where people had been forced to leave their country due to war and hostilities, the “right of return” is an unquestionable and sacrosanct principle that all people of the world must strive to protect. Palestinians are a notable exception, in that the majority of the nation was expelled from its land to seek refuge in adjacent Arab lands. But unlike other war situations, Palestinians were denied the “right of return” in full contempt of political and legal protocols. As such, the “right of return” became organically intertwined with an emergent sense of identity and to the national right of self-determination.

While Israel contrived to declare its independence on May 15, 1948, based on a UN partition resolution, war and politics prevented the Palestinians from forming their independent state as envisaged in the partition plan. Instead, a mass exodus of Palestinians took place in 1948, followed by another wave in 1967. Consequently, the majority of the Palestinian people have been in exile, unable to exercise their “right of return” despite its endorsement by the UN General Assembly since 1948.

The ensuing two decades saw the Palestinian question essentially treated as a “refugee problem.” By categorizing it as such, there was a denial of the Palestinians as a people with a history and a heritage. After 1967, the Palestinian revolution brought a considerable amount of recognition to the Palestinian problems. Consequently by 1974, the UN General Assembly unequivocally acknowledged the Palestinians’ right to self- determination in compliance with the UN Charter, reaffirming their inalienable “right of return.” These basic human rights remain at the core of the Palestinian-Israeli conflict and indeed play a major role in it. Without a fair and equitable solution, the Middle East will no doubt continue to suffer from future instability and bloodshed.

* The Universal Declaration of Human Rights

The context of the “right of return” is explicitly spelled out in article 13 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which reads:

- Everyone has a right to freedom of movement and residence within the borders of each state.

- Everyone has the right to leave any country, including his own, and to return to his country.

- All human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights.[94]

As the Palestinians clearly do not enjoy or exercise these rights, a universal and humanitarian dimension is added to their cause.

* The Human Commission on Human Rights

The right of return to one’s own country has been reiterated in the draft principles by the UN Economic and Social Council in 1973. In addition, the Council mandated the Commission on Human Rights to keep it on its agenda. The draft principles read as follows:

- Everyone is entitled, without distinction of any kind, such as race, color, sex, language, religion, creed, national or social origin, property, birth, marriage or other status, to return to his country.

- No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of the right to enter his own country.

- No one shall be denied the right to return to his own country on the grounds that he has no passport or other travel document.[95]

It is clear that juridical opinions assert that the inherent “right of return” is an acknowledged norm of international law, recognized by civilized nation-states.

* The Partition Resolution and subsequent UN Resolutions

The Partition Resolution. Resolution 181 (II) of November 29, 1947, called for the establishment of a Jewish and an Arab state in Palestine. After the war of 1948 and the subsequent creation of a massive refugee problem, the partition resolution became a moot agreement. The war had geographically and demographically altered the make up of Palestine to such a degree that reversal to Partition Plan lines was virtually impossible. This was further reinforced by the new Israeli state’s intransigence and hyper concern over the issue of its security. The refugees were perceived by Israel as a threat to security rather than victims of the war which had largely excluded their participation. Even though Israel was unwilling to acknowledge the refugees’ “right of return,” the UN General Assembly endorsed and ratified this right soon after the battlefield dust had cleared in November 1948. It read (and continues to read) as follows:

The right of the Arab refugees to return to their homes in Jewish controlled territory at earliest possible date should be affirmed by the UN. and their repatriation, resettlement and economic and social rehabilitation, and payment of adequate compensation for property of those choosing not to return, should be supervised and assisted by the UN Conciliation Commission ...[96]

The UN established the “right of return” of Palestinians in Resolution 194 (III), based on a draft resolution presented by Great Britain to the General Assembly on December 11, 1948 [Resolution 194 (III)], which categorically in paragraph eleven declared:

that the refugees wishing to return to their homes and live at peace with their neighbors should be permitted to do so at the earliest practicable date, and that compensation should be paid for the property of those choosing not to return and for loss of or damage to property which, under principles of international law or in equity, should be made good.[97]

Furthermore, this resolution established the Conciliation Commission for Palestine, instructing it “to facilitate the repatriation, resettlement and economic and social rehabilitation of the refugees and the payment of compensation.”[98] It is important to note here how the element of compensation exists at the heart of the “right of return,” which was interpreted in the provision of paragraph II of Resolution 194 (III), by the Conciliation Commission for Palestine.[99] This resolution, which was drafted five decades ago, has been reiterated by the General Assembly in every session since then, with a “note of deep regret that repatriation or compensation of the refugees as provided for in paragraph II of General Assembly Resolution 194 (III) has not been effected.”[100]

That the resolution of the refugee problem fell on deaf ears in Israel is no surprise. To add to its complexity was the historical instability of the region that brought about the 1967 war. This war itself created a whole new set of displaced persons of its own, and altered the geo-political make-up of the region even more. Now Israel occupied land from three different countries and more than doubled its total land area. The UN continued its tradition in the form of several UN resolutions calling for the return of the Palestinian refugees, both old and new. Israel was required to undertake obligations to cooperate in the return of the second wave of displaced Palestinians to their homes.[101]

On June 14, 1967, Resolution 237 was endorsed by the General Assembly declaring:

<quote>

that essential and inalienable human rights should be respected even during the vicissitudes of war and

Calls upon the government of Israel ... to facilitate the return of those in habitants who have tied the areas since the outbreak of hostilities ...[102]

</quote>

The UN also passed the infamous Resolution 242 of November 11, 1967, which was supposed to act as a land for peace deal between Arabs and Jews. Resolution 242's treatment of the refugees called "for achieving a just settlement of the refugee problem."[103] The Assembly explicitly called upon Israel to "take effective and immediate steps for the return without delay of those inhabitants who had fled the areas since the outbreak of hostilities."[104] Yet in tact, Resolution 242 only dealt with the Palestinians as a question of refugees, and not as a people with a legitimate national cause. For that reason the PLO rejected 242 and it called on Israel's acknowledgment of the "right of return" for the Palestinians.

There are other moments when the international community has come forward to endorse the Palestinian refugees' "right of return." In 1970, the Assembly recognized: "that respect for the rights of the Palestinians is an indispensable element in the establishment of a just and lasting peace in the Middle East ... "[105] Also in 1973, the UN General Assembly endorsed the "right of return" of the Palestinian people, tracing it directly to Resolution 194 (III).[106]

* The Committee on Palestinian Rights

In 1975, the General Assembly established the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People.[107] The Committee submitted its report in May 1976, which stated the following:

to implement the “right of return.” a two-phase program is proposed. In the first phase, the Palestinians displaced in 1967 should be allowed to return to the territories which have been under Israeli military occupation since 1967. [108]

These preparations involved the following elements:

- Designation or creation of a competent agency to be entrusted with the organizational and logistical aspects of the mass return of displaced Palestinians;

- Creation and financing of a fund for that purpose;

- Registration of displaced Palestinians other than those already registered with UNRWA.[109]

The Committee’s report was endorsed by the General Assembly in November 1976, and in December 1977. The Assembly on both occasions re-endorsed the “right of return” of the Palestinian people.

It is fairly evident from the above that time and again the international community has collectively ratified the unquestionable right of the refugees to return. But UN resolutions, however comprehensive, are not binding unless UN members themselves actively seek their implementation. As of yet, no countries have risen to the challenge of trying to implement that which was endorsed by the world community. The impotence of international laws and structures in creating any effective practical change for Palestinian refugees resulted in a Palestinian consciousness which deemed them as being outside the laws of the international community. By this I mean if international law and protocol are to exist and be observed, they must in some way be implemented or else they cease to have any purpose outside of their limited cause. If international law therefore is not abided with respect to the Palestinians, why then should Palestinians follow, respect, or even be held accountable by such laws. Such sentiments linger in the hearts and minds of Palestinians creating an environment where anything was seen as feasible with respect to the liberation of Palestine and the “right of return” of the refugees.

 The Refugee Question and the Peace Process

The Oslo Accords, signed between Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization in September 1993 marginalized the position of Palestinians living in diaspora. The Declaration of Principles (DoP) did not include specific provisions for the future of displaced Palestinians. In fact, reference to the question of refugees was limited to two references. Article V of the DoP states that negotiations on the remaining issues including refugees, settlements, Jerusalem, security arrangements, and so on will start as soon as possible, but no later than the beginning of the third year of the interim period. It is later mentioned in Article XII, which provides for the establishment of a continuing committee with Jordan and Egypt to agree on the modalities of admission of persons displaced from the West Bank and Gaza Strip in 1967.

There are three items of particular note that may not be so evident from the somewhat vague and logistical language of the DoP. First, the PLO and Israel were only able to come to terms by agreeing not to agree for now at least, but hopefully later on at some unspecified time period.

Second, the DoP is only brave enough to refer to refugees in contrast to those that date back to 1967. There is no specific mention of refugees created as a result of the 1948 war, even though they exist as the heart and core of the refugee problem.

Third, the DoP also fails to mention the fundamental principle of the “right of return” as specified in UN resolutions for the previous 45 years. Israel had adamantly refused to acknowledge the Palestinians’ right to return, thus never accepting the authority of the UN General Assembly Resolution 194 of December 1948. These three issues need to be kept in mind at all times when considering judgment on the Oslo peace Accords and their ability to provide a sustainable and productive peace between both interlocutors.

The Madrid Peace Conference made Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338 the basic framework for negotiations. A decision was made early on to include the refugee question, as well as other issues of regional scope to be dealt with by the peace talks within a multilateral context. A working group on refugees was founded as one of the five multilateral groups dealing with various issues relating to the Arab-Israeli conflict. Other issues included water, the environment, security, and economic cooperation and development. The refugee group became known as the Refugee Working Group (RWG) and held its opening meeting in Moscow. This working group is gaveled by Canada with the United States, the European Union, and Japan acting as co-organizers. The Palestinian delegation had insisted on putting the refugee question on the agendas of both bilateral and multilateral tracks. It seems this was done to highlight the essence of the refugee question and its solution within the West Bank and Gaza Strip. However, given the political nature and context of this problem, the refugee question ultimately can only be resolved on a bilateral level, as both parties seem intransigent on having any attempted solution imposed by a foreign party.

The agenda of the RWG revolves around several items that have formed the basis as well as the frame of reference of the various intercession activities. These issues consist of:

The gathering of information on refugees.

The question of family reunification.

Issues related to improving the basic quality of living and welfare of the refugees. This consists of human resource development, vocational training and job creation, public health, child welfare, and the development of the socioeconomic infrastructure of both camps and areas where refugees may have attempted to resettle.

* The Israeli position

In all fairness, it is worth articulating the Israeli position. Regardless of the propriety of the Israeli claims, any attempted discussion of the refugee question would be incomplete without some form of their account. Without it, an incomplete picture will be painted of an already obscure and complicated topic.

Israel’s basic contentions have been systematic and coherent for the fifty years of its existence. Its arguments are based upon the following:

- The Arabs alone caused the problem of the refugees, and the responsibility for resolving it rests with them alone.

- Instead of helping the refugees, the Arab governments deliberately used the refugees as a political pawn to gain political ends. They pressured them into opposing resettlement, thereby keeping the refugee issue alive to employ it as a weapon against Israel.

- The Arab world was and remains sufficiently large and wealthy enough to sustain the absorption of all refugees.

- The refugees would be happier if they resettled in Arab countries where they would be with their own people.

- Israel was unable to accept repatriation because of the lack of space, continued existence of a state of war with the Arabs, and the serious social, political, and security consequences that would arise if repatriation were implemented.

As previously mentioned, such arguments remain at the heart of the Israeli position, and have been consistently reiterated (very similar to the way Arab demands have been reiterated) ever since the creation of the problem. Such inertia and deadlock have aided in giving the Palestinian-Israeli conflict the aura of a morass of utter futility. Therefore, when we return to the issue of the peace process, we notice the similar (intransigent) position of the Israeli negotiators. Israel continues to restate that the negotiations of the RWG should focus on rendering assistance to Palestinian refugees with the view of resettling them wherever they may be at present. In brief, Israel continued to refuse to admit culpability or responsibility in the creation of the Palestinian refugee problem, or even for its resolution — and definitely not on the basis of any existing UN resolutions.

It is not surprising that Israel's tough stand against the returning of the refugees is rationalized along the lines of security as well as the undermining of the Jewish character of the state, even when it entails the return of refugees controlled by the Palestinian National Authority. Paradoxically, the "right of return" of the Jews is enshrined in the Israeli Law of Return. Withholding this right from Palestinians, while at the same time permitting such a right to Jews, is tantamount to an act of racism, especially when many Palestinians can trace their lineage in Palestine for centuries. Although implementation of the "right of return" to Israel within its borders is unlikely, it is politically feasible that over an extended period a substantial number of refugees could return to the territories under Palestinian control. This form of return could facilitate the process of repatriation and resettlement in a broad sense; however, it will only be implemented by monetary compensation. Of course, a major difficulty confronting the Palestinians would be the creation of an economically viable entity that could absorb the influx of Palestinian returnees.

* The Palestinian position

The Palestinian position has been consistent all along with its reference to UN resolutions in regard to the question of refugees. It has reiterated time and time again Israel's refusal to accept any responsibility for the creation of the refugees, even though there is ample convincing evidence (by both Palestinian, international, and even Israeli scholars) that this is the case.

Benny Morris, Ilian Pappe and other so called “new historians” shattered the myths of independence which Israeli relied upon and had based (and continues to base) much of the credibility of their founding father’s actions. In many senses, Morris and others were not really saying anything that Arab and international historians had not been saying for years: that the mass wave of refugees was not a result of orders from Arab leaders, but was rather the direct consequence of expulsion combined with fear tactics of the Haganah and other Jewish militias. Yet the scholarship achieved a degree of higher credibility (sometimes questionably so) after Israeli historians changed their ideas on accountability with the help of declassified Israeli documents from the war period. Refugee scholarship is by no means a field where all participants agree. Yet there is at least the sense that most serious scholars accept variations on the overriding idea that Israel was largely responsible for the creation of the refugee problem. Perhaps more important is the fact that Palestinians were not allowed to return, which, more than anything else, implicates Israel for the birth and maturation of the refugee problem.

Yet the Palestinians have always understood the inherent difficulties in implementing any agreed-upon solution. Both time and current reality have made it clear that compromises will have to be made. But what motivates the Palestinian position is not the unilateral fulfillment and implementation of UN principles, but rather the acknowledgment of the principles that they embody. These include the Palestinians’ right to return to their homes and lands, that Israel was largely responsible for their displacement (whether through force, or through other means), and that the “right of return” is a sacred principle that Palestinians hold dearly which embodies the justice of their cause. For this reason, the “right of return” can never be compromised. It is a basic Palestinian national principle upon which much of Palestinian identity is based. The Palestinian Liberation Organization and the Palestinian Authority cannot succumb to Israeli and American pressure to yield on this principle because the “right of return” is simply at the core of preserving the Palestinian national identity. It may be true indeed that any solution would require drastic conceptual and expectational changes, which must be followed up with attitudes and policy changes made by the policy-makers. Furthermore, these difficult changes will also have to include rehabiliatory considerations (such as the construction of new houses, job training, and the creation of employment opportunities) that will ameliorate the basic daily travails that refugees suffer. Other Arab host countries likewise need to be involved in the political agreement due to the magnanimous presence of the Palestinian refugees in those respective countries. Only with enormous financial resources that will cover the costs of repatriation, resettlement, and rehabilitation can a solution be reached. Before this is possible, however, there needs to be a desire of all partners involved a scenario that as of yet remains to be seen. So far, the position of both partners to the conflict revolve around a zero-sum conflict which might make it necessary for third-party intervention to break the impasse and narrow the gulf between the two extreme positions. It is fair to infer that second-track diplomacy could effectively address the nuances and could bridge and narrow the bellicose posturing of both sides, by creating the ambiance as well as the conducive conditions to get the issue of the refugees back on track. Above and beyond, bold leadership on both sides is required to shoulder the responsibility as well as withstand the barrage of criticism from both constituencies in implementing the DoP and the permanent status issues.

 The Future of Palestinian Refugees in the Peace Negotiations

The Oslo peace process ran into an impasse largely due to Israeli intransigence as a consequence of a Likud elected government. As a result, final status issues were delayed; and above all, the RWG stopped meeting as gatherings quickly turned into fruitless endeavors. It is, however, worthwhile to shed light on the basic issues in the RWG, as they are indicative of the breadth of problems involved with negotiation and the possible procedure in the process of reaching plausible solutions to the refugee question.[110]

Of the six issues that the RWG saw as relevant, only one (the question of family reunification) dealt with the concrete political dimension of the refugee problem. All others addressed issues of community development and refugee living conditions, with major European countries and the United States shepherding each. The question of family reunification will be used here as an exemplary of the problems that faced negotiators. Keep in mind how this, if any of the six topics, was the most uncomplicated due to the fact that it dealt with practical, limited cases where families sought to exercise their right to reunite with their families.

The Oslo Accords set a quota of permitting 2,000 annual cases of family reunification, although Palestinians had higher expectations raised by the May 4, 1994 Cairo agreements. Unfortunately these hopes were quickly dashed by the attitudes of the Israeli negotiators. Many Israelis perceived the permission of families to reunite as the “right of return” through the back door. The Israeli government and its mouthpiece press encouraged and alluded to this fallacy several times in the hope of mobilizing support for “foot dragging” at the negotiation table, and backtracking on previously signed agreements.

With respect to the RWG, the third round of negotiations saw the breakdown of talks where interlocutors were unable to agree on basic principles or frameworks for discussion. Such a problem proved to be a trend that Palestinian and Israeli negotiators faced, especially after the change in the Israeli government. Several unresolved issues of family reunification continue to complicate the momentum of the process:

- Criteria: clear guidelines as to who is entitled to apply

- Transparency: guidelines on transparency have been ignored by the Israelis.

- Quotas: The declared annual goal of 2,000 families per year has been complicated by the Israeli Civil Administration not announcing the number of acceptances or rejections on a periodic basis. As such, it is very difficult to see whether the quotas have been met.

- Time limitation: Applicants complain of not receiving responses within the previously agreed-upon time span of three months. This leaves families in an agonizing situation of uncertainty, with their lives directly subject to the whims of Israeli negotiator transience.

- Appeals: Lack of accountability on behalf of a rejected application, no way to appeal a rejected application, and lack of transparency concerning the appeals process itself means that families engage in a virtual gamble as to whether they are able to enjoy their right to be with their families.

As a result of these and other such stymies, nothing fruitful emerged from the RWG talks regarding the issue of family reunification. Dispersed family members continued to suffer as visitor permits were denied and extension prohibited. Israeli unfaithfulness to its agreement with respect to Oslo became an expected charade, with refugees' lives continuing to sustain the consequence. It has reached a point where Palestinian expatriates that return to their homes have fewer rights than the non-Jewish expatriates that come from eastern Europe in search of work. For this, the Israeli advocate Eliahu Abram writes:

While the Palestinian residents of the occupied territories have not acquired independent citizenship, neither are they alien residents with the option to return to a previous homeland or domicile in order to be reunited there with dependent parents or relatives. The anomalous position of Palestinians under prolonged occupation, disrupting at times the natural development of the family, should not be ignored. Their right to be unified with family members should approximate state practices with respect to citizenship.[111]

Other aspects of the refugee question were taken up by the RWG that witnessed similar difficulties in procedure. In line with the Oslo Accords, Palestinians pushed for resolution of the issue of 1967 displaced persons (the term commonly referred to 1967 refugees to distinguish them from the refugees of 1948.) A quadripartite committee representing Jordan, Egypt, Israel, and the Palestinians was established to work toward that end. Article XII of the Oslo Accords stipulated that this committee will decide by agreement on the modalities of admission of displaced persons from the West Bank and Gaza Strip in 1967, together with preventative measures against disorder and disruption. The frame of reference of this committee is the DoP Article XII, the Jordanian-Israeli Peace Agreement and the Clauses of the 1979 Camp David Accords that dealt with displaced persons.

Similar to the question of family reunification, basic vocabulary and definitions have also become a problem. The committee met several times in 1995 and managed to adopt an agenda revolving around three major issues:

1. The definition of displaced persons.

1. The number of displaced persons.

1. The possible modalities of repatriation.

But even this proved to be too difficult. The Jordanian-Palestinian delegation defined displaced persons as “those individuals and their families and descendants who left their homes in the West Bank and Gaza Strip or were unable to return to their homes as a consequence of the 1967 war.” Such a straightforward definition was rejected by the Israelis, as the negotiators tried to undermine the process by a shift in the terms of the debate. The Israeli press backed up their negotiators’ positioning by engendering an unnecessary fear that the acceptance of any decision on the 1967 refugees signaled the prelude for the return of the 1948 refugees.

These examples demonstrate the uphill struggle of negotiators in arriving at a decision on the variegated issues of refugees. Fifty years have transpired without a resolution, while the daily lives of refugees deteriorate and their fate becomes more and more the consequence of power politics, historic intransigence, and reneged agreements.

 Plausible Options in Negotiations Over Refugees

I am neither the first nor the last Palestinian to propose a solution for the Palestinian refugee problem. In fact, I do not even wish to propose one here, out of fear that I would not do the subject justice considering all its complexities. I do, however, wish to endorse Rashid Khalidi's recommendations for resolving the claims of the refugees.[112] He comprehensively outlines a pragmatic solution, yet one that does not turn its eye from the claims of justice that Palestinians have so long decried. These claims are:

- That Israel acknowledges its moral accountability for the creation of the Palestinian refugee problem, including the means of socializing this recognition to the younger generation of Israelis.

- That Israel accepts, in principle, the right of Palestinians and their descendants to return to their homes. The Palestinians in return will recognize that the right cannot be literally exercised inside 1948 Israel, and will have to exercise it in the State of Palestine. Israel should take into its domain several tens of thousands of refugees, particularly those that have family members living inside of Israel.

- A distinction should be made between reparations (for those who will not be allowed to return) and compensation (for those who lost property in 1948). Khalidi suggests a figure of $92-$ 147 billion for property loss, and $40 billion in reparations, all based on an estimate of $20,000 per person for 2 million people.

- Palestinian exiles should have the right to return to the future Palestinian state, or implicitly to the areas under control of the PNA. Palestinians who choose to remain in Jordan should be offered the choice of having full citizenship rights, or limited rights as citiens of the Palestinian component of the Jordanian Palestinian Confederation.

- Palestinians in Lebanon would be offered a choice: repatriation to the Palestinian state, return to the Galilee and acquisition of Palestinian citizenship, or the granting of permanent residency in Lebanon.

Tamari, on the other hand, has suggested that two separate forms of reparations be made:

- The first would be collective compensation, to be negotiated by the Palestinian refugees in general, the result of which will be used to rebuild the infrastructure of the Palestinian state which will be, in part, the state of the returnees.

- The second would be based on individuals' claims which would be negotiated between the State of Israel and representatives of the refugees. Since many of these refugees are not the subjects of the Palestinian state, the PNA would not be a first party to this second set of negotiations.[113]

Both Tamari and Khalidi provide us with some experienced basic thoughts in the area of compensation. There are, however, many other attempts by scholars, both Arab and Israeli, who attempt a resolution of questions of compensation. Among such scholars of note are Shlomo Gazit and Don Peretz.

This essay does not attempt to suggest formulae for compensation. One must give up the idea that there is a magic pill that, when taken, will resolve all the complexities and intricacies of this problem. Rather, scholars, policy-makers, and most importantly refugees must acquaint themselves with the idea that if there is to be a solution, it is not likely to solve every problem, or perhaps even most of the problems. Additionally, it is likely to take a great deal of time, effort and patience, especially considering that the results are likely to be far less exciting than the vibrant cause. In such a scenario, it is up to those involved to ask themselves whether it is better to continue negotiating with a ruthlessly stubborn opponent, or attempt to put an end to a tragedy whose inconclusive history has for so long caused unmeasurable amounts of human suffering.

The question of Palestinian refugees seemingly took a backseat position to more attainable ends in the interim agreement period. Several things caused this. The election of Benjamin Netanyahu placed a particular damper on the refugee question not to mention the peace process as a whole. Moving at an almost unbearably slow pace, Palestinian negotiators had a difficult time gaining any concession from the man who has spoken, written, and acted out his dislike of the Oslo Accords. As such it was a safe bet that the Israeli position of negotiation would revolve around the all too predictable Likud pole of intransigence. As the status quo remains to Israel's benefit and as the disproportion of power between the Palestinians and Israelis remains drastically tipped in Israel's favor, Netanyahu was unwilling to give any green lights to his negotiators to make concessions on topics such as the refugee question. In fact, attempts to marginalize the issue were more in order from the Israeli president, as hyper-concentration on issues of Israeli security and the need to stop terrorism served as justifications for all Likud policies: from settlement building, to closure, and, of course, the refugees' "right of return."

Secondly, the signing of the Oslo Acords and the convening of the Quadripartite Commission on Displaced Persons shifted the debate such that the multilateral committee on refugees became marginalized. As such, the RWG has not met since 1995. Furthermore, the American and Canadian parties who had both respectively sponsored and gaveled the talks, replaced the heads of their delegations with less important and influential civil servants. This demonstrated that even the supporters of the talks had lost confidence in the ability of RWG meetings to bear any fruit.

Thirdly, the 1994 Jordan-Israel peace treaty signaled an era of normalization in which collective Arab pressure on Israel on the issue of refugees was released. Normalized relations between Israel and Jordan effectively meant that the Palestinians could not rely upon Jordanian pressure to necessarily pull for their cause. This becomes a serious problem when one considers that the majority of Palestinian refugees outside of the Occupied Territories reside in Jordan. Also, since the Quadripartite Committee has by definition excluded all free-floating potential pressuring entities upon Israel (most especially Europe, which has historically shown existent, albeit limited political pressure), the Palestinian negotiating position finds itself with Egypt as its only ally — a country that has signed its own peace treaty with Israel and with very few Palestinian refugees residing there. This is, of course, it negotiations on the question of refugees ever have the opportunity to be restarted.

Given all this, it remains to be asked whether the Refugee Working Groups, actually accomplished anything on an issue reflective of the essential problems intrinsic to the Palestinian-Israeli negotiations. On a political level, there are some basic things that still block progress. The question, for instance, of defining the scope of the refugee problem was given to the Norwegians, which have so far come up with some useful surveys and studies that are sure to be beneficial if negotiators can actually get to that point. Still, these studies fail to address critical issues such as the category of the refugees as well as their personal sentiments regarding future options. It is such critical issues that remain at the heart of the issue, and therefore remain so sensitive that even independent researchers refrain from getting their hands dirty.

Furthermore, concrete issues such as the question of family reunification have failed to meet expectations, even though this, if any issue, was seen as potentially most fruitful. Permitting 2,000, as opposed to 1,000 cases, still fell far below Palestinian demands and expectations. Even when Israel has permitted cases, the procedural headaches, lengthy time period, uncertain criteria, and acres of red tape make this issue such a harrowing debacle that has only added to refugee frustration and suffering.

Several other problems need to be addressed by the RWG. Mobilizing adequate resources, both in the field of monetary flexibility of projects and political willpower to implement these schemes, is a serious issue that needs consideration. There is a need for concrete proposals to be drawn up, organized, and implemented. This is a marked shift away from the broad and general rhetoric of both sides. The absence of clear mechanisms to implement ideas continues to plague the process and has done so from the very start. Furthermore, the whole process needs to be divested of the lofty language and entrenched dogma that all too often results in deadlock and stagnation. There is a need to break down taboos between both policymakers and their constituencies that would allow pragmatic solutions to permeate all sides. Furthermore, there is a need to differentiate between objective and subjective assessments of intentions and preferences in order that the question of refugees can be effectively addressed in the final status phase. So far negotiations in the interim phase have had a difficult enough time surviving, and therefore we must not have any unnecessary illusions about the capacity or productivity of Final status talks if or when policy makers can even get to that stage.

Further general problems were latent throughout the framework of the negotiations. The RWG required the consent of all parties involved in the multilaterals before any solutions could be implemented. This is comfortably democratic, and may well be the essence of negotiations; however, it fails to bring about anything productive when the participants themselves seem to rely on power politics rather than on questions of justice. The Palestinian negotiating position is so utterly weak that it seems incapable of squeezing any leverage from an Israeli entourage which is quite happy to continue its policies (toward refugee rights among other issues) relatively unimpeded. In this, negotiations on refugee rights appear to be comfortable lip service to the peace process, but are hardly taken seriously when it comes to getting anything accomplished. Furthermore, Israeli political discourse has imbued amongst its constituency (and even outside its constituency) that concessions on the refugee issue are tantamount to threatening the future security of the Jewish state and the Jewish people. As Tamari acutely points out, Israeli collective fears of the refugee question have been used by the Israeli negotiating team to preempt rational discussion of this matter.[114] Without the employment of reason, the hope for progress on this front is all but dissolved into subjective gerrymandering and intentional foot-dragging.

One further issue that also remains to be discussed is the refugee problem’s relation to the question of Jerusalem. Jerusalem became inadvertently linked to the issue of refugees after Israel’s policy on the city worked to preempt final status talks and change the demographic reality of the city. Jerusalem itself remains a divided city, and the international community continues to consider East Jerusalem occupied. Yet, focusing upon the 1967 lines and the refugees that this war created overlooks the fact that a considerable amount of refugees came from Jerusalem back in 1948. Furthermore 70 percent of (presently Jewish) West Jerusalem property belonged to Palestinians from Talbieh, Lifta, Katamon, Baqa’a and other suburbs.[115]

Israel s most recent onslaught upon the city has been its encirclement with a ring of settlements in an attempt to preserve Jewish majority to the city and divide it from the rest of the West Bank. Israel has also tried to restrict residency conditions of Jerusalem's Palestinians by taking away social services such as health care and national insurance. Building restrictions and identity confiscation add to a lengthy list of human rights abuses that are deliberate premeditated attempts by the Israeli government to make the issue of Jerusalem a non-negotiable issue as far as Palestinian statehood is considered and most especially with regard to the question of the "right of return" for Jerusalem refugees.

 Concluding Remarks

In terms of strategic vision toward the future, the refugee question exists in relative abeyance proportionate to the enormous gravity of its weight in propitiating the Palestinian-Israeli conflict. Its sensitivity and intractability tests the limits of not just the current peace process, but also the question of the efficacy of formalized negotiations as a tactic for resolving disputes. If left unresolved, the inherent latent problems are guaranteed to surface in the continued tradition of cyclical hatred, poverty, and injustice.

It is important to note that the refugee problem is composed of demographic, political, and psychological dimensions. This essay has largely focused upon the former two and ignored the latter. However, it would be foolish to continue to do so, especially with respect to negotiations. One day, policy-makers will have to sit down and decide on the fate of 2.5 million people, many of whom see little reason to sacrifice the justice of their cause for a pragmatic solution wrought from power politics, poor negotiation position, and exhaustion from the conflict. So far, no one has found a way to solve the problems, let alone communicate them to the refugees themselves. For this reason, it is almost possible to say that nobody wants to solve the problem, because of its potential ramifications on the stability of the region.

Ignoring the problem, however, is not a way of solving it. There is a need to re-energize participants and breathe life into the talks. This could possibly be done with the impetus of a third party. However, any new talks are not likely to have a positive effect unless participants stop bargaining from positions of strength or weakness, but rather commit themselves to bargaining on achieving what limited forms of justice can be obtained. If this were a perfect world, politics would view the world through the enlightened moral lens of justice (however unattainable such a concept is). Unfortunately, the Palestinian refugees know only too well that words like justice and rights were made for political abuse and rarely if ever are used toward the achievement of such soundbite-friendly rhetoric. In such a world, power translated through violence (whether actual or structural) becomes the language of communication. The inevitable results are the scars of our violent history, which if remain unsolved, are doomed to be repeated.

[94] “The Right of Return of the Palestinian People,” United Nations Publication, ST/SG/SER. F/2, New York, 1979, p. 4.

[95] Economic and Social Council Resolution — UN 1988, (LIV) of May 18, 1973.

[96] Official Records of the General Assembly, Third Session. Supplement No. I 1, Document A/648. Progress Report of the UN Mediator in Palestine, pp. 17–18.

[97] The text of Resolution 198(111) at Annex IL

[98] “The Right of Return,” ST/SG/SER.

[99] Official Records of the UN General Assembly, Sixteenth Session, Document A/AC. 25/W.81/Rev 2. (Historical survey of the Efforts of the UN Conciliation Commission for Palestine to Secure the Implementation of Paragraph 11 of G.A Resolution 194 (III) para. 38.

[100] Ibid.

[101] “The Right of Return,” SR/SG/SER. F/2, p. 16.

[102] Ibid.

[103] Ibid.

[104] General Assembly Resolution 2452 A (XIII) of December 19, 1968. Votes: 100 in favor, I against, 6 abstentions.

[105] General Assembly Resolution 2628 (XXV) of November 4, 1970. Votes: 57 in favor, 16 against, 30 abstentions.

[106] General Assembly Resolution 3089 D (XVIII) of December 7, 1973. Votes: 87 in favor, 6 against, 33 abstentions.

[107] General Assembly Resolution 3376 (XXX) of November 10, 1975. Votes: in favor 93, 18 against, 27 abstentions.

[108] Official Records of the General Assembly, Thirty First Session, Supplement no #35. Document A/31/35. Para, 18–24.

[109] General Assembly Resolution 31/20 of November 24, 1976. Votes: 90 in favor, 16 against, 30 abstentions. Also General Assembly resolution 32/40 of December 15, 1977. Votes: part A: 100 in favor, I against, 29 abstentions. Part B: 95 in favor, 20 against, 26 abstentions.

[110] Much of the following data comes from Salim Tamari. “Palestinian Refugee Negotiations: From Madrid to Oslo II, A Final Status Issues Paper” (Institute for Palestine Studies, Washington, D.C., 1996).

[111] Eliahu Abram, “Problems of Definition of the Palestinian Family and its Implications for Family Reunification Schemes?” An unpublished report submitted to the Group on Family Reunification and Residency Rights, Jerusalem, February, 1994, p. 6.

[112] Rashid Khalidi, “The Palestinian Refugee Problem: A Possible Solution,” Palestine-Israel Journal of Politics, Economics and Culture 3 (4) (Autumn 1995): 72–8.

[113] Tamari, “Palestinian Refugee Negotiations,” p. 19.

[114] Ibid., p. 26.

[115] Faisal Husseini, al-Quds, May 25, 1995.

 6. Early US Policy toward Palestinian Refugees: The Syria Option

[[Joshua Landis]]

During the first four years following the 1948 Palestine war, the United States attempted to solve the Arab-Israeli conflict by settling Palestinian Refugees in Syria. At the height of US-Syrian negotiations during the summer of 1952, the US contemplated paying the Syrian government $400,000,000 dollars in exchange for settling up to 500,000 Palestinians in the fertile plains of the Jazira that lie between the Tigris and Euphrates rivers.

This chapter of US foreign policy toward the Arab-Israeli conflict has been almost entirely ignored.[116] Despite the failure of US attempts to settle the majority of Palestinian refugees in Syria, it is an important episode in US foreign policy. It was the first concerted effort by the West to settle the Palestine issue after the 1948 war. It helped define US attitudes toward the Arab Israeli conflict. As the Truman administration abandoned efforts to induce Israel to compromise with the Arabs either by returning land to the Palestinians or by allowing for the return of refugees, the State Department asked the Arab countries to resettle the refugees. In doing so. the US accepted the notion that the solution to the Palestinian problem was to assimilate the refugees into the neighboring Arab countries. This meant denying the force of Palestinian nationalism and embracing the notion that economic assistance and development could solve the political problems of the region.

US policy toward the Palestine Question following the 1948 war was guided by two main concerns: domestic concerns, in particular. President Truman's inability or unwillingness to push the Israelis to allow the return of Palestinian refugees; and foreign concerns, in particular, the emerging Cold War and the policy of containment. The United States might have ignored the refugee issue altogether had it not been committed to helping Great Britain organize some framework for defending the Middle East against the influence of communism and possible attack by the Soviet Union. The successful organization of such a defense organization required a resolution to the Arab -Israeli conflict that was souring relations between the western powers and the Arab states.

At the Lausanne Conference, which ran from April to September of 1949, the US and UK attempted to solve the Arab Israeli conflict. It is there that President Truman made his last attempt to pressure Israel to accept the return of Palestinian refugees. US State Department officials were largely hostile to Israel. Like Mark Ethridge, the US member of the Palestine Conciliation Commission, they insisted to Ben-Gurion that "the refugees were the main concern for Arab states," and reported to President Truman that "the Arabs have made what the Commission considers very great concessions; the Jews have made none so far."[117]

Under pressure from the State Department, President Truman decided to get tough with Israel. In April, he wrote to Ethridge the following, “Dear Mark ... I am rather disgusted with the manner in which the Jews are approaching the refugee problem. I told the President of Israel in the presence of his Ambassador just exactly what I thought about it. It may have some effect, I hope so.”[118] Later Truman cabled the Israeli government, insisting that if they were not more forthcoming on the refugee issue “the US Govt, will regretfully be forced to the conclusion that a revision of its attitude toward Israel has become unavoidable.”[119] Emboldened by these Presidential declarations George McGhee, the US coordinator on Palestine Refugee Matters, threatened the Israeli ambassador to the US that if Israel did not accept 200,000 refugees, the US would withhold S49 million worth of Export/Import Bank loans to Israel. The Israeli Ambassador was unimpressed with McGhee’s threat and responded that McGhee “wouldn’t get by with this move.” The Israeli Ambassador boasted that “he would stop it ...”[120]

True to his word, the Ambassador was able to nip McGhee’s threat in the bud. That same afternoon, the White house phoned McGhee to say that the President would have nothing to do with withholding loans to Israel. Never again would a State Department official under President Truman attempt to intimidate Israel on the issue of refugees.

US policy toward the refugees took a dramatic turn during the summer of 1949 away from Israel and toward Syria. Rather than withhold money from Israel, a policy for which President Truman did not have the stomach, the US began to develop a plan to pay money to Syria in order to take in refugees and turn them into Syrians.

The notion of Syria’s taking in a large number of Palestinians first came up under Husni Za’im. On March 30, 1949, the Syrian army led by Husni Za’im, the Chief of Staff, overthrew President Shukri al-Quwwatli and the republican government in Syria. US policy toward Syria’s new military ruler was influenced from the start by concern for settling the refugee problem.

Only days after the coup, US officials on the Palestine Conciliation Commission began to argue for the recognition of the Za'im regime because without diplomatic recognition no progress on refugee maters "could be adequately undertaken."[121] Furthermore, the US State Department and the British Foreign Office were unanimous in recognizing that without some resolution of the refugee problem and the Palestine Question, no progress could be made on the question of organizing Middle East defense. As the Policy Planning Staff in Washington concluded in June 1949:

All of the countries of the Middle East area ... have indicated at one time or another a desire to enter into a military alliance or other military arrangements with the US or with the US and UK ... Moreover, with the exception of Saudi Arabia, none of the Arab governments could enter into an alliance with the US at this time due to the deterioration of relations relating to the Palestine Question.[122]

Settling refugees was important to the Western Powers because of their interest in organizing Middle East Defense and fighting the Cold War. It was during these years from 1949 through 1956 that Great Britain sought to form what it called the Middle East Command, then MEDO or Middle East Defense Organization — following the plan of NATO and SEATO, and finally, the Baghdad Pact.

From the moment the West recognized Za'im's government, Britain's Prime Minister Ernest Bevin began to "put pressure on Syria for the settlement of between 200,000 and 300,000 in northern Syria."[123] Za'im, who was from a Aleppine Kurdish family, did not have strong Arab nationalist feelings and was willing to conclude a deal with the Israelis. He had fought under Ottoman, French, and Syrian command and had led the Syrian army during its disastrous Palestine campaign of 1948. His experience had taught him the value of possessing a strong army, which he wanted for Syria above all else. In the hope of winning Western military support in July, Za'im offered "to settle about 300,000 refugees in the Jazirah area" on condition that Israel accept "large-scale international financial aid to Syria and the repatriation of most of the refugees and resettlement of the rest in Syria.[124] Israel was not interested in such a deal. It had already determined that Washington would not pressure it to accept refugees. Syria presented little military threat to Tel Aviv either. During the 1948 war in Palestine, Syria stationed only 3,000 Syrian soldiers out of a total military strength of 10,000 at the border with Israel.[125] Za'im had no bargaining power in his negotiations with Israel. Ben-Gurion understood this full well and refused to meet Za'im. He was not about to accept 200,000 additional Arabs in Israel. Ben-Gurion's policy of delay paid off in August 1949. Husni Za'im was overthrown by Colonel Sami al-Hinnawi, who was in turn overthrown by Colonel 'Adib al-Shishakli in December 1949 four months later.

'Adib Shishakli was a more able leader than Za'im. He tried to work through Syria's parliament, known for its emulous factionalism, rather than run roughshod over it. A Sunni Arab from Hama who had ably led a division of volunteer troops in Palestine during the 1948 war, Shishakli was keenly aware of the growing Arab nationalist sentiment among Syrians that Za'im ignored and often belittled. He made every effort not to get too far ahead of public opinion or to resort to dictatorial and extra-legal measures. Despite their many differences in temperament, origin, and style, Shishakli and Za'im pursued similar strategies. Shishakli wanted money to develop Syria's economy. He pushed forward on projects to improve agriculture, irrigation, and transportation. Most of all though, he wanted to strengthen Syria's military; in particular, he wanted jet fighters.

During the first years of Shishakli's rule, the US and UK came to believe that Shishakli could deliver on the refugee issue if he were offered enough money and arms. He was a strong leader, they determined, who could cajole the Syrian parliament and people into accepting a deal to settle large numbers of Palestinians in Syria without being overthrown as Za'im had been. They realized that the issue was a sensitive one because leftist politicians and public opinion equated any such deal with capitulation to western imperialism and acq uiescence to Israel. Syria's minister of national economy, Ma'ruf al-Dawalibi, explained that the "Syrian Government would find it difficult to cooperate with the US, especially in realizing any projects envisaging refugee resettlement instead of repatriation"; though he hoped that if both countries understood "the difficulties each faces in present circumstances," the influence of the Palestine situation could be "minimized to permit economic collaboration."[126]

In an attempt to diffuse the dangers such a deal presented to Shishakli and the Syrian government, US and British officials tried to convert what was a political problem into a technical and economic one. As the British representative to UNWRA explained, the trick was to treat the Arab refugee problem “as a non-political one” even though, in his view, it was “fundamentally a political problem.”[127] Western governments encouraged UNWRA, the International Bank, the Export/Import Bank, and other development agencies to take the lead in offering Syria aid and in pushing for refugee settlement. They reiterated in their meetings with the Syrians that assistance from UNWRA for the settlement of Palestinian refugees “would be regarded as being of a strictly provisional nature.” UNWRA “did not concern itself with the permanent settlement of the dispute with Israel.” they insisted, and any attempt to “improve” the living conditions of the refugees would not prejudice their right to return.[128]

The State Department and Foreign office were most optimistic about closing a deal with Syria on the refugee issue during 1951 and 1952. A number of factors contributed to this positive assessment. President Truman displayed a renewed interest in the Middle East and placed “particular emphasis on the problem of the Arab refugees” and on helping the British to establish a regional defense organization to contain the Soviet Union, problems which were understood to be linked. He demonstrated this by allocating substantial sums of money for economic and military aid to the region.[129]

As for the Syrians, Colonel Shishakli had begun his second year in power and had every reason to believe that he had Syrian politics well in hand. Opposition to his rule was negligible. He had successfully pitted the two major conservative parties in parliament against each other. The left, including the Ba’th Party and Akram Hawrani’s Arab Socialist Party, continued to support him. It was not until December 1951 that these two parties merged in order to overthrow Shishakli. The coup attempt was broken up even before it started because Shishakli moved quickly and decisively to suppress it and because few senior military officials were willing to join the conspiracy.

Within the larger arena of Middle East politics, Shishakli also faced few important challenges in 1951 and 1952. The Arab League seemed amenable to revising its resolutions on refugee settlement in order to pave the way for large-scale settlement in Syria. The Egyptian monarchy faced serious internal disturbances in 1951 and was unable to stand in the way of an independent Syria policy toward the West. Gamal Abdul Nasser did not take power in Egypt until the summer of 1952 and it was some time before he had consolidated his power in Egypt. Once Nasser began to champion Arab nationalism and to throw his full support behind the Syrian left in opposing any possible rapprochement between Syria and the West, the chances for a Syrian deal on the refugees diminished considerably.

In 1951, however, UK and particularly US officials believed the likelihood of settling refugees in Syria was good. President Truman pushed for increased aid of various types to the Middle East. Point Four money, which was earmarked for technical assistance, was continued. The Foreign Aid Bill of 1951 authorized $160,000,000 for economic assistance to the Middle East with increased levels for Syria. In recognition of the particular needs of refugees, Congress allocated $50,000,000 for Arab refugees, the same amount allocated to Israel for settling Jewish immigrants. This was a considerable increase from the allocation in 1950 of $27,000,000 and from 1949’s allocation of $16,000,000. As the British recognized, these increases in refugee aid indicated “the United States had played its part well in dealing with the problem.” The fact that congress specifically designated half the money for the resettlement of the refugees and expressed its willingness to “increase appropriations for a second and third year” of a three-year program, also cheered officials in the field.[130]

Just as important, Truman successfully shepherded the Mutual Security Program through congress. This assistance was specifically designated lor arms and defense spending in the region. This permitted the US to provide Arab countries with large-scale military assistance for the first time. The 1952 allocation for the Middle East was $196,000,000, a considerable sum. President Truman’s speech to congress in May 1951 urging the passage of Program was summarized as follows:

No part of the world is more directly exposed to Soviet pressure than the countries of the Middle East. He stated further that the incessant pressure on the Middle East could be overcome only by a continual build-up of armed defenses and the fostering of economic development ... This would permit the United States for the first time to assist those countries directly in building up their defensive capabilities.[131]

The willingness of the US and UK to supply substantial quantities of arms and military aid was key to any success with settling the refugees. As the Chief of the British Legation in Damascus explained in March 1951, “If we are to influence Syria to come out in favor of the Western powers we must show that we are prepared to help her build up her defences. This we can best do by supplying arms and equipment to the Syrian Army.”[132]

Early US attempts to interest Shishakli in small amounts of Point Four money and economic aid for refugee resettlement as “confidence building” programs failed miserably. The Syrian government rejected one offer of $150,000 in seed money for a project in 1951 out of hand. “Syria expected something far more generous,” the British Chief of Legation explained.[133] US and British officials groused that the Syrians did not understand the realities of congress, government funding, and project development; nevertheless, the Western powers did revise their approach to winning Syrian confidence. By the beginning of 1952, it was agreed that “an alternative” policy to “reinforce resettlement” would have to be made. “Such a generous offer of economic aid to Syria” must be made that it would “enable the Syrian government to over-ride the political objections to resettlement. But such an offer would have to be on an impressive scale, for the reason that in general political considerations weigh far more strongly with the Syria people than do economic ones.”[134]

Military aid also had to be increased. As the British Legation Chief observed, “trying to conduct diplomacy in Syria without military goods was akin to producing bricks without straw.”[135] He described his meetings with Shishakli and General Silo, the nominal leader of Syria in 1951, to be centered around discussions of arms and jet aircraft, in particular.

These talks are never exactly easy going. Silo keeps in the middle of his desk a large and shiny model of a jet lighter, which he strokes from time to time while eyeing me in a rather meaningful way.[136]

Renewed efforts by the West in 1951 to settle refugees in Syria were matched by positive indications about the possibility of a deal on the part of the Syrians. Syrian government officials asked for aid with increasing persistence throughout 1951. Shishakli deliberately held out the possibility of resettlement as an inducement for Western aid. Early in 1951, the Syrian ambassador to Britain told the Parliamentary Under-Secretary that the Americans could win resettlement for a substantial sum of money and quantity of arms. As the Under-Secretary reported:

He said that none of the Arab States could begin to cooperate freely with Israel until the question of the Arab refugees had been settled ... The Arab countries would be only too pleased to absorb them but it was not sufficient simply to set them down on the land and tell them to start life again as peasants. Many of them were artisans, merchants and members of the professional classes and in order to reestablish them a good deal of capital would be required ... The Ambassador suggested that America might provide the money ... then said that Syria was in urgent need of arms for self-defence.[137]

The Syrians continued to tantalize western officials with possibility of large-scale resettlement if only the West would talk real money and weapons. Negotiations proceeded throughout 1951 and the early part of 1952 with ever larger numbers being put forward by both sides. General Robertson of the British army reported in 1951 that the Americans were considering large-scale military support for Syria for purely political reasons. He wrote:

Mr. McGhee is impressed with the importance of giving arms to the Syrians. In the case of Syria we are asked to give the arms first, and we are told that the political position will depend upon an adequate supply of arms being received. This may be quite a logical attitude from the Syrian point of view, but it means that we are being asked to buy Syria's friendship with arms. This may be a proper thing to do.[138]

General Robertson was quite explicit that he believed the Syrian army to be rotten and incapable of providing much help to the West in halting a Soviet invasion through Turkey. So long as everyone was clear that military assistance to Syria would be undertaken for political and not military reasons, he would not oppose it. A Foreign Office official explained Britain's position on aid to Syria as follows: "We are only considering supplying military and economic aid to Syria insofar as this will bring her to our way of thinking and persuade her to carry out such projects as may assist in the major problem of the resettlement of refugees."[139]

Shishakli inquired about Western aid with increasing persistence throughout the first half of 1952. Sir William Horace Montagu-Pollock. kcmg, Chief of Legation in Syria, reported that Shishakli "professed to be wholeheartedly in favor of a practical scheme for the resettlement of the refugees," and that he had commented that "all aid from the West would be welcome, provided the West was prepared to support Syrian independence."[140] Following the failed anti-Shishakli coup of December 1951, Iraq increased its support for Syria dissidents and renewed its call tor a united Fertile Crescent, which was to begin with Syrian unification with Iraq. In order to counter Iraqi ambitions in Syria, Shishakli sought to curry favor with the Western powers that had influence over Iraq and could restrain Hashemite unification schemes.

During the early months of 1952, Shishakli called a number of meetings with the Director of UNRWA, Mr. Blanford, and was able to convince him that "the Syrian Government meant business in its approaches to foreign authorities for funds."[141] In April 1952, Blanford announced that there had been a breakthrough. UNRWA had reached an agreement with Shishakli. The plan was to resettle 500,000 refugees in Syria at the cost of $200,000,000. Shishakli demanded a further $200,000,000 in order to improve the Syrian standard of living, or as he phrased it, "parallel development." Shishakli argued that it would cause problems in Syria if only the Palestinians were to receive assistance. He insisted that Syrians receive an equal amount. "The new programme," the British Legation reported, "was to help the refugees to obtain adequate housing and employment. They would be transferred from camps and temporary shelter to suburban housing projects and rural villages ... The cost of such a programme ... would be about $220 m. over three years." The British report concluded that, "Negotiations for the implementation for the three year plan are now proceeding between UNWRA and the Arab Governments ... The prospects of a solution of the problem are now less discouraging than at any time since the Palestine war resulted in the exodus of the refugees."[142] In 1952, Congress approved a much-augmented package for the Mutual Security Program, which in conjunction with other aid programs and World Bank funds came close to meeting the Syrian request for parallel development and resettlement costs.

Further momentum to the resettlement plan was provided by the Arab League, which moved to include Syria among the places mentioned in the League's resolution where it approved of the resettlement of the refugees. As the Foreign Office reported, "The other Arab Governments have been discreetly informed of the Syrian negotiations and have reacted quite favorably. Leading officials of the Arab League have also given it informal support."[143]

Shortly after the Egyptian revolution of July 1952 Shishakli shelved his agreement with UNWRA and the Western powers. The British legation cabled the Foreign Office in September that "we have heard no further mention of this programme from the Syrian side and. as you know. Colonel Shishakli recently asked that the plan for re-settling refugees from outside Syria should be postponed indefinitely."[144] Shishakli returned to complaining about the pressures put upon him by public opinion and his political opponents. British representatives in Damascus explained that Shishakli had been "at pains to exculpate himself in public and private statements. You will remember that Hourani accused him of suppressing freedom, of shackling Syria to the imperialist organizers of Western Pacts and to the oil companies, and also of selling the refugees."[145] By the end of 1953, Shishakli's opponents had grown in number and courage. Iraq called for Shishakli's removal and supported his right wing opponents while Egypt supported his left-wing opponents and fanned the Hames of Arab nationalism and anti-imperialist and Zionist sentiment in Syria. In such an environment, Shishakli found it impossible to accept Western aid or to resettle Palestinian refugees.

In February 1954, Shishakli was driven from the country by a military insurrection. Neither western countries nor Syria raised the issue of the resettlement of refugees again.

In reviewing early Western efforts to solve the Palestine question by resettling refugees in Syria, several conclusions can be drawn. Although modern scholarship ignores resettlement negotiations, they were a foreign policy priority for the US and Great Britain during the early 1950s. In particular, the Truman administration was much more active in trying to find a solution to the Palestinian problem than previously acknowledged, for it was ready to bankroll the lion's share of $400,000,000 resettlement project. The US was unwilling to pressure Israel on the subject of returning refugees. Instead, it believed that the Palestinians could be Syrianized, underestimating the importance of nationalism in the region and overestimating the extent to which local problems could be solved by money and offers of economic development. The primary motive of the Western powers in finding a solution to the Palestinian problem was their interest in organizing a Middle East defense plan to fight to Cold War and to contain the Soviet Union.

Syria sought to use the refugee issue for its own interests. Overlooking the welfare of the refugees, Syria tried to use them to squeeze money and weapons out of the West. Instability in Syria ultimately undermined efforts at negotiating an improvement in the living conditions and economic prospects of the Palestinian refugees. The unwillingness and inability of the Arab states to cut a deal on refugee resettlement led the West to turn further toward Israel rather than to pressure Israel to make concessions.

 Notes

I would like to thank my student, Russ Allen, for his help in researching this article and in sharpening its arguments.

[116] Moshe Ma’oz is the first academic to mention this episode in US policy in his line work, Syria and Israel: From IVar to Peacemaking (Oxford: Clarendon Press. 1995). Major texts on US policy in the region and toward Palestinians ignore it. These include important works such as: Michael E. Jansen. The United States and the Palestinian People (Beirut: Institute tor Palestine Studies, 1970); Donald Neff, Fallen Pillars: US Policy toward Palestine and Israel since 1945 (Washington, D.C.: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1995); George Lenczowski. American Presidents and the Middle East (Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 1990); Seth P. Tillman. The United States in the Middle East, Interests and Obstacles (Bloomington: Indiana University Press. 1982); Dan Tschirgi. The Politics of Indecision: Origins and Implications of American Involvement with the Palestine (New York: Praeger, 1983); and Dan Tschirgi. The American Search for Mideast Peace (New York: Praeger, 1989).

[117] FRUS 1949, “Mr. Mark F. Ethridge to the President” (Jerusalem), April 11, 1949, pp. 905–6, as quoted in Neff. Fallen Pillars, p. 75.

[118] Ibid., p. 76.

[119] Ibid.

[120] Ibid.

[121] Ilan Pappe. The Making of the Arab-Israeli Conflict, 1947–1951 (London: I.B. Tauris, 1992), p. 218.

[122] FRUS 1949, Gordon Merriam (Washington), “Memorandum to the Policy Planning Staff,” June 13, 1949, p. 33.

[123] FRUS 1949, “Talks at Washington between the US and the UK,” April 4, 1949, p. 51.

[124] Pappe, The Making of the Arab-Israeli Conflict, pp. 226. 234.

[125] Joshua Landis, “Syria and the Palestine War: Fighting King Abdullah’s Greater Syria Plan.” in Eugene Rogan and Avi Shlaim. eds. Rewriting the Palestine War: 1948 and the History of the Arab-Israeli Conflict (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000), p. 35.

[126] FRUS 1950 (Damascus). Keeley to Secretary of State. February 24. 1950. p. 1206.

[127] PRO. “Minutes of a meeting held at the Foreign Office.” November 30. 1951. FO 371/91218.

[128] PRO (Damascus), Mann to Morgan, June 29, 1950, FO 371 Z82785 EY1015/21.

[129] PRO (Washington), “Transcript of Acheson’s Summary of Truman’s Message to Congress,” May 21, 1951, FO 371 /91195.

[130] PRO, “Minutes of a Meeting Held at the Foreign Office.” November 30. 1951. FO 371/91218.

[131] PRO. “Transcript of Acheson’s Summary ofTruman’s Message to Congress.” May 21, 1951, FO 371/91195.

[132] PRO (Damascus), Montagu-Pollock, “Internal Situation in Syria, “ October, 1951, FO 371/91842/EY 1015/10/G.

[133] PRO (Damascus) Montagu-Pollock to Geoffrey Furlonge, November 12, 1951, FO 371/91840/ EY 1016/24.

[134] PRO (Damascus), British Legation to Eden, December 10, 1951, FO 371/91852 EY 1051/16.

[135] PRO (Damascus) Montagu-Pollock to Rapp, May 22, 1951, FO 371/91865/ EY 1192/12.

[136] PRO (Damascus), Montagu-Pollock to Geoffrey Furlonge, July 2, 1951. FO 371/91867/EY 1195/15.

[137] PRO (London), Davies, “Conversation between the Syrian Ambassador and the Parliamentary Under-Secretary,” February 2, 1951, FO 371/91848/ EY 1025/2.

[138] PRO (Damascus), General Brian Robertson, GHQ Middle East Land Forces to Under Secretary of State, War Office, April 19, 1951, FO 371/91867/ EY 1195/15.

[139] PRO (Damascus), P. A. Rhodes, “Arms Aid to Syria,” March 5, 1952, FO 371/98921/ EY 1102/7.

[140] PRO (Damascus), Montagu-Pollock to R. J. Bowker, January 7, 1952, FO 371/98925/ EY I 102/1/E.

[141] PRO (Damascus), Minutesofa Meetingin Foreign Office,” June 27, 1952, FO 371/918520/ EE 18126/10.

[142] PRO (Damascus), Evans and Wright, “Paper for the Heads of Missions to the Middle East,” June 6, 1952, FO 371/98254/ El056/41.

[143] PRO, “Minutes of a Meeting in Foreign Office,” June 27, 1952, FO 371/98520/EE 18126/10.

[144] PRO (Damascus), Chancery to Secretariat, British Legation, September 11, 1952, FO 371/98925/ EY1102/22.

[145] PRO (Damascus), Samuel to Ross, January 30, 1953, FO 371/104967/ EY 1015/5.

 7. Refugee Compensation: Responsibility, Recipients, and Forms and Sources

[[Don Peretz]]

The issue of compensation is one of the most critical but difficult aspects of the refugee problem to be negotiated in the final status negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians. Differences between the parties are indeed wide on nearly all aspects, including responsibility for payment, identification of property and non-material items to be covered, the value of material and non-material items, who is to be compensated, the form and source of payments, and counterclaims for compensation that Israel is likely to present.

 Responsibility for Compensation

On one hand, the Palestinians and the Arab states maintain that Israel is responsible for payment of compensation to the refugees who left Israel during the 1948 war regardless of the reasons for their departure. To support their claim they cite precedents established through international law and United Nations resolutions, in particular paragraph 11 of Resolution 194 (III) passed by the UN General Assembly in December 1948, resolving “that compensation should be paid for the property of those [refugees] choosing not to return and for the loss of or damage to property which, under principles of international law or in equity, should be made good by the governments or authorities responsible.” Although the resolution does not specifically designate Israel as responsible, the Arab states, and indeed many nations not party to the conflict, have assumed that the resolution infers that Israel is accountable for abandoned refugee property, even if not for the cause of the refugee Hight.

On the other hand, Israeli governments since 1948 have disclaimed responsibility tor the refugee departure, placing the blame on the Arab states and Arab leaders. They have asserted that the refugee flight was the result of instigation by Arab leaders in a war of aggression against Israel; therefore ultimate responsibility for any claims must be borne by the aggressor states. However, Israel has stated that it is willing to discuss the issue in the context of a peace settlement and to consider some form of payment as a humanitarian gesture, not as an obligation by the State of Israel.[146] Ze’ev Schiff underscores this perspective in a recent monograph, Israeli Preconditions for Palestinian Statehood. He asserts that:

Israel should participate in a humanitarian effort to rehabilitate the refugees, recognizing that it bears no responsibility to compensate these refugees for damages suffered during a war initiated by others during which Israelis themselves suffered greatly. Additionally, Israel should reject claims for compensation of Palestinian refugees, perhaps by presenting in return Israel’s own claims to regain Jewish property in Arab countries.[147]

Recently, however, there have been nuances of change in Israeli public opinion. In a Knesset speech. Prime Minister Ehud Barak expressed regret for Palestinian suffering caused by the 1948 war, but emphasized that his regret was “not, under any circumstances, based on a feeling of guilt or responsibility for the emergence of the conflict and its results.[148] Several “new historians” using official archives have refuted assertions that Israel was blameless in the matter of refugee flight, documenting that a large percentage of Palestinians were forced from their homes to become refugees either within Israel or beyond its borders. Even the Ministry of Education recently initiated a project to revise school textbooks to give a more balanced and equitable picture of Israel’s early years.

General (Ret.) Shlomo Gazit, former head of Israeli military intelligence, reflects changing perspectives in a monograph titled, “The Palestinian Refugee Problem.” He observes that: “One must question the current Israeli policy of refusing to recognize any Israeli responsibility to compensate the refugees. Whoever seeks a full solution to the Arab-Israel and Palestinian-Israeli conflicts, cannot ignore the significant psychological contribution to a changed Arab-Palestinian attitude toward Israel that would derive from an Israeli decision to pay compensation.”[149]

Gazit asserts that there is no possible comparison between the situation of the Palestinians in 1948 and Jewish suffering resulting from the Holocaust since the former resulted “from war their own leadership initiated.” However, he asserts, Israel should calculate compensation and payments to be made to the refugees, a process that “could be of great psychological importance, facilitate normalization, and open a new era of positive bilateral relations between the peoples.” If Israel were to insist, “as in the German case, that Palestinians be obligated to use the Israeli payments to import Israeli products,” Palestinian and Arab markets would be opened for Israel.[150]

Gazit’s proposal is indicative of an influential view in Israel that corresponds with the international consensus concerning Israel’s, at least partial, responsibility for payment of compensation to the 1948 refugees.

 Identification and Evaluation of Property and Non-material Items

A major task facing those dealing with the compensation issue is identification of items for which to be compensated. The two main categories are movable and immovable property. The latter includes primarily land and building structures; the former, industrial equipment, commercial stocks, motor vehicles, agricultural equipment and livestock, household effects, and blocked bank accounts.[151] In addition, Palestinian and other Arab specialists have demanded compensation for loss of “human capital,” psychological suffering, and the Palestinian Arab share in the value of public material assets during the mandatory period; such as railroads, airports, ports, water resources, and other such public assets.[152]

Rural and urban lands constitute the principal capital owned by the Arab community in 1948. Land categories of diverse values include urban property, various qualities of cultivable land, forests, uncultivable grazing lands, and wastelands.

Table 7.1 Arab-owned land in Israel following the 1949 armistice agreements

| | Area (in acres) | Percentage |

| Arab individually owned | 1,870,492 | 36.64 |

| Jewish owned | 368,941 | 7.23 |

| Other than A or J | 26,308 | 0.52 |

| State domain | 2,838,765 | 55.61 |

| Total | 5,104,506 | 100.00 |

Sources for identification of former Palestinian Arab assets are diverse, including Arab specialists such as Sami Hadawi, Yusuf Sayegh, and Atif Kubursi; the Israeli Custodian of Absentee Property; and the UN Conciliation Commission for Palestine (CCP). Hadawi, former Chief of the Land Taxation

Section of the Palestine Government’s Department of Land Settlement and editor of the authoritative Village Statistics that classified land categories and ownership during the mandate, provided data on Arab owned land in Israel following the 1949 armistice agreements (table 7.1).[153]

The CCP’s Refugee Office established a Committee of Experts on Compensation in 1950 to undertake the task of identifying and evaluating Arab property, focusing on land. Its principal source of data was based on land holdings and values registered in the Government of Palestine’s Land Ottice in 1937, 1942, and 1947. The CCP’s global estimate was based on the territorial situation defined in the 1949 armistice agreements between Israel and Egypt, Jordan, Syria, and Lebanon.[154]

After completing a global estimate of Arab property, the CCP sought to identify hundreds of thousands of individual land parcels based on mandate records giving each location, area and description, owners’ names and respective shares, and other data such as mortgages affecting the parcel.

A major problem was that records of land holdings were dispersed among several authorities. At the end of the mandate, British officials turned over to Israel only those records within the jurisdiction of the Jewish state where land was predominantly Jewish owned. Other records were received by Jordan, Syria, and Egypt. Many microfilmed documents had been sent to England, where they were made available to the CCP.[155]

The CCP expected to base its estimates on records sent to England and from government tax records held by Israel. Although the CCP claimed that Israel, Syria, Egypt and Jordan cooperated in its work, it was discovered that many original land registration records were destroyed in the 1948 war or otherwise missing. Some of the microfilmed material sent to England was later found to be illegible, and many documents had basic omissions.

The CCP Refugee Office estimated that more than 80 percent of Israel's total area of 20,850 square kilometers represented land abandoned by the Arab refugees, although only a little more than a quarter of it was considered cultivable.[156] Three-quarters of this land was sub-marginal or semi-desert, mostly occupied by nomad tribes whose ownership, although not clearly defined, was unchallenged during the mandate. Actual title to this land was "presumed" to be state domain and thus was considered government land by Israel. Given the ambiguity of title to such lands, they are likely to be the object of controversy in compensation negotiations. According to the CCP, abandoned Arab cultivable land was nearly two- and-a-half times the total area of Jewish-owned land at the end of the mandate.

Specific identification of land ownership and evaluation of many large abandoned tracts was impossible because of the land system prevailing at the end of the mandate. Most land in the CCP's global estimate of 16,324,000 dunams (one-quarter acre), including the 4,574,000 considered cultivable, had not been registered under the Land Settlement Act that identified ownership by cadastral survey. Much of this property was registered under the old Ottoman system that usually identified land parcels or buildings undefined by a survey. Entries in the Register of Deeds could rarely be identified with the parcel of land to which they purported to refer. In effect, land registration was personal rather than territorial.[157]

Although land registration under Ottoman law was compulsory, it was frequently not enforced. Consequently, much land was held by private contracts drawn up according to local custom outside the official Land Registry Office. There was no record of successions that often divided and subdivided ownership. The Register of Deeds, especially in rural areas, often did not show true ownership of land and the tangle of titles was a complex labyrinth leading to frequent disputes over encroachments and boundaries.

The British mandatory authorities initially adopted Ottoman legislation pertaining to immovable property that conformed to Shari'a Islamic religious law modified by tradition. Although the mandate authorities did little to modify Ottoman land legislation, they permitted the civil courts to apply principles of English common law and doctrines of equity in force in the United Kingdom, subject to Ottoman law.

In 1928, the British introduced a new system, the Land Settlement Ordinance, basing registration on survey maps accurately defining each parcel of land. However, by the end of the mandate, only 5,200,000 dunams had been reclassified or settled under this system, including most Jewish-owned land. Large areas that became absentee property, particularly in western Galilee, the Jerusalem Corridor, and areas surrounding Safad, Acre and the Little Triangle, were never reclassified. In these areas ownership and payment of compensation on an individual basis would generate complicated legal and technical difficulties.

A major objective of the 1928 Land Registration Ordinance was to limit land holdings in undivided or collective ownership (mush’a) and to end fragmentation of holdings by preventing registration of tiny plots into valueless fractions. Owners of such fragments were required to combine their shares with neighboring owners.

Jointly owned village land (mush’a) holdings varied from village to village throughout Palestine, but precise information on its distribution and pattern was never collected. The most common type was joint ownership of village land and distribution of shares for each family. Over time, numerous partitions among the heirs and the sale of land to others reduced the shares to infinitesimal denominations — ten-thousandths, hundredthousandths, and even millionth shares. Many areas were in total dispute with as many as thirty claims to a single small parcel of land. Often claimants had no documentation to support their claims with only oral evidence as the basis for decisions.

Although there was no extensive documentation on the total amount of mush’a land in Palestine, it was known that mush’a was the most common ownership throughout the nineteenth century. However, the amount greatly decreased under the mandate. Mandatory surveys indicated that the decline in mush’a holdings during the 1920s and 1930s resulted from voluntary partitions carried out by the fellahin themselves. On the basis of the mandatory surveys, it would seem that between 40 and 50 percent of village lands were commonly owned. Attempts to determine individual compensation payments for commonly owned village lands would raise a host of difficulties.

Since a large part of immovable urban and village property consisted of building structures that were destroyed in war or demolished in urban reconstruction, identification of such items would depend on tax records or such documents that former owners might possess.

The most authoritative Israeli source for identification and evaluation of abandoned refugee property is the Israel Custodian of Absentee Property, a division of the Ministry of Finance. However, much information concerning the use, amounts, distribution and value of abandoned property, and the government's policy concerning it, has been secret. Often sessions of the Knesset Finance Committee discussing the work of the Custodian were closed. Even the CCP was unable to acquire information from the Custodian concerning its activities.

According to early press releases, unclassified reports to the Knesset, and Israeli press accounts, the property acquired by the Custodian made a major contribution to the country's early economic development. The extent of this property and the fact that much of Israel's border region consisted of absentee property made it strategically significant. Of the 370 new Jewish settlements established between 1948 and 1953, 350 were on absentee property. By 1954, more than a third of the 250,000 new immigrants settled in abandoned Arab urban areas. Arabs left whole cities including Jaffa, Acre, Lydda, Ramleh, Bissan, Majdal; 388 towns and villages and large parts of 94 other cities and towns containing nearly a quarter of all buildings then in Israel. Ten thousand shops, businesses and stores were left in Jewish hands. Nearly half the country's citrus holdings, then a major source of foreign currency, were formerly Arab. In 1949, olive produce from Arab groves was Israel's third largest export after citrus and diamonds.[158]

Since the 1950s nearly all this property has been dispersed to Jewish owners through the Jewish National Fund, Jewish Agency, and Israeli land and housing authorities. Much of the rural land was turned over to agricultural settlements; urban property (land and remaining buildings) was acquired by individuals or housing firms on long-term leases. To identify immovable property abandoned by the Arab refugees, the archives of the Custodian would have to become available.

At this point, fifty years after the refugee flight, it will be difficult, if not impossible, to identify movable property. According to the finance minister in 1951, much absentee property was illegally seized during the early 1950s by squatters, veterans, and institutions settling new immigrants.[159]

Until now the Israeli government has not made publie any estimate of the overall value of abandoned property. Consequently there are no precise figures available, but only estimates of former Arab property values. These estimates range from about two billion to well over two hundred billion current US dollars. Two principal sources of estimates are the CCP and Palestinian economists and land specialists mentioned above.[160]

The CCP maintained that valuation of movable property was all but impossible. There was no way of knowing what the refugees took with them and w hat they left. The CCP Refugee Office received no answer from Israel concerning the nature and extent of movables appropriated by its authorities, although the Custodian of Absentee Property estimated the value of movables in its warehouses during 1951 at LP (Palestine Pounds) 4 million. Despite these difficulties, the CCP offered a rough calculation of the value of movable property based on the national income of Palestinians in 1945 and the aggregate value of various items in 1945 such as farm equipment, livestock, and household effects: a figure of LP 20 million. Comparisons were made between the relative value of movable to immovable property in the case of Turks leaving Greece and Greeks leaving Turkey after the First World War since the social structure of these two communities resembled that of the Palestinians. Based on this comparison, the value of Arab movable property would have been LP 21.570.000. Thus the total value of Arab movable and immovable property in 1948–50 according to the CCP was LP 121.570.000. the equivalent of about SI.85 billion 1990 US dollars.[161]

The CCP estimated that the total value of abandoned Arab land in 1950 was about LP 100 million and of movable Arab property in the neighborhood of LP 20 million. Because of the complexity of the problem resulting from missing records and technical complications, these were acknowledged to be very approximate estimates. Furthermore, immovable property evaluation was overshadowed by. on one hand, many changes in land and building values brought about by improvements after the Arab flight. On the other hand, tens of thousands of buildings and hundreds of thousands of acres of agricultural land deteriorated during the 1948 war and Arab flight.

CCP estimates were based on the tax records of the Palestine Government. Agricultural land values were based on estimated productivity used for tax purposes. Agricultural productivity was determined by the Rural Property Ordinance which set a tax per dunam according to the estimated soil productivity; the Ordinance applied to all rural lands except those in the Negev. Urban and town property values were based on assessed rental value.

The value of land was greatly increased by the Land Transfer Regulations of 1940 (derived from the 1939 White Paper) which greatly restricted areas in which Jews could acquire land, thus driving the price upwards. An additional factor was the Arab nationalist campaign against sales to Jews, a fact that made land sales to Jews by Arabs dangerous.

Uncultivable land and buildings in rural areas were not evaluated by the

CCP. I he total value of abandoned immovable property estimated by the CCP based on this method was (in Palestine Pounds):[162]

Rural land Urban lands Jerusalem lands

Total

Neither the Arab states nor the Palestinian community accepted the UN estimates, belies ing that they were far too low. The Arab League appointed its own committee of experts to evaluate the loss of Arab property in Palestine. Arab delegates at the CCP s 1951 Paris conference presented a figure nearly twenty times the estimate of the CCP experts, the equivalent of over 35 billion US dollars. They demanded that refugees who did not return to Israel should be compensated for their share in public property, including roads, railways, ports, airfields, and other such facilities, in addition to compensation for individual property.[163] Palestinian economist Dr. Y usif Sayegh estimated the value of abandoned Arab property at 756.7 million 1948 pounds sterling (land and houses £644.2 million, movable property £12.5 million). He added lost income possibilities, the cost of separating the West Bank and Gaza from the Palestinian economy, and the burden imposed on the neighboring Arab states by absorbing large numbers of the refugees.[164]

Sami I ladawi added to the bill for land, houses, and movables the costs of human capital losses including loss of life, careers, suffering, etc. His estimate of property losses in 1948 prices was LP 743 million; in addition, 430.2 million in human capital losses totaling LP 1,182 billion or $239 billion in 1990 US dollars.[165]

(Canadian economics professor Dr. Atif K ubursi maintains that the estimates presented above were inaccurate, those of the CCP far too low, and those of the various Arab experts, although more realistic than the UN estimates, not inclusive enough. His estimate of material losses is identical to Hadawi s, i.e., LP 743 million in 1948 prices, the equivalent of $132 billion in 1994. Inclusion of human capital losses raises total compensation claims to $209 billion. If compensation for psychological damage and pain, similar to payments made to Jews by West Germany is added, the total reaches $253 billion. K ubursi and other Arab economists maintain that the ((p greatly undervalued refugee assets, neglecting important data such as sales records of land in Palestine when the mandate ended and the diversity and fluctuations in land evaluation.[166]

 Compensation Recipients and Forms of Payment

A principal difference between the parties in the dispute over compensation is whether payments should be global or individual; and. it global, should payment be made directly or to an agency representing refugee interests in the form of large-scale development projects intended to rehabilitate and absorb them.

Although Israel has offered individual payments for expropriated land to its internal Palestinian refugees (those who fled or were driven from one part of Israel to another during 1948) it has insisted that only global payment be offered in the case of refugees who left the country, and only within the context of a general peace agreement. In 1949, the Israel Government stated that it would consider payment into a UN fund for integration of the refugees within the neighboring countries with the understanding that Israel was not responsible for the refugee flight. Final agreement on compensation would have to put an end to the whole refugee problem. Individual claims by former Arab owners would have to be addressed to a UN body charged with settling the compensation issue, not to Israel. This offer would not be viewed as an obligation, but as a humanitarian contribution dependent on loans to Israel.[167]

Gazit has proposed that Israel should determine compensation “at a fixed and modest rate, making no attempt to calculate the amount due to every refugee family according to the value of its property in 1948.” He proposes a rate of approximately $10,000 per family to be applied toward rehabilitation “within a collective framework.” Such family grants, he acknowledges, “would account for a relatively small part of the original assets left behind in 1948.”[168]

In early negotiations on the refugee issue, the CCP considered that Israel should pay compensation to individual owners based on CCP evaluations of abandoned property. Considering Israel’s stringent economic conditions in the early 1950s, the CCP recommended establishment of a UN trustee through whom individual payments would be made and who would be assisted by a group of economic and financial experts charged with developing a compensation program. However, when it became evident that the compensation issue would be indefinitely deferred, emphasis changed from direct individual payments to some form of global financing of refugee resettlement and rehabilitation.

Neither the US nor the UN has taken an official position on the question of global versus individual payment. UN Resolution 194 (III), while calling for compensation, was ambiguous about the form of payments, and whether or not they should be individual or global. However, early attempts to resolve the refugee issue placed great emphasis on resettlement and rehabilitation through projects such as those proposed by the Clapp Mission (UN Economic Survey Mission) and Eric Johnston's schemes for regional economic development. These proposals implied global compensation in the form of contributions through the UN for projects that would absorb the refugees in the countries surrounding Israel. Neither the Clapp nor Johnston proposals were implemented because of the belief by most Arab authorities that they were intended to dispose of the refugee problem through resettlement, thus relieving Israel of any obligation for repatriation or compensation.[169]

Arab delegations to the 1951 Paris conference insisted on individual compensation payment; if Israel was incapable of assuming the burden, then the UN should assume responsibility. Attempts to establish a relationship between payment and Israel's ability to pay was seen as pure and simple confiscation of Arab refugee property. To restrict the right of the refugees to compensation would be to make Israel a present of the refugees' property, the Arab representative insisted.[170]

Kubursi underscores the Palestinian emphasis on the right to individual compensation in his study, Palestinian Losses in 1948: The Quest for Precision-. "Individual rights are at the heart of the compensation issue," he states. "The largest losses are incurred by individuals or families. The collective will, as expressed by the Palestinian leadership, can only theoretically forfeit collective rights. It is up to individuals to pursue their rights regardless of the agreements the current Palestinian leadership may reach with the Israelis at this time, presumably on their behalf.”[171]

A workshop on refugee compensation sponsored in July 1999 by the Palestinian Refugee Research Net and the Canadian International Development Research Center outlined the strengths and weaknesses of various forms of compensation and types of claimants. These included claims by individual 1948 property owners and their heirs, by extended families and/or villages, by the refugee community as a whole regardless of property ownership, by the Palestinian slate on behalf of the refugees, by host governments for the costs of hosting the refugees.[172]

The workshop also surveyed the strengths and weaknesses of payment mechanisms. They included cash payments to individuals, payment in service vouchers for individuals and/or families, investment in community development, refugee ownership of investments in development corporations, a lump sum payment to a Palestinian state, payment through a binational (Palestine, Israel) agency, trilateral (Palestine, Israel, other), or multilateral international commission, and payment through a UN organization such as UNRWA or its successor.

In summary, considerations in payment of both global and individual or family compensation include:

- Should payments be in equal amounts regardless of whether recipients were property owners or not?

- Should they be determined by amounts and type of property lost?

- Should payments be specifically designated for refugee rehabilitation or should recipients be free to use payments as they wish?

- Should payment be direct to refugees or through an intermediary agency such as an Israeli or Palestinian authority or through an international agency, UN or other?

 Counter Claims

When the issue of compensation was initially raised, Israel responded with counterclaims for Jewish-owned property in areas of Palestine held by Jordan, war-damage claims, and claims for property of Jews leaving Iraq in the early 1950s.[173] War damage claims included the costs to Israel of the economic blockade imposed by the Arab states and Jewish property in the Jordanian-held Old City of Jerusalem, the Rutenberg electric plant at Naharayim. several Jewish settlements in the West Bank, the Dead Sea potash works, and Jewish-owned property in Hebron.

After Iraq froze Jewish property and turned it over to a Custodian of Jewish Property in 1951, Foreign Minister Sharett emphasized that Israel would have to take into account the value of Jewish-owned property frozen in Iraq “with regard to compensation we have undertaken to pay the Arabs.”[174]

Similar moves by Syria in 1953 and Egypt in 1956 to freeze Jewish property or to place it under control of a custodian increased the number of counterclaims by Israel. They were reinforced by the powerful lobby of Jews from Arab countries, who, in 1975, established the World

Organization of Jews from Arab Countries (WOJAC), which received quasi-official status from the Israel Government.[175]

WOJAC demanded that Jewish property in Arab countries and the costs to Israel of absorbing Jewish immigrants from the Arab world be presented as counterclaims to the compensation demanded for Arab property seized in Israel. The demands were again r

Congress and organizations of Sephardi Jews who intensified their campaign against payment to the Palestinians, charging that the value of their property was larger than that of the Palestinians. Some presented what they maintained was a conservative estimate of $100 billion.

Until now there has been no accurate accounting of Jewish property in Arab countries. However, Sephardi organizations recently distributed 75,000 questionnaires to Jews from Arab countries now living in Israel, the US, and in other countries to obtain data on property left by the Jewish emigrants.

Although a strong case may be made by Palestinian negotiators that Arabs who left property in Israel are in no way responsible for the fate of Jews who left Iraq, Syria, Lebanon, Egypt, Yemen, Morocco, Libya and Algeria, the Sephardi lobby in Israel will continue to exert strong pressures on the government to take into account their counterclaims.

 Sources of Compensation Payments

All estimates of compensation due the Palestinian refugees are substantial. The largest amounts are greater than the annual national income of most Middle East nations (the current annual budget of the Israel Government is around $50 billion). It is therefore obvious that, if compensation is to be paid, the source will have to come from or be supplemented from outside the region.

A survey, “Financing Palestinian Refugee Compensation,” by Rex Brynen of McGill University postulates a variety of sources including Israel, the Arab states, the UN and third party international assistance, principally Western nations.[176]

Although counterclaims for reparations and internal political opposition are pressures militating against any substantial Israeli contributions to compensation funding, there are several possible sources worthy of consideration. They include some property restitution, payments from rental funds collected by the Custodian of Absentee Property and the Israel Land Authority, payment-in-kind for Jewish settlements in the Occupied Territories turned over to the Palestine Authority, and assistance to the Palestinians of the type Israel extends in its aid programs to developing countries. Even if all these sources are available (which is not likely), they would total only a few hundred million dollars a year constituting but a small fraction of the value of absentee property.

Contributions from Arab states are unlikely because they hold Israel liable for creating the problem. Furthermore, only Arab states with large petroleum revenues would be able to participate in any compensation scheme. However, Arab participation might be elicited by contributions to projects for refugee rehabilitation and/or resettlement, either in the projected Palestine state or in the neighboring countries.

Some economists have anticipated the devolution of UNRWA functions to host countries (Syria, Lebanon, Jordan, Palestine) and the gradual transfer of UNRWA funds (now over $300 million per year) to projects for refugee rehabilitation. Compensation in whole or in part might take the form of global payments to finance these projects.

A major source might be Western contributions to projects in the Palestine state which would absorb substantial numbers of refugees. Although the US has been a principal contributor to Middle East development schemes, the current political climate in America is not conducive to large-scale foreign aid. Theoretically, as US economic assistance to Israel decreases, funding for development projects in the Palestine state might increase.

International contribution to any compensation scheme is unlikely to be based on payment to individual property owners. If international assistance is forthcoming, it would be for projects in refugee rehabilitation and economic development of the Palestine state — in essence, a form of global compensation.

The political climate in Israel and the outlook for international assistance indicates that there is little likelihood of any substantial funding for individual compensation. To the extent that funding may become available, it will probably be for global compensation in the form of contributions to rehabilitate and resettle the refugees. If individual claims are to be considered, they will probably have to be dealt with through a bilateral (Palestine/Israel) claims commission where former refugee owners would be represented by the Palestine state. Such a commission will probably be established as one of the bodies set up in a peace treaty to deal with unresolved issues in the final status negotiations.

[146] Divrei ha-Kneset (Israel Knesset proceedings), vol. 8, pp. 358–9.

[147] Washington Institute for Near East Policy f WINEP), May, 1999, p. 38.

[148] Haaretz, October 12, 1999.

[149] Shlomo Gazit, The Palestinian Refugee Problem, Jaffee Center for Strategic Studies (Tel Aviv University, 1995), p. 30.

[150] Ibid.

[151] UN GAOR (United Nations General Assembly Official Records) (6th Session) Supp. no. 18, Annex A.

[152] Atif Kubursi, Palestinian Losses in 1948: The Quest for Precision, Information Paper No. 6. The Center for Policy Analysis on Palestine (CPAP), Washington, D.C., August 1996.

[153] Sami Hadawi. Palestine is Our Heritage, private research paper. No date.

[154] UN GAOR (6th Session).

[155] UN GAOR (7th Session) Annexes, Vol. 2, Item 67 (doc. A/2216-Add 1); UN PR (Provisional Records) (8th Session) (doc. A/2629) CCP 13th Progress Report.

[156] UN GAOR (6th Session).

[157] See F. M. Goadby and M. J. Doukan, The Land Law of Palestine (Tel Aviv, 1935); A. Granott, The Land System in Palestine (London, 1952); A Survey of Palestine 1945–46, vol. 1.

[158] Israel Government, Custodian of Absentee Property, press release, 1/16/53; Israel Government Yearbook (English edition). 5713 (1952); 5712 (1951/52); Ha’aretz, April 17, 1956; Jerusalem.

[159] Divrei ha-Knesset, 1951, passim; Ha’aretz, passim 1951.

[160] Peretz, Palestine Refugee Compensation, Information Paper No. 3, CPAP, May, 1995, pp.13–14; Kubursi, Palestinian Losses.

[161] D. Peretz, Israel and the Palestine Arabs (Washington, D.C.: The Middle East Institute, 1958), pp. 144—7.

[162] UN GAOR (6th Session).

[163] UN GAOR (7th Session).

[164] Sami Hadawi, Palestinian Rights and Losses in 1948: A Comprehensive_Study (London: Saqi Books, 1988).

[165] Ibid.

[166] Kubursi, Palestinian Losses.

[167] Divrei ha-Knesset, vol. 1, p. 721.

[168] Shlomo Gazit, The Palestinian Refugee Problem, Jaffee Center for Strategic Studies (Tel Aviv University, 1995), p. 30.

[169] Peretz, Israel and the Palestine Arabs, ch. 4, “The Shift to an Economic Solution.”

[170] UN GAOR (6th Session).

[171] Kubursi, Palestinian Losses.

[172] Report on the Workshop on Compensation as Part of a Comprehensive Solution to the Palestinian Refugee Problem: July 14–15, 1999, Palestinian Refugee Research Net, Ottawa, Canada, September 1999.

[173] Peretz, Israel and the Palestine Arabs, pp. 199–201.

[174] Peretz, CPAP, pp. 10–11.

[175] Ibid.

[176] Report on the Workshop, Ottawa, Canada, September 1999.

 8. Refugee Compensation: Why the Parties have been Unable to Agree and Why it is Important to Compensate Refugees for Losses

[[Emanuel Marx]]

The opinions of both Palestinian and Israeli statesmen regarding Palestine Refugee Compensation have been set out in Don Peretz's groundbreaking survey in 1995.[177] Rex Brynen[178] and Shamay Cahana[179] brought the discussion forward until 1997. One point emerges clearly from these studies: that both parties have skirted the issue of why and how to compensate the refugees, and left it to the final status negotiations. So far Palestinian spokesmen have put all the emphasis on the "return" (cnida). the reinstatement of all the refugees to their former homes and properties. Therefore, they have never explored alternative or additional options, such as granting the refugees living in camps ownership titles to their homes, paying the refugees and their descendants compensation for loss of property and missed life chances, resettling refugees in Palestine and. of course, negotiating an agreement on the return of a specified number of refugees to Israel. As to the Israeli authorities, for almost fifty years they have stuck to the notion that over the years, and especially from 1948 onward, a de facto population transfer has taken place, in which both Palestinians and Jews from Arab countries were dislodged from their land and property. While frequently arguing that the material losses on both sides were equal and should be set against each other, Israeli leaders never formulated a comprehensive policy regarding the treatment of Palestinian refugees.

This leaves us with two perplexing questions:

1. Why have the parties so far been unable to formulate policies regarding the compensation for refugees?

1. Why is it so important to compensate individual refugees for losses sustained half a century ago?

Concerning the first question I argue that the State of Israel's continuing efforts to achieve a monopoly on land have so far blocked any thoughts of handing over land to Palestinians, and that the Palestinian Authority's insistence on "return" as the only acceptable solution to the refugee problem is an inevitable reaction to this position. As to the second question. I believe that people memorize material losses as perpetual debts. Debts that are not redeemed remain open sores. Therefore it is incumbent on states which intend to make a lasting peace to compensate the individuals who suffered and sustained losses in the course of acts of war. If these persons are no longer alive, their rights do not lapse but pass on to their descendants.

The State of Israel's resistance to both the return of Palestinian refugees and the payment of compensation is longstanding, as documented by Shenhav. [180] It is based on the argument that the 1948 war created refugees among both the Palestinians and the Jews in the Middle East. In 1982, the then Minister Mordechai Ben-Porath, himselfa Jew of Iraqi origin, chaired a ministerial committee on a solution to the Palestinian refugee problem. In his foreword to the committee's report Ben-Porath restates this argument. His narrative begins in 1948, when "590,000 Arabs left for the Arab countries and were there put into refugee camps. At the same time 600,000 Jews from Arab countries arrived in Israel." He ends with the, to him, obvious conclusion that “the solution to the problem of the Middle East refugees is by resettlement.”[181] The thinking behind this story is that the events following the establishment of Israel turned both Jews from the Arab countries and Palestinians into refugees. They left behind property, most of which was then taken over by the states concerned. Thus two linked accounts were created: the number of refugees on both sides was almost equal, and the property left behind was presumably of equal value, and. anyway, it would be difficult to recover. The State of Israel absorbed the Jewish refugees and thus compensated them for their losses. If the Palestinian refugees, too, were resettled in their present locations, there would no longer be a need to compensate them. The Palestinian refugee camps would be dismantled and there would no longer be a refugee problem. In line with this feat of wishful thinking, the ministerial committee concluded that the refugee issue should be discussed within the framework of peace agreements between Israel and the Arab countries. (We must remember that the invasion of Lebanon in 1982 created a political climate that could disregard the fact that a peace agreement between Egypt and Israel had already been concluded in 1977.) At that time “Israel will demand that the Arab countries absorb the refugees living in their territories, as against [Israel’s] absorption of the Jewish refugees from Arab countries.”[182] The committee thus adopted Israel’s traditional position, but also introduced a new idea, namely that on humanitarian grounds Israel should resettle the inhabitants of refugee camps in the Occupied Territories.

The argument was not motivated by a concern for the Jewish immigrants from Arab countries, for the State of Israel never demanded compensation for their losses. They were always considered immigrants who chose to come to Israel; and only in this special context did they become “refugees.” Needless to say, these Jewish immigrants had not appointed the state as their attorney. The state’s real concern was, and still is, to remain in possession of the land and property that the Palestinians left behind. It has. by various means, whether legal sequestration, administrative decree, or by the forcible removal of the original owners, established ownership over 93 percent of all the land in the country. This trend has not abated; the state still seeks to increase its land holdings.[183] Its agent, the Israel Lands Authority, does not usually sell land. Instead, it gives Jewish users 49-year leases to parcels of land; its regulations do not permit the leasing of land to Arab citizens. The State of Israel is incapable of giving up land. Its leaders and politicians cannot conceive the possibility of restoring large areas of land to the original Palestinian owners. Perhaps this explains the seeming paradox that, in the absence of specific policies regarding the Palestinian refugees, Israel's reactions to the demands made from time to time to reinstate Palestinian refugees to their lands have for 50 years remained so consistent and unchanged.

To Israel's flat refusal to receive or compensate the refugees, the Palestinian representatives could only react in one way: to demand the complete reinstatement of all Palestinian refugees to their former homes and properties. They still feel that Israel's proposals are unjust; if they were implemented, only the Arab states and the Israeli state would benefit, whereas neither the Palestinian state nor the individual Palestinians who sustained the losses would receive any compensation. It would also introduce numerous states, each with its own agenda, into negotiations concerning solely the Palestinians and the Israelis. The Arab countries would, for instance, argue that the Jews left of their own free will, that many Jews sold their property before emigration, and that, therefore, the Arab countries were not obliged to discuss the issue of compensation.

The history of the idea of the "return" parallels that of the Israeli refusal to deal with the refugee issue. It is enshrined in UN Resolution 194 (III) of 1948, paragraph, of which "resolves that the refugees wishing to return to their homes ... should be permitted to do so at the earliest practicable date, and that compensation should be paid for the property of those choosing not to return.[184] It reappears in paragraph 9 of the Palestinian Compact of 1968 as "the liberation of the motherland and return to it."[185] but without the option of compensation. Various studies of refugees testify to the paramount importance attached to the "right of return."[186] A 1968 study of Jalazon camp found that the idea of the "return" was not only accepted unanimously by persons meeting in public, but was also found to underlie much of the camp's social organization. For instance, the neighborhoods were initially based on village origin and people from the same village still tend to intermarry.[187] A recent study of the attitudes of Palestinian refugees by a research team made up of Palestinians and Israelis still finds that "Return" is probably the one magic word that can fulfill the Palestinians' longing for the original homes and lands that they have never really forgotten."[188]

These set attitudes are not likely to change, precisely because they have never been thoroughly examined by either of the parties or discussed by both parties. The Multilateral Working Group on Refugees set up at the Madrid Peace Conference of 1991 was convened six times in five years. At all these meetings the Palestinian delegation regularly raised the issue of the return, while the Israeli delegation as regularly refused to discuss it.[189] A recent meeting of Israeli and Palestinian academics and former politicians, arranged by Harvard University's Weatherhead Center for International Affairs, attempted to seek a compromise between the positions. The Israeli representatives were adamant: "Israel would pay collective compensation" to the Palestinian state, paralleled by Arab state compensation for Jewish refugees from 1948.[190] And the men who formulated this declaration were academics, not politicians! The Palestinian participants were more flexible: they insisted that Israel recognize, in principle, the "right of return," but agreed to restrict the number of returnees. They did, however, demand that "Israel would pay both individual and collective compensation" to Palestinians.[191] It should be clear by now that the twin issues of the return of Palestinian refugees to Israel and to Palestine and the payment of compensation to those preferring not to return must be discussed and some solution agreed upon before the parties can implement peace.

Why is individual compensation of Palestinian refugees so critical? And why is it more important for the establishment of peace in the Middle East than either the return of the refugees or payment of collective compensation? Because states only conclude peace treaties, while peace is made between peoples.

A lasting peace between Palestinians and Israelis must be based on a dense network of links between the two peoples. The peace treaties between the states will regulate the borders and provide security measures, establish controls on the movement of people and goods, and set up fiscal obstructions to free trade. Such regulations would be implemented by a growing bureaucratic staff, which would make every effort to entrench itself and to set up elaborate control mechanisms. Peace must then be fostered by the people of Palestine and the people of Israel, against very heavy odds.

But before such relationships can be established, the people on both sides must be reconciled and become more tolerant of each other. The hatred and resentment accumulated over generations must be overcome, and wounds must be healed. That there is such a problem comes out clearly in informal intercourse with Palestinian refugees. The memories of a lost home, of land and property left behind and the social upheaval that accompanied their flight, are indelibly etched in their minds.[192] Each household keeps legal documents, such as tax receipts and land registration documents, which have become reminders of a happier past. People may turn a simple artifact, such as a house-key, into a symbol that elicits detailed itemized accounts of the property to which it gave access. It may arouse memories of the abrupt loss of property and life changes. It may also remind people of the injustice perpetrated on them, and cause them to realize that the world has forgotten them and that no one has compensated them for their losses. Such profound reactions can be observed, not only where people witnessed the past, but also by members of a second and third generation. These sentiments are never far from the surface. In meetings with refugees, the issue of their lost property crops up regularly. No sooner is the theme broached than their anger flares up and they hold their interlocutor, especially if he is as an Israeli, partly responsible for their plight. This issue must be attended to. Only when the refugees are compensated for these losses, will they be able to turn a new page, though without ever forgetting that they are refugees. [193]

Refugees who are not compensated for their losses may pass their resentment on to descending generations. The best illustration are the refugees created by the 1922 war between Greece and Turkey, which ended with the signing of the Lausanne Treaty of 1923. The two governments consented to a population transfer, as a result of which over a million persons became “Greeks” and 350,000 people became “Turks” who lost their homes and property. Hirschon’s study of a settlement of Asia Minor refugees in Pireus found the “Greek” refugees, fifty years after their arrival in Greece, still to be refugees. They still considered themselves to be people from Asia Minor and had little respect for the local Greeks.[194] Many of them still spoke Turkish among themselves.[195] While the Greek state had housed them in state-owned makeshift accommodation, it had never compensated them for their losses. The refugees resented both the Greek and the Turkish authorities for having left them in the lurch. This resentment is spread throughout the refugee populations in both countries. It has poisoned the relations between the countries and has fed into their sporadic disputes. It flares up at the slightest pretext. Thus the disagreements between Muslim and Christian Cypriots repeatedly brought the two countries to the brink of war.

Compensation provides a substratum on which economic and other relationships may grow and thrive. If the Palestinians and Israelis could establish dense networks of economic relations, these would reinforce peaceful relations. But the chances for developing such ties are quite slim. For in thirty years of Israeli rule, the Palestinian economy has been eroded. Not only were local trade, industry,and agriculture supplanted by Israeli imports, but the Occupied Territories were also left without a labor force: the Israeli labor market offered higher wages for unlimited numbers of Palestinian workers. In order to collaborate with the Israeli economy, the Palestinians must first develop an independent and competitive economy. Their natural outlets are, of course, the neighboring Arab countries. But at the moment the level of trade between the Arab countries stands at about 7 to 8 percent (Feiler and Yisraeli put the figure at under 7 percent),[196] largely because of the divide between the rich oil-exporting countries and the poor labor-exporting ones. The rich states import goods from all over the world, and seek to control the import of labor from their poorer Arab neighbors, relatives who might eventually claim the rights and benefits of citizenship. Therefore, they maintain strict border controls and restrict the import of goods from the poor countries.

Relations between Palestine and Israel are likely to fall into a familiar pattern: The poorer state will export labor to the rich one, while the wealthy one will swamp the market with its products. The Palestinian state will need to throw up high tariff walls in order to protect itself against the inroads of the Israeli economy. The import restrictions are likely to remain in force for as long as the Palestinian economy is insecure. The Palestinian state is likely to discourage labor migration to Israel, because this would withdraw the most skilled and entrepreneurial segment of its manpower. It seems that neither now nor in the foreseeable future will the Palestinian authorities be interested in the movement of Palestinians to Israel.

It appears that Palestinian economic interests are totally opposed to the movement of Palestinians to Israel, either as migrant workers or as settlers, as distinct from the ideological demand for a return. If Israel were to adopt a more flexible position toward the return of Palestinian refugees and agreed to compensate them for losses, the Palestinians would probably respond positively and the seeming contradiction could be reconciled.

[177] Don Peretz, Palestinian Refugee Compensation (Washington, D.C.: Center tor Policy Analysis on Palestine, 1995).

[178] Rex Brynen, “The Funding of Palestinian Refugee Compensation,” Fofognet Digest, March 1996.

[179] Shamay Cahana, Differing and Converging Views on Solving the Palestinian Refugees’ Problems (Jerusalem: Hebrew University, Davis Institute for International Relations, 1997).

[180] Yehouda Shenhav, “The Jews of Iraq, Zionist Ideology, and the Property of the Palestinian Refugees of 1948: an Anomaly of National Accounting,” International Journal of Middle East Studies 31 (1999): 605–30.

[181] Aner Avner, 1984, Ha-omnampelitim la-netzach? (in Hebrew: Will they forever remain Refugees?). (Jerusalem: Information Center, with Minister M. Ben- Porath’s Office).

[182] Ibid.

[183] Emanuel Marx,“Palestinian Refugee Camps in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip,[11] Middle Eastern Studies 28 (2) (1992): 281–94.

[184] Paldstinensische Fluchtlinge undder Friedensprozess: Paldstinenser ini Libanon, ed. Ronald Ofteringer (Berlin: Das arabische Buch).

[185] Yehoshafat Harkavi and Mati Steinberg, Haamana ha-falastinit (in Hebrew: The Palestinian Compact) (Jerusalem: Information Center, 1988).

[186] Rashid Khalidi,“The Way Forward: a Palestinian Perspective,” Journal of Refugee Studies 2 (1) (1989): 191–9; Randa Farah,“Crossing Boundaries: Reconstruction of Palestinian Identities in al-Baq*a Refugee Camp” (Jordan, 1997); Palestine, Palestiniens: Territoire national, espaces communautaires, eds. R. Bocco, B. Destremau and J. Hanoyer (Beirut: CERMOC [Les Cahiers du CERMOC, No. 17]), pp. 259–98.

[187] Yoram Ben-Porath and Emanuel Marx, Some Sociological and Economic Aspects of Refugee Camps on the West Bank (Santa Monica, CA: Rand, 1971).

[188] Adel Yahya, Palestinian Refugees Remembered (Jerusalem: IPCRI, 1998).

[189] Cahana, Differing.

[190] Joseph Alpher and Khalil Shikaki, The Palestinian Refugee Problem and the Right of Return (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1998), Weatherhead Center for International Affairs.

[191] Ibid.

[192] Shimon Shamir,“West Bank Refugees — Between Camp and Society, [1]* in J. Migdal, Palestinian Society and Politics (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1980), pp. 147–65; Farah, “Crossing Boundaries.”

[193] Emanuel Marx, “Land and Work: Negev Bedouin Struggle with Israeli Bureaucracies,” Nomadic Peoples (NS) 3, no. 2 (2000).

[194] Renee Hirschon, Heirs of the Greek Catastrophe (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1989).

[195] Ibid.

[196] Gil Feiler and Yaacov Yisraeli, Business Laws and Economic Prospects in the Middle East and North Africa (Tel Aviv: Federation of Israeli Chambers of Commerce, 1996).

 9. Traditional Positions and New Solutions

[[Moshe Ma’oz]]

The traditional positions of the Palestinians and Israelis regarding the creation of the Palestinian refugee problem and its desired solution are highly contradictory. According to the Palestinian narrative, Israel forcibly expelled many Palestinian Arabs from their homes in 1948, making them refugees. Therefore, these refugees and their descendants have the right to return to their previous homes in Israel or accept compensation for it; Israel should acknowledge its moral responsibility for the injustice created to these refugees.

Israel, by contrast, has rejected any responsibility for the Palestinian refugee problem and has denied their “right of return.” It has continued to put the blame on the Arabs — including the Palestinians — who had repudiated the creation of Israel and declared war upon it in 1948. This war created the Palestinian refugee problem, alongside a Jewish refugee problem in certain Arab countries. Israel has absorbed the Jewish refugees and expects the Arab states to deal with the Palestinian refugees. Their return to Israel would undermine the viability of Israel as a Jewish state.

To be sure, the official positions of Israel and the Palestinians — represented by the PLO have not essentially changed, even following the Oslo Accords (signed by these parties in September 1993) which inter alia depicted the Palestinian refugee problem as one of final status issues to be discussed in a later stage. The PLO still insists on “Right of Return” (Haqq al-Awda) for the Palestinian refugees to their homes in Israel and on the implementation by Israel of UN Resolution 194 III (paragraph. 11) of December 11, 1948, namely :

the refugees wishing to return to their homes and live in peace with their neighbors should be permitted to do so at the earliest practical date, and that compensation should be paid for the property of those choosing not to return and for loss of or damage to property ... [197]

Israel, by contrast, still rejects both the Palestinian refugees’ “right of return” and UN Resolution 194. Nevertheless, for the first time, an Israeli prime minister, Ehud Barak, adopted a somewhat more flexible attitude toward the Palestinian refugee problem: In the opening of the Knesset winter session on October 4, 1999, Barak stated:

We regret the heavy suffering that the conflict caused not only us. but all of the Arab nations that fought against us, including the Palestinian people ... In the time of peace Israel will be ready to take part in the efforts to heal the wounds of the war out of goodwill, friendship and good neighborliness, and under no circumstances out of feelings of guilt or responsibility for causing the conflict and its results.[198]

Unlike Barak, or previous Israeli prime ministers, several Israeli scholars and politicians have indeed pointed to the responsibility of Israel, at least partially, regarding the creation of the Palestinian refugee problem.[199] Significantly, in a new study published by the Israel Defense Ministry’s publication house, Professor Yoav Gelber, an Israeli nationalist, writes inter alia:

The waves of the [Palestinian] flight after the invasion of the Arab states stemmed from the IDF counter-attacks against the Arab invaders ... It now became legitimate to expel those [Palestinians] who invited the Arab invaders. Occasionally, refugees were expelled beyond the borders. In certain cases, IDF units frightened Arab inhabitants in order to enhance their flight; and there were also a few massacres [of Palestinians].[200]

Among Palestinian scholars, too, Professor Rashid Khalidi presented in 1992 a more pragmatic view than the official Palestinian line regarding the implementation of the refugees’ “right of return.”[201]

Remarkably, however, for the first time a joint working group of Palestinian and Israeli scholars and intellectuals recently developed new approaches to the refugee issue and to its acceptable solution. Established by Professor Herbert Kelman of Harvard University, it published a joint concept paper[202] which largely lays out two compromise solutions to the Palestinian refugee problem from a Palestinian and an Israeli point of view, respectively. Each represents a serious attempt to address the concerns and needs of the other side and to narrow the gap in the traditional positions of both parties. Yet the paper does not represent a consensus solution that could be endorsed by all members of the working group, Palestinians and Israelis alike. The main points of this essay are as follows.

 Principles

It goes without saying that any solution to the refugee problem must be perceived as reasonably just and fair by both sides. Each side must see it as addressing its needs, rights, and concerns. The solution should transcend the balance of military power and accommodate the other side's sense of justice and fairness. Neither side should see the outcome as giving an unfair or unwarranted advantage to the other.

While there can be no genuine "finality" to a solution on the personal level for refugees who have suffered for 50 years, the solution should, nevertheless, strive to "close the file" on the issue of refugees. It must therefore and not only in the West Bank and Gaza. It should attempt to resolve all aspects of the problem. Both sides must agree not to make any further claims in the future. Arrangements and institutions associated with the refugee problem — such as refugee camps, refugees' legal-political status, refugee ID cards, and the United Nations Relief and Works Agency (UNRWA) — must cease to exist as part of the implementation of the agreement.

The agreement should be conducive to the stability of the Palestinian- Israeli and Arab-Israeli settlement. It should therefore be based on trust, equality, and reciprocity and should promote better relations. For example, it must not lead to the forced de-Palestinization of refugees in host countries. Nor should it impose a heavy burden on those countries: In particular, the agreement should make clear that the refugee solution would not be at Jordan's expense.

The solution should be consistent with international law and relevant

UN resolutions.

 A Palestinian Compromise Solution

This compromise seeks to provide an acceptable, honorable though not necessarily just — resolution of the refugee issue while accommodating the realities on the ground and Israeli security concerns. No return en masse of the Palestinian refugees is envisaged, but the individual moral right of Palestinian refugees to return to their homes and property in Palestine is fully acknowledged by Israel. In this sense, Israel accepts the responsibility for creating the refugee problem. The actual exercise of the "right of return," however, is a different matter. Here a return of only a limited number is seen as feasible. This reflects the changed situation of individual refugees and of the property that they had to abandon a half century ago, when the problem of the refugees was created. Many individual refugees — having in fact resettled and made their homes elsewhere — will opt for compensation. Further, Israel will want to have a say as to the number of refugees allowed to return.

Those not returning to Israel proper would be allowed to return to the Palestinian state if they so wished. The absorptive capacity of the Palestinian state, not Israel's position, would determine the number of those returning to the state. In this final settlement, the Palestinians make a strategic trade-off. They demand a return to the 1967 border in order to absorb the largest possible number of refugees, in return for foregoing the full exercise of the "right of return." Refugees who may wish to remain in host countries may be resettled there if the host countries agree.

Those not exercising the "right of return" would receive individual compensation. Collective compensation would be paid to the Palestinian state and used for rehabilitation and absorption projects. Israel would carry the sole responsibility for finding and providing the two types of compensation, possibly under an international umbrella. The resettlement in host countries would probably require separate negotiations with them as well as the participation of international donors. Finally, to ensure the permanent nature of this agreement, refugee camps would be dismantled and UNRWA dissolved.

* Advantages

This solution appears to give Israel what it wants most. It diminishes existential threats and demographic problems by removing the most threatening element in the Palestinian negotiating position. In return, the Palestinians get what they want most from Israel. The final settlement provides the Palestinians with the largest territorial assets for resettlement and strengthens the Palestinian demand for the 1967 borders, or equivalent trade-offs. In the absence of absolute justice, this solution provides realistic and reasonable justice by granting a moral-political right while acknowledging realities on the ground. It also provides a sense of finality at the psychological level, and makes it politically feasible that it will receive widespread Palestinian and possibly Israeli support.

* Disadvantages

From an Israeli perspective, this solution has several disadvantages. The attribution of moral responsibility to the Arabs, rather than to itself, is central to the Israeli narrative. Hence this solution, which requires that Israel acknowledge actual guilt and moral responsibility on its own part, would be seen by it as a potential political threat and dangerous precedent. The determination that a limited number of refugees return to Israel proper might also be seen as a violation of Israel’s sovereign control over its borders and population, hence a precedent. In other words, Israelis might fear that this solution merely opens the file on the Palestinian refugee issue rather than closing it.

Moreover, Israel may see a demographic problem in the return of a large number of refugees to mandated Palestine even if the return is confined only to the State of Palestine. And Israel will not wish to pay both individual and collective compensation, particularly insofar as the issue is not linked to compensation for Jewish refugees from Arab countries.

Israel may also be reluctant to accept the return of a large number of refugees to the Palestinian state as that might bring about political instability there. Indeed, the economic and social burden on the Palestinian state might be very heavy due to its limited absorptive capacity and fragile economy. Therefore, fears of social and political disorder cannot be entirely discounted.

The solution requires cooperation of host countries, particularly Jordan, Lebanon and Syria, who may be asked to absorb a large number of refugees. While Jordan signed a peace treaty with Israel and has granted citizenship to its Palestinian refugees, and, therefore, may show willingness to cooperate, Lebanon and Syria, on the other hand, may choose not to do so. Moreover, those refugees who stay in some host countries may face the threat of de-Palestinization.

Finally, Palestinians might be concerned that the return of a “limited” number of refugees to Israel proper would not be sufficient from the standpoint of Palestinians’ psychological and/or material needs, and hence would lack justice and finality.

 An Israeli Compromise Solution

In this compromise, Israel acknowledges that, at least to some extent, it shares practical (but not moral) responsibility, together with the other parties in the process that culminated in the 1948 war, for the plight and suffering of the refugees, and that rectification of that plight by all parties is the central goal of the Arab Israeli peace process. Israel also accepts the “right of return” to the Palestinian state, but not to Israel proper. Israel also may accept repatriation of tens of thousands of Palestinian refugees as part of its family reunification program.

Israel compensates refugees for lost property on a collective basis. The relevant Arab countries create a similar mechanism for Arab collective compensation of Jewish refugees (based on Arab states’ acknowledgment of their obligations in this regard). Both programs fall within the framework of the Multilateral Working Group on refugees, but they are not linked operationally.

Israel and the Palestinians reach an understanding intended to harmonize the inflow of refugees with Palestinian absorptive capabilities.

Israel drops its demand for direct physical control over the inflow of refugees to the Palestinian state in view of enforcement difficulties. The Palestinian state commits itself to limit the flow in consideration of its assessment of its absorptive capabilities. This gives Israel a mechanism for reciprocity. If the pledge is blatantly violated, Israel can curtail some obligation of its own, such as financial compensation. On the other hand, Israel will encourage the expansion of Palestinian absorptive capabilities.

A key component of this proposal is the Israeli “statement of acknowledgment.” While this is recognized to be of great psychological-historical importance to Palestinians, it is also so to Israelis, whose historical narrative holds that the Arabs bear culpability and responsibility. The following is a possible formulation:

- Israel recognizes that the historical process culminating in the 1948 war generated a refugee problem that caused great suffering to the Palestinian people. As Israel, the Arab countries, and the Palestinians all participated in this historical process, all parties share, at least to some extent, the responsibility for the injustices of the past and for the plight of the Palestinians. Rectification of that plight by all parties is a central goal of the Arab-Israel peace process.

- The Palestinians, having received financial compensation within the context of a settlement of Israeli and Palestinian refugee claims, consider that this satisfies their grievance and renounce any claim to exercise the “right of return” to the State of Israel.

- Israel will continue its unilateral program of family reunification of Palestinians.

- The Palestinian state undertakes, with Arab and international aid, the rehabilitation of the 1948 refugees with the aim of resolving the refugee problem on Arab territory as a condition for a stable Israeli-Palestinian peace.

- The Arab host countries where Palestinian refugees reside recognize the right of those refugees to remain in the country without forfeiting Palestinian citizenship.

- This series of acts and understandings on the part of Israel and Palestine are part and parcel of the overall Arab-Israeli peace process.

* Advantages

This solution, too, enjoys the advantage of closing the file on the entire refugee question, including the ending of refugee status, dissolution of refugee camps, dissolution of UNRWA, etc. It poses no existential or demographic threat to Israel, from whose perspective the settlement is both final and consistent with its self-image.

From the Israeli perspective, compensation funds will be paid out collectively only, and Jewish refugees from Arab countries will be compensated.

From the Palestinian standpoint, the inflow of refugees to the new state is a function solely of local considerations. This solution also operationally delinks the Palestinian and Jewish refugee issues, thereby denying the Arab states leverage on the Palestinian issue.

* Disadvantages

The key disadvantage of this solution for the Palestinians is that it still denies the moral “right of return.” Many Palestinians would not consider Israeli recognition that “the historical process culminating in the 1948 war ... caused great suffering” to be an achievement that justifies concessions. Hence, correspondingly, acknowledging that suffering might not be worth the risk for an Israeli leader. This solution could also, at one and the same time, put pressure on the absorptive capacity of the Palestinian state, and de-Palestinize those refugees who choose or are constrained to remain in other Arab states.

Additional disadvantages from the Palestinian standpoint include the unacceptability of the Israeli program of unilateral family reunification as the sole means of “return” to Israel proper and the linkage, however generalized, between Arab compensation to Jewish refugees and Israeli compensation to Palestinian refugees. Palestinians would also see a disadvantage from the moral standpoint in the definition of Israeli compensation as collective rather than personal.

From the Israeli standpoint, one disadvantage lies in the removal of the operational linkage with Arab state compensation to Jews, and controls over the inflow of refugees, although, given the difficulties of enforcement, this appears to be a calculated risk that Israel must take. At the same time, from the Palestinian standpoint, the residual Israeli sanctions on refugee repatriation to Palestine constitute an undesirable political constraint upon Palestinian sovereignty. The statement of acknowledgment might also be problematic in the eyes of some sectors of the Israeli public. And acceptance of an international role in determining the scope of compensation might invite intolerable pressures on Israel’s financial capabilities.

 Linkages and Interlocks

We may distinguish at the outset between third-party linkages and issuearea linkages. The former appear to have a disruptive potential from the Palestinian standpoint but to be at least occasionally useful for Israel, whereas the latter bear the positive capacity to generate flexibility for both parties in finding solutions.

Concerning third-party linkages, in the course of this inquiry, we have repeatedly encountered the possibility of involvement by actors other than Israelis and Palestinians. This is an inevitable corollary of any attempt to solve an issue as complex as that of the Palestinian refugees. This is particularly so when the solution falls within the overall context of the Israeli-Arab peace process, wherein an entire multilateral working group is devoted to refugee issues.

While both Israel and the PLO agree than any solution should be based first and foremost on an Israeli-Palestinian negotiating framework, Israel tends to look positively upon the prospect of tripartite agreements, e.g., with Lebanon regarding the disposition of its refugees, while the PLO would prefer itself to represent the interests of all Palestinians, wherever they are. Similarly, Israel has already made provision for Jordanian involvement in refugee discussions within the framework of the Israeli- Jordanian peace treaty, and, in the case of Lebanon and Syria, would presumably wish to see refugee agreements linked to peace treaties with these countries. The PLO, on the other hand, would seek to be the sole negotiator with these Arab countries on refugee issues, to the exclusion of Israel. In either case, it is generally understood that all relevant agreements with Arab third parties must be compatible with Israeli-PLO agreements on the refugee issue.

This suggests that the most obvious and necessary area of inter-Arab linkage is the Arab role in the rehabilitation of refugees who do not return to Palestine. Another area of possible inter-Arab linkage is the juxtaposition of Arab state compensation to Jews who fled Arab countries with Israeli compensation to Palestinian refugees, a demand voiced by many Israelis and rejected by the Palestinians as counterproductive. As we have noted, both of these spheres offer possibilities for Arab actors to exercise some sort of veto power over the pace and nature of a settlement.

We have already mentioned a demand voiced by Jordanian spokespersons that Jordan represent its resident Palestinians' claims for compensation for property abandoned in Israel. Jordan also expects compensation for having hosted Palestinian refugees since 1948. This, coupled with the Hashemite aspiration that a refugee solution ease Jordan's demographic-political problems, suggests the potential for considerable friction between Jordan and the PLO over refugee issues. Thus Jordan might confront refugees remaining there with the threat of forced repatriation, or '"political return," by forcing them to choose between cancellation of their Jordanian citizenship thus constraining their rights within Jordan and implicitly holding out a threat to force their emigration — and the acceptance of Jordanization. The frequently discussed possibility of the establishment of some sort of Jordanian Palestinian confederation might alternatively complicate or ease disposition of the refugee issue.

Two additional third-party linkages apply mainly to Israel. Even assuming that a refugee agreement is clearly defined so as to apply only to Palestinians outside of Israel, resolution of the refugee issue, like other aspects of a Palestinian settlement, will undoubtedly impact upon Israel's own Palestinian Arab population. Specifically, any move by Israel to compensate Palestinian refugees for properties left behind in 1948 might generate parallel demands by Israeli Arabs who also abandoned lands or were removed from them, even though they remained in Israel. This could have far-reaching implications for Jewish-Arab relations within Israel. Hence the Israeli-Palestinian agreement on refugees must, from the Israeli standpoint, clearly define the PLO role as representing only Palestinians outside of Israel, while the government of Israel is responsible for all Israeli citizens, including Arabs.

Secondly, if Israel agrees to offer compensation, and particularly if that compensation is not directly linked to payment by Arab countries to Jewish refugees, it will require large sums of money. At least some of this is likely to be borrowed on the international market and/or raised from the world Jewish community, thereby affecting Israel's economy and international relations. All of these options imply the possibility that the extent of compensation might be determined at least in part by a third party.

Totally different categories of linkages are those between the refugees' "right of return" issue on the one hand, and all the other aspects of an Israeli-Palestinian final settlement on the other. After all, final status negotiations will involve a broad range of interlocking issues; in addition to refugees, the Oslo Declaration of Principles mentions Jerusalem, borders, Israeli settlements, security arrangements, relations and cooperation with other neighbors, and other issues of common interest. Once final status negotiations are enjoined, the possibilities for linkage among these and additional issues are endless. We have already seen how the Ben- Gurion government in 1949 viewed the refugee issue within the context of a comprehensive settlement.

These linkages can work to the benefit of the overall negotiations. For example, Israel might make concessions on refugee issues in return for Palestinian concessions on settlement issues. Conversely, Palestinian willingness to show flexibility in the implementation of the right of return might be made contingent on Israel's flexibility on territorial issues. Or the abandonment of certain Israeli settlements might be linked to the "return" and rehabilitation within those settlements' infrastructure of Palestinian refugees. Or the scope of Palestinian family reunification could be linked to the number of Israeli settlers who remain in the Palestinian state. Certainly it seems doubtful that a solution to the refugee issue will be concluded on a "stand alone" basis. It is very likely that one or both parties will see fit to introduce into the refugee negotiations extraneous issues that do not touch directly on the refugees' plight or status. Indeed, it is virtually certain that a comprehensive final settlement of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict will comprise an agreed-upon timetable for the phased execution of agreed-upon solutions to a number of issues, not the least of these borders, Jerusalem, and of course refugees.

 Conclusion

While major differences in Palestinian-Israeli positions regarding the refugee issue do exist, and while the legacy of human suffering can never fully be dispelled through political decisions, this issue is nevertheless probably less difficult than other permanent settlement issues. Therefore, an attempt to bridge the gap between the two positions is not a futile exercise. For example, there is acknowledgment among some Palestinians that the exercise of the right of return by all refugees to homes they were forced to abandon in 1948 is unrealizable. Similarly, there is a recognition on the part of some Israelis that Israel s historical role in the events that created the refugee problem is undeniable: They are willing to acknowledge the refugees' suffering along with partial responsibility for the injustice of the past. Moreover, there is agreement that collective material compensation for refugees is an essential and vital component of the solution.

Additionally, the two solutions (the Israeli and the Palestinian) concur that, at the practical level, the core of the solution involves four components: first, a "return," however defined, of a limited number of refugees to Israel proper; second, return of a larger number to the Palestinian state; third, permanent absorption in host countries (notably Jordan); and fourth, compensation. Both sides agree that a successfully negotiated solution should close the file on the refugee issue. At the practical level, this means dismantling the refugee camps and integrating their residents into the communities in which they have lived; ending the political-legal status of the refugees both inside the Palestinian state and in host countries; ending all claims and rights to future claims; and dissolving UNRWA and other international bodies created to deal with the Palestinian refugee problem.

Needless to say, closing the file implies the resolution of other Palestinian-Israeli permanent status issues and making progress toward a more comprehensive Arab-Israeli settlement. By the same token, no comprehensive settlement can be called final unless it also solves the refugee question. In this sense, all the issues are linked. Certainly the dismantling of refugee camps in Arab countries and the resettlement of those wishing to remain in those countries can only occur within a comprehensive settlement.

Despite these points of agreement, no solution acceptable to the two sides has been found. In order for a compromise approach to bridge the two proposed solutions, it must still resolve four clusters of issues, detailed below.

* The nature of Israeli acknowledgment of s u fferi ng/res ponsi bi l ity

In their solution, the Palestinians, in accordance with their narrative, demand that Israel accept the responsibility for the creation of the refugee problem, and that the collective moral right of return to Palestine be fully acknowledged by Israel, but without demanding the actual return of all refugees to their homes. In its solution, Israel acknowledges a portion of the responsibility for the injustices of the past and the plight of the refugees. At the same time, it insists that the Arab states and the Palestinians themselves also bear responsibility. This is in accord with the Israeli narrative, which holds that the Arab parties started the war of 1948, and hence bear the primary responsibility for its consequences.

The Palestinians find this version of “shared” responsibility intolerable, insofar as it implies that they were at least in part responsible for their plight, thereby contradicting their own narrative. They continue to insist that Israel acknowledge “moral” responsibility, particularly by acknowledging their “moral right of return.” This implies Israeli guilt, however, which in turn, compromises the Israeli narrative in a way that is intolerable for Israelis. It also, in Israeli eyes, compromises finality: Once moral responsibility and guilt are acknowledged, what historical or ethical argument could stop the Palestinians from demanding — at the present stage or a later one — massive return to Israel proper, thereby negating the Jewish-Zionist nature of the Israeli state? The Palestinians argue that in the absence of Israel’s acceptance of UN Resolution 194 it must accept moral and legal responsibility, and thus provide a basis for the Palestinian demand for compensation.

* The nature and number of “returnees” and family reunification to Israel proper

This issue is directly linked to the previous one, which is acknowledgment of responsibility. Once the Palestinians have achieved a satisfactory Israeli acknowledgment of responsibility, they are prepared to forego massive return to Israel itself. They will accept the return of a limited number of refugees. But they reject the concept of “family reunification” and the use of the term “symbolic return” by Israel. They seek a genuine, albeit limited, return of the 1948 refugees to Israel (along with unfettered access to the Palestinian state by the large mass of remaining 1948 refugees; see below). Only by acknowledging the validity of “right of return,” they argue, will Israelis give genuine expression to their acknowledgment of moral responsibility.

It is precisely for this reason, Israelis argue, that to accept any sort of a return is to give the Palestinians a moral “foot in the door” that undermines the Israeli narrative. Family reunification is a tried-and-true formula; and the difference between “several tens of thousands” and a “limited number” of refugees returning over a period of years may be significant.

* The nature and size of compensation, and linkage to Jewish refugees

We have noted that there are two basic forms of compensation: collective and individual. There are also two different populations demanding or requiring compensation: Palestinian refugees from 1948, and Jews who fled Arab lands in the aftermath of the creation of the State of Israel. Israel agrees to offer compensation to Palestinian refugees from 1948, but insists that it be collective and not individual. This, in the Israeli view, avoids a prolonged, backward-looking, and inevitably frustrating attempt to put a price on every asset abandoned by Palestinians, in favor of a forwardlooking approach of compensating the PLO or the Palestinian state with funds that can be dispersed at its own discretion, whether to individuals or for state-building enterprises. Israel is prepared for this approach to be applied by the Arab states to the issue of compensation for Jews who fled Arab lands, but it insists that this parallel effort indeed be made by the Arab states.

The Palestinians insist that compensation be both collective and individual, arguing that this corresponds with historical justice, based on the Palestinian narrative of both extreme individual and national deprivation. And while the Palestinians do not object in principle to the notion of Arab compensation for Jewish refugees, they do reject any kind of linkage or parallelism with their own demand for compensation. Here too, to do otherwise would be to compromise the Palestinian narrative of Israeli moral responsibility in favor of the Israeli narrative of a shared Israeli, Palestinian, and Arab state responsibility. It would also give Israel and the Arab states a form of veto power over progress in compensating Palestinian refugees.

Our discussion has not entered into another potential area of controversy regarding compensation. Regardless of whether this compensation is collective, individual or both, will it be on the basis of property left behind, the suffering of the past 50 years, the costs of relocation, or some other set of criteria?

The issues of refugee compensation extend far beyond the borders of Israel/Palestine and involve Arab host countries as well as, almost certainly, the international community. In any negotiations, the PLO will seek to be recognized as the sole negotiator for Palestinian refugees, wherever these refugees are. It will then undertake to turn over collective and/or individual compensation in bilateral talks with other Arab states, beginning with Jordan. But the latter, for one, has already made clear its desire to negotiate directly with Israel. Israel may be able to exercise some discretion of its own in deciding this issue and similar ones. In any event, precisely because of the potential for multilaterality, the formulae for bridging the gaps we have outlined are likely to be particularly difficult to achieve.

* The size of return to the Palestinian state

Here, the gap between the two options reflects Israel’s practical concerns. First of all, it regards these possible ecological and political effects of an unmonitored or unrestricted massive influx of refugees into the Palestinian state, and secondly, it concerns the Palestinians’ demand to fulfill a national obligation and to exercise the same sovereign independence in regulating the influx of new residents that Israel maintains. Yet, both sides, along with Jordan, recognize the essential size and resource limitations and ecological fragility of the landmass between the desert and the sea, and the need to monitor population movements with an eye to avoiding irreversible damage. Hence, this appears to be partially an issue of trust as well as one of clashing narratives.

These, then, are the principal gaps that remain to be bridged if an agreed solution is to be found to the refugee “right of return” issue. The formula for bridging the gaps between the two solutions lies, we believe, in two realms. The first is the building of trust and confidence derived from a sincere and prolonged effort at seriously negotiating the issues at hand. This is where narratives can be modified and adjusted to accommodate the other side. The second is the more pragmatic, indeed political, realm of the inevitable trade-offs among different, yet interrelated aspects of the overall Israeli-Palestinian conflict-resolution effort.

[197] Text in DennisC. Howley, The United Nations and the Palestinians (New York: Exposition Press, 1975), p. 86.

[198] Jerusalem Post, October 29, 1999, p. B2.

[199] For example, Benny Morris, The Birth of the Palestinian Refugee Problem 1947–1949 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1988).

[200] Cf. Ze’ev Schiff, “A new approach to the Palestinian problem,” Ha’aretz, November 5, 1999, p. IB.

[201] Rashid Khalidi, “Observations on the Right of Return,” Journal of Palestine Studies 2] (2) (1992): 29–40.

[202] The Palestinian Refugee Problem and the Right of Return, Harvard University, Weatherhead Center for International Affairs, May 1998, by Joseph Alpher and Khalil Shikaki, with the participation of Gabriel Ben Dor, Ibrahim Dakkak, MK Yossi Katz, Ghassan Khatib, Moshe Ma’oz, Yezid Sayigh, Ze’ev Schiff, Shimon Shamir, with an Introduction by Herbert C. Kelman and Nadim N. Rouhana.

 10. Actual Repatriation: A Minimal Israeli Cesture

[[Donna E. Arzt]]

The refugee issue has long been the “last taboo” of the Israeli-Palestinian peace process. Even though it was named in 1991 as one of the six multilateral committee topics under the Madrid Framework,[203] until recently the refugee issue was considered so volatile that it was usually not even mentioned alongside that other ostensibly intractable subject, Jerusalem. Most Israelis (as well as many American and Canadian Jews) either vehemently vowed that not a single Palestinian would ever return across the Green Line or adamantly refused to talk about it; while Palestinians, no matter what their residential status, almost uniformly denied that they would accept anything less than complete and total return of all Palestinian refugees to their original homes within the 1949 Armistice line.[204]

For over fifty years, Palestinians and Israelis have fought rhetorical as well as military wars over the highly charged phrase, “the right of return,” though, in fact, that precise locution does not appear in any treaty on refugees, nor in any of the relevant General Assembly or Security Council Resolutions — not 194, 242 nor 338. (Even where it appears in paraphrased form in general human rights documents, it is most probably not applicable to the collective circumstances of the Palestinians.)[205] Moreover, the rhetorical debate occurred almost completely in a vacuum: Palestinians and Israelis rarely if ever talked to each other about anything, let alone about the topic of refugees.

But public posturing when only one audience is listening is one thing; serious peace negotiations across a table is another. At least on the Palestinian side, a number of moderate voices have begun to suggest that compromises will be necessary and possible in pursuit of a permanent peace accord. For instance, Ziad Abu Zayyad has recognized that Palestinian “return” can, in fact, mean:

the acquisition of national independence and dignity, and not necessarily as a literal return. In other words, Palestinians continue to believe that they are entitled to their claim to the Right of Return, but they are prepared to bring it to the negotiating table. This claim can be satisfied either through the actual return of a mutually acceptable number of refugees, or a symbolic number of them... ,[206]

Similarly, Walid Salem has recently concurred that the “right of return” to Israel proper would be limited to a symbolic number of refugees, so long as the vast majority could “return” to the to-be-established Palestinian state and all refugees would receive compensation; while in a recent interview, Salim Tamari referred to “a symbolic return to 1948 territories, but a substantial number to the 1967 territories,” i.e. the West Bank and Gaza.[207]

Are Israelis equally prepared to bring the issue of “return,” of a symbolic number, at least, to the negotiating table? In order to achieve a negotiated peace with the most important characteristic, finality,[208] Israelis have no choice but to entertain the issue of “return.” For if the refugee issue is the lynchpin of peace, then a symbolic gesture of repatriation is the lynchpin for solving the refugee issue.

This essay explores this idea within the current negotiating climate, examines why such a symbolic gesture is necessary (including why it is merely a gesture and not a risk), and discusses who might be among those repatriated and how they might be assisted in returning. The essay concludes with the question of “Then, What?” In other words, how will these new Palestinian immigrants to Israel be integrated into Israeli society?

 The Current Negotiating Climate

Besides being one of the multilateral topics, refugees are one of the eleven agenda items scheduled to be discussed within the bilateral Israeli-Palestinian Framework Agreement.[209] The very existence of this agenda implicitly reflects concurrence on two essential elements: One, that Palestinian statehood is inevitable and imperative, and, two, that the refugee issue is integral to any permanent peace settlement. True, each side has its own “nationalist red lines.” in the words of Shibley Telhami:

No Israeli government can accept the massive return of Palestinians into Israel in a way that threatens the Jewish majority, and no Palestinian leader can sign an agreement that does not grant a future Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza the right to accept as citizens any willing Palestinian refugees.[210]

Nevertheless, these are not so much red lines as the front lines of negotiation.

Officially, as of this writing in 2001, Israel is still denying the right of any refugee to return. In late November 1999, Prime Minister Barak declared that Israel would not accept a single Palestinian refugee within the Green Line.[211] Chief Israeli negotiator Oded Eran had said earlier that same month that the solution to the refugee problem ‘‘cannot be found within the borders of Israel,” and that the refugees should be settled in their current places of residence, albeit with massive economic aid. (He did not use the word “compensation.” per se.)[212] At about the same time, retired Israeli General Shlomo Gazit opined that a final status agreement would have to include a public announcement by Yasser Arafat that “refugees would not be returning to Israel proper.”[213]

Yet, concomitantly, unofficial trial balloons about limited return were being released for Israeli public consumption. On 21 November, during a visit to Shuafat refugee camp, Labor MK Yossi Katz (the Labor Party’s official liaison with the Palestinians) told reporters that “the State of Israel must return Palestinians [to places] within the Green Line as part of the state's recognition and shared responsibility — together with the Arab states — for the refugee problem."[214] Previously, Katz had called for the return of 100,000 refugees within the 1948 borders as part of a "framework of family reunification."[215] While, officially, Katz may be sanctioned by his party for saying this, the timing, location, and affiliation of this announcement cannot be pure coincidence.

Clearly, the words "right" and "return" are as highly charged as ever. But, at least, a much-needed dialogue on Palestinian refugees is beginning among the Israeli public. The Katz trial balloon should be read together with the publication of the new Israel Defense Ministry book acknowledging, for the first time in official circles, that the Israeli army prompted much of the flight of the Palestinians in 1948 and created the refugee problem by taking an active role in frightening them enough so that they would flee.[216] Moreover, at least one recent public opinion poll indicates that as many as 46.8 percent of Israeli Jews place some degree of responsibility on Israel for creating the refugee problem originally.[217] These sources are more demonstrative of a shift in Israeli thinking (both governmental and popular) than any new academic text by Benny Morris or any of the other "new historians."

When Ehud Barak and Yasser Arafat finally sit down together to negotiate the refugee issue. Bill Clinton or whatever third party is hosting their discussions should leave them with these blunt words of advice: Get Real.[218] Israelis will never accept a peace that includes return of all the refugees; and, likewise, Palestinians will never accept a peace without return of some refugees. In order to achieve a mutually acceptable and durable peace, both sides will have to relinquish their absolutist aspirations and negotiate a comprehensive compromise solution to the refugee issue.

That solution will undoubtedly contain certain key features. For instance, it will be regional in scope, because, at least for the foreseeable future, a Palestinian state will not have the economic stability to absorb six, or even three to four, million refugees, and because all states in the region share at least some responsibility for perpetuating the Arab-Israeli conflict, if not, in fact for causing the refugee crisis. As a member of the region, it will be necessary for Israel to make a minimal gesture of repatriation as part of the overall regional package. Moreover, the solution must offer:

- voluntary and realistic options for individual Palestinian families, including the option to remain where they are, with compensation packages that can assist them to rehabilitate themselves; or

- the option to move to the Palestinian state in the West Bank or Gaza, again with compensation which should also include communal reparations so that Palestinian communities can be reconstituted; and in all cases,

- Palestinian passports and full citizenship in whatever country they reside (or even dual citizenship in Palestine and, for instance, Jordan, Syria, Israel or, say, Canada).[219]

In the context of such an overall settlement, Israel should agree to accept the repatriation of 50,000 to 100,000 Palestinians. (For the sake of concision, this figure will hereafter be described as 75,000. But both the range and the middle number are offered here only as “ballpark figures,” an approximation of the general amount to be targeted, not as precise numbers of persons).[220] Both sides should avoid further rhetorical battles over semantic distinctions concerning how this part of the package is described. While Palestinians will wish that these 75,000 be identified as refugees who are exercising their right to return, Israel may prefer a designation such as “reunited families” or “reabsorbed refugees” or even “absorbed migrants.” Palestinians will try to insist that the agreement be accompanied by an apology for having caused the refugees to flee in 1948, while Israel will want to avoid employing any language that connotes blame.

Repatriation need not, in fact, be an acknowledgement of blame: According to the international law doctrine of “objective responsibility,” a breach of international law from which arises a right to compensation to remedy the breach — occurs through the result alone, provided that agency and causal connection or “attribution” can be established.[221] The “blame game” over who caused the refugees to flee in 1948 is probably unwinable, even in the face of newly revealed documents from historical archives. Nevertheless, Israelis cannot deny that they have been living as “custodians” for “absentee” landowners since 1948; indeed, the Israeli government office charged with administering former Palestinian property is called the Custodian of Absentee Property.[222] When the office was created in 1950 it had to be anticipated that eventually at least some of the absentees would come home.

 Why the Gesture is Necessary

From the Palestinian perspective, an Israeli gesture of limited repatriation is necessary because as part of the final peace agreement, Palestinians will be asked to make a trade-off of absolute return for limited statehood. That is, Palestinians will be receiving an independent state in less than the full amount of land they consider to be Palestine — and perhaps also a state whose sovereignty is restricted in one or more respects, such as in its degree of militarization. The trade-off will be scrutinized especially carefully by the millions of “diaspora Palestinians” — those living outside the West Bank and Gaza Strip, who, since the Oslo Accords in 1993, have suspiciously felt that Yasser Arafat and the PLO have been neglecting their needs and interests for the sake of de facto statehood.

Although Israel holds most of the cards when it comes to negotiating the final peace agreement, it does not necessarily hold them with regard to the refugee issue. According to Palestinian academic Salim Tamari:

Israel will not be in a position to demand that the Arab states “regularize” the status of refugees in their own countries and make them citizens if it refuses to do so itself... The more Israel is amenable to a certain degree of absorbing Palestinian refugees within Israeli territory, the more likely that the Arab countries will join in a framework of resettlement of refugees in their own countries.[223]

From the Israeli perspective, such a gesture is necessary to show good will to its neighbors and to encourage other states in the region to agree to absorb at least as many Palestinians as well. Israeli agreement to this rather small and symbolic target of 75,000 persons is essential to facilitate the final peace agreement, because, only when the Arab states see that Israel is at least partially recognizing Palestinian claims for return (regardless of the terminology employed), will they themselves be willing to grant citizenship to and permanently absorb the refugees they will themselves have to absorb. It will also facilitate mutual acceptance of peace if Israel accepts full Palestinian self-determination. In other words, Israel should make a pragmatic decision to exchange partial, symbolic return of Palestinians and the establishment of a Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza for the Palestinian and Arab state acceptance of less than full Palestinian return and less than the complete territory they originally sought.

Although there is currently much popular opposition in Israel to the idea that even a single Palestinian refugee would return to live within the Green Line, this sentiment can be overcome when it is presented as part of a reciprocal and regional framework for resolving the Palestinian refugee question and obtaining a full-scale peace. Israel’s decision to accept Palestinian refugees could be described, instead, as the same process of “absorption” that the Arab states would concomitantly be undertaking, rather than as the oft-feared acknowledgment of a Palestinian “right” to “return.” Israelis would do well to recognize their own advantage in such a compromise resolution and to express their commitment to truly being part of a regional absorption plan that will lead to greater regional stability.

 Why it is Merely a Gesture

True, 75,000 is not a very substantial figure. It constitutes barely 2.14 percent of the current number of registered Palestinian refugees, approximately 3.5 million, and only 1.21 percent of Israel’s current total population of 6.2 million, of which one million are Arab citizens of the state. [224] (Adding 75,000 to one million would only raise the Arab percentage of the total Israeli population from 16.13 percent to 17.34 percent, though over time that proportion would rise, as the birthrate among Israeli Muslims is higher than among Israeli Jews.)[225] Perhaps most tellingly, the figure has been criticized vehemently by both Israelis and Palestinians alike as, respectively, either 75,000 too high or almost 3.5 million too low.[226] But it is a figure that is “sellable” to Israelis, not due only to the negligible demographic impact, but also on historical grounds.

The United Nations Conciliation Commission, which was created by the UN General Assembly in December 1948 to try to end the Arab-Israeli war and resolve its conflicts, came closest — if only fleetingly — to reaching a settlement on the refugee question during its conference in Lausanne in 1949. The United States delegation strongly urged Israel to agree to repatriate from 200,000 to 300,000 Palestinian refugees, who, at that time, were estimated to number between 500,000 and 900,000.[227] After a series of Commission negotiation efforts, in August of that year, Israel reluctantly agreed to accept no more than 100,000 family reunification cases, screened to keep out security risks. Israel also insisted that the refugees return not to their original homes but to locations determined by Israel, where they would “not come into contact” with possible enemies of the Jewish state.

The “100,000 proposal” was in fact fiercely opposed within Israeli political and popular circles, elicited a lukewarm international reception, and was denounced by Arab delegations as a “less than a token ... propaganda scheme.”[228] Within official Israeli circles, the offer was heavily criticized, reflecting, in the opinion of one observer:

- “security fears of the reintroduction of a ‘fifth column’;

- fears that Israel would be forced beyond the 100,000 to allow the return of larger numbers;

- distaste for the apparent surrender to US pressure; and,

- a popular backlash against the return of any of the refugees."[229]

The "100.000 proposal" — which was really for admission of no more than 75,000 additional people, because at least 25,000 had already returned on their own by that time[230] — became snagged amid counterproposals concerning territorial compromises and frozen bank accounts, as well as growing Commission impatience with the parties' implacable negotiating styles. Soon thereafter, Israel withdrew its reluctant offer.

Given the small number of Jews living in Israel in 1949 (under 700,000), the return of 100,000 would have constituted a much greater relative percentage then than 75,000 would be to Israel's current Jewish population of 5.2 million.[231] Similarly, 100,000 was a greater percentage of the total Palestinian population of 1949 than 75,000 is of even the most liberal estimates of the current combined West Bank and Gaza populations of 3 million. Moreover, at least 75,000 Jewish settlers will most likely return from the West Bank to Israel proper when a final peace agreement is signed.[232] Therefore, an additional 75,000 Palestinian citizens will not unduly endanger Israel's demographic stability and, moreover, is less than the Israeli government conceded to, if only momentarily, at Lausanne.

 Who Might be Repatriated

Israel will naturally — and rightfully — require that each Palestinian who seeks to return to (or "be absorbed by") Israel satisfy certain conditions which are related to its legitimate security needs. Criteria to be agreed upon in the final peace treaty might include the following:

- The returnees must be able to prove original residence before 1948.

- They must have close family members (a term which would have to be defined) who have been citizens of Israel since 1948.

- They must agree, by written contract, to comply with the condition in General Assembly Resolution 194 to “live at peace with their (Israeli) neighbors.”

A population subgroup very likely to seek return, and which would be most likely to satisfy this third criterion, is the oldest living generation of Palestinians, the ones with personal memories of life before 1948. However, members of this subgroup are unlikely to be able to return on their own. without being accompanied by some younger relatives who can care for them. Palestinians may also object that, because this generation does not have long to live, that agreeing to their return is too easy a condition for Israel to satisfy.

Related questions to be resolved include: who should make the decisions on who shall return (a commission composed of Israelis alone? one of Palestinians alone? A joint commission?); where they should be able to live within Israel (in their original homes, if they still exist, regardless of whether Jewish Israelis or even Palestinian Israelis currently live there?); and whether they should be entitled to compensation for being displaced from their homes for over 50 years, even if they are among the few who will finally return.[233]

 How the Returnees Might be Assisted

Regardless of the actual number who return and who they will, in fact, be, the returnees cannot simply be deposited in front of their former homes and be expected to start new lives. They will need both individual and collective assistance from the Israeli government, from the Palestinian community (especially if they are to be eligible for Palestinian citizenship, in addition to Israeli citizenship), and from those states and institutions in the Arab world and international community who support the Middle East peace process.

Aside from the paying of compensation, how will the refugees be assisted in their transition to new homes and new legal and social statuses?[234] While Palestinians will look to UNRWA, Israelis distrust it due to a perception of its political bias. (Indeed, Shlomo Gazit has called for “an unequivocal announcement on the cessation of UNRWA’s activities” as part of a final status agreement.)[235]

Regardless of whether the UN Relief and Works Administration was originally intended to do more than simply provide just that, relief and works, UNRWA may not be the ideal agency to help Palestinian refugees with repatriation and making the transition to statehood.[236] Instead, Palestinians and Israelis might look for assistance to the widely experienced and respected United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), which, in the last decade, has directly overseen and often administered refugee repatriation movements in over twenty countries,[237] as well as regional resettlement and reconstruction efforts in various parts of Africa.[238] UNHCR has also assisted in the global resettlement of refugees in Australia, Canada, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Scandinavia, Switzerland, and the United States.[239] These efforts have involved more than just migration assistance: along with other UN agencies such as UNDP and peace-keeping forces, and myriad non-governmental organizations, UNHCR has been engaged in actual nation building, laying the foundations for new infrastructures of democracy.

The UNHCR’s statutory mandate is to provide “international protection” to refugees and to seek “permanent solutions” to their problems, including facilitating their repatriation or their assimilation within new national communities. Its work is humanitarian and social and, more to the point, “of an entirely non-political character.”[240] Its efforts to administer solutions to refugee crises have generated a series of guidelines to ensure the voluntary, orderly, and humanitarian character of the absorption programs. For instance, the Executive Committee of UNHCR has, among other requirements for repatriation, reaffirmed that: the repatriation of refugees should take place only at their freely expressed wish; the voluntary and individual character of repatriation of refugees and the need for it to be carried out under conditions of absolute safety, preferably to the place of residence of the refugee in his country of origin, should always be respected.[241]

The agency has, whenever possible, sought the adoption of written guarantees of non-recrimination against returnees. For instance, UNHCR's Executive Committee has recognized the importance of refugees being provided with the necessary information regarding conditions in their country of origin in order to facilitate their decision to repatriate; and recognized further that visits by individual refugees or refugee representatives to their country of origin to inform themselves of the situation there without such visits automatically involving loss of refugee status — could also be of assistance in this regard. The Executive Committee has also called upon governments of countries of origin to provide formal guarantees for the safety of returning refugees and stressed the importance of such guarantees being fully respected. Even if it is not politically feasible for UNHCR to completely replace UNRWA in the role of administering services to Palestinian refugees during the post-agreement transition process, it would be useful if key, experienced UNHCR personnel could be available on loan or as consultants.

Other international organizations, both governmental and nongovernmental. might also be enlisted in the transition process. For instance, the Refugee Project of the New York-based NGO Lawyers Committee for Human Rights has issued a set of ten General Principles Relating to the Promotion of Refugee Repatriation, along with useful commentaries on implementation of the principles. Some of the most relevant include:

- Repatriation should not be promoted unless all countries involved in the repatriation can ensure the protection of and respect for the fundamental human rights of the refugees.

- Repatriation should be promoted only if it can be accomplished in a manner that ensures safety and dignity upon return.

- The UNHCR should be involved in a meaningful way from the inception of the repatriation plan to its conclusion.

- Non-governmental organizations, in addition to the UNHCR, should have independent access to the refugees, both before and after their return.

- Any repatriation plan should establish that the conflict has abated and its attendant risks eliminated before promoting return. And

- Particular emphasis must be placed on the unique protection needs of returning women and children, who are a high-risk group within an already vulnerable population.[242]

In sum, there is clearly a surplus of available wisdom and experience (if not financial support) to assist the repatriating Palestinians and their Israeli neighbors in making the transition.

 Then, What?

What comes after minimal repatriation? Ideally, maximum reconciliation. While “reconciliation” (or more precisely, “Truth and Reconciliation”) has become the watchword of the transition to democracy in many formerly conflict-ridden countries — most notably in El Salvador and South Africa it has rarely been successful in the context of bi-national peace settlements.[243] Moreover, as has been demonstrated elsewhere, the Palestinian-Israeli conflict has been, in part, a conflict over mutually inconsistent historiographies.[244] For half a century the parties have been unable to agree on what caused the 1948 refugee flow; why should reconciliation of this issue be any easier to achieve in the future?

Nevertheless, it might be possible for Palestinians and Israelis to begin to focus on their common interests and histories, in order to lay the groundwork for their joint future as economic if not political partners in two respective states. One such commonality is the experience of having been refugees. The creation of a joint Israeli Palestinian Truth and Reconciliation Commission to air, record, and exchange testimony on the pain and repercussions of each people's own refugee experience — might be a pipe-dream worth undertaking.

At a minimum, newly repatriated Palestinians must be offered Israeli citizenship so that they can become a part of the larger Palestinian- Israeli community, which currently constitutes almost 20 percent of the overall Israeli population. They will continue to be a national minority (as will, presumably, a certain portion of Israeli settlers who choose to remain within the territory of the future State of Palestine) and will be entitled to the protection that international law accords national minorities. This should not be considered a major burden on Israel's part. The 1948

Declaration of Israel's Independence already provides for protection of minorities. It calls on "the Arab inhabitants of the State of Israel to preserve peace and participate in the upbuilding of the state on the basis of full and equal citizenship and due representation ... "[245]

More detailed guidelines on post-repatriation minority rights can be derived from international precedents such as the 1950 New Delhi Accord between India and Pakistan,[246] which regulated the migration of Hindus and Muslims between the two newly independent, partitioned states. Significantly, these events took place at virtually the identical time, and under similar circumstances — the withdrawal of Britain — as the plan for the partition of Palestine into two states. Although implementation of the Accord was troubled by disorder and violence, Article A is worth quoting almost in full:

The Governments of India and Pakistan solemnly agree that each shall ensure to the Minorities throughout its territory complete equality of citizenship, irrespective of religion, a full sense of security in respect of life, culture, property and personal honor, freedom of movement within each country and freedom of occupation, speech and worship, subject to law and morality. Members of the minorities shall have equal opportunity with members of the majority community to participate in the public life of the country, to hold political or other office and to serve in their country's civil and armed forces. Both Governments declare these rights to be fundamental and undertake to enforce them effectively. It is the policy of both Governments that the enjoyment of these democratic rights shall be ensured to all their nationals without distinction.[247]

Among contemporary precedents on this issue, foremost are the achievements of the Organization on Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE), which, both during and after the Cold War, forged a common bond of humanitarian principles among the disparate political and economic systems of Eastern and Western Europe (plus Canada and the US and, after the dissolution of the USSR, the Central Asian states). Though not legally binding, the OSCE's various agreements, which were reached by the rule of consensus, have realized better than any formal set of treaties the establishment of "standards for the behavior of governments, creation of a diplomatic process and encouragement of social movements that continue to this day."[248]

For instance, in the area of national minority rights — probably the most contentious issue, outside of security, to engage the East-West divide — the member states of the OSCE were able to agree on a series of general principles, including:

- Persons belonging to national minorities have the right to exercise fully and effectively their human rights and fundamental freedoms without any discrimination and in full equality before the law ... with the other citizens.

- The participating states will respect the right of persons belonging to national minorities to effective participation in public affairs, including participation in the affairs relating to the protection and promotion of the identity of such minorities.[249]

- (National minorities have the right) to establish and maintain their own educational, cultural and religious institutions, organizations or associations, which can seek voluntary financial and other contributions as well as public assistance, in conformity with national legislation; and

- to establish and maintain unimpeded contacts among themselves within their country as well as contacts across frontiers with citizens of other states with whom they share a common ethic or national origin, cultural heritage, or religious beliefs.[250]

This last right will be especially important for repatriated Palestinians, who will wish to visit with family members residing in the West Bank, Jordan, and other Arab countries. With regard to freedom of movement, the OSCE participating states have affirmed that “freer movement and contacts among their citizens are important in the context of the protection and promotion of human rights and fundamental freedoms.”[251] Included among their specific commitments in this regard are the good faith and expeditious processing of visa applications and customs controls; the reduction of visa application fees; and the simplification of administrative procedures. They also have paid deliberate attention to the protection and promotion of the rights of migrant workers.[252] In all OSCE documents on “the human dimension,” the problem of family reunification is given special emphasis. Each of these standards is equally important to Palestinians, many of whose families have been and may still remain split and scattered across many borders. Palestinians who repatriate to Israel should be allowed to visit and work in the State of Palestine and other Arab states, while those who remain outside of Israel should, similarly, be permitted to visit and even work inside.

 Conclusion

Reconciliation is not just a process of facing each other: it is about facing one’s own self-image, one’s own reality. Both Palestinians and Israelis need to “get real” and recognize that they can only find peace through compromise. While compromise over the return of refugees may be one of the most painful for Israelis to make, this essay has demonstrated that it can be done and that it must be done.

 Notes

Portions of this essay are adapted from the author’s book, Refugees Imo Citizens: Palestinians and the End of the Arab-Israeli Conflict (Council on Foreign Relations Press, 1997).

[203] The other multilateral topics are water, the environment, arms control, and economic development. See Donna E. Arzt, “Negotiating the Last Taboo: Palestinian Refugees,” The Jordan Times, July 12, 1995.

[204] The most recent opinion polls are, in fact, somewhat more optimistic than this anecdotal assessment indicates. While 42.7 percent of Israeli Jews reject the right of even one single Palestinian refugee to return, 20.8 percent support the return of a limited number of refugees (and suitable compensation to those who do not return) as the most feasible solution. “Limited number” was defined as “a few thousand” or fewer, however, Poll conducted by Ephraim Yaar and Tamar Herman of Tel Aviv University during the last week in October 1999, as reported in Amira Hass, “Counting Palestinians is a Matter of Perspective,” Ha’aretz, January 4, 2000. A coordinated survey among West Bank and Gaza residents found 81.1 percent believing that the solution to the refugee issue requires the right of return of all the refugees and compensation to those who do not return. Ibid.

[205] See Arzt, Refugees Into Citizens, pp. 64–7.

[206] Zayyad continues: .“or through compensation, or even through the implementation of any other option agreed upon through the negotiations on a comprehensive settlement to the Palestinian-Israeli conflict.” Ziad Abu Zayyad. “The Palestinian Right of Return: A Realistic Approach,” Palestine- Israel Journal of Politics, Economics and Culture 2 (Spring 1994): 74, 77.

[207] See Shlomo Gazit. “Refugee Solution,” The Jerusalem Post, November 9, 1999, p. 8; “Palestinian Refugees and the Palestinian-Israeli Negotiations: An Interview with Salim Tamari,”

Journal of Palestine Studies 29 (1) (Autumn 1999): 81, 86. Note that the subject of refugee compensation is not within the scope of this essay. See the author's recent comments in Donna E. Arzt, "The Right of Compensation: Basic Principles Under International Law," background paper prepared for the IDRC Workshop on Compensation for Palestinian Refugees (Ottawa, July 14–15, 1999).

[208] Shlomo Gazit and other Israeli commentators have stated that only a permanent peace in which Palestinians relinquish future demands for land or other concessions can be acceptable. See Gazit, "Refugee Solution."

[209] The ten others are borders, Jerusalem, settlements, security arrangements, military sites, Israelis in the West Bank and Gaza, foreign relations of the Palestinians, archaeological finds, water rights, and ownership of water and sewer networks. See Americans for Peace Now, Middle East Peace Report, Issue 19(November 15, 1999), citing Ha'aretz and Associated Press. November 15, 1999.

[210] Shibley Telhami, "Real Issue, Israeli, Palestinian Nationalism," Los Angeles Times, October 25, 1999.

[211] Gideon Alon. "Barak to MKs: No Return of Refugees within Green Line," Ha'aretz, November 30. 1999. The same day, some Palestinian activists stated that refugees are not interested in a Palestinian state, if its price would be surrender of the right to return to their original homes. "No Final Status Agreement with Israel Without Implementation of the Refugees[1] Right of Return," BADIL Resource Center, FOFOGN ET Digest. November 28 to November 29, 1999 (e-mail listserve).

[212] Quoted by Ben Lynlield, "Final Status Talks Open Without Signs of Flexibility," The Jerusalem Post. November 9, 1999.

[213] Gazit, "Refugee Solution."

[214] Quoted by Ben Lynfield and David Zev Harris, “MK Katz: Israel Partially Responsible for Palestinian Refugee Problem,” The Jerusalem Post. November 22, 1999.

[215] Ibid.

[216] See Ze’ev Schiff, “The IDF’s New Take on the Refugee Problem,” Ha’aretz, November 5, 1999.

[217] See “Counting Palestinians is a Matter of Perspective,” Haaretz, January 4, 2000.

[218] If King Hussein of Jordan were still alive, he might word the message more eloquently. As he told the Palestinians and the Israelis in October 1991, at the start of the Madrid Process, they each needed “the courage to face reality ... to bury senseless illusions.” See Laura Zittrain Eisenberg and Neil Caplan, Negotiating Arab-Israeli Peace: Patterns, Problems, Possibilities (Indiana University Press, 1998), pp. 78–9.

[219] See Refugees into Citizens, pp. 83–100, for more details on the author’s proposed solution. Admittedly, Arab states are not currently in the practice of recognizing dual citizenship with other Arab states.

[220] This figure is similar to the number of Palestinians that Lebanon should be expected to absorb, within the context of a regional peace; it is also similar to the number of Jewish settlers who might, for ideological reasons, seek to remain in the West Bank after it becomes part of the Palestinian state. Ibid, pp. 89, 98–9.

[221] See Arzt, “Compensation for Palestinian Refugees,” p. 7, n. 12, citing Ian Brownlie, Principles of Public International Law

(2nd edn., 1973), pp. 423–8. See Donna E. Arzt and Karen Zughaib, “Return to the Negotiated Lands: The Likelihood and Legality of a Population Transfer between Israel and a Future Palestinian State,” New York University Journal of International Law and Politics 24 (1992): 1399, 1423–5; Eyal Benvenisti and Eyal Zamir, “Private Claims to Property Rights in the Future Israeli- Palestinian Settlement,” American Journal of International Law 89 (April 1995): 295, 323–4; and Don Peretz, “Early State Policy Toward the Arab Population, 1948–1955,” in Laurence J. Silberstein (ed.), New Perspectives on Israeli History: The Early Years of the State (New York University Press, 1991), pp. 82, 95.

[222] “An Interview with Salim Tamari,” p. 89.

[223] The most recent demographic data for both the Jewish and Palestinian populations of Israel are discussed in Peter Hirschberg, “Population Overload, “ The Jerusalem Report. January 3, 2000, p. 16. See also Isabel Kershner, “People Power,” The Jerusalem Report. January 3, 2000, p. 22. For the current number of registered Palestinian refugees, see UNRWA General Information Sheet (January, 2000). (I have rounded off UNRWA’s numbers, [224] as UNRWA itself admits that they are mere estimates. The total number of Palestinians, as opposed to those registered as refugees with UNRWA, may be as much as double, or 7 million.) See also “Counting Palestinians is a Matter of Perspective,” Haaretz, January 4, 2000.

[225] The average Muslim woman in Israel currently has 4.8 children compared to the average Jewish woman’s 2.7. Kershner, “People Power.” The cited data did not report figures for average Christian women, but the majority of Arab Israelis are Muslim, not Christian.

[226] After my 1997 book. Refugees into Citizens, first proposed the “target figure” of 75,000 refugees to return to Israel — as part of a regional balance which would, by the year 2005, include doubling the Palestinian population in the West Bank and requiring Lebanon, for instance, to grant full citizenship rights to a comparable 75,000 Palestinians, I was often labeled a “terrorist” by Jews, including members of my own synagogue, and, I’ve been informed, had my photo mounted on dart boards in Palestinian refugee camps (or worse).

Even in scholarly settings, commentators conveniently ignored the carefully worded caveats in my book to the effect that my “target numbers, timetables, priority rankings, and other suggested guidelines” were not a formal blueprint, but were intended only to “help spark the refugee discussions in the final status talks,” so that “participants in the negotiations can borrow some parts, reject other parts, improve on those for which future fact-finding may shed more light, and be prompted to generate other possible solutions.” See Refugees into Citizens, pp. 7, 64–67, 83, 87–90. Instead, even the academics acted as if I had demanded outright quotas (and, as quotas go, one side’s ceiling is another side’s floor).

[227] See Refugees into Citizens, pp. 13–14, on the “magic number” debate over how many Palestinians actually fled.

[228] See David P. Forsythe, United Nations Peacemaking: The Conciliation Commission for Palestine (Johns Hopkins University Press, 1972), pp. 48–63; Mark Tessier, A History of the Israel-Palestinian Conflict (Indiana University Press, 1994), pp. 313–14; and Neil Caplan, The Lausanne Conference 1949: A Case Study in Middle East Peacemaking (Tel Aviv University, 1993), pp. 92–5.

[229] Caplan, The Lausanne Conference, p. 93.

[230] Benny Morris cites then-Foreign Minister Moshe Sharett as explaining that the offer would really only amount to 65,000, as approximately 35,000 of the 1948 refugees had already found their way back over the border. Benny Morris, The Birth of the Palestinian Refugee Problem (Cambridge University Press, 1987), pp. 280–3; Benny Morris, 1948 and After: Israel and the Palestinians (Oxford University Press, 1994), pp. 26–7. See also Caplan, The Lausannne Conference, p. 93.

[231] In January 1949, Israel's total Jewish population was estimated at 650,000. Martin Gilbert, Atlas of the Arab-Israeli Conflict (Oxford University Press, 1993), p. 46.

[232] Of the approximately 175,000 Jewish settlers living in the West Bank and Gaza, only about 20 to 25 percent are considered "ideologically motivated" by the concept of a Greater Israel and therefore unlikely to willingly depart. That still leaves over 100,000 who can be persuaded to return to Israel, with the right mix of economic incentives. That would provide a number which is more than adequate, from the perspective of those who may need this kind of persuasion, to "offset" the addition of 75,000 Palestinians (although Jewish settlers are already included in the current population figures cited above). Israel will probably want to encourage the returning settlers to move to the Galilee, where the Arab population currently outnumbers Jews.

[233] Questions concerning compensation of the refugees are beyond the scope of this essay. See Terry Rempel, "The Ottawa Process: Workshop on Compensation and Palestinian Refugees, " Journal of Palestine Studies 29 (1) (Autumn 1999): 36.

[234] See Elia Zureik, "The Trek Back Home: Palestinians Returning Home and their Problems of Absorption/' in Are Hovdenak, Jon Pedersen, Dag Tuastad and Elia Zureik (eds.), Constructing Order: Palestinian Adaptations to Refugee Life^WQ, 1997).

[235] Gazit, "Refugee Solution."

[236] I am not advocating the abrupt shutdown of UNRWA, just the slow phaseout in which more and more of the long-term work of administering services is transferred to the Palestinian Authority, while the temporary job of helping with repatriation and resettlement is handled by UNHCR specialists.

[237] Including Afghanistan, Angola, Bosnia, Burundi, Croatia, Cambodia, Ethiopia/Eritrea, Guatemala, Laos, Liberia, Mozambique, Namibia, Rwanda, Serbia, Sierra Leone, Somalia, South Africa, Sudan, Western Sahara, Zaire, Zimbabwe and elsewhere. See “Going Home,” Refugees, No. 88 (January, 1992), pp. 6–11; Jean-Victor Nkolo, “Journey’s End,” Refugees, No. 94 (December, 1993), pp. 34–5; “The Preferred Solution,” Refugees, No. 96 (II — 1994), p. 24; John Battersby, “UN, Mozambique, Begin Massive Repatriation,” Christian Science Monitor (August 11, 1993), p. 3; John Battersby, “Going Home in Southern Africa,” Christian Science Monitor (March 11, 1994), p. 6; Sylvie Girard, “Afghanistan: The Will But Not the Means,” Refugees, 90 (July 1992): 20–3.

[238] See T. F. Betts, “Evolution and Promotion of the Integrated Rural Development Approach to Refugee Policy in Africa,” Africa Today 31 (1984): 7–24; Art Hansen, “Managing Refugees: Zambia’s Response to Angolan Refugees, 1966–1977,” Disasters III (1979): 375–80. “As a general rule, the more racial, linguistic, religious or cultural characteristics incoming refugees have in common with the native population, the easier integration will be ... The generally celebrated receptivity of African countries to refugees from neighboring countries has been commonly credited to hospitality within related groups of people who straddle borders.” Gil Loescher, Beyond Charity: International Cooperation and the Global Refugee Crisis (Oxford University Press, 1993), p. 25. Examples of successful integration include Afghans in Pakistan and Iran, Bulgarian Turks in Turkey, Burmese Muslims in Bangladesh, Ethiopians in the Sudan, Ogadeni Ethiopians in Somalia, Southern Sudanese in Uganda, and Mozambicans in Malawi. Ibid.

[239] Rupert Colville, “Resettlement: Still Vital After All These Years,” Refugees 94 (December, 1993): 4–8; “Resettlement Criteria in a Changing World,” Refugees, 94 (December, 1993): 18–21; United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, The State of the World’s Refugees, 1993: The Challenge of Protection (United Nations, 1993), pp. 172–5.

[240] Statute of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, para. I and 2, Annex to General Assembly Resolution 428(V) of December 14. 1950.

[241] UNHCR Executive Committee, “Voluntary Repatriation,” No. 40 (XXXVI) — 1985, para. b.

[242] Lawyers Committee for Human Rights, Refugee Project. ‘ General Principles Relating to the Promotion of Refugee Repatriation” (New York, May 1992). The guidelines, with commentary, also appear in Arthur C. Helton. “Repatriation or Refoulement.” Refugees 90 (September 1992): 38–40.

[243] See Donna E. Arzt. “Bridge Over Troubled Water: Law and the Emergence of New Democracies,” Syracuse Journal of International Law and Commerce 22 (Spring 1996): 81; Neil J. Kritz (ed.), Transitional Justice: How Emerging Democracies Reckon with Former Regimes, 3 vols. (United States Institute of Peace Press, 1995).

[244] See Refugees into Citizens, pp. 13–29.

[245] State of Israel, Declaration of Independence, May 14, 1948.

[246] Agreement Between Pakistan and India, April 8, 1950, 131 UNTS 3. See Wayne A. Wilcox, Pakistan: The Consolidation of a Nation (Columbia University Press, 1963), p. 54; Mohammad Waseem, Politics and the State in Pakistan (Progressive Publishers, 1989), pp. 111–16.

[247] 131 UNTS at 4. Reprinted in Patrick Thornberry, International Law and the Rights of Minorities (Clarendon Press, 1991), p. 403. See also article 7 of the State Treaty of May 15, 1955 for the Re-establishment of an Independent and Democratic Austria, reprinted in ibid., p. 404.

[248] Dennis DeConcini and Steny Hoyer, Letter of Transmittal (February 24, 1992), in The Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe: An Overview of the CSCE Process, Recent Meetings and Institutional Development (Washington, Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe. February 1992), p. iii. See also the symposium issue on national minorities in the CSCE, International Journal on Group Rights 2(1) (1994). A newer European agreement on national minorities, which may eventually prove as influential as that of the CSCE, is the Council of Europe's Framework Convention for the Protection of National Minorities, adopted at Strasbourg, November 8, 1994, reprinted, along with an explanatory report and commentary, in International Human Rights Reports 2(1) (January 1995): 217–40.

[249] Document of the Copenhagen Meeting of the Conference on the Human Dimension of the CSCE (June 29, 1990), 29 International Legal Materials 1305 (1990), Principles 31, 32 and 35.

[250] Ibid., Principles 32.2 and 32.4.

[251] Copenhagan Document, Principle 19.

[252] Ibid., Principles 19.1 to 19.3 and 22 to 22.4.

 11. From Refugees to Citizens: A Regional Proposal

[[Joseph Ginat and Dale F. Eickelman]]

Words have the power to destroy or heal. When words are both true and kind, they can change the world. — Buddhist proverb

The Palestinian refugee problem is a major issue in the Palestinian public consciousness, but only a marginal issue for the Israeli Jewish public as it comes to terms with final status negotiations.[253] Likewise, a recent "guide" to final status negotiations acknowledges that the fate of Palestinian refugees remains a major problem, but devotes a mere two pages to a substantive discussion of the issue.[254] Although the refugee problem is now over half a century old, only in the last five years have various multilateral working groups that include Israeli and Palestinian participants begun to explore pragmatic approaches to addressing the Palestinian refugee issue.[255] In contrast, over 60 recent proposals address the status of Jerusalem.[256]

The proposal outlined in this essay begins from "below," stressing the importance of involving refugees themselves or their representatives in the implementation of decisions affecting their status. It builds on the available evidence, however imperfect, concerning how Palestinian refugees themselves, especially those living in UNRWA-administered camps, have made pragmatic choices and actions concerning residence, housing, and employment. This proposal focuses on the form an expanded participation might take in the continuing conditions of a weak economy and authoritarian rule.[257] Our principal discussion concerns how such "material" interests as adequate housing, residential planning, and livelihood are inextricably linked to issues of identity, community, and nation. We also argue for a regional approach to resolving the issue of Palestinian refugees that includes the granting of citizenship or dual nationality in the country of residence.[258]

 The View From the Refugee Camps

As is well known, the refugee camps have become increasingly crowded with the passage of time. Gaza, for example, holds the world record in birth rates with an average of 9.8 births per woman.[259] Houses in camps have gradually expanded, leaving passageways barely wide enough to permit the passage of a single person. In the grim humor of the refugee camps, people sometimes say, “Even a coffin can’t get through here. If you die in your own home, it’s hard to get you to the cemetery.”[260] The complex and narrow streets also offer, however, protection from outsiders so that it is difficult for police unfamiliar with the camp or other outsiders to navigate. In some cases one has to walk sideways to negotiate narrow spots.

In the 1960s and 1970s, outsiders asked camp inhabitants why they remained in the camps, even when permanent settlements in nearby towns or lodging closer to their places of employment was available. The answer was that those who remained in the camps were more likely to benefit from an eventual settlement, or, in some cases, they expressed the hope that Israel would be obliged to surrender some of its territory.[261]

Some Israelis, in contrast, compare the Arab experience from 1948 to 1967 with the relatively rapid settlement and absorption of Jewish refugees into Israel beginning in 1948. Israel’s internal resources were initially meager, but the combination of external resources, including reparation payments, contributions by Jewish communities elsewhere, and massive international financial support, enabled Israel to absorb immigrants from the Middle East and Europe. The policies and politics of these Israeli patterns of absorption changed over the last half-century, but in the early stages the patterns partially resembled the situation of Arab refugees. Immigrants were first placed in camps, usually made up of tents. These tents were later replaced by corrugated metal shacks, and subsequently wooden ones. The Jewish camps were subsequently dismantled in a coordinated national effort, with the refugees resettled in newly-planned “development” towns as well as in other available housing, including Arab homes “abandoned” due to the 1948 war or from which the Arab inhabitants were evicted. With the exception of those in Jordan, the economic and juridical status of most Palestinian refugees remained precarious.[262]

The majority of Palestinian refugees from the 1948–9 war became stateless. Zureik explains:

<quote>

In order to highlight the plight of the refugees and to put pressure on Israel to admit responsibility for them. Arab countries (except Jordan) have denied citizenship rights to the Palestinians in their midst; in so doing, they claimed they were serving the interests of the Palestinians and supporting their right of return.[263]

</quote>

For the Palestinian leadership and for many other Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza, the centrality of the refugee issue has shifted significantly over time. Until 1967, the refugees were the main issue in the Israeli-Arab conflict, but later the creation of a Palestinian state took precedence.[264] Within the Lebanese refugee camps, Rosemary Sayigh noted a similar shift, but for different reasons: “A strongly defined Palestinian identity did not emerge until 1968, two decades after expulsion ... Palestinians challenged their designation insisting that they were not ’refugees,’ but ’freedom fighters.’”[265] The issue of the refugees is re-emerging as a principal component of a permanent peace settlement.

The record for the Palestinian leadership’s consultation with the refugees themselves remains uneven, when the issue concerns the internal governance of the camps, as documented by Bucaille for Gaza,[266] or for the multilateral discussion of refugee issues in the discussions leading to Oslo. Some observers, including Shlomo Gazit, argued that representatives from the camps in Lebanon. Syria, and Jordan should also have been included in discussions concerning the status of refugees. Gazit also was the first to argue that any resolution of the refugee issue would oblige Israel to participate in direct talks with the Palestine Liberation Organization, which Israel did not yet recognize.[267]

Gazit also recognized the significance of obtaining popular Israeli and Palestinian support for high-level initiatives. After the Oslo agreement in 1993, many residents of the Lebanese refugee camps switched their allegiance from the PLO to a rival Palestinian organization opposing the peace-talks.[268] With rising levels of education and expectations, decisionmaking about refugees from this point onward, no matter how difficult, should engage representatives from the camps themselves.

 “Refugees” Defined

The issue of who is a Palestinian refugee is highly contested, for the language used directly raises questions of responsibility, obligation, entitlement, and numbers.[269] Estimates of the numbers of refugees created in 1948–9 vary considerably, as do estimates of the aggregate contemporary Palestinian refugee and non-refugee population. Alpher and Shikaki note that “Palestinians cite the UNRWA figure of 3,469,109 refugees (January 1998) as the minimum number, including 1,308,438 in the territories (548,874 in the West Bank and 759,564 in Gaza); some Palestinian sources argue that the total figure is as high as 4,900,000.”[270] They distinguish between the Palestinian refugee population, “persons who were displaced from their homes in Palestine in 1948 and subsequently registered as refugees with UNRWA, and their descendants,” a figure larger than those of camp residents.[271] Gazit suggests that the “practical refugee population”

(as of 1992) was 1.9 million, “or a little more than one-third of the total Palestinian population.”[272]

 The Social Organization of Camp Life

Palestinian refugees living in UNRWA camps have been afforded few opportunities to express views on their status. At a literal “on the ground’ level, however, their directly and indirectly expressed preferences regarding housing and residence patterns suggest issues that must be taken into consideration in any settlement that will sustain widespread acquiescence or even support.

Both Israeli and Palestinian anthropologists and other scholars offer insight on the evolution of urban patterns in the camps over the past half century.[273] Even when some camp residents had the opportunity to move out, and non-residents moved into the camps, most refugees within the camps chose to settle in close proximity to people from their hometowns and villages. Marriage and residence patterns both indicate sustained efforts to preserve ties with kinspeople and neighbors sharing common places of origin.[274] The “imagined communities” of villages that have in many cases disappeared half a century ago remain pervasive and enduring anchors in contemporary social life.[275]

The camps have become permanent residences for the refugees living in them. They have been home to the refugees for nearly half a century. The ties of kin, community, and livelihood formed over this time would be difficult to replace were the communities broken up and their residents dispersed. Some of the families in the camps are third-generation offspring of the original 1948 refugees. The camps, whether in Gaza, the West Bank, or Lebanon, are the only home known to many of the descendants of the original refugees.

Private construction by refugees in the camps offers some guidance on preferred residential choices. In the Jenin and other refugee camps, some residents bought housing units from neighbors who had left the camp. Some purchasers expanded their own units by adding an extension to their existing home; others tore down their original house and built a larger one. When asked why they did not move to the city of Jenin or to one of the larger villages in the area, the refugees said that their social and economic relationships were all with people in the camp or nearby villages. Their choice of permanent residence was therefore near the refugee camp.

Ginat asked a refugee from the Qalandiyya camp (north of Jerusalem), and another from ‘Arub (north of Hebron) why they did not take their families with them to live nearer their places of work in the West Bank. Their answers were almost identical: the cost of living is less in the camps and their family ties are in the vicinity. Among other factors, married daughters in Palestinian society remain in close contact with their families of origin, who retain major responsibility for them.[276]

Such attitudes are not, however, set in stone. In field research conducted in the 1970s and 1980s, Ginat noted that some of the older camp inhabitants, mostly first-generation refugees, opposed any changes to camp lite. They refused to build outside the camp. They claimed that they would return to their villages in present-day Israel. The same answer was given in all the camps, but applies only to an older cohort. In some camps, Ginat asked older refugees whether they would be willing to return to the area merely near their original village, since the original villages have become Jewish. They answered unequivocally that they would return only to their original houses in Masamiyya, Qastina, or Mijdal (now Ashkelon). Their sons, grandchildren, and many of their own generation who have become refugees like them say that this nostalgic aspiration is no longer practicable. A 1995 poll conducted by the Jerusalem Media and Communication Center, for example, found that the youngest cohort (aged 15 to 18) was more opposed than older residents to any agreement that relinquished claims to lands held in 1948.[277] On the basis of this poll and others, Zureik states that Ginat's conclusion — younger refugees are more amenable than older ones to relinquishing claims to lands held in 1948 — is incorrect.[278] Part of the difference between Ginat's findings and those of the Jerusalem Media and Communication Center may be due to the gap of a decade or more between the two inquiries.

 Refugee Resettlement in Gaza Under Israeli Rule

Israel attempted several resettlements of refugees in Gaza from the 1970s until its 1994 withdrawal. Although inspired in part by security considerations, these efforts point to approaches for future planners to consider. One attempt to resettle refugees was carried out in the Rafah camp. Each family that agreed to resettle received a 200 square meter plot of land, on which was built a house unit of specified measurement and Israeli design. The cost of these houses, however, was high. When refugees were allowed to participate in the construction of the houses themselves, they rapidly deviated from Israeli intentions and made more intensive use of the allotted plots. Israeli building permits allowed use of 60 percent of the plot; the refugees, however, used more than 80 percent of the allotted space for construction.

At the beginning of the 1980s, multistoried apartment buildings were introduced, a change dictated by dwindling land resources. Local contractors — not necessarily refugees — received a plot of land on the condition that they erect upon it a four-storied building comprising eight apartments.

In order to receive the keys to the new apartment, the refugee household had first to give up its existing house in the camp, which was then torn down. The intention was to use the land thus cleared for the construction of additional new housing units, but was also related to Israeli security concerns during the Intifada.

The principal innovation of the 1990s structures was that the contractor built only the frame of the building, including all the outer walls and finish windows, doors, electrical sockets, and plumbing. The inner space of the apartments was left undivided, so that each family could adapt the interior to its preferences.

Many camp inhabitants are skilled construction workers — including carpenters, masons, and plumbers. The ability to apply their crafts to their own housing when they were prevented from working outside of Gaza became an irresistible incentive. In the years of the Intifada, the camps were often placed under closure, barring inhabitants from wage labor in Israel. The do-it-yourself approach in the early 1990s brought a 50 percent reduction in the price of apartments, in comparison to those built entirely by contractors. Moreover, much of the infrastructure was constructed and funded by the Israeli authorities.

The hesitant starts of these various housing schemes were in part due to political vicissitudes as well as resistance to the top-down planning by Israeli authorities. Throughout the world, from public housing in St. Louis, Chicago, to the suburbs of Paris, and to the 1960s “new” towns on Morocco’s western plains, top-down housing schemes built without significant input from residents has encountered obstruction and resistance. Habitat for Humanity, among other ongoing concerns, demonstrates the value of “sweat equity” in implementing housing schemes. The same can be said for allowing at least some residential choice in design.

 An Approach to Resettlement

The existing camps should be turned into permanent towns, as they have, in any case, been incrementally urbanized over the past few decades and function as towns.[279] Camps adjacent or close to towns should be annexed to the local municipalities. The camps located away from towns should be turned into permanent settlements and given an independent municipal status. Thus, the Dheisha camp would be incorporated into the Bethlehem municipality, while Jalazon, on the outskirts of Ramallah, should be annexed to it. The al-Shatti camp, likewise, should be assimilated into the town of Gaza. Camps such as Qalandiya, ‘Arub or Fuwar (south of Hebron) should be given the status of independent municipalities. This model should also be applied in neighboring states with refugee settlements.

This approach, as sociologist Ishaq Qutb concurs, takes into account the de facto evolution of the camps into municipalities or parts of them:

Relative autonomy should be given to the camp cities, which would allow the formation of a power structure, a local representative leadership and a system for the wider participation of the citizenry ... long-range urban development as well as short-term planning should be geared toward the comprehensive development and change in both the physical and cultural environments.[280]

Resettlement also necessarily involves relocation for some Palestinian refugees. The experience of refugees has varied significantly among the countries in which they have settled, with Lebanon most resistant to their assimilation and Jordan the most accommodating.[281] Israel has remained the most intransigent, although a trickle of refugees has been allowed to return to Israel under a family reunification program and the open borders with Jordan have generated a perceptible amount of clandestine labor immigration. The return of at least some Palestinian refugees from Syria, Lebanon, and Jordan to the West Bank and Gaza is also likely. As one Palestinian intellectual has commented, once the Palestinians have a state, it is reasonable to reinterpret the “right of return” to signify a return to Palestine.[282] Widespread public acceptance, or at least acquiescence, of such a major ideological shift is not unthinkable, any more than the transition of the PLO leadership over the past decade to close daily economic and security cooperation with Israeli authorities on a range of issues difficult to conceive a decade earlier.[283] Such a shift in interpretation of the right of return should also be accompanied by Israel’s acceptance of at least a token number of former Arab residents. As Arzt argues, the refugee problem necessitates a regional agreement that should also allow refugees to remain in their current countries of residence with rights of citizenship or of dual citizenship.[284] Likewise, some Jewish settlements in the West Bank and Gaza might be dismantled or made available to Palestinian refugees.

Some aspects of the Israeli experience in Gaza arc useful for envisioning the process of turning the camps into de facto as well as de jure permanent residences. First, residents themselves should be involved in the decisionmaking process. Space constraints, however, require a high degree of collective decision-making, necessitating multi-storied apartment buildings as a likely form of residence. However, as prior experience in Gaza indicates, such an approach can allow considerable latitude in design within the space allocated to each family or family group.

Construction work should start at the camp periphery and work inwards, so that the inhabitants of the next area designed for development would be the first to inhabit the new apartments. Such housing need not always involve related families in this respect there may be changing attitudes toward residence patterns, at least among some refugees. Although refugees often prefer to settle near households related by village or origin or kinship ties, other settlement patterns may also be possible. Recent experience in construction in Tirah, an Arab rural settlement in Israel’s Central Triangle region, shows the success of housing estates comprising three- to four-storied apartment buildings in which many residents are not related to each other.

For economy of scale, construction should include a well-prepared infrastructure sewers, potable water, access roads, electricity, and telephones. Each neighborhood should be built around a nucleus consisting of public institutions such as schools, medical clinics, and social clubs. Employment opportunities should also be pre-planned, in order to anchor residents in their locality.

In any discussion of a post-settlement Middle East, the economic development of the former refugee camps should be given precedence in any regional development plans. In referring to Israeli involvement in the resettlement of Palestinian refugees, Gazit notes the Israeli experience in absorbing new' immigrants of various educational and income levels.[285] One might also consider the negative aspects to Israeli resettlement and "absorption" of Jews of Middle Eastern origin, especially those from North Africa and Yemen, in the 1950s and 1960s. Direct Israeli involvement in resettlement schemes may appear unrealistic in present circumstances, but such involvement could have the benefit of confidence building on both sides.

Arzt, Alpher and Skikaki, and others stress that any permanent settlement of Palestinian refugees also involves granting them citizenship in the countries where they are settled.[286] As Arzt points out, the granting of citizenship, including dual citizenship, is a major challenge because it implies relinquishing the "right of return" and poses other challenges for host countries. This concern is particularly acute in Lebanon. As Salem indicates, any naturalization of Palestinian refugees in Lebanon will affect its delicate sectarian balance, a concern not alien to Israeli sensibilities.[287] A change in Lebanese attitudes toward granting citizenship to Palestinian refugees is unlikely; the eighteen members of the Council on Christian- Muslim Dialogue are unanimous in their rejection of this possibility.[288] As Heller and Nusseibah stated nearly a decade ago, some Palestinian intellectuals at the time accepted the idea of refugees receiving citizenship in their host countries.[289] The process is most advanced in Jordan, which accorded full citizenship to many refugees in spite of its limited resources and the fact that Palestinians of refugee origin constitute over half the population.

A regional agreement to settle Palestinian refugees would involve Israel's offering "some sort of moral compensation"[290] for giving up the "right of return." Gazit, for one, suggests ways in which such a statement might be formulated without suggesting "Israeli responsibility for the Palestinian predicament." The Weatherhead Center report also reiterates the suggestion that both sides acknowledge that Israel had a "historic role" in creating the refugee problem, and also that the massive exercise of the right of return is unrealizable.[291]

Such language has already been incorporated into formal documents. For example. Article 8 of the Israeli-Jordanian peace agreement signed on October 26, 1994 acknowledges "the massive human problems caused to both parties by the conflict in the Middle East, as well as the contribution made by them toward the alleviation of human suffering," and commits both parties to "alleviate those problems arising on a bilateral level."[292] The wording of the agreement suggests a way in which the strongly conflicting Israeli and Palestinian-Arab national "narratives"[293] about the 1948 war can be overcome in order to generate new ideas for resolving the status of the Palestinian refugees.

In addition. Israel, most likely with international support, would pay some form of compensation to the refugees. The states of the region, again with external support, would also undertake a major program of economic development. The UNRWA administrative apparatus would be abolished and the administration of the refugee camps and separate entities would also come to an end.

To implement such a solution, a regional fund should be established under international auspices, and the absorbing countries should be allotted resources through a regional bank, an idea supported by the United States. The first stage would be planning, followed by investment in infrastructure, and finally the actual resettlement of refugees, including in some cases their relocation. Only at this third and final stage would individuals receive compensation, probably around $10,000–520,000 per household, as suggested by various informal working groups.

A “new” Middle East with a durable Israeli-Arab peace would create many new opportunities for employment and development. The process would no doubt involve major economic and social readjustment, but the overall effect would be a significant advance over the increasingly untenable status quo of the last fifty years.

[253] See the results of public opinion polls reported by Yuchtman-Ya’ar and Tamai- Hermann (chapter 25, this volume), and Khalil Shikaki, “Palestinian Public- Opinion about the Peace Process, 1993–1999.” Information BRIEF Number II. October 26, 1999, Washington, D.C.: Center for Policy Analysis on Palestine (available at [[http://www.palestinecenter.org] [www.palestinecenter.org]]).

[254] Aharon Kleiman, Compromising Palestine: A Guide to Final Status Negotiations (New York: Columbia University Press, 2000), esp. pp. 129–30.

[255] Donna E. Arzt, Refugees into Citizens: Palestinians and the End of the Arab-Israeli Conflict (New York: Council on Foreign Relations. 1997), pp. 182–99, for a concise bibliographic essay on the Palestinian refugee question. See also Elia Zureik, Palestinian Refugees and the Peace Process (Beirut: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1996), pp. 75–84, available at: [[http://www.ipsjps.org/html/zureik.htm][http://www.ipsjps.org/html/zureik.htm]]. Key recent discussions include Joseph Alpher and Khalil Shikaki, The Palestinian Refugee Problem and the Right of Return, Working Paper Series, 98 (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University, Weatherhead Center for International Affairs, May 1998); Shlomo Gazit, The Problem of the Palestinian Refugees (Tel Aviv: Jaffe Center for Strategic Research, Tel Aviv University, 1994); General Principles for the Final Israeli-Palestinian Agreement, Working Group on International Conflict Analysis and Resolution, PICAR Working Paper (Cambridge, MA: Weatherhead Center for International Affairs, Harvard University, September 1998); and Shibley Telhami, “Lines Already Drawn in the Mideast Sand,” Los Angeles Times, October 27, 1999.

[256] Arzt, Refugees into Citizens, p. 5.

[257] See Laetitia Bucaille, Gaza: La violence de la paix [Gaza: The Violence of Peace] (Paris: Presses de Sciences, 1998). This study remains the only full- length political ethnography of political and economic life in post-autonomy Gaza.

[258] See Arzt, Refugees into Citizens', Telhami, "Lines Already Drawn"; and Zureik, Palestinian Refugees, pp. 72–3.

[259] See Bucaille, Gaza, p. 99.

[260] Ibid., p. 98.

[261] Joseph Ginat. A Permanent Settlement Plan for the Palestinian Refugees (Haifa: University of Haifa, 1994). Also available at: [[gopher://gopher-igcc.ucsd.edu][gopher://gopher-igcc.ucsd.edu]] 9

[262] Arzt, Refugees into Citizens, pp. 34–5; and Laurie Brand, Palestinians in the Arab World (New York: Columbia University Press, 1988), p. 7.

[263] Zureik, Palestinian Refugees, p. 18.

[264] Emanuel Marx, "Changes in Arab Refugee Camps," Jerusalem Quarterly 8 (Summer 1978): 141–52.

[265] Rosemary Sayigh, “Palestinian Identity Among Camp Residents,” Journal of Palestine Studies 6 (3): 3–22.

[266] Bucaille, Gaza, pp. 53–93.

[267] Gazit, a former chief of intelligence for the Israeli Defense Forces, advocated this approach in a speech to the National Council for Peace and Security, an association of army reserve officers, on April 12, 1994.

[268] Ginat, Permanent Settlement Plan, intimates that the PLO leadership was opposed to including Palestinians in Lebanese camps to their delegation. Zureik, Palestinian Refugees, p. 52, rejects this inference, claiming that objections to including them came from “Israel and the refugees themselves.” For a journalist’s account of how news of the Oslo Accords was received in Lebanese refugee camps, see Peter Waldman, “Forgotten Families,” Wall Street Journal, January 17, 1994.

[269] See Alpher and Shikaki, Palestinian Refugee Problem, pp. 3 4; Arzt, Refugees into Citizens, pp. 69–71; Gazit, Problem of the Palestinian Refugees, pp. 2–3; and Zureik, Palestinian Refugees, pp. 6–8.

[270] Alpher and Shikaki, Palestinian Refugee Problem, pp. 3–4.

[271] Ibid., p. 3. Some 80 percent of persons who were “displaced” from the West Bank and Gaza as a result of the 1967 war already had refugee status as a result of the 1948–9 war. Israelis, but not Palestinians, distinguish sharply between the 1948 refugees and persons “displaced” by the 1967 war.

[272] Gazit, Problem of the Palestinian Refugees, p. 3.

[273] See, for example, Yoram Ben-Porath, Emanuel Marx, and Shimon Shamir, A Refugee Camp on the Mountain Ridge (Tel Aviv: The Shiloah Center, 1974) (in Hebrew); and Yoram Ben-Porath and Emanuel Marx, Some Sociological and Economical Aspects of Refugee Camps on the West Bank (Santa Monica, CA: Rand, 1971). For a post-intifada view, see Bucaille, Gaza.

[274] Ben-Porath and Marx, Sociological and Economical Aspects, pp. 48–9.

[275] Susan Slyomovics, The Object of Memory: Arab and Jew Narrate the Palestinian Village (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1998).

[276] Joseph Ginat, Women in Muslim Rural Society: Status and Role in Family and Community (New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction Books. 1982), pp. 100–14, 126–32.

[277] Zureik, Palestinian Refugees, p. 30.

[278] Ibid., p. 52.

[279] Emanuel Marx, “Palestinian Refugee Camps in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip,” Middle Eastern Studies 28 (2) (April, 1992): 281.

[280] Ishaq Y. al-Qutb, “Refugee Camp Cities in the Middle East: A Challenge for Urban Development Policies,” International Sociology 4 (1) (1989): 91–108.

[281] Arzt, Refugees into Citizens, pp. 30–62.

[282] Manuel Hassassian, comment at the conference on “The Palestinian Refugees,” University of Oklahoma, Norman, Oklahoma, November 30, 1999. Also see Rashid I. Khalidi and Itamar Rabinowich, The Palestinian Right of Return: Two G’t’ir.y (Cambridge, MA: American Academy of Arts and Sciences, 1990).

[283] See Bucaille, Gaza, pp. 126-A3.

[284] Arzt, Refugees into Citizens, pp. 87–91.

[285] Gazit, Problem of the Palestinain Refugees, p. 26.

[286] Arzt, Refugees into Citizens, pp. 83 100; Alpher and Shikaki, Palestinian Refugee Problem.

[287] Nawaf A. Salem, “Between Repatriation and Resettlement: Palestinian Refugees in Lebanon,” Journal of Palestine Studies 24 (1) (Autumn 1994): 18–27.

[288] Interview, Muhammad Sammak, London, November 25, 1999.

[289] Mark A. Heller and Sari Nusseibah, No Trumpets, No Drums: A Two-Hyphen State Settlement of the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict (New York: Hill and Wang, 1991).

[290] Gazit, Problem of the Palestinain Refugees, pp. 20–1.

[291] Alpher and Shikaki, Palestinian Refugee Problem.

[292] Cited in Arzt, Refugees into Citizens, p. 216.

[293] Alpher and Shikaki, Palestinian Refugee Problem, p. I.

 12. Palestinian Refugees in Jordan and National Identity, 1948–1999]]

[[Mohanna Haddad]]

At the termination of the British Mandate in Palestine, the legal status of the political organization functioning there also came to an end. The Jewish organizations appear to have been more aware of the situation than were the Palestinian Arabs, and proclaimed the State of Israel, taking the place of the terminated state authority. By refusing the partition plan, the Palestinian side lost something essential in the process: the creation of the legitimate and legal, nationally recognized corps d’etat that granted citizenship to the Palestinian Arabs. Under the umbrella of the Arab League, the member-states carried out the responsibility of defending Palestine. Their endeavor led to their defeat in 1948 and to the division of Palestine into three parts, one of which (the West Bank) came under the protection of the Jordanian Monarchy, which, in 1950, became part and parcel of the Jordanian Kingdom. The Jordanian Constitution of 1952 included it as part of the Kingdom of Jordan and still includes it despite the Fak al-Irtibat (Detachment) of 1988.

As a result of the war of 1948, some 94,000 refugees fled to the East Bank of the Jordanian Kingdom.[294] This brings us to the core of the problem of the demography of the Palestinian refugees in Jordan.

 Demography

To reach approximately correct estimates of the number of Palestinian refugees in Jordan, it is necessary to consider the demographic development of Jordan since 1921, the year of the inception of the state as an emirate. Despite the estimation given by the British officers operating in the east of Jordan at that time, it seems that the most correct and, to some extent reliable estimate, is the census of the tribes in 1922, which found that Jordan had a total count of 225,380.[295] Athamna,[296] who presents the various estimates for the period of the emirate through 1946, points correctly to the defects of the estimates in that period. Mahafza,[297] quoting A. Konikoff and H. Horani,[298] gives the figure of 300,214 in 1938. Musa Samha[299] gives the figure of 400,000 for 1947.

The year 1947 forms the onset of the direct military clashes between the Palestinian Arabs and Jews in an attempt to replace the mandatory power. Noteworthy is the fact that the rate of population increases in the region had been 0.8 percent annually for reasons of ignorance, bad health, and economic conditions.[300] It was only after 1960 that living conditions underwent considerable progress, and the rate of population increase went up to 1.2 percent. The high rate of population increase between 1948 and 1973 was due to two factors: the expulsion of the Palestinian Arabs from Palestine as a result of the 1948 war between the newly emerging Jewish state and the Arab states. Jordan (the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan) and the region that it was assigned to keep (the West Bank) got the lion’s share of the Palestinian refugees. UNRWA estimated the number at 506,200 for the year 1952. forming 55.4 percent of all the Palestinian refugees in the Arab states.[301]

The Jordanian-Palestinian Committee for the Study of the Living Conditions of the Refugees in the West Bank[302] stated the number of refugees at 94.000 for the East Bank and 357,200 for the West Bank, making a total of 451,200 PRs (Palestinian Refugees) in 1948–9.[303]

An abstract of the population from the annual statistical reports for the East Bank (1952, 1961, 1979, and 1994) refers to the total number of Jordan’s population in 1952 as 586,880, including the refugees. Based on estimates of the rate of population increase during this period, Jordan must have harbored 424,005 East Jordanians and 98,516 refugees. The remaining increment of the population was caused by internal migration from the West Bank to the East Bank in addition to migration from other Arab countries. Only this only can explain the high rate of population increase in the country.

Eor 1961 the total population of Jordan was 1,760,279, of whom 809,304 were in the West Bank and 950,975 were in the East Bank, including 61,972 living abroad and 55,525 Bedouin. The net total of the Jordanian population, according to the census, is 1,698,207. A simple mathematical calculation reveals that, counting on the basis of 1.2 percent as the rate of population increase in that period, the West Bank must have harbored 430.936 refugees and 378,936 inhabitants in the three districts of Nablus, Jerusalem, and al-Khalil (Hebron). The East Bank must have had 474,890 East Bankers and 108,677 refugees. The remaining part of the Jordanian population, 305,536 people, must have come into Jordan from the West Bank and other countries such as Syria, Lebanon, and Iraq during one decade. Even following Samha's reasoning[304] (Samha 1987: 187), which states that in 1952 the number of refugees in the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan is estimated at 464,670 (369,689 refugees in the West Bank and 100.981 in the East Bank), the figures do not match those of the Jordanian Palestinian Committee. The difference is 13,200 refugees. According to Samha, the number of refugees in Jordan increased to 631,000 in 1961; whereas this number, according to the figures given above, was 539,613 — a difference of some 92.387 persons. Still unknown is the formula on the basis of which he calculated his estimate.

What makes these differences less ambiguous are the UNRWA statistics for 1971 and 1983 as presented by Samha,[305] showing the number of refugees in Jordan for 1971 as 551.612, forming 36.3 percent of the total Palestinian refugees. This is to say that the number of refugees in Jordan fell to less than it had been in 1951, being 506,200.[306] According to the same source, the number of Palestinian refugees in 1960 was 613,743. According to the DPA, the number of Palestinian refugees in 1980 was 716.372; whereas UNRWA cites their number in 1983 to be 759,160. The estimate for 1983 on the basis of the former figure and a 3.5 percent increase rate gives the figure of 791,594. Again, the difference is rather extensive and there is no agreement on the issue. Even the Jordanian figures do not match reality, for their estimates are based on a 2.5 percent annual increase rate; whereas elsewhere the rate of increase is considered to be at least 3.09 percent for 1990.[307] However, UNRWA recognizes only ten refugee camps in Jordan, when in fact there are thirteen. The total number of Palestinian refugees in Jordan amounts to some 1.5 million. Zureik maintains that of an estimated 2,328,308 Palestinians in Jordan, the refugees total 1,741,796 individuals. [308]

The formal Palestinian reading is that the Palestinian refugees problem was created in a number of waves, as follows:

* The first wave

Approximately 30,000 Palestinians were forced to leave the country during the period from January 1947 to March 1948.

* The second wave

Over 300.000 Palestinians left West Jerusalem, Tiberias, Haifa, Jaffa, and Beishan as well as those who survived the Deir Yasin massacre. These huge numbers were forced to leave during the period from March 1948 to May 1948. They were terrified by the horrible massacre committed by Haganah and Stern forces against innocent civilians in the village of Deir Yasin, where the death toll reached 250 persons including women, children, and the elderly.

* The third wave

The Israeli armed forces deported approximately 100,000 Palestinians from the cities of Lod and Ramleh to Jordan during the period from May 1948 to December 1948.

* The fourth wave

In view of the Israeli hostilities which continued even after the 1948 war, over 200,000 Palestinians were forced to move to the Gaza Strip.[309]

 Palestinian Refugees: An Identity

The history of Palestinian identity passed through four phases in the twentieth century. Until 1918, Palestine had been part of the Ottoman Empire for four centuries, and the people in Palestine were considered Ottoman subjects. The term “citizen” is rather difficult to apply to the Ottoman period, for the state identity did not match with the regional identity of the subject. Yet Palestine was one of the Arab-speaking dominions of the empire and the people were represented in the various Arab movements organizing for the Arabs’ liberation from the Ottoman yoke. Palestine then formed a part of the Fertile Crescent or Greater Syria; those who took part in the Young Arab movement were obsessed by the one idea of Arabism against Ottoman nationalism. The same was true for Syrians, Iraqis, and Lebanese.

The Palestinian Arab identity crystallized more after the Balfour Declaration, which promised the establishment of a Jewish national home in Palestine. The Sherif of Mecca and the leader of the Great Arab Revolution at that time, Hussain Ben Ali, included Palestine in his map of the future Arab state. All the Palestinian uprisings against Jewish immigration and the British Mandate in Palestine had taken place under the motto of “Palestine, an Arab Land,” to be understood as “an Arab, Muslim, and Palestinian land.” During the twenty-eight years of the Mandate, no real attempt was made to form a united Palestinian front, and a struggle remained between the two prominent leading families in Palestine — the Nashashibi in Nablus and the Husseini in Jerusalem. A reconsideration of the literature concerning the Palestine issue between 1920 and 1947 does not show an overall representative organization for the Palestinians in terms of a well-defined national movement and the consciousness of establishing such an organization had to wait until the emergence of the Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO) in 1964.

Some scholars referred to the identity of Palestinians in that period as “segmented”: tribal, territorial, and religious. Territorially, the allegiance was either to the village, city, or simple district.[310] In fact, the pan-Arab idea had dominated and still dominates Arab societies. The regimes of the country states in the Arab lands institutionalized themselves through three approaches: the adoption of Arab nationalism, force and military oppression, and the expansion of the state bureaucratic apparatus. The Jordanian Hashemite monarchy did the same, yet with a more humanitarian flavor, not only in this period among the east Jordanians, but also in the following phase among the Palestinian segment of the society.

The third phase was that between 1948 and 1964/1967. I call this period the “phase of awakening.” the term coined by G. Antonius.[311] It is in this period that the Jordanian monarchy came to play a major role in the development of the Palestinian identity, whether positively or negatively. The first step was the participation of the Arab Legion (the Jordanian army) in the 1948 war. The defeat of the joint Arab armies led to an armistice between Israel and Jordan, whose troops remained in control of what came later on to be called the West Bank. Both the banks received 451.000 refugees fleeing from the territories in which the State of Israel w as established. The Israeli Defense Forces (IDF) expelled the majority of the Palestinian refugees, and a considerable number fled out of fear for various reasons summarized by Amirah Habibi.[312] She mentions, among others, family considerations (fear for the lives of their relatives, family honor, being with the family), fear of the war. social behavior, and expulsion by force. In 1950. the two banks were unified (whether for better or worse) and constituted the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan. Yet. had UNRWA not been established, the economic situation of Jordan at that time did not permit Jordan to give assistance to such a huge number of refugees in addition to a similar number of West Bank Palestinians. The population of the Jordanian society tripled within two years.

The question of Palestinian identity among the refugees in Jordan did not escape the attention of Israeli scholars.[313] Their views vary significantly, albeit representing the Israeli side. The formal Zionist view, before as well as after the establishment of the state, maintains that King Abdullah always looked toward expanding his state to Palestine in order to establish the Arab state that his father as leader of the Arab Revolution of 1916 advocated. Various readings present Prince Abdullah in negotiations to form a state where both Arabs and Jew’s could live in peace, aiming thereby at creating the State of Israel. This attempt, according to the Israeli view, aimed at Jordanizing the whole area of Palestine. After 1950 Jordan (according to Israeli and Palestinian understanding) annexed and (according to the Jordanian view) united the two banks of the River Jordan on grounds inherent in the Hashemite political mind based on the idea of Arab nationalism. The Jordanian citizenship granted to the Palestinians (refugees and non-refugees in the West and the East Bank) implied, for better or worse, for many, an attempt at a virtual liquidation of the Palestinian identity, to be replaced by the Jordanian identity. Ilan Pappe writes:

From the very beginning of the Annexation, the Hashemite court worked relentlessly to Jordanize the West Bankers and the Palestinian Refugees. Abdallah tried at first to placate the Palestinians by liberalizing his autocratic rule and allowing a modicum of democratization into the new political system. This move, however, produced exactly the opposite effect, as it revealed the amount of opposition to Abdallah’s rule in the West Bank and ultimately led the King to dissolve the Palestinian dominated Parliament he had helped to establish.[314]

That the Palestinians were unwilling to accept Jordanian identity as the national one is a logical truth since they were (and are) a people with a case to defend. The problem, I suggest, is deeper than that. Now in the fourth generation, if asked where one is from, a Jordanian of Palestinian origin would answer, “From Palestine.” The Palestinians were stateless until the Jordanian monarchy granted them citizenship. Accepting it meant in no way that they had detached themselves from their natural allegiance to the land where they were born and grew up, nor that they were willing to be referred to by any other name than “Palestinian.” Citizenship and national identity are different things that may be interrelated and interdependent in various cases; but in the case of Palestinians, they are not. Without resorting to apologetic discourse, the Jordanian version simply leans upon ideological grounds inherent in the “mind of the great Arab revolution” as a fundamental motive for that political behavior, regardless of any other consideration. It was only thereafter that the idea of pan-Arab nationalism got its gestalt.

The truth is that the Palestinians came to be subject to two forces: UNRWA and the Jordanian authorities. The former's task was to provide help to the Palestinians, but by doing so they helped them keep their national identity. What is lacking in Pappe's argument is that the Jordanian monarchy at that time stuck with the issue of self-institutionalization among a newly-added part of the population who came to form the majority of Jordanian society. The Palestinians came to live in the urban centers and formed the middle class of Jordanian society, and indeed they still form the majority of that class, including the academic and professional elements.[315] The issue is that the same situation had existed already in 1970 when the sad September events led to complete segregation of Jordanian society into East and Palestinian Jordanians. In fact, the collective consciousness of national identity will continue even if a final solution is provided. The PLO and the recognition it achieved in both the Arab and the international arenas moved the Palestinians to actively manifest their Palestinian national identity. Despite the fact that the Hashemite monarchy had been in need of the Palestinian people to consolidate its existence as a state, the burden of the Palestinians on the monarchy was heavier than the state was able to bear.

The fourth phase (the phase of revolutionary formation) came after 1964 and lasted until 1970 when the PLO realized that it was able to gain support for its activities in Jordan. This ambition and the facilities they received from the state led to an extraordinary position. Jordanian citizens, not only of Palestinian origin but also East Jordanians, were encouraged to join the organization. The refugees in Jordan became a recruiting field, and the Palestinian national revival became an obsession. Since at that time the Palestinians formed the majority of the population, especially after the 1967 war, they felt that the state should transfer the responsibility of defense of the country and war against Israel to those who were more concerned with the issues — namely the PLO. The Palestinian national identity rose to its climax among Palestinians and also among many of East Jordanians so that it looked as if it were representing Jordanian nationality. The majority of the Palestinian refugees at that time no longer lived in the refugee camps. This integration posed a danger if the Palestinians were to turn their backs on the citizenship Jordan granted them. Such a possibility inflamed the army. The term “Jordanian” at that time appeared as if it had become a curse and an insult. In fact, had Jordan not taken part in the war of 1967, a clash between the Palestinian organizations and the Jordanian army would have been inevitable. The organization had already affected the West Bank to the point that the institutional resistance against the Jordanian monarchy was alarming. The loss of the West Bank simply postponed the confrontation until some years later. From a pan-Arab nationalist point of view, the rise of the PLO had been divisive to the Arab front. It was also a result of the Palestinian consciousness of the fallacy of the traditional pan-Arab ideology that was adopted by the country state (al-Dawla al-Qutriya) and the incapability of the country states to weigh against the Israeli military power. [316]

The events of September 1970 ended the presence and activities of the Palestinian military organization, but the consciousness of the Palestinian identification had already reached its peak. The question of Jordanian citizenship became (at least for a good many of the Palestinian refugees) more a temporary means for movement and claiming public rights. “Not to lose the hen that lays the golden egg, at least for the time being,” became the slogan. Events on the Arab political level led to the recognition of the PLO to be the sole representative of the Palestinian question in the international arena. This gave the Palestinians in Jordan a push in the direction of consolidating their national identity, a fact that manifested itself in the solidarity they showed with the Palestinian struggle, first in Lebanon, and then in the Intifada in the West Bank. A similar reaction, though in a different context, was clear among the Palestinians in Israel.

After 1974, Jordan functioned as an umbrella for the participation of Palestinians in the international arena and continued to do so (at the Madrid Conference, for example). However, The Palestinian national identity, as understood by the Palestinian Authority at present, seems to be debated on various levels. There is a lack of consensus on whether the Palestinians in the diaspora will lend an ear to the call of the new state-information. A logical consequence of the life in exile is that many of Palestinians have established themselves and acquired rights, properties, and even influential positions that they will not give up easily.

 The Refugees' Living Conditions

Jordan has thirteen refugee camps, ten of which are under the supervision of UNRWA, which assists the inhabitants in education, health, occupational training, and financial assistance to those they consider hardship cases. UNRWA would never have been able to perform its tasks if the Jordanian government was not willing to take charge of more fundamental and costly services such as infrastructure (electricity, telephone, running water and sewage, roads and communication), education for the last three years of high school, university education, security and sanitation, and especially, jobs in the public sector. Even so, UNRWA assists only the refugees in the camps, who form some 20 percent of the total refugees, whereas 80 percent of the refugees do not live in camps and enjoy their life as citizens in the country. Despite the fact that all Palestinian refugees are eligible and can profit from the services of UNRWA, the majority do not, and all costs for the services presented to them are from the account of the state.

The last Fafo Report[317] on living conditions in Jordan, including the refugees, does not show much difference in the standard of living, compared with the Jordanian population. The lower class of Jordanian society perceives the services presented to the Palestinian refugees as privileges. Yet most indices found by researchers put the conditions of the refugees in-between the urban and the rural standard of living in the country. Considering the fact that the majority of urban Jordanians are of Palestinian origin, the conclusion is self-evident. For example, the population dependency ratio for refugees is .83, whereas it is .80 for the urban and .92 for rural populations.[318] The total fertility in 1995 for refugees is less than that of non-refugees (4.34 and 4.40 respectively) whereas it is 4.83 for rural areas.[319] The Infant Mortality Index for refugees is far lower than for non-refugees (23.9 to 31.2), while it is 24.3 for rural areas, 43.3 for the southern Governorates, and 34.8 for the Balqa and Madaba.[320] Enrollment of the refugees' children at the secondary (high school) educational level is 78 percent, and in vocational training it is 22 percent, which is far above the rural areas where these figures are 70 percent and 30 percent respectively. These percentages lor all students are 80 percent and 20 percent.[321] Health insurance coverage and medication for refugees are completely free compared to the rest of the population, regardless of origin.[322] The distance to the medical centers for refugees is far shorter than it is for non-refugees, not to mention the refugees in camps, where the distance is negligible.[323] Participation in the labor force among camp refugees is about the same among non-refugees and other refugees not in camps.[324] Female participation in the labor force in Jordan is the highest for non-Jordanians, and is the same for both in all other categories with some very slight differences. Employment in the Arab world cannot be measured according to usual standards, and perhaps the only standard is Wastah (mediation). The refugees' representation in the professional and managerial sectors is 5 percent less than that of non-refugees, and they are over-represented in clerical work and two other sectors.[325] Even participation in elections does not show much difference (55 percent for refugees and 67 percent for non-refugees),[326] the motivation of participation being bound to the tribal character of the elections in the country.

To speak of the living conditions of the refugees in Jordan in general terms seems to me unjustifiable, since the majority of the Palestinian refugees in Jordan are integrated into society at large. In fact, the term "non-refugee" need not necessarily refer to non-Paiestinian of origin. Living conditions in the country vary per governorate, and there are Governorates where only very few Jordanians of Palestinian origin live, such as al-Karak, Ma'an, Tafilah, and al-Shawbak. In East Jordan, the whole northern Badia is void of Palestinians, and the villages of'Ajlun and Irbid host only individual Palestinians. Except for the chain Amman- Rusaifa and Zarka the whole area east of Amman is lacking Palestinians, and the Valley rift from Ajlun to al-Salt is lacking nearly any Palestinian presence.

The not-in-camp refugees do not manifest much difference from nonPalestinian citizens; and in many respects they are better off. The problem remains with the refugees in camps, where unemployment is estimated at 22 percent for 1997.[327] It was estimated at 28 percent for 1995 by the Fafo researchers.[328]

The refugee camps form a diminishing factor for the population. The numbers of the people in the camps are decreasing due to many factors, among which are housing, sanitation, social factors, economic and perhaps policy factors. This decrease is clearer when measured against the natural increase rate of the population. In al-Baq’a, for example, refugees bought land outside the camp-built houses and expanded. Though the new area does not belong to the camp, it became part and parcel of it, carrying the same name. Similar trends have taken place in other camps as well. Most of the houses around the camp in Irbid are owned by the refugees; and the majority left the camp and lived there, while in many instances they maintained their cottages in the camp or left persons behind to occupy them. Al-Sukhna, an unrecognized camp near al-Zarqa, is no longer a camp; it is rather one part of three agglomerations of the town (a part is for settled nomads; the other for Chechens). The al-Zarqa camp is becoming part of the city itself, sharing the same municipality and municipal services. Many of the camp refugees have left the camp and are scattered throughout the town. Specifically, refugees populate the ward called al-Ghuwayriyya, its neighboring wards, and the western wards of the city. The refugees of the Schneller Camp spread east and north, and in various cases they laid hands on miri (state land), and built their houses. The government pardoned them and registered the land in their names. In Al-Husn, the refugees spread south and north, confiscating the land and building houses under the observing eyes of the landowners and the state. The description often given of the camps is specific as to the spot of the camp, which the state rented for them from the owners.

Table 12.1 Palestinian refugee population by camp, in selected years

Camp name	Initial population	1985	1992	1998
Al-Jabal	8,000	33,321	32,245	28,000
Al-Baq’a	26,000		63,413	84,737
Al-Wihdat	5,000	43,911	42,000	53,300
Al-Zarka	8,000	16,042	15,481	16,494
Souf	8,000	13,203	13,666	17,100

| Talbieh | 5,000 | | 2,612 | 8,043 |

| Irbid | 4,000 | 20,060 | 18,536 | 22,076 |

| Marka (Hittin) | 15,000 | 30,663 | 30,865 | 65,000 |

| Al-Husn | 12,500 | 13,066 | 13,180 | 25,356 |

| Jarash | 11,500 | | 11,750 | 25,980 |

 The State and the Refugees

The camps, then, continue neither in their size nor in their characteristics. The various comparisons between living conditions of the refugees in Jordan and elsewhere refer to Jordan as the better situation. UNRWA could never have been able to sustain the refugees in Jordan had the state itself not invested so much to make life for the refugees bearable and, to some extent, comfortable.

In addition to the ten camps mentioned earlier, Jordan has other camps, which the state sustains completely: Al-Sukhnah near Zarqa, Hnaikin and al-Nazif in Amman, and Madaba. UNRWA does not render them any service whatsoever. Since expansion of the house units in the camps has always been forbidden, in addition to the fact that the space assigned for the house units is very limited, the natural increment was obliged to leave the camps and form new squatters' plots around the cities, but without being recognized by UNRWA. The government provides for all the basic services and infrastructures (roads, water, electricity, schools, health centers, sanitation, etc). Especially after 1967, the government provided the land to build five new camps. Those who were in need from the new generation to have their own home could apply to the state to grant them a piece of land to build a house. By 1985, some 294 applications were approved, whereas 1,353 were under study and 298 were refused."[329]

Government expenditures on the refugees for 1985 were as follows:

- Costs of education (basic, preparatory, secondary, university and scholarships in addition to educational supervision: 23,195,000 JD (Jordanian dinnar).

- Costs of refugees' displaced rations, aid to their children, costs of land, rent for the camps, water, training sewing centers, and administrative staff: 7,225,000 JD.

- Costs of health services, medication in clinics and hospitals, X-rays and blood banks in addition to psychiatric and obstetric consultation: 7,117,000 JD.

- Costs of social aid, cash contributions, institutional services, and contributions of charity institutions: 1,120,000 JD.

- Costs of police security service (police centers), social defense, and other administrative services inside and outside the camps: 1,650,000 JD.

- Contribution to UNRWA to enable it to perform its tasks: 1.025.000 JD.

- Other services to various governmental institutions: 40,307000 JD. Total 81,639.000 JD or $244,917,000 US.

For the year 1998, these costs reached some $350 million US.

 Identity, Citizenship and Attitudes

The literature on national identity has made it clear that national identity is part of man's existence and a major motive for allegiance and loyalty.[330] The history of the Palestinians in the State of Israel demonstrates clearly the allegiance of this group of Israeli citizens to their national identity. Likewise, the history of the Palestinians in Jordan shows similar characteristics. Citizenship does not seem to compensate for national identity in normal situations, as is the case with ethnic groups in Europe and the New World, least of all let it be compensating in cases where national groups live in a crisis situation as the Palestinians do. Palestinian identity has survived all the oppression it underwent, whether or not the Palestinians remained stateless or acquired citizenship — as in Israel and Jordan. In several cases citizenship appears to work toward hardening loyalty to nationhood, as such groups consider citizenship a means of reducing the intensity of their cause. Jordan has suffered a lot from this phenomenon.

The dispersion crisis witnessed by the Palestinians has created in them an attitude toward the world outside: they see it as hostile, unjust, and oppressive. Even among colleagues and companions, skepticism and continuous dissatisfaction form the dominating features of their presence. This situation is over-dominant in the Palestinian groups in the societies hosting them. Talks with colleagues, university students, professors, lawyers, physicians, and clerks emphasize such a view; the feeling of being discriminated against is overwhelming. The Palestinian Authority does not escape such skepticism. My Palestinian colleagues condemned the Sharm El-Shaikh Agreement as much as they did the Wye River and Oslo Accords, and. before those, the Madrid Conference. The Jordanian-Israeli peace agreement was refused categorically and the various civil societies in Jordan (where Jordanians of Palestinian origin form the majority) not only oppose the agreement, but take action against any of their members who try to normalize relations with the Israelis. It is no longer a secret that the syndicates, professional unions, and labor unions condemn any of their members if he or she comes in contact with Israelis or goes to the State of Israel. In some cases, members have been dismissed from membership. It is clearly beneficial that political decision-making concerning foreign policy and national security issues in Jordan is separate from public opinion — which is different from the case in Israel.[331] It eases the government’s movement toward peace making so that finally there may be peace with the State of Israel. But these problems outlined above make the issue of a solution of the refugee question complicated and difficult.

 Refugees in Jordan and the final solution

Except for the refugees from the Gaza Strip and some others, the Palestinian refugees in Jordan, whether in or outside camps, enjoy full Jordanian citizenship. The idea that UNRWA alone only has helped maintain their status as refugees is true only to a limited extent. Their national. Palestinian, identity has been with them all these years; and it will, perhaps, continue to be with those who refuse to leave Jordan. The probable 1.4 million refugees living in Jordanian society cannot be classified under one denominator as refugees. As part of Jordanian society, they are integrated into the socio-structural framework of the population in all its dimensions — commercial, occupational, industrial, intellectual, social, and cultural. They form a hard core in class, political, and tribal structures. The refugees in the refugee camps have so far constructed a new sub-culture in Jordanian society: I call it "the refugee or camp culture."[332] This segment of the refugees cannot be classified as one, for even in the camps, people can be classified differently — ethnically, territorially, or socioeconomically.

Any proposal for a final solution to the Palestinian refugee problem has in the end to cope with variable attitudes these refugees have toward their definition of the homeland, the State of Israel, the Palestinian Authority, and the Kingdom of Jordan.

What do the Palestinians mean by returning home? Is it their houses and agricultural land? If so, this means that they will return to neither Palestine which they know, nor to their Arab environment of which they have been dreaming since the al-Nakba (catastrophe). Even when they can have the choice to go back to Israel, will they be willing to give up their Arab-Jordanian citizenship for an Israeli one? What choice do they have? If Palestinian identity gives them the choice to change only from a national political identity to a cultural one without the possibility of gaining back their land and properties, they would ask what benefit their return has.

The State of Israel (i.e., the Israeli society) has the image not only of the occupier but also of the expropriator and the expelling force. The question is whether the State of Israel, even if it allows Palestinians to return, can compensate their losses both materially and psychologically. What will it mean for the Palestinians to return to the State of Israel? The other question is whether the fast-rooted image in the mind of these people is amenable for change, especially since their culture and socialization process is based fundamentally on the conviction (religious as well as cultural) that Israel and the Jews are not to be trusted. What guarantees, they will ask, will Israel be able to present that they will not be expelled again, particularly since they cannot lean upon any power to protect them in time of need.

Attitudes toward the Palestinian Authority are exempt neither from skepticism nor of criticism. The first reaction of some Palestinian refugees in al-Husn (Martyr ‘Azmi al-Mufti Refugee Camp) to my question asking whether they would heed the call of the Palestinian state to go and live there was (after a very sarcastic laugh): What would they do in the desert of Beit Lehm (Judea) or in the Gaza Strip? Why leave one camp to go to another camp? Why go to a state that has not enough land and a shortage of water to drink?

 The State of Jordan

The attitude of the refugees toward Jordan in a political sense has never been investigated. The only indication we have is to be found in the Fafo report of the living conditions in Jordan (1998). That report measured the extent of satisfaction the people have with their houses, infrastructure, living standard, medical care, education, etc. The general result of the research indicated a given satisfaction among the refugees, particularly among those outside the camps. That is to say, after fifty years of their presence in Jordan and despite the turmoil of the years 1967–70, the refugees in Jordan lead a normal life as citizens. Jordan for them is the land where they live and share in its flora and fauna, security and freedom. It is the country where no one can oblige them to leave if they choose to stay. The law guarantees that, and Jordan is a country of law and order despite various inconveniences that may occur from time to time. Supposing that the parties (Israelis and Palestinians) concerned do not reach an acceptable solution, the Hashemite Kingdom has never been and will never be the country to harm its citizens so profoundly.

Yet Jordan cannot stand watching while other states or a “state-in-formation” is benefiting from suitable conditions to acquire rights and wealth, while Jordan pays the toll.

 Some Contributions to a Solution

On the basis of the foregoing it is necessary to note that one solution for the Palestinian refugees’ problem in terms of either/or will not be possible, since the fundamental, traditional demand is neither possible nor credible. The solution, I think, should be made in terms of “and/and/and,” i.e., the individual’s (household head) choice. Palestinian demands are now formulated clearly to have their own state in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. It is also becoming evident that those who will agree to go (or not go back) to the Palestinian state in-formation will vary according to the situation and the opportunities that will be made available. Such a solution should include three lines:

1. Return.

1. Compensation for land, property, and suffering.

1. Settling the refugees.

Israel is not the only party to compensate for the historical mistakes. Israel is but one part of the conflict. Those states who adopted the fulfilling of Zionist prophecy and used whatever means available to help establish and maintain the Jewish state should also bear responsibility, i.e., England, France, Germany, the USA, Canada, and Australia, in addition, the international Jewish organizations, the Christian churches that propagated the return of the Jews to the Promised Land and facilitated the establishment of the Jewish state as represented in the Protestant, Confessional, Lutheran, Anglican, Reformed, Baptist, and other Christian denominations, must also take moral and financial responsibility.

* Return

With regard to returning to Israel (Israeli Palestine), it is doubtful that many will agree to go back to the Palestine which is now Israel and choose to acquire Israeli citizenship. Yet those who accept and choose to return to Palestine have that right, as well as the right to compensation for their lost property. The latter can be priced through negotiations between the parties concerned. Seen against the background of the conflict and the disciplinarian process that has been and is still going in the Arab cultural and educational programs, it is expected that no more than 10 to 13 percent of the refugees in Jordan will show interest in returning to Palestine. The justification of this estimate is to be found, in addition to the background process mentioned above, in the fact that the majority of these refugees have established themselves in the country. Most of them own their own houses, businesses, offices, jobs, and other basic necessities that bind them fast to the country.

Return to the Palestinian state, especially for those who left the West Bank in 1967 for the second time, will find more acceptance among the refugees in Jordan, especially those in the camps. Among those refugees from the Gaza Strip, the wish to return will be greater; and Jordan will no doubt find it suitable to see them return so as to put an end to the refugee camps. Additionally, these refugees form a burden on the Jordanian economy. As for the other category of refugees in camps, the majority come from parts of Palestine other than the West Bank and Gaza. It is difficult to find any motivation for these people to go to the newly established Palestinian Authority territory, and it is doubtful whether these people have any interest in, or loyalty to, Palestinian leaders or even to the state to be proclaimed in the future. What forms their attitudes toward the regime in the Palestinian territories is the information they get from the residents of the territories about the harsh treatment they experience from the Palestinian Authorities. Such information revives memories of the past history of the Arab regimes.

As for the remaining part of the Palestinian refugees, some 30 percent belong to the lower-income classes in Jordan. They seek better living conditions than they have in Jordan. These people have their rights on compensation, but they may neither wish to stay in Jordan or go back to Israel (Palestine), or go to the Palestinian state. In this case, it seems reasonable to propose that they be given the choice to emigrate. The USA,

Canada, and Australia can absorb these refugees as new immigrants and end their status as refugees. The compensation they would receive can be very good capital to start a new life. The Protestant churches can, and have the responsibility to, assist in this process materially and morally.

* Compensation tor land, property and suffering

Courageous voices in Israel have already admitted the historical mistakes and even crimes against the Palestinians in the wars of 1948 and after. This admission was manifest in the changes made to the texts of schoolbooks in a consciousness-raising effort to recognize that the Palestinians had been dismissed by force from their villages and land. In a recent article by Ilan Pape (received from the fofgnet, September 19, 1999), he agrees with Abu Sitta’s statement with regard to the numbers and total amount of area confiscated by the Israelis in the years from 1948 onwards. For only 1948–9, he mentions some three million dunams of land in addition to the houses and the villages the Israelis abolished in a process of terminating any Palestinian trace in the territory of the new Israeli state.

Despite the fact that the Palestinian demand is both the “right of return” and compensation at the same time, which, from both rational and emotional points of view are justified, justification alone cannot make things possible. Compensation is not only compensation to individuals; compensation comprises more than individual losses of both the material and the psychological; it also includes compensation to the hosting states. The Jordanian population has suffered from the Palestine Question and the Palestinian-Israeli conflict as much as the Israelis and the Palestinians.

This is perhaps what the Jordanian government referred to as vital interests in the negotiations of the refugees’ problems as expressed by the Director of the Department of the Palestinian Affairs, Mr. ‘Abdel-Karim Abul Haija in Al-

Ra’i. The reporter asked that if we spoke of a million and a half refugees in Jordan carrying the Jordanian nationality, what interests did Jordan speak about? He answered:

<quote>

It is not interests. What we say is that we will defend the vital interests of Jordan, and, therefore, we should have an active role in one way or another in the search for a solution and in putting the suitable mechanisms to solve the problems of the Palestinian refugees whom we granted the Jordanian nationality. Though they are registered as refugees, their Jordanian citizenship does not contradict in any way their legal rights. We are for the legal rights of the refugees in return within the framework of the UN Resolution 194 and the other international agreements to begin with the Jordanian-Israeli peace accord.[333]

</quote>

The answer of this statesman as a director in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs does not designate anything specific. It may be diplomatic, but it is surely not clear. What he clearly said is that his department or the Jordanian Government has documents of the possessions of the Palestinian refugees whether these are lands, houses, stores or other items.

Jordan, surely, deserves compensation not only in terms of cost-bearing services to refugees in the camps, but also for all services which it presented to the Palestinians during the last fifty years in the East Bank, in addition to all the money it has paid out for the 18 years of control on the West Bank.

* Settling the refugees

Settling the refugees in Jordan does not present a problem, since they are settled except for the 230.000 in the refugee camps, most of whom are Jordanian citizens. The state cannot oblige them to leave Jordan. The question of the wish of a given refugee to leave Jordan is a personal matter of the refugees everyone has the right to stay or go. Settling or not settling may apply for other Arab states where the refugees remained stateless, but surely Jordan cannot be either for the permanent settling of refugees anywhere, nor for bringing in more Palestinian refugees to settle in the country. The demographic situation in Jordan does not permit people to settle in the country.

[294] Labib ‘Abdel-Salam Qudsiyya, Mawsu’at al-Mukhayyamat al-Falastiniyya, (Encyclopeadia of the Palestinian Refugees’ Camps} Vol. I. “The West Bank,” (Amman, 1990), p. 22.

[295] Munib al-Madi and S al-Musa, Tarikh al-Urdun fi-al-Qarn al-‘Ishrin (History of Jordan in the Twentieth Century} (Amman: Armed Forces Printers, 1959), p. 311.

[296] ’Abdel-Basid Athamnah, “Palestinian Refugees and Displaced Persons and the Demographic Transformations in Jordan.” A paper presented to the Fourth Conference of the Faculty of Economics. “The Economic and Social Impact of the Peace Process in the Middle East,” held at Yarmouk University 13–15 May, 1996. An unpublished paper written in Arabic, p. 2.

[297] ‘Ali Mahafza, Tarikh al-Urdun al-Mu’asir: ‘Ahd al-lmara (1921–1946) (The contemporary history of Jordan [the Period of the Princedom]). (‘Amman: Armed Forces Printing, 1973), p. 245.

[298] Hani Horani, Social and Economic Structure in East Jordan (1921–1946}. (in Arabic). (Beirut: The Research Center of the PLO, 1973); A. Koniokoff, “Trans-Jordan: An Economic Survey,” Jerusalem, 1946.

[299] Musa Samha, “Camp Refugees in Jordan’s East Bank: Distribution and Problems.” pp. 185–92 in John R. Rogge (ed.), Refugees: A Third World Dilemma (Totowa, New Jersey: 1987).

[300] Horani. Social and Economic Structure; al-Tal 1978 ????; Paltai 1958????.

[301] UNRWA Report. 1995: 65.

[302] Qusdsieh. Encyclopedia, p. 22.

[303] Palestinlian Encyclopaedia, part 2 (1990) p. 65

[304] Samha, “Camp Refugees in Jordan’s East Bank,” p. 187.

[305] Ibid., p. 188.

[306] Department of Palestinian Affairs, The Annual Report 1999, p. 11.

[307] Af hamneh Jordan, p. 7.

[308] Zureik, Elia “Palestinian Refugees and the Middle East Peace Process.” A paper presented at the Conference: The Middle East Peace Process: Costs of Instability and Outlook for Insecurity. October 22–23, 1998 at the University of Quebec in Montreal, Canada, p. 8.

[309] Palestinian National Authority Special Report 1998, Refugees, 1948.

[310] ‘Azmi Bisharah, “The Arab Israeli: A Reading in the Imperfect Political Discourse/’ Palestinian Studies 24 (1995): 26–54 (in Arabic).

[311] George Antonius, The Arab Awakening (Lippincott: Philadelphia, 1939).

[312] Amirah Habibi, The Second Exodus: An Analytical field Study. (Beirut: Research Center of the PLO, 1967), pp. 175–8 (in Arabic).

[313] Avi Plascov, The Palestinian Refugees in Jordan, 1948–1967 (London, 1981); Shaul Mishal, West Bank!East Bank: The Palestinians in Jordan, 1949–1967 (Yale University Press, 1978).

[314] Ilan Pappe, “Jordan between Hashemite and Palestinian Identity,” pp. 61 94 in Joseph Nevo and Ilan Pappe (eds.), Jordan in the Middle East 1948–1988: The Making of a Pivotal State (Ilford: Frank Cass, 1994), p .64; Salim Tamari, Return, Resettlement, Repatriation: The Future of the Palestinian Refugees in the Peace Negotiations (Institute of Jerusalem Studies, 1996).

[315] Gad Gilbar “Trends in the Demographic Development of the Palestinians (1870–1987)” (Tel Aviv, 1989) (Hebrew).

[316] Mohanna Haddad, “The Refugees and the Palestinian Identity: Between the Jordanian Citizenship and the Future choices/’ A paper presented to the Conference of Comprehensive Security in the Middle East, held at Yarmouk University, Irbid, Jordan on 14–15 October, 1998 (Arabic).

[317] Jon Hansen-Bauer and Age A. Tiltes (eds.), Jordan Society: Living Conditions in the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan (Oslo: Fafo Report 253, 1998).

[318] Hansen-Bauer and Tiltes (eds.), Jordan Society, p. 54.

[319] Ibid., p. 64.

[320] Ibid., p. 81.

[321] Ibid., p. 141.

[322] Ibid., p. 185.

[323] Ibid., p. 187.

[324] Ibid., p. 232.

[325] Ibid., 249.

[326] Ibid., p. 299.

[327] Department of Palestinian Affairs, Amman. The Annual Report 1998, p. 13.

[328] Hansen-Bauer and Tiltes (eds.), Jordan Society, p. 238.

[329] Report of the Ministry of the Occupied Territories Affairs, 1985, p. 7.

[330] Jan Berting, “The Significance of Collective Identities in Intergroups Relations.” A paper presented to the International Conference: Stereotypes and Alterity, Valetta, Malta, 1997; Anthony Smith, National Identity (London: Penguin Books, 1991); Gellner, Earnest Culture, Identity and Politics (Cambridge University Press, 1987);. R. W. Langbaum, The Mysteries of Identity: A Theme in Modern Literature (University of Chicago Press, 1982); J. Friedman, “The Past in the Future: History and the Politics of Identity," American Anthropologist 94/4 (1992): 837–53.

[331] Tamar Herman and Efraim Yuchtman-Ya'ar, "On the Road to Peace? The Dynamics and Political Implications of Israeli Jewish Attitudes towards the Oslo Process." A paper prepared for delivery at the 1999 annual meeting of the American Political Science Association, Atlanta, September 2–5, 1999.

[332] Mohanna Haddad, "Arab National Self-Image and its Impact on the Relations between the Arab States and the State of Israel." In Dirasat (Jordan University) (1999) vol. 25, no. 1, p. 184.

[333] Al-Ra'i, September 20, 1999, p. 32.

 13. Final Status Negotiations and Regional Cooperation

[[Taisir Amre]]

It is widely acknowledged that the Palestinian cause is the crux of the Middle East problem. There is also a consensus that solving the refugee issue with due care and vigilance is the major ingredient of any solution to the Palestinian cause, which will in turn, lead to peace in the Middle East. This suggests that without solving the refugee problem in an acceptable and reasonable way, doubt will increasingly be cast upon the possibility of achieving a sustainable final solution to the Palestinian cause, and thus to the Middle East conflict. Unless the issue of the Palestinian refugees is dealt with effectively, there can be no real peace, a peace which would be an indispensable beginning to a promising future which would unfold tremendous opportunities for regional cooperation. Hence, resolving the refugee issue is a precondition for a stable peace, not just a benefit that would follow.[334]

The purpose of this essay is to explore the issue of the Palestinian refugees as one of the final negotiation issues in the Palestinian track of the Middle East peace process with the aim of determining a working draft of a policy memorandum to strike a just, acceptable, and working balance between the non-alienable, absolute rights of the Palestinian refugees in the light of five decades of checkered developments which have culminated in the current peace process. The current negotiations offer a unique and historic opportunity to usher in a new era of peace and prosperity in our region. However, it is important to emphasize that this aim should not be taken for granted. It requires hard work by both Palestinians and Israelis, and the ball is in the Israeli court.

 A Historical Perspective of Palestinian Refugees

The estimated population of the Palestinian people in the year 1948 was 2,115,000, of which two-thirds were Muslims and Christians (i.e., 1,415,000). The remaining 700,000 were Jews.[335] The total area of Palestine was 26,320,000 dunams. Until 1948, ninety-two percent of the land was owned by Palestinian Arabs, and the remaining 8 percent by Jews.[336] To view this situation from a different angle, it is worthwhile to note that Palestine bore the brunt of many world events, from the assassination of Alexander II in the year 1881 and the massacres that followed, to the Balfour Declaration, which considered the Arab majority as “a non-Jewish 9 community,” to the Second World War, with its revealed and unrevealed secrets. All in all, the events paved the way for intensive Jewish immigration to Palestine.

The Jewish population in Palestine in 1882 was 24,000. That population had grown to 52,000 in 1918 and to 700,000 by 1948.[337] The year 1948 also witnessed the outflow of as many as 940,000 Palestinian refugees according to the report of the Secretary General of the United Nations to the Fourth Session of the General Assembly held in June 1949, although the number of refugees registered with the United Nations Relief and Work Agency (UNRWA) in 1950 numbered 960,000.[338]

 Interpretations and Approaches

It is difficult to determine any cause for the huge influx of Palestinian refugees in 1948 other than attributing it to the excesses and atrocities of the fledgling Israeli state. Academic honesty makes it obligatory to state the Israeli point of view in an attempt to juxtapose it with other contesting ones in order to establish a foundation for the just solution both parties crave. This endeavor becomes very important because Israeli and Palestinian views with regard to refugees diverge on everything from the original number of Palestinian refugees created in 1948 to the means of resolving the impasse.[339] To date, the Israeli government, as well as a significant body of academics in Israel, have subscribed to the notion that the Palestinian exodus in 1948 was either voluntary or largely instigated by the leaders of neighboring Arab countries,[340] or it was at most the by-product of a war imposed on Israel by the Arabs who tried to prevent by force the implementation of United Nations Resolution 181 dated November 29, 1947. Fortunately, some Israeli researchers, and even some of its leaders, have uncovered a substantial body of information that largely affirms the refugees' own versions of their involuntary exodus. For example, the exPrime Minister of Israel, Menahem Begin, in his book The Revolution, disclosed the role the massacre at Deir Yasin played in horrifying the humble civilian Palestinians and led to their mass exodus.[341] The Israeli author Simha Flaban pointed out in his book The Birth of Israel the fact that Palestinian departure from Palestine in 1948 was due to an Israeli political and military plan that resulted in driving out 84 percent of the Palestinian population. Mr. Flaban also revealed that 55 percent of those who fled did so as a result of Jewish assaults on Palestinian cities and villages, 15 percent left their homeland under pressure of terrorist attacks from Argon, 2 percent left due to propaganda and psychological warfare, an additional 2 percent due to direct military orders, and a remaining 10 percent out of a general feeling of fear and helplessness.[342] Two-thirds of these refugees did not even live in lands stipulated in United Nations Resolution 181; they came from areas subsequently conquered by Israel. This fact sheds further light on the extent of the atrocities committed by the Israelis against innocent Palestinians to create a de facto demographic situation on a “clean land” in keeping with the assumed logical consistency between practices and thoughts enshrined in the Zionist ideology regarding the establishment of a pure Jewish state.[343] This same rationale has been adopted and advocated by subsequent Israeli governments toward Palestinian Arabs in varied proportions in the territories occupied since 1967, and must be exposed as a blatant attempt to ensure the “purity” of the Jewish state. Unfortunately, “old habits die hard.” Terrorist tactics continued to be employed against Palestinians in the occupied territories through such acts as dynamiting homes, issuing one-way exit permits, judaizing Jerusalem, confiscating land on which to build Jewish settlements, imposing a large number of heavy taxes, and instigating harsh economic measures to create decisively high unemployment rates among Palestinian Arabs, which also had the effect of forcing them out of their homeland. These actions graphically depict an anti-Palestinian policy that set a precedent for current policy.

Is there now anything that can lead us to believe that the Israeli government is concerned with accepting responsibility for creating the problem with Palestinian refugees? No. Instead, they attempt to cast blame on the Arab side for creating the refugee situation. In November 1992 it initially appeared as if the Israeli government was beginning to accept responsibility for their actions when Shlomo Ben-Ami, the head of the Israeli delegation to the second Refugee Working Group (RWG) meeting in Ottawa, said that the proposition that the “Palestinian refugees” problem was the result of mass expulsion” was a travesty. However, he went on to state “that the Palestinian refugee problem was born as the land was bisected by the Sword, not by design, Jewish and Arab. It was largely the inevitable by-product of Arab and Jewish fears, and the protracted bitter fighting.”[344] This language, echoing Israeli historian Benny Morris’s well-known statement that the refugee problem was “born of war, not of design,” represents an important departure in Israeli official thinking. Even though it is laced with an element of Jewish culpability, it is unlikely to impress those who have languished for generations in camps, whether a result of expulsion from their homeland by design or fear of life. Still the statement does acknowledge some Israeli responsibility for what the head of the Israeli delegation to the RWG called “the inherent immorality of war.”[345]

 The Political Nature vis-a-vis the Wrong Path

It is an established fact to which there is a consensus that the problem of the Palestinian refugees is of a distinct political nature. That is why the emphasis for Palestinian refugees differs from that of other refugees in the aftermath of the Second World War. The thrust of the latter has been not so much on repatriation as on (a) providing a new place of residence for the refugees, and (b) recognizing the needs to protect such individuals from persecution, either in their adopted country or in their country of origin, should they be forced to return to it. In contrast, the emphasis with Palestinian refugees has been substantially different. Palestinian refugees are not seeking a place of residence other than their country of origin. That is why United Nations Resolution 194 is so very important. It deals specifically with Palestinian refugees; it affirms their right of return and compensation particularly for those not wishing to return. That is why Palestinian refugees have been excluded from protection under the umbrella of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and other international bodies. UNRWA’s creation is just an extension of Resolution 194. It is not a substitute for it.[346] There is no doubt that Resolution 194 was not, is not, and will not be implemented without arriving at a political solution to the Palestinian national cause. Israel knows this fact more than any other concerned party. This development should not be viewed lightly because the Palestinians as a whole, wherever they have lived, have been recognized as a people who have a place at the negotiating table. The issue has been one not simply of inhabitants of a specific territory, but of a people who are scattered as refugees.[347] Everyone is aware that the multilateral track is meant to assist, supplement, and reinforce the bilateral track and vice versa, so one can safely state that the Declaration of Principles (DoP) Agreement between Israel and the PLO have had a direct, strong effect on the multilateral groups, particularly with working group on refugees. On one hand, it dealt with the displacement issue in stating that refugees would have the right of return to their homes and homeland. On the other hand, it stated that the issue of the refugees of 1948 would be discussed at the latest by the beginning of the third year of the interim period. Unfortunately, none of these important issues has ever been resolved, despite the fact that we are currently in the seventh year of the interim period.

Nevertheless, what is important is that this agreement could not have been achieved had the many bilateral Palestinian-Israeli meetings not occurred since the Madrid peace conference in 1991. These series of meetings have gradually been melting the ice surrounding the negotiations. In addition they have played, and will continue to play, an important role in changing the Israeli attitude about refugees from a dogmatic to a more positive one. It has also played a similar role in adjusting the perhaps-rigid attitude of the Palestinian refugees in dealing with new realities. Professor Howard Adelman has nicely explained this dual shift in his analogy between the Freudian basic structure of the personality and the working group on refugees, which reflects on how the refugee situation has been dealt with during the past five decades. Professor Adelman divided the development of the multilateral talks on refugees into three phases: (1) the id phase, (2) the super ego phase, and (3) the ego phase.[348] Though I agree in general with Professor Adelman's classifications, it is not my intention to discuss these phases at this juncture. Rather, I want to stress the fact that the Palestinian refugees are witnessing with passion and hope the resurrection of their homeland and political identity, and are out of the disorganized id and parentalist super ego phases and well into the ego phase which is organized and capable of making its people competent enough to determine their own destiny and assume responsibility for the destiny of self. In other words, it allows them to respond and adjust to the realities of the external world, which, if I may add, is a precondition for a historic compromise. If the other parties meet them halfway and discard the wrong path in dealing with the roots of their cause, it will expediate the process of both bilateral and multilateral tracks away from the rigid terms of reference in the current peace process outlined in the disorganized and lopsided id phase.

 The Wrong Path

Admittedly, the international community has failed miserably in offering the Palestinian refugees any honorable solution which would address their political needs since it has confined itself to the services of UNRWA which can at most cure, not solve, the problem. On the other hand, most, if not all, regional parties have played unholy games with the pains and sufferings of the refugees. In Jordan the refugees are legally considered citizens equal to nationals, though this status is not necessarily identical to that of nationals. Nevertheless, the refugees have viewed that as an attempt to dissolve their attachment to the long-awaited political identity. In Lebanon they have, unfortunately, been subjected to unspeakable discrimination embodied until now in legal and administrative laws and decrees, which require that they work only in a variety of blue-collared jobs. This situation has aggravated their agony and made them feel anachronistic drubbings of the supposedly democratic and open society in multiple ways.

 The Current Peace Process

One can safely state that the multilaterals, and particularly the working group of refugees, began in an almost total vacuum as far as terms of reference are concerned. That is why nothing tangible has yet been achieved and why progress is virtually frozen. On the other hand, the controversial United Nations Security Council Resolution 242 constitutes the basis for the peace process in its entirety but confines itself, as far as the refugee problem is concerned, to demanding a just solution.[349] However, it is inevitable to assess things on the basis of their ultimate outcome, which should be comprehensive and have a lasting peace. In this course we cannot but find ourselves face to face with the concept of absolute and relative rights.

 Absolute and Relative Rights

There is considerable evidence affirming Israel’s responsibility and guilt in creating the problem concerning the Palestinian refugees, and there is an endless number of indisputable legal instruments and international resolutions supporting the Palestinian refugees’ right of return. We also have Israel’s statement of May 11, 1949, the date on which it was admitted to the United Nations, in which Israel pledged to respect the principles of the charter of the United Nations and to implement its resolutions, as well as the preamble to Resolution 273 (111) of May 11, 1949 which stated specifically that Israel pledges to implement Resolution 181 and 194. These pledges were a major reason why Israel was granted admission to the United Nations and remain indispensable to the final settlement of the Palestinian question.[350] But, despite their usefulness as a reminder of Israel’s responsibility to act in good faith according to the principles set forth by the United Nations, they have limited practical use. Events have been occurring successively over the past five decades in a manner that naturally affects the course of action and the final end result. Just like the other dimensions of the Palestinian question, the right of return overlaps many other objective factors. For this reason, many see the necessity to discuss the right of return simultaneously in light of recent developments in the Arab-Israeli conflict and from a legal angle. More than twenty-five years ago an English researcher said that what we need for the refugees was an acceptable solution, not a just one. Justice, in real terms, cannot be achieved for the Palestinian refugees as nothing can compensate them for their agony and distress throughout the years they have spent in exile, even if this resolution is fully implemented. He rightfully added that there is no possibility of solving the issue on any basis other than the one this resolution furnishes, but at the time of implementation many difficulties and developments should be taken into consideration. Justice is a remote goal. “Justice can never be absolute,’’ as was stated by Ben-Ami in his presentation to the second session of the RWG in Ottawa in November 1992. We must remember that Israel views Resolution 194 as an instrument to engulf the Arabs in an manner bound to upset its demographic balance which would also pose a grave security situation, threatening its justification for existence. The aforesaid contradictory argument makes it necessary to launch a historic compromise.

 The Way Out

Approaching a thorny issue like that of the Palestinian refugees is indistinguishable from the complex Palestinian national problem; it requires an open mind, courage, credibility, and commitment to establishing a just and comprehensive peace. We, the Arabs, have a phrase, sadikoka man sadakaka la man sadakak, which means “your friend indeed is the one who is sincere to you when you seek his opinion and not the one who believes you, irrespective of the rightness or wrongness of your attitude.” Therefore, our attempt to find a way out of this dilemma should stress that the Israelis cannot turn a blind eye to the agony and legitimate rights of the Palestinian refugees, nor can Palestinians expect to repatriate approximately four million refugees for both political and practical reasons.

It is quite clear that the Palestinian refugees, and the Palestinian people as a whole, are well armed with a variety of legitimate rights that they are not willing to give up just because the other party shuns them. By the same token, the Palestinians are ready to negotiate a dignified settlement in which they will entertain legitimate Israeli concerns in exchange for realizing their relative legitimate rights. One can't help asking the concerned parties to be pragmatic and just, because, if we can start from these twin principles, we can reach our supposedly common goals: coexistence, peace, cooperation and prosperity. I believe that the cohesive nature of the content of the solution should be in no way overlooked. We must not subscribe to a sugarcoated, piecemeal strategy in an attempt to achieve these goals.

It has been rightly stated on several occasions that regional cooperation involving Israel as one of the parlies to such cooperation will be a "peace dividend." So peace is the sine qua non that must be achieved first, but such peace within the region as a whole is inconceivable without a final political settlement having been achieved between Israel and the Palestinian people.[351] This is probably a truism not needing much analysis or proof. The Palestinian refugee problem is organically linked with the political settlement of the Palestinian national cause as a whole, which could be settled through the establishment of a sovereign Palestinian state which would shoulder the responsibility of more than 1.1 million refugees currently living in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, in addition to the thousands of other refugees who fled those areas in 1967 and became displaced persons. They, too, are supposed to be able to return according to the Declaration of Principles accord. Such a sovereign state would replace the coercive ties and relations with Israel, and perhaps those with other regional parties, by establishing good neighbor relations and paving the way for a healthy and positive role for the Palestinian people in the new regional order. This would in turn eliminate in large part the despair of the remaining Palestinian refugees, as they would perceive such a state as their political ka'aba, and it would satisfy their yearning for political identity. This strategic breakthrough would need to be coupled with the United States taking an active role in leading the international community to convince Israel to accept the return of a negotiated number of refugees while initiating a simultaneous compensation process particularly for those who do not wish or are unable to return. In fact, nothing is new in this scenario as far as Israel is concerned. Following the establishment of the Israeli state in 1948, Israel offered to take back 100,000 Palestinian refugees which was only a small fraction of the more than 960,000 refugees at that time. Dr. Nabeel Sha’ath of the PLO and PNA stated to the English daily newspaper The Independent that Israel had to accept back 100,000 Palestinians of the Galilee. Though the size of the negotiated number should naturally be left to the negotiating parties, I feel that an acceptable number would be approximately 20 percent of the total current number, a figure which is not far from the percentage offered by Israel in 1949. Moreover, the increased absorption capacity of the Israeli state and infrastructure should logically serve as a factor deciding the number of return refugees. On the other hand, the second move should aim at convincing host countries, particularly Lebanon, to grant full civil and political rights to the Palestinian refugees who may not wish or be able to return.

At the same time, a well-defined committee with a clear mandate, clear term of reference, and a clear operational mechanism should be set up to work out a program for compensation to the non-returning refugees as well as to returning refugees for the damages they had suffered during their diaspora. This program could be similar to the “Widergutmachung” program, which means in English “to make something good again,” as the Jews themselves asked for and accepted while settling their claims from Germany in the aftermath of World War II.[352] In addition the work on these pivots — return of a negotiated number of refugees and a compensation program should be synchronized by a geared-up and proper Palestinian internal strategy whereby the refugees should be deeply involved. A plebiscite may be held to determine how many refugees would actually want to exercise their right of return. The pivots and this work are interconnected and are bound to soothe mutterings of the refugee communlity and thus reinforce the positive course of the whole issue. This multifaceted but simple, coherent solution will not only establish peace but also cement its foundation, consolidate its structure, and raise a historical edifice that eclipses the hatred of yesterday.

The major twin moves — the return of refugees and compensation and the establishment of a Palestinian sovereign state — are quite feasible. The first implies the return of a negotiated number of refugees which will not upset the demographic balance of Israel as well as compensation, which is incomparable with the huge amount of resources which will drift away to such expenses as armaments if peace eludes us.

While the second is enjoying the merit of objectivity, the Palestinian refugees — if the sequence of solution is maintained — will work on the following two lince. First, they will plunge into action to build their state directly and indirectly, i.e., their political “Ka’aba” and economy. Particularly several hundred thousand of them are classified as semi-skilled and skilled labor, technicians, professionals, industrialists, merchants, contractors and so on. They operate as individuals or through companies and professional associations. They are most eager to make a substantial contribution to their national economy as soon as the opportunity arises. Secondly, they will get themselves integrated into a rising crescendo of regional economic cooperation, which by nature gradually lessens the importance of geographic and national boundries. This could successfully imitate the European experience in the aftermath of World War 11, thus ushering new horizons of cooperation. This could transform the Middle East tremendously and render it a real paradise on Earth.

[334] Yusif A. Sayigh, “Development Strategics for the Palestinian Development Program,” Department of Economic Affairs and Planning (Tunis, 1993).

[335] Sami Hadawi, The Palestinian Rights and Losses in 1948: A Comprehensive Study (London: Saqi Books, 1998).

[336] Ibid.

[337] Ibid.

[338] The Palestinian Encyclopedia, Vol. 1, Part 2, p. 339.

[339] Elia Zureik, “Palestinian Refugees and Peace,” Journal of Palestine Studies 24 (1) (Autumn 1994): 10.

[340] Ibid., p. 10.

[341] Mohammed Khalid Ai Aza’ar, “The Palestinian Right of Return. Between the International Resolutions and the Actual Restrictions.” Cairo: Al Falloja Center for Studies and Publications (June 1992), p. 13.

[342] Ahmed Al-Sayed Al-Najar, “‘Compensation and The Right of Return in the Palestinian-Israeli Negotiations,” Al Falloja Center for Studies and Publications (June 1992), p. 1.

[343] Taisir Amre, “The File of the Palestinian Refugees,” unpublished work, Department of Economic Affairs and Planning of PLO, Tunis (April 1992).

[344] Shlomo Ben-Ami, “‘Opening Remarks, Middle East Peace Negotiations, Multilateral Working Group on Refugees” (Ottawa, November 11, 1992).

[345] Ibid.

[346] Taisir Amre, “The File of the Palestinian Refugees,” unpublished work, Department of Economic Affairs and Planning of PLO, Tunis (April 1992).

[347] Zureik, “Palestinian Refugees and Peace,” p. 8.

[348] Adelman, “Overview of the Refugee Problem, The Working Group on Refugees,” a paper presented at Vouliagmeni IGCC Conference, November 4–8, 1994, p. 3.

[349] Al-Aza’ar, “The Palestinian Right of Return,” p. 14.

[350] Taisir Amre, “The File of the Palestinian Refugees,” unpublished work, Department of Economic Affairs and Planning of PLO, Tunis (April 1992).

[351] Yusif A. Sayigh, “Development Strategies for the Palestinian Development Program,” Department of Economic Affairs and Planning (Tunis, 1993).

[352] Atef Qubrisi. in Hadawi, “‘The Palestinian Rights and Losses.” Chapter 5.

 14. Refugee Resettlement in the Gaza Strip: Israeli Policy Revisited

[[Norma Masrieh-Hazboun]]

Discussion of the resettlement of the Palestinian refugees coincides with what is currently happening in Lebanon, where the issue of the Palestinian presence has been reopened after a period of more than ten years. This topic is especially pertinent at this time in light of attempts to isolate the problem of the Palestinian refugees in Lebanon and other host countries from the political changes currently taking place in the region. There is also an attempt to make this problem a local, internal issue instead of recognizing it as part of the overall problem in the Middle East — the dimensions of which have grown exponentially throughout the Palestinian people’s struggle toward a just and comprehensive settlement. Unfortunately, the majority of explicit and implicit international and Israeli positions disregard the international legitimacy of the Palestinian claims, as well as the human aspects and historical injustice done to an entire population. Today, Lebanon, for example, is concerned about the resettlement of the Palestinian refugees on its land. Instead of working to solve the problem, Lebanon is fearful of repercussions on internal equilibrium, that is, on the political, social, economic, and humanitarian impact the refugees make on the country.

The question of the Palestinian refugees revolves around the interconnected cause of a people, land, and homeland. This is what gives the Palestinian refugees a unique posture differing from that of other refugee experiences in four vital respects:

1. They differ in the nature of their uprootedness. The majority of the Palestinians became refugees in what Weinstock described as “a deviant pattern of colonization.”[353]

1. They differ in that the Palestinian refugees insist on return, and this insistence gives them a unique posture. As such, they see themselves not as refugees, but as very temporary absentees, whose situation can only be rectified through restitution and not resettlement.

1. They differ in their unique collectivity, which the refugees have managed to maintain, that revolves around the Palestinian idea, both culturally and politically.

1. They differ in that the struggle and persistence of the Palestinian refugees has fueled Palestinian nationalism. As such, the Palestinian refugees have been asserting the broad collective will of an entire people for self-determination and independence.[354]

The doves in the Israeli Labor Party are competing with the hawks in rejecting the “right of return” for the Palestinian refugees. Both call for resettlement, rehabilitation, and integration into the Arab host countries — a solution that is unacceptable to the refugees themselves who view the distinction between return and resettlement as that between resolution and liquidation.

The topic of the return of the 1948 refugees has become taboo in Israel.

We do not sense any serious differences among the Israelis with regard to this issue. The Israelis seem to feel that the “right of return” applies exclusively to them.[355] They feel that the indigenous population of Palestine has no right even to consider their “right of return.” The Israelis seem to be in complete consensus, so much so that this issue does not appear in Barak’s four “No’s,” pronounced as a precondition for commencing the final status negotiations:

1. No for the division of Jerusalem;

1. No for Israeli withdrawal to pre June 1967 borders;

1. No for the existence of any foreign army on the banks of the River Jordan; and

1. No for the dismantling of the settlements.

This rejectionist policy has been followed for the last fifty years: It has left questions, rather than convincing answers. The question of how to resolve the problem of the Palestinian refugees has remained unresolved due to the steadfast positions taken by the two parties struggling over the issue. As a result, this problem is considered to be the longest-standing one in modern history, not withstanding other unresolved refugee situations throughout the world; many have argued that the Palestinian refugee problem crisis is unresolvable.

There is a total agreement between Palestinians and Arab governments on the final status issues; namely, Jerusalem, restitution, borders, and water. Palestinians and the Arab governments have underscored the “right of return” of the refugees and reject all attempts to resettle the refugees in Arab countries, or resolutions that call for either rehabilitation or reparations.

With the commencement of the final status negotiations between the Palestinians and Israelis, the refugee question emerges as a point of agreement among the Arabs.[356] Resettlement is rejected as an alternative to the return of the refugees to their homeland, Palestine. United Nations Resolutions 194 and 237 represent international legitimacy for the “right of return” of the Palestinian refugees, viewed as a Palestinian solution that embodies the justness of any international resolution.[357]

There is a huge gap between the Palestinian and Israeli positions in the multilateral negotiations regarding the question of the refugees. During the negotiations, the Israeli delegation reiterated that the refugee question poses a threat to the security and existence of Israel. Not only do the Israelis want to prevent the Palestinians from returning to their lands and properties in Israel proper, but they also deny the “right of return” to a future Palestinian state. They claim that this would create pressures on the Palestinian economy and on the regional environmental equilibrium, which could in turn threaten the peace agreement between the two parties. Their approach to return would be limited to a “reunion of Palestinian families.”

Resettlement of the Palestinian refugees is a controversial issue. There are diverse points of view, many position papers, and a wealth of written material. Rather than reiterate the arguments I have chosen to discuss one specific issue: the resettlement of Gazan refugees.

Most studies on the Palestinian refugees examine the creation of the refugee situation. However, few, if any, have looked into the resolution of this problem. Too many of the proposed solutions, policies, and measures undertaken to eradicate the Palestine refugee question do not effectively deal with the political and legal rights of the refugees. This issue is an old-new paradigm. An economic approach to the solution of the refugee question was first proposed in the 1950s and a similar approach is being advocated today in the current peace negotiations.[358] This approach smacks of Israeli- Western collusion.

Robert McGhee, an advisor on refugee problems in the US State Department, suggested a “Marshall Plan” for the Middle East; the resettlement of Palestinian refugees in the Arab states was an integral part of this plan. He suggested that “Trans-Jordan, Syria, and Iraq, in that order, offer the best opportunities for refugee resettlement, and the best approach for Arab governments would be to stress the development aspect for their benefit and not to stress the refugee aspect.”[359] Such proposals have been acceptable to the Israeli leadership as a means of ending the refugee question, despite the warning in 1959 made by Dag Hammarskjold when he addressed the General Assembly of the United Nations. He stated that the “integration of refugees in the host countries would not be possible, if it was brought about by forcing people into new positions against their will.”[360]

Between the years of 1949 and 1959, attempts by UNRWA to reintegrate Palestinian refugees did not succeed because more serious obstacles were encountered than had been anticipated. The General- Commissioner admitted that “UNRWA should not again attempt works projects designed to settle the refugees. From this experience, one should not conclude that economic development is not wanted by the people of the region; on the contrary, it is wanted and at an accelerated rate... and it should proceed independently of UNRWA, but not in the form of refugee resettlement.”[361]

In all negotiations and proposals regarding refugee resettlement, this strategy has failed for two reasons:

1. All resettlement proposals for Palestinian refugees identify the question as economic, requiring economic solutions; the political aspects of the question have been neglected. The refugees have been perceived, not as a “liability, but an asset for the future,” a reservoir of manpower, which, when combined with the economic potentialities of the area, could contribute to raising the standards of living in the whole region.[362] However, on a political level, they have been perceived as a threat to the stability and peace in the area that could be exploited by Communism and other radical movements.[363]

1. The Palestinian refugees have rejected any sort of permanent settlement outside Palestine. Their adherence to the “right of return” to their homes and properties has been expressed at two levels: (a) holding protest conferences and issuing communiques condemning the proposals and criticizing their initiators;[364] and (b) consolidating the collective identity of the Palestinian refugees as a survival strategy against all the political and socioeconomic restrictions imposed upon them.

In all the proposals for resettling refugees prior to the 1967 war, self-determination of the Palestine refugees and non-refugees was overlooked. For the West, the refugee question was not a priority on their agenda.

As a result of the failure of the resettlement strategy, UNRWA,[365] as the tool of the UN, “ceased to be prominent in the capitals of the affluent West. It was even raised in the US congress that UNRWA’s relief was helping to subsidize Palestinian commando groups ... but the main politics of the refugee situation were well beyond UNRWA’s purview or control.”[366]

The lesson that Israel and its Western partners must learn from the failure of the resettlement strategy before and after 1967 should come from their experience in resettling Gaza Strip refugees during the 1970s. This experience has challenged the Israeli authority’s belief that through relocation, “urbanization,” or “de-peasantization” the refugee numbers, and thus their resistance, would decline. More importantly, the Israeli authorities ignored the fact that “improving housing” has never been an alternative to a political solution nor a means to thwarting resistance. As the historical experience of Palestinian refugees has shown, repression escalates resistance, regardless of residential location. This theory has been affirmed by the relocated refugees in the Sheikh Radwan Resettlement Scheme in Gaza, one of the nine Israeli-sponsored resettlement schemes on the Gaza Strip: 95.6 percent of these refugees believe their conception of, and contribution to, the national struggle is as strong as it was prior to relocation, as was shown in the author’s previous research.[367]

The Gaza Strip has always been a priority whenever the issue of refugee resettlement has been raised, due to the socioeconomic problems there.

[368] These problems include the large concentration of refugees in a limited geographical area. The area comprises a mere 363 square kilometers and has a population density of 920 persons per square kilometer in 1952 which rose to 1850 persons per square kilometer in 1996. The refugees on the Gaza Strip are also highly militant, a trait which they developed under the Egyptian Administration and during the Israeli occupation of the Gaza Strip in the mid-1950s.[369]

While the improvement of the physical living conditions in the camps was always a thorny issue for the first generation, refugees from the second generation perceive the provision of basic services in the camps from a different perspective. Their perception is based on full awareness of their entitlement to adequate housing as recognized in a number of international human rights laws and their universal instruments. For example, Article 11.1 of the international Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, proclaims that “everyone [has a right] to an adequate standard of living for himself and his family, including adequate food, clothing and housing, and to the continuous improvement of living conditions.”[370]

In the case of the Palestinian refugees, enjoyment of these rights can be carried out without in any way affecting the permanent solution to the refugee question, which must be a political one. This begs the question of whether the Israeli authority’s aims in resettling the refugees in the Gaza Strip were humanitarian, or whether they connoted a link to the longstanding strategy of dispersion and control in the Zionist-Israeli ideology and practice. This question will be examined in some detail later.

The Palestinian refugees fall into the category of majority-identified refugees who are firm in their conviction that their opposition to the events is shared by the majority of their compatriots, rather than that of events- alienated refugees and exiles or self-alienated persons. Moreover, their attitudes toward displacement place them in reactive-fate groups, rather than purpose groups.[371]

The Palestinians who were exiled in 1948 were a highly family-oriented society that gave precedence to informal and personal ties. The Palestinian family is an influential unit, considered the dominant group structure, and is viewed as a critical part of the informal politics in the Middle East.[372]

The Palestinian family, as part of the Middle East culture, has proven “impossible to rupture or break.” This “invisible skeleton” has been the means and the motivator by which the Palestinians have been able to respond to the conditions of their exile and crisis, and to maximize their chances for survival.[373] Through such a society that is bound together, Palestinians, as Sa’id observed, have been able to “survive the ravages of our history, its tragic mistakes and misfortunes, and the destructive course of Israeli policies.”[374]

As survivors, it is not only the social dimension which stateless Palestinian families have managed to bridge through the creation of new social networks, it has also been the means by which Palestinian nationalism and identity are protected and preserved; it has served as a form of social psychology. Franz Fanon observed that the oppressed “develop in themselves a sense of conscious self-determination that is based on the discovery of their social needs.”[375] The strength of social ties among refugees is one factor, among others, which has created a new Palestinianism that has identified with Palestine and developed a growing Palestinian consciousness. This has been a cyclical reaction to the post-1948 era, of which the Intifada became a symbol, led mainly by the young leadership and children from the refugee camps.

Let us now consider a telling statement made by then Defense Minister Moshe Dayan in June 1973. “As long as the refugees remain in their camps ... their children will say they come from Jaffa or Haifa; if they move out of the camps, the hope is they will feel an attachment to their new land.”[376] The plan to eliminate the camps, and consequently the Palestinian refugee status, has been interpreted as having a dual political purpose, but the Palestinian resettlement has been delayed simply because of Israel’s preoccupation with security and its own guilt. Thus, the Zionist ideology of dispossession, continuing dispersion and transfer of Palestinian refugees and non-refugees, both pre-1948 and post-1967, provides a better understanding of the Israeli resettlement policy.[377] The Israeli authorities hoped that by doing away with the camps, they would remove the ugly evidence which exposes as a lie the Zionist slogan that Palestine is “a land without a people, for a people without a land.”

Moreover, Israeli measures to resettle Gazan Strip refugees do not conform to their humanitarian claims. Instead, these measures can be interpreted as an integral part of modern counter-insurgency doctrines promoted by security considerations in response to revolutionary guerrilla warfare or insurgency. It becomes clear that the conflicting statements given by the Israeli authorities regarding the resettlement schemes in the Gaza Strip[378] reflect political, rather than humanitarian, policies toward dispersion and control.[379] Responses from refugees in the camps to the resettlement schemes in a sample survey reflect a full awareness of the political motives and dimensions of these schemes (72.5 percent at the Shati’ camp, and 74.4 percent in the Sheikh Radwan Resettlement Scheme).[380]

In the context of a counter-insurgency strategy, resettlement is perceived as part of a “civic action” to counter-organize the population after the destruction of a guerrilla organization. It is a policy that follows the French concept that emphasizes “destruction must be followed by construction.”[381]

the real motives behind the Israeli resettlement schemes in the Gaza Strip. These schemes were set up after the crackdown on the Fedayeen (Freedom fighters) in 1971, through the then head of the Southern Command in the Gaza Strip, Ariel Sharon’s, roadwidening operations in the large camps in the Strip.[382] The long-term objectives of these operations were to liquidate the refugee camps and the refugees as a category and thus eliminate the core of the Palestinian question and, in the long run, to attempt to promote the Israeli resettlement schemes and enhance the military authority’s control over the camps. This combination of security and resettlement strategy was confirmed in the Ministry of Defense report on the occupied territories, which stated: “the slackening of terrorist activities in 1971 made possible the implementation of Israel’s rehabilitation programme.”[383]

The contradictory statements of the Israeli authorities nevertheless provide ample evidence of ulterior motives toward the policy to impose control over the refugee community and quell their resistance to occupation. The major concern of the Israeli authorities has been to retain the Strip, but with a minimum of number of refugees. This policy makes provision for refugee families to relocate to homes outside the camps; however, before a family is allowed to do so, several conditions must be met. (1) the family must have a down-payment toward purchasing a home outside the camp, (2) they must currently reside in a refugee camp, and (3) the camp shelter must be demolished. This Israeli resettlement policy has two implications. First, it leaves the refugees only a limited opportunity to re-accommodate themselves, and secondly, it promotes the purchasing of houses or plots of land in the resettlement projects, thus projecting a coercive aspect onto the resettlement projects.

An example of the considerable coercion used in achieving relocation is cited in the General-Commissioner’s Report of 1987. In the Jabalia and Rafah camps, bulldozing activities left shelters isolated and completely surrounded by mounds of sand higher than the shelters themselves, thus making it extremely difficult for the families to remain and live normal lives.[384] This left as their only option to purchase home plots, which the authorities could allocate to them.

The UNRWA and UN positions toward refugee resettlement in the Gaza Strip has been to deny “the fact that people are being forced to move from the camps,” as stated by Ronald Davidson, former deputy director of UNRWA in an interview with a New York Times correspondent.[385]

One of the main criticisms made by UNRWA regarding the Israeli resettlement scheme was that demolition of the family’s camp shelter was a precondition for obtaining a new home. In the annual reports of the General-Commissioner, emphasis is placed on this issue more than on the difficulties the refugees face due to relocation. UNRWA’s protest was voiced by Davidson who stated that camp shelters are UN property needed for the growing refugee population, and their demolition would further increase the housing shortage in the camps.[386]

The Israeli official response to this complaint from the Defense Ministry was “of course, we demolish them. The whole point of the project is to get rid of the refugee camps.”[387] In addition, the Israeli Government position has been that materials from demolished shelters should be used by refugees in new construction outside the camps, thus relieving congestion in the camps.[388]

Fragmentation of extended families through relocation, brought about by the initial dispersal strategy, raised concern of family reunification among the Sheikh Radwan refugees who seek to live with others from the same village or town in order to form new patterns of concentration. The initial dispersion strategy was conducted by Israeli authorities for a variety of political and logistical reasons, and the break-up of extended families was justified on such grounds. Even so, the refugees remained within the larger Palestinian family which retained cultural compatibility and accelerated the integration process, in marked contrast to resettlement processes experienced, for example, by Lithuanian and Vietnamese refugees in the USA.[389]

The resettlement schemes were set up with counter-insurgency strategies in mind. For example, the roads were made wide enough for use by military forces, and narrow alleyways avoided. Even so, the Israeli authorities aimed to minimize the refugees’ longings for return and pacify their resistance to occupation by providing improved housing conditions.

Nevertheless, the refugee’s role in the Palestinian national struggle, and their adherence to their “right of return” (83.3 percent in Sheikh Radwan Scheme and 90.7 percent in the Shati camp) have not been diminished by having been provided better housing conditions. On the contrary, Palestinian political mobilization has been sustained, and the Israeli counter-insurgency strategy proved counter-productive, particularly during the Intifada.

The greatest negative impact of the Israeli resettlement scheme is that it has created a feeling of alienation among relocated refugees, particularly among first-generation refugees (28.9%). This can be attributed to two fatal factors; the first is in not allowing the same mixture of refugees as in the camp, the second is in breaking up extended family groups that had formerly lived in the same village or town.

The Israeli resettlement policies in the Gaza Strip, designed to foster population dispersal, have created antagonism among the refugees who desire population concentration for personal reasons. This points up the contradictions that have developed between the principles established in the resettlement policies and the realities of the resettlement processes.[390]

The circumstances of the Israeli resettlement process have created a situation for the Palestinian refugees in the Gaza Strip that differ radically from those of other resettlement experiences in countries such as Algeria and Malaya.[391]

One shortcoming of the Israeli resettlement scheme is that “improving housing conditions” has never been an alternative to a political solution, nor a means of thwarting resistance. Historical experiences with the Palestinian refugees demonstrate that repression escalates resistance, regardless of residential location. Emanuel Marx has even argued that the Israeli-sponsored resettlement schemes in the Gaza Strip have increased the value of being a refugee there. Palestinian leaders in the Gaza strip were interviewed, and in these interviews they emphasized the fact that improved living conditions in the Gaza Strip did not affect the Palestinian national struggle. As one interviewee explained, “living in a tent, or under inhuman conditions, or a palace does not enhance or lessen national struggle and political consciousness; political consciousness has components other than type of housing.”[392]

Consequently, refugee resettlement in the Gaza Strip may require the use of a new set of conceptual lenses to understand some of the specific circumstances of resettlement that differ from similar experiences in other parts of the world. One unique characteristic of refugees in the Gaza Strip is that they feel the burden of occupation more than any other area in the occupied territories. Another is that direct Israeli control has helped in sharpening and consolidating the collective Palestinian cultural and political identity, enabling the refugees there to hold ground in the face of Israeli attacks during the Intifada.

Resettlement in other countries has been accomplished by isolating the settlement schemes from the locals through defensible borders. Yet, the scarcity of land in the Gaza Strip has not permitted resettling refugees in separate, distinct areas. Instead, the resettlements were constructed adjacent to the camps, which have maintained, to a high degree, the links between camps and the resettlements.

The Zionist movement tended to negate the history of the land (Palestine), except for the Jewish existence in it, and this is what has distinguished Zionism from other national movements, states Amon-Raz Karkoteskin, a Professor of Jewish history at Beer Sheva University. In this regard, the theological dimension connects directly with the political activity and the historical conception of the Arab-Israeli conflict. This consciousness provided an excuse for the expulsion of the Palestinians in 1948, the adoption of a denial stance, and for the concealment of expulsion in the Zionist legendary consciousness. The term “salvation from exile” for the Jews has been transformed into the source of legitimization of suppression and the continuation of the policy of land confiscation and setting-up of settlements, [393] and even the expulsion of hundreds of thousands of Palestinians.[394]

Though there are some major differences between the situations in Kosovo and Palestine, basic similarities exist between the two. Both crises resulted from political decisions, whose architects found it easy to use uprooting techniques to expel a people from their original homeland for the purpose of achieving short-term and short-sighted political gains.

There is a question to be raised here. If the United States led NATO in a long war to force Slobodan Molosevic to accept the return of nearly one million Albanian refugees to their homes in Kosovo, why is the world’s sole superpower not doing the same to assist more than four million Palestinian refugees dispersed worldwide to return to their homeland? This again raises the question of a “double standard” — a factor that should be considered by the international community in dealing with conflicts worldwide.

Palestinian historian Mohammad Darwazeh eloquently declared: “We Palestinians were not defeated in 1948. When we deny the outcome of an event... When we attempt to change it... When we cling on to our rights, history, memories and identity ... we are not defeated. Defeat comes from the inside, and when we are defeated from the inside, we are truly defeated. Do we consider the legions of Palestinian martyrs and heroes defeated?”[395]

I would like to expand on Darwazeh’s impassioned cry. Do we consider the rejection of resettlement by refugees, inside Palestine and in the Diaspora, defeat? The unshakable belief in our rights, which is the backbone of Palestinian refugees and non-refugees alike, does not nullify the possibility of bringing about a historical reconciliation that has international legitimacy. The plight of the Palestinian refugees, created by the Jews, who themselves rejected “exile,” is based on the Jews’ views of historical right and principles. Both principles were interconnected with theology, later transformed into political policy with the advent of political Zionism. Karkoteskin observes that, “The reality of alienation and exile consciousness are the lot of the Palestinians today.”[396]

When Ahmad Zweil, the Egyptian-born recipient of the Nobel Prize for Chemistry for 1999, was asked about his acceptance of a prize from The Wolf Foundation, one of the scientific centers in Israel, he stated that he believed in the universality of science, and its resistance to narrow concepts.[397] Let us, too, call upon universality; universality in the concept of salvation. The refuge we all seek is protection from forces that wrench us away from security and comfort, physical and mental, which give dignity and meaning to human existence.[398]

We are so in need of a brighter world, one offering adequate refuge to all its inhabitants, and one that eradicates the roots of injustice inflicted on the Palestinian refugees. True justice for the Palestinians and Israelis means living in security — the fundamental social contract any government makes with its people. However, with the ending of the Cold War, the treatment of the refugees will be the litmus test of any new economic order, since no amount of material goods or technological know-how can compensate for human irresponsibility and injustice.

The dream of a society ruled by reason, security, and justice is a dream as old as civilized man. It does not have to be an impossible dream.

[353] Nathan Weinstock, “The Impact of Zionist Colonization on Palestinian Arab Society Before 1948,” Journal of Palestine Studies (Winter 1973): 51.

[354] Norma Masriyyeh Hazboun, The Resettlement of the Palestinian Refugees of the Gaza Strip. Unpublished Doctoral Thesis (Leeds: The University of Leeds, Department of Politics, 1994), pp.7–8.

[355] A Russian Jew, for example, who has no link with Palestine, immigrates to Israel, receiving full support, starting with reception at the airport and provision of accommodation and a job that suits his/her qualifications.

[356] The Arab support for the refugees question, their ‘Tight of return” and rejection of resettlement, in line with international legitimacy, was manifested at the meeting of The Council of Arab Foreign Ministers, held in Cairo on September 12, 1999.

[357] The UN General Assembly Resolution 194 of December 11, 1948. Article 11 reads: “Resolves that the refugees wishing to return to their neighbors should be permitted to do so at the earliest practical date, and that compensation should be paid for the property of those choosing not to return and for loss of or damage to property which, under principles of international law or in equity, should be made good by the Governments or authorities responsible.

[358] Henry Cattan, Palestine and the Arabs and Israel (London: Longman, Green and Co., 1969), pp. 142–3.

[359] Foreign Relations of the United States (1949), p. 908. Many resettlement proposals were passed at this early period (1949–59); for example: “The Blandford Scheme of 1950,” adopted by UNRWA; “Dulles Proposal of 1955”; “Eisenhower Proposal” of 1957; and “Hammarskjold’s Plan” of 1959.

[360] Fayez Sayigh, Mashrou Hamarshold Wa Qadiyat al-Laji’in (The Refugee Question and Hammarskjold’s Project). (Beirut: Dar al — Fajr al-Jadid, 1959), pp. 36–7.

[361] United Nations, Annual Report of the Commissioner — General of the UNRWA, July 1, 1961 — June 30, 1962 (GA, Official Records: 17th Session, Supplement No. 14 [A/52/14], New York, 1962), p. 2.

[362] Sayigh, The Refugee Question and Hammarskjold’s Project, p. 36.

[363] S. G. Thicknesse, Arab Refugees: A Survey of Resettlement Possibilities (London and New York: Royal Institute of International Affairs, 1949), p. 8.

[364] Conferences were held by the Executive Committees of the Refugees in Gaza (March 24, 1952); in Syria (March 26, I952); in Bethlehem and Hebron Districts Camps (February 8, 1952); in Jerusalem (July 20, 1955); in Beirut (June 26, 1959 and July 12, 1959).

[365] The United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (UNRWA) was established according to General Assembly

Resolution 302 of December 8, 1949 (Article 22). It began its operations on I May, 1950. Its mandate includes the care of refugees — inside and outside the camps with relief services, shelter, social assistance, health and education care. These services apply to the five field offices where UNRWA operates — Jordan, Lebanon, Syria, the West Bank, and Gaza Strip; they are known as the host countries (UN, 1986), p. 25.

[366] David Forsythe, “The Palestine Question: Dealing with a Long-Term Refugee Situation,” ANNALS (May 1983), p. 97.

[367] Norma Masriyyeh Hazboun, “Refugee Resettlement: The Gaza Strip Experience, “ Palestine-Israel Journal of Politics, Economics and Culture (Autumn 1995): 63–4.

[368] In 1997, for example, the estimated incidence of poverty in Gaza Strip was 51 percent in the south of the Gaza Strip, compared to 31 percent in the north and the city of Gaza. More than 38 percent of Gaza Strip households live below the poverty line.

[369] The Israeli occupation of the Gaza Strip began on October 30, 1956 and lasted until March 12, 1957. For more details see : E. L.M. Burns, Between Arab and Israeli (Toronto: Clarke, Irwin and Company, 1969), pp. 136–49.

[370] The United Nations, The Human Rights to adequate Housing (New York: UN, 1994), p. 5.

[371] Egon Kunz, “Exile and Resettlement: Refugee Theory,” International Migration Review (Spring-Summer, 1981): 43M.

[372] James Bill and C. Leiden, Politics in the Middle East, 2nd edn. (Boston: Little, Brown and Company, 1984), p. 77.

[373] Ibid.

[374] Edward Said, “Palestine, Then and Now: An Exile’s Journey Through Israel and the Occupied Territories,” Harper’s Magazine (December 1992), p. 54.

[375] Honi Bhabha, “Review of Franz Fanon and the Psychology of Oppression,” Race and Class (Winter 1987): 84.

[376] The Jerusalem Post, June 13, 1973.

[377] A case in point is the Israeli measures in occupied East Jerusalem, involving withdrawal of identity documents (IDs) of Palestinian families; these withdrawals escalated alarmingly year after year — 1,300 families in Jerusalem losing their IDs every year.

[378] Conflicting statements by Israeli officers indicate the hidden agenda behind setting up the resettlement schemes in Gaza Strip; for example: Major Amir Cheshin told a New York Times correspondent “that the idea behind the schemes is less security and more humanitarian” (The New York Times, November 24, 1976); Whereas Moshe Dayan stated that the result of the resettlement policy is to make Gaza Strip refugees in name only (The New York Times, April 2, 1974).

[379] Emanuel Marx, ‘‘Palestinian Refugee Camps in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip,” Middle Eastern Studies (April 1992): 292.

[380] Hazboun, “Refugee Resettlement/’ p. 139.

[381] John McCuen, The Art of Counter — Revolutionary War, the Strategy of Counte-Insurgency (London: Faber and Faber, 1966), pp. 128, 152–66.

[382] According to UNRWA statistics, 10,794 rooms were demolished (affecting 3,941 families 24,067 persons), in the three large camps — Jabalia, al-Shati', and Rafah (UNRWA, 1991).

[383] Ministry of Defense, Judea-Samaria and the Gaza District: A Sixteen-Year Survey (1967–1983) (November, 1983), p. 56.

[384] United Nations, Annual Report of the Commissioner — General of the UNRWA, July 1, 1985-June 30, 1986 (GA, Official Records: 41st Session, Supplement No. 13 [A/41/13], New York, 1987), p. 17.

[385] The New York Times, November 24, 1976.

[386] United Nations 1987, p. 17, see note 33; and United Nations, Annual Report of the Commissioner General of the UNRWA, July 1, 1976-June 30, 1977 (GA, Official Records: 32nd Session, Supplement No. 13 [A/32/13], New York, 1978), p. 23. Up to June 1989, 7,764 rooms were demolished as a precondition for relocation to the resettlement schemes.

[387] The Jerusalem Post, October 19, 1988.

[388] United Nations 1987, p. 17.

[389] L. Baskauskas, "The Lithuanian Refugee Experience," International Migration Review (Summer 1981): 282–3; and David Haines, "Family and Community Among Vietnamese Refugee," International Migration Review (Summer 1981): 310–13.

[390] Hazboun, “Refugee Resettlement,” p. 234.

[391] The objectives of the resettlement experiences in these two countries was to separate the civilian population from the insurgents. To ensure such separation, two methods have become customary since 1945: “either by erecting a physical barrier against guerrilla infiltration in the manner of the French “Morice Line” in Algeria ... or by resettlement of the civilian population, e.g. Malaya (1948 1960), the Boers in South Africa (1900 1902). (For more details see: Ian Beckett and John Pimlott (eds.), Armed Forces and Modern Counter-Insurgency (New York: St. Martin’s Press, 1985), pp. 11, 59.

[392] At the end of 1997, Israel’s Interior Ministry released the figures of settlers in the West Bank and Gaza Strip (including East Jerusalem), which amounted to 321,000 settlers in 144 settlements. Sham Newsletter, February 1998.

[393] Interview, July 7, 1991.

[394] Amnon-Raz Karkoteskin, “as-sahyuniyyah, ‘ath-thiyolojiyyah, wa z-sdiwaji- hhat al-qawmiyyh: mutadiyyinum wa Timaniyyn fi israil,” al-Karmel (Spring 1997): 204–8.

[395] al-Ayyam, September 17, 1999.

[396] Karkoteskin, al-Karmel (Spring 1997): 213.

[397] al-Ayyam, October 30, 1999.

[398] Aung San Suukyi, Towards a True Refugee (Oxford: The Refugee Studies Programme, 1993), p. 11.The majority of explicit and implicit international and Israeli positions disregard international legitimacy, human aspects, and historical injustice done to an entire population. The distinction between “return” and “resettlement” is that between resolution and liquidation.

 15. Palestinian Refugees in Lebanon since 1982

Kais M. Firro

This chapter investigates the social, economic, and legal situation of the Palestinian refugees in Lebanon since 1982. Three topics will be discussed: the impact on the refugees of the departure of the PLO from Lebanon; the relations between the Lebanese and the Palestinian refugees after 1982, and finally, the connection between the experience from the past and the current peace process. Combining these three topics, this chapter argues that the Palestinians were pushed into a state of marginalization even more severe than that they had experienced in the period 1948–69.

In 1995, Rosemary Sayigh wrote that the marginalization of the refugee issue in Lebanon was a result of the Madrid conference of 1991 and the Oslo agreement of 1993:

Palestinians in Lebanon form a special case of the marginalization of the refugee issue began in Madrid and given the ... (PLO) stamp of approval at Oslo ... [The Palestinians] in Lebanon suffer from uncertainty about the future to a degree unparalleled elsewhere.[399]

Sayigh saw Madrid as the first step on the road to marginalizing the refugee issue, when James Baker’s “two-track” formula sidetracked it to a multilateral committee, thus weakening the historic legacy of the UN resolutions on refugees. According to her, “it was from this time that UNRWA and PLO aid to refugees in Lebanon began to decline.”[400] It is true that the Madrid conference can be seen as a turning point in the international treatment of the refugees' problem, but marginalization of the refugees in Lebanon had begun much earlier, in 1948–9 as a result of their dispossession and the way by which the international community treated them following the war of 1948 in Palestine. The fact that the UN failed to enforce the implementation of the Resolution 194 (III) of December 11, 1948 meant that the refugees were forced to remain in exile in a state of marginalization. However, when we compare the case of the refugees in Lebanon with that of refugees in other Arab countries, we realize that the Palestinians in Lebanon were deprived of many legal rights which prevented them integrating into the political and economic life of the country. The best way to understand the state of marginalization of the Palestinians is to contrast it to the UN treatment of refugee problems in other parts of the world. As we know, the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees (UNRWA) was established by Resolution 212 (III), November 19, 1948, and 302 (IV), December 8, 1949, of the UN General Assembly "to plan and implement a relief programme and to seek the aid of UN Specialized Agencies and Non Governmental Organizations (NGOs)."[401] UNRWA was to provide "temporary" assistance to prevent conditions of famine and distress. In this sense, UNRWA's mandate was to help the refugees until a peace agreement had been reached. The "temporary" mandate of UNRWA resulted in the exclusion of the Palestinian refugees from the implementation of the famous Convention of 1951. This Convention offers refugees significant economic and social rights protecting refugees against discrimination in employment, labor legislation, and social security. Palestinian refugees are excluded by Paragraph D of the Convention's first article which states that its provisions shall not apply to persons who are at present receiving from organs or agencies of United Nations other than the United Nations High Commissioner of Refugees protection or assistance.[402]

The 1951 Convention provides protection and security to refugees in the host country before their repatriation. It is this exclusion from the 1951 convention, combined with their legal status in Lebanon, that has marginalized the Palestinians in Lebanon.

From 1968 the relationship between the Palestinians and Lebanon began to change as the PLO began to establish bases in south Labanon and refugee camps from which guerrilla units attacked Israeli targets. As result of these attacks, the Israeli army shelled Lebanese villages. Attacks and counter attacks escalated further in December when Palestinians hijacked an Israeli plane in Athens, leading Israeli commandos to land at Beirut airport and destroy thirteen aircrafts of the Lebanese airline. In spring 1969, the Lebanese army tried to stop the PLO's military activities so as not to give Israel cause for further attacks on Lebanese territory. In October the Lebanese army launched an operation against the PLO to restore "Lebanese sovereignity." But because of pressures from the Lebanese leftist parties and from almost all the Arab states, the commander of the Lebanese army met with Yasir Arafat in Cairo to negotiate an agreement regulating the relations between the two sides. From I to3 November 1969, Arafat and the commander of the Lebanese army negotiated an agreement which enabled the PLO to legitimize its presence in Lebanon and documented the rights of Palestinian refugees in the country.

Thus the period from 1969 to 1982 was exceptional, in that the Cairo agreement redefined the general basis of the regulations of the Palestinian presence in Lebanon, granting them the right to employment and residency according to UN and Arab League decisions, to which Lebanon had agreed. Although the agreement on November 3, 1969 focused on keeping in check Palestinian weapons, and placing limits on the areas in which armed forces could operate, it empowered the PLO to administer the camps. Subsequently, the PLO could address the civil, social, and economic requirements of the refugees. Meanwhile the agreement stipulated that the Palestinians had the right to work, reside, and circulate freely in Lebanon. The PLO was enabled to impose this redefinition on Lebanon as an outcome of a shift in the internal balance of forces.

When the internal balance of forces had shifted again in 1982, the Palestinians faced a new balance of power in which their general base collapsed and in 1989 the Agreement of 1969 was abrogated. The legal status of the Palestinian refugees in Lebanon was then reverted back to what it had been between 1948 and 1969.

It is worth noting here that from 1983 to 1987, the PLO made substantial efforts to stay in touch with the refugees in Lebanon, possibly with two objectives in mind. First, to ensure an independent role of the PLO as the sole representative of all Palestinians, including all refugees in Lebanon. Second, to protect the safety and security of the Palestinians in Lebanon and alleviate their economic hardship. It was the “war of the camps” between Arafat’s followers and the Shi’ite militia of Amal in 1985–7 which undermined this PLO strategy. The remaining offices of PLO in Beirut were shut down and the flow of military and economic assistance to the Palestinians in Lebanon became more difficult. At a fringe meeting of the Arab Ministers’ Council in Cairo in May 1991, the PLO and the Lebanese government reached an understanding by which the former recognized the extension of Lebanese authority over the camps while Lebanon promised to facilitate the flow of humanitarian aid to the refugees. A tripartite ministerial committee was established to investigate the situation in the camps. However, the Oslo Declaration of Principles (DoP) led Lebanon in 1992 to withdraw from any further contact with Arafat. The DoP was seen by Syria and Lebanon as a violation of the principles of a united Arab stance, as expressed at the Madrid Conference. [403]

One result of the DoP was that the tripartite ministerial committee was scuttled and Lebanese officials ceased to respond to even some of the most basic humanitarian needs in the camps, notably rehousing for the displaced refugees. Restoring the legal status of the years 1948–69, the Lebanese government insisted on re-establishing full control over the refugees. The two governments of Lebanon since 1992 conducted approximately the same policies toward refugee problem, which enjoyed a broad consensus among the main Lebanese political forces.

In addition to official policies, the refugees face cuts in UNRWA’s services. While international donors increased their financing of projects in the West Bank and Gaza, they provided less aid for UNRWA, which resulted in a cumulative deficit of approximately 50 million dollars in 1996.[404] In 1993 UNRWA warned the international community not to forget the refugees, because otherwise they would turn away from peace. UNRWA’s financial difficulties could not meet the needs of the camps, where by now most public services had ceased to exist and housing conditions no longer fulfilled the most basic requirement of providing shelter. Shortages of water and electricity, open sewage, and unpaved flooded roads are only part of the heavy burden placed on UNRAW's agencies. Lebanese restrictions on employment of Palestinians — exacerbated by the fact that refugees had lost their posts in the PLO's medical and economic institutions, which had collapsed — meant that unemployment rose from 35 percent in 1992 to more than 40 percent in 1995.[405] According to other sources, unemployment in 1996 was 50–65 percent.[406] Palestinian education in Lebanon almost entirely collapsed. Only 41 elementary and 35 preparatory schools of UNRWA remained. Even UNRWA had lost 11 of its schools in Lebanon during the years of the upheaval.[407] Since 1982, medical services have sharply declined. The Palestine Red Crescent Society (PRCS) and URWA both offered medical services to Palestinians. Because of the decline in PRCS' services, UNRWA was unable to meet the health requirements, though its health budget increased by 7.5 percent from 1993 to 1995.[408]

The Lebanese government finds itself confronted with these miserable conditions of the refugees while it attempts to rebuild its own economy. More importantly, providing assistance to the refugees, when final status negotiations are being deliberated, would be interpreted in and outside Lebanon as creating conditions for permanent resettlement (Tawtiri) of the approximtely 400,000 Sunni Palestinians there. Thus, it would be seen as pre-empting the future negotiations between Israel and the Palestinian Authority on the refugees question and undermining the refugees' "right of return," and thereby further destabilizing the "demographic balance." which is vital for the survival of the country's political system. Thus Lebanese governments since 1992 have approached the Palestinians with a policy of maintaining the status quo, which means rejection of any assistance which would lead to al-Tawtin and rejection of a resumption of any Palestinian military activities in Lebanon.

The Lebanese campaign of November 1999 against the attempt of Palestinian organizations to resume military training in the camps reflects the characteristics of the relationship of the Palestinians with Lebanon. Perhaps the PLO or other Palestinian organizations in Lebanon are attempting to impose new game rules in Lebanon in order to influence the ongoing negotiations between Israel and the PA on the "final status," per chance to improve the highly inadequate conditions of the camps within Lebanon.[409]

In my view, Palestinians in Lebanon today cannot reverse their current marginalization to a situation similar to that of the 1970s. During the 1970s, the success of Palestinians in securing control over the camps and enhancing economic processes was linked directly to the weakness of the Lebanese polity to deal with Palestinian issues. Today, with Syrian backing and the political atmosphere created by the departure of the PLO in 1982, the agreement of Ta'if in 1989, the Madrid conference in 1991 and the Oslo process since 1993 put the Palestinians and Lebanese in a zerosum game, as Weighill puts it:

Interaction between political representatives of refugees and the government [of Lebanon] ... develops into a zero-sum situation in which any prerogative or control secured by the refugees is interpreted as an encroachment on the power of the government.[410]

As a result of the departure of the PLO from Lebanon in 1982, Palestinian decision-making was shifted to Tunisia and other places outside Lebanon. Meanwhile, changes in the internal situation in Lebanon had put the Palestinian refugees in Lebanon in a state of passive accommodation, letting outside factors decide their future. The peace process has further marginalized the Palestinians in Lebanon. The absence of Lebanon from multilateral committees has also added confusion among the refugees of Lebanon. Since 1994, anti-Palestinian rhetoric, which had previously been less prominent, began to be accepted in the political discourse in Lebanon even amongst the Sunnis and Druzes, the traditional supporters of the "Palestinian cause." In a meeting with the Palestinian delegation in early 1994, Prime Minister Rafiq al-Hariri acknowledged the existence of an official plan to reduce the number of Palestinians in Lebanon. In the summer of 1995, the authorities issued new regulations requiring Palestinians to obtain re-entry visas before traveling, while those who were already outside the country were not allowed to return without a re-entry visa from a Lebanese embassy. In most cases this was not granted.[411] Faris Buwayz, the ex-foreign minister, suggested in 1996 to distribute the refugees between the territories of the Palestinian Authority and those Arab countries where they had families and relatives. Meanwhile, it would not be a bad idea to facilitate ongoing emigration to Canada, Australia, and the US.[412]

Two examples will serve to illustrate the situation that the refugees have been facing since 1994. The one is related to the building of new housing for displaced Palestinians in the Lebanese village of Quraya in August 1994. The project led to a debate among Lebanese leaders about al-Tawtin (the resettlement) of the Palestinians in Lebanon, which by now had covered hundreds of pages in the Lebanese press. The debate on al-Tawtin came into the spotlight after Barak's promise to withdraw Israeli troops from the security zone in South Lebanon and to re-start Israeli-Palestinian negotiations on "the permanent status." In a speech on Lebanese Independence Day, November 22, 1999, President Emile Lahud stressed the urgent demand of Lebanon to solve the problem of the refugees in Lebanon but rejected any compromise that would lead to al-Tawtin.

The second example concerns the issue of Abu al-'Aynayin, a Fatah leader in Lebanon who was given the death sentence in September 1999 by a Lebanese court. As a result, in early November 1999 Fatah began military training of its members in the Ayen al-Helua camp, fearing that the Lebanese authorities would "attack the camp with the pretext to capture Abu al-'Aynayin." The renewal of the military presence within the refugee camps immediately raised the whole issue of the Palestinian-Lebanese relations and their historical experiences since the 1960s. Both the Quray'a and Abu al-'Aynayin episodes have put the Ta'if agreement of 1989 to the test, with respect to the whole question of the presence of the Palestinians in Lebanon and their future.

There are at least about 370,000 UNRWA registered Palestinians living in Lebanon. About half of them live in camps (twelve in total; five in South Lebanon, one in Beirut, three in Mt. Lebanon, two in North Lebanon, and one in Beqa'a). It is important to recall that during the civil war three camps were completely destroyed. Even those camps that remained have been partly destroyed by Israeli invasions and bombardments and by the "war of the camps" between Amal's militia and Palestinians in 1985–7. Another 17 informal, small camps contain about 40,000 Palestinians. Those who live outside the camps, including those with UNRWA registration, number between 200,000 to 250,000.[413] Reconstructing the destroyed camps or rehousing displaced Palestinians are both rejected as solutions by the Lebanese authorities.

In summary, one can assert that Palestinian refugees in Lebanon are caught between, on the one hand, Lebanon’s rejectionist position toward them, and, on the other, the pessimistic outlook on the current Israeli- Palestinian negotiations due to Barak’s four “No’s.” As such, the refugee problem in Lebanon has become a time bomb which can only be defused through a concerted international effort. In other words, there is little hope for comprehensive peace as long as Lebanon and Syria are not part of the peace negotiations.

[399] Rosemary Sayigh, “Palestinians in Lebanon, Harsh Present, Uncertain Future,” Journal of Palestine Studies 25 (1) (Autumn 1995): 37.

[400] Ibid., p. 38.

[401] Yves Besson, “URWA and its Role in Lebanon.” Journal of Refugees Studies 3 (1997): 335; Anthony Parsons, “The United Nations and the Palestine Refugees.” Journal of Refugees Studies 3 (1997): 232–3.

[402] Marie-Louise Weighill, “Palestinians in Lebanon: The Politics of Assistance,” Journal of Refugees Studies 3 (1997): 305; see also I. C. Jackson, “The 1951 Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees,[11] International Journal of Refugees Law 3 (3) (1991): 408.

[403] See Abbas Shilbak, “Palestinians in Lebanon and the PLO,[11] Journal of Refugees Studies 3 (1997): 270–1.

[404] Ibid., p. 272.

[405] Hussein Shaaban, “Unemployment and its Impact on Palestinian Refugees in Lebanon,” Journal of Refugees Studies 3 (1997): 385.

[406] See Michael C. Hudson, “Palestinians and Lebanon: The Common Story, [11] ibid., p. 258.

[407] On education problems see Bassem Sirhan, “Education and Palestinians in Lebanon,[11] ibid., pp. 388–92.

[408] On health situation see Ali Hassan, “Health Amongst the Palestinians in Lebanon,[11] ibid., pp. 392–6.

[409] On “dialogue,” at the end of 1999, between the main forces on the Palestinian side and the Lebanese State, see Jaber Suleiman “The Current Political, Organizational, and Security Situation in the Palestinian Refugee Camps of Lebanon,” Journal of Palestine Studies 29 (1) (Autumn 1999): 77–9.

[410] Weighill, “Palestinians in Lebanon,[11] p. 304.

[411] Shilbak, “Palestinians in Lebanon and the PLO,[11] p. 271.

[412] Farid El-Khazen, “Permenent Settlment of Palestinians in Lebanon,[11] Journal of Refugees Studies 3 (1997): 282.

[413] See Mahmoud Abbas, Hussein Shaaban, Bassem Sirhan and Ali Hassan, “The Socio-Economic Conditions of Palestinians in Lebanon,” Journal of Refugees Studies 3 (1997): 379–82.

 16. The Future of Palestinian Refugees in Lebanon

[[Laura Drake]]

After the long deferrals of Oslo and the interim period, the seminal issues of the Middle East peace process are finally being discussed. The final status of the Palestinian refugees of 1948, the same issue which constituted the initial condition of the Arab-Israeli conflict, may now define either the closure of this conflict or its indefinite continuation.

The Palestinian refugees in Lebanon, most of whom hail from the Galilee, will prove to be the essential crux of the issue, since Israel's preferred solution, resettlement in the host countries, does not work in Lebanon. Indeed, Palestinian Authority (PA) President Yasser Arafat has drawn attention to the fact that the refugees are not only in Lebanon.[414] It is in Lebanon, however, where the issue is most urgent.

Were it not for Lebanon, Israel may have been able to indefinitely defer the entire refugee issue, or simply refuse to discuss it. However, the tie-in of the ultimate Palestinian issue — the refugees — with the Syria- Israel-Lebanon track, makes immediate discussion imperative even for Israel. In fact, the success of the Lebanese track of the peace process will ultimately hinge on the fate of these 350,000 refugees.[415] According to Lebanese President Emile Lahoud, "We cannot accept a settlement without a pull-out from Lebanon and Syria, and without the sacred right of the Palestinians to return home, and this is a final decision."[416]

If the intertwining of the tracks around the refugee issue makes its solution urgent from an Israeli perspective, then the scenarios emanating from the Israeli sense of urgency make the situation that much more urgent from the perspective of the Palestinian refugees themselves. Of course, there is little discussion about what they think, their fears, their hopes, but only their disposition. What the refugees in Lebanon fear most is the concept of third-country resettlement — that they will be subjected to a forced transfer even further away from the borders of their home country to faraway destinations as Iraq, or that they will be dispersed throughout the Arab world, much as the PLO forces were dispersed after the Israeli invasion in 1982. Likewise, they fear that their people as individuals, not as a population, will be subjected to a combined process of being “pushed” out of Lebanon and “pulled” — redirected by way of coordinated economic pressure and enticement — into an assorted variety of Western countries. The Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine’s (PFLP) Abu Ali Mustafa objected to such schemes in the following manner: “They must not just say search for another country for them. It is as though an exodus requires another exodus when in fact an exodus requires the right of return.”[417]

These transfer scenarios — to use the Israeli lexicon — are now considered to be immediate threats, or worst-case scenarios by the Palestinian refugees in Lebanon. Brigadier General Sultan Abu Aynain, refugee leader and Fatah commander in Lebanon, responded, “We are not herds of cattle, nor is Palestine a livestock trading firm.”[418] The fear that one of these scenarios will come about bears down on the Palestinian refugees in the Lebanon camps night and day, as something analogous to the possibility of an imminent apocalyptic event.

Not far behind the fear and uncertainty that resides within these dispersion scenarios are the fears that the United States and Israel will somehow convince Lebanon to nationalize the refugees within that country, thus putting a final end to their possibility of returning home.

From the Lebanese perspective, this urgency stems from the fear that the Palestinian-Israeli final status talks will contain a solution for the Palestinian refugee situation that goes against their national interests, and that is adopted without their participation or involvement. That is, the fear that the Palestinian leadership might be forced by virtue of US pressure to agree to the permanent settlement of the refugees where they are — namely, in Lebanon. Some parties, notably the Jordanians, appear to believe that this solution will indeed be forced upon Lebanon.[419] This would then be presented to the government of Lebanon as a fait accompli, and followed up by US pressure on Lebanon to grant Lebanese citizenship to the refugees. Despite the fact that the prohibition on granting citizenship to “non-Lebanese” has now been enacted into Article 43 of the Lebanese naturalization law,[420] in addition to being a component of the post-Taif Lebanese constitution,[421] such pressure could be very difficult to resist, since everything will have already been decided. That is why Lebanon wants to be involved as early as possible in the discussions surrounding this issue. As Lebanese Prime Minister Salim al-Hoss has stated:

We are sometimes told that the refugee issue is one of the subjects to be discussed on the Palestinian track, and that it is one of the issues to be debated in the multilateral negotiations. Our answer is no. This issue concerns Lebanon directly.[422]

But alas, the refugee issue is being discussed not trilaterally in an Israeli-Palestinian-Lebanese format, but as a component of the Palestinian- Israeli track of the peace process.

On top of these urgencies, as if it were not enough, is a new one: the unilateral Israeli withdrawal from Lebanon came in tandem with the return ofChairman Arafat’s Fatah forces to the Ein al-Hilweh refugee camp near Saida in southern Lebanon. This camp is so important that it has been called the “capital of the Palestinian diaspora.”[423] Hence, it is imperative for Fatah to be in control there if it is to credibly represent the Palestinian refugees in the final status talks. This turn of events so magnified Lebanon’s security concerns in the event of a unilateral Israeli withdrawal to the point where the Lebanese, in a joint statement with the French, said that the unilateral withdrawal would constitute an irresponsible act on the part of Israel.[424] Perhaps they feared they would not be able to control the Palestinians in the south in the event of the Israeli departure; for them it brought up shades of the earlier civil war in Lebanon, in which the PLO took over the south and established the zone of PLO control near the Israeli border that Israel used to call “Fatahland.” The desire to move the Palestinians out of Lebanon by a combination of local pressure and international diplomacy became doubly urgent for Lebanon; indeed, Lebanon’s international diplomacy on this subject reached a fever pitch.

It was in this context that the death sentence Lebanon recently passed against the aforementioned Sultan Abu al-Aynain, the Fatah commander in Rashidiyah camp in the far south, should be understood — as a move concurrent with the return of the Fatah militia, in some force, to Ein al-Hilweh.[425]

The military forces of Fatah are presently being enhanced through the institution of new military training courses for new and old recruits in Ein al-Hilweh — a development that has heightened Lebanon’s fears. However, according to the PLO, it is being done for the Palestinian refugees’ protection and security, in particular, vis-a-vis Israel and its hired agents lurking in and around the camps. These activities become necessary, according to the PLO, in the wake of the recent series of assassinations and assassination attempts against Fatah commanders in the Saida area, and the generally deteriorating security conditions in the Ein al-Hilweh camp. Furthermore, the Palestinians are responsible for the security inside their camps by virtue of an old agreement between the PLO and Lebanon. However, the Lebanese fear the ramifications of the Israeli-Palestinian Authority security cooperation in the form of the PA “self-rule authority” potentially being transferred into their country during time of war with Israel.[426]

The Palestinians are feeling the pressure. They have tried to reassure the Lebanese that they have no designs whatsoever on re-establishing themselves in Lebanon, and that they only want to return home.[427] According to Col. Munir al-Maqdah, the PLO-Fatah Commander in Lebanon prior to Oslo, speaking about the situation in Ein al-Hilweh, “As far as individual weapons are concerned, they exist and nobody denies that. However those weapons will never be used against the Lebanese army or authority and they will never be used to sabotage the situation in Lebanon either.”[428] However, relations between the PA and Lebanon remain hostage to the ghosts of wars past; thus the mechanisms necessary to resolve bilateral problems, and the problems facing the refugees themselves, do not exist.[429]

The truth is that neither the civilian refugees nor the military leaders feel anything similar to the power they exerted in the 1970s. What they do feel is economically poor, politically abandoned, and militarily vulnerable. In fact, they feel that the walls of the 1990s are closing in around the remnant of what they have been able to preserve since the 1970s, which is very little. Every refugee in Lebanon has the same sense of total powerlessness.

 Scenarios

Israel says that “the refugee issue could be both the most difficult and the easiest to solve of all the issues in the final status agreement.”[430] If Israel could simply defer the refugee issue and leave the refugees in place as a fait accompli, it would be its easiest issue. The Palestinian side has been facing some pressure to do just that, to defer this issue to some final status date and deal today with the subject of the Palestinian state. There are several strategies that Israel may be thinking about employing to accomplish this.

* Negotiation scenarios

Separation of the refugee issue from other issues. Israel might try to simply deal with the territorial issues first (borders, Jerusalem, and settlements), deferring the refugee issue indefinitely. Israel in fact has already begun to use this approach, demanding the deferral of both refugees and Jerusalem,[431] drawing rejection from the head of the PLO final status negotiating team, who hold that “the issues cannot be separated.”[432]

It is extremely unlikely that the PLO leadership which, according to the PLO Refugee Department Affairs head As’ad Abdel Rahman, sees the refugee subject as “the basic issue in the policy of the PLO and the PA … the central cause,”[433] will sign an agreement ending the conflict under these terms. What the PLO wants to discuss is not refugee rights, which are already universally affirmed, but rather, the “practical mechanisms to implement Resolution 194."[434] There have been worries among the refugees that they will be traded away for statehood.[435] However, the PLO would not be able to do this even it wanted to (and it does not), and at the same time simultaneously retain its national credibility. Furthermore, statehood in some form is already accepted as inevitable by Israel; all that remains to be discussed is in what form it will ultimately be expressed. Finally, according to President Arafat himself, even "talking about settlement" of refugees is a crime.[436]

Regrouping of issue clusters geographically. Failing that, Israel might try to avoid the subject of the refugees by breaking the final status issues up into two separate geographical clusters: for arrangements inside Palestine and arrangements outside it. Such a potential strategy is already foreshadowed in an important article by one of Israel's most prominent intelligence commentators, Shlomo Gazit.[437] Again, the main agreement would focus on the Palestinian territorial arrangements, which will take care of borders. Jerusalem, and settlements. The refugee issue may then be discussed first as it pertains to the refugees currently under PA jurisdiction, i.e., those currently resident in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, under the justification of practicality, since President Arafat does not have territorial jurisdiction of Palestinians outside. Those 1948 Palestine refugees currently living inside the West Bank and the Gaza Strip would be expected to stay there. They would be offered compensation from an international fund over which Israel would have an influential decision-making capacity. Their refugee status would be eliminated and UNRWA would be disbanded in areas under PA jurisdiction; or at the very least, their activities would no longer include the refugees living in those areas. Israel might then continue negotiating the situation of the refugees in exile bilaterally with the PLO/PA; or if those talks fail, it might try to transfer the disposition of the refugees in Arab countries to the domain of Israel-Arab state negotiations, which would be dealt with either bilaterally or multilaterally — in the latter case, with PLO/PA participation.

Even if Israel were able to pressure the PLO to sign an agreement without the refugees in exile, which seems impossible in any case, both of these Israeli "options" break down with regard to the Palestinian refugees in Lebanon and Syria, because their situation is tied to the peace process with regard to these two countries, particularly Lebanon. Syria, additionally, is standing behind the Lebanese position on this issue.[438] The Israelis might have therefore tried to do the aforementioned with all the other refugees, including the refugees in Jordan; but they would, however, still need to find a solution as to the final disposition of the Palestinians in Lebanon in particular if they wish to have a peace agreement with that country. Because of Jordan’s political sensitivities, Amman is not willing to stand alone on this issue for fear of being held responsible for the results. Thus, the strategy breaks down on all three counts. Jordan cannot negotiate anything relating to the permanent settlement of the refugees in existing countries without Lebanese and Syrian support, which it is unlikely to receive.

* Transfer scenarios

As tor the Palestinian refugees in Lebanon, there are only two possibilities: They can either leave Lebanon or they can remain there. For them, there are no other options. They can either 1’ight or negotiate their way home; and barring this, they must stay in Lebanon until it becomes possible to go home. To Israel, it means two entirely different things: Either Israel can find a new home for these refugees or convince Lebanon to allow them to stay there. The Israelis, sometimes with the help of the Americans, have been pursuing both of these options behind closed doors, examining options and sending up trial balloons with various third parties. It must be restated for the record that these proposals do not originate with the Canadian government, nor are they being conceived within the Refugee Working Group, neither of which are implicated in any way. Rather, these are unauthorized government-to-government contacts, at times with the help of intermediaries, that have been undertaken by an interested party outside the formally agreed-upon method for negotiation of the refugee issue. Were these contacts to become successful, the formal refugee negotiations would become merely ceremonial, since all the outlines would have been completed in advance. This is nothing new in the history of negotiations.

The reason this has been done in secret is because the first option, which is finding a new home for the Lebanon refugees in one or more third countries, is unacceptable to both the refugees themselves and to the Palestinian leadership. The second option, that of naturalizing the refugees permanently in Lebanon, is not only unacceptable to the aforementioned Palestinian parties, but also to the government and people of Lebanon.

Not everything that is secret is a conspiracy. Keeping any type of hostile effort a secret — and this is a hostile effort because it goes against the express wishes of the populations concerned — prevents the targets of that effort from benefitting from the early-warning asset, thus posing it as an institutionalized fait accompli with the organized support of powerful states on which the affected parties depend. It prevents them from employing diplomatic, political, or military countermeasures for disruption purposes in advance of the event, simply because the lack of information has deprived them of the time they require to organize a resistance effort in advance. As Lebanon's Faris Bouez noted, "We need to take precautionary moves."[439] The Palestinian refugees feel exactly the same way.

The Iraq scenario. The most prominent of the third-party resettlement efforts by Israel has been the so-called Iraq option. This option is one of which I have a first-hand knowledge — something I have been following directly with Middle East parties since late 1993. The basis of the proposal is that Iraq re-settle the Lebanon refugees, and possibly some of the others, in either the western desert of Iraq, in the Anbar region near the Jordanian border,[440] or perhaps closer in. In a different variation, the Iraqis would be resettled in the southern part of Iraq near the Saudi border. In exchange, Iraq would receive Israeli help in convincing the United States to release the country from the global trading embargo to which it has been subjected since Iraq entered Kuwait in August 1990. In another variation, they would be promised a lifting of the embargo by the United States directly, though they would still be required to adhere to and implement all of the UN Security Council resolutions (presumably including those pertaining to their internal situation).

There have been some media reports of late attributing the origin of this proposal to the Iraqi leadership.[441] These stand in contradiction to my own first-hand information on the subject. Early on, in 1993, before the idea of resettling the Lebanon refugees in Iraq became the common knowledge it is now, the existence of this proposal was offered to me by an Arab official in the Middle East, with the understanding that the Iraqis did not wish it to come to pass. I was told that the Iraqis saw it as inimical to both their historic alliance with the PLO and the Palestinian people, as well as destructive to their own national interests. These same affirmations were echoed by Azzam al-Ahmad, the Palestinian Ambassador to Baghdad, in November 1999, following his own discussion with Iraqi officials.[442]

There have also been scattered allegations of Palestinian leadership complicity in certain of these underground consultations,[443] accusations which are totally and completely unfounded. This would be seen as a complete betrayal by Palestinians everywhere, and there is no way the PLO leadership would or could ever be a part of such a thing. The fact that the official Palestinian media has been not only willing but enthusiastic about publicizing and exposing the so-called “Iraq option” for what it is should put to rest any such accusations.

I am also aware of certain consultations that occurred between Palestinian and Iraqi officials attempting to uncover the origin of the proposal, and to see if the other side was in any way participating in it. It turned out that neither side was the origin, and that neither side was complicit in its conception. In 1997, PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat publicly rejected the concept.[444]

It is most probable that the proposal is of Israeli origin, as it has received only intermittent and inconsistent US backing. There was a time, roughly during the period of 1995–7, when Washington opposed the concept as standing in contradiction to its all-important Gulf policy, even though it would clearly have been in Israel’s interests. The Israelis have been interested in such resettlement schemes for many years — the idea being to “move the Palestinians away from the regions that border Palestine as a prelude to merging them into remote societies.”[445] During this time, however, the Americans warned Israel in the person of US ambassador Martin Indyk to stop pursuing this or any other option that involved Israeli overtures to Iraq, for fear of injuring ongoing American efforts to perpetuate Iraq’s isolation internationally. The isolation of Iraq, from the American perspective, was then seen as a higher priority than the resettlement of Palestine refugees in Iraq (perhaps because the final status had not yet started).

But today, Fouzi El-Asmar reports correctly that at the present time, US administration officials are in fact insisting that Iraq both take these refugees and enter the Middle East peace process as a necessary but not sufficient condition for the lifting of sanctions,[446] which is identical to their original line back in 1993–4. Although supportive of it once again, the Americans are clearly trying to shift the responsibility for the original suggestion onto the Iraqi leadership. By doing this, they can pursue the option without looking like they need something from Iraq — having it appear that Iraq is asking for something from them. For the Iraqis, however, any notion that the idea belonged to them would cause immeasurable and permanent injury to their reputation among their Arab supporters regionwide.

Aside from the above, there are essentially two reasons, I believe, that this proposal is seen as contrary to Iraq's own national interests. First, not only would Baghdad have to resettle the refugees; it would also have to sign a peace agreement with Israel and align itself unconditionally with US regional security policies in both the Gulf and the Mashreq.

Second, there is no guarantee that the sanctions would actually be lifted.[447] Iraq would simply receive "help" in getting them lifted, or alternatively, "steps leading to lifting the blockade."[448] This sounds like a very long process, perhaps akin to the Oslo process. Normalization first, followed by a prolonged lifting of sanctions that could be done in tiny steps, issues taken apart and carved up into fragments and fractions and stages and phases as the issues in the Palestinian Israeli track of the peace process have been — as the West Bank and Gaza Strip territory have been with no real finality, into infinity, dragged out forever. With these tactics, every promise of the tiniest increment of forward movement on lifting sanctions would be met with a demand to Iraq for yet another concession, with no real end in sight.

Once inside such a process, it is nearly impossible to get out of it. We all know that these kinds of concessions are a slippery slope, especially when one needs something from the receiving country. During the indefinite interim, Iraq would become a hostage to both US and Israeli policy, not only in regional affairs but also inside Iraq itself. Iraq would be made complicit in all kinds of activities during this period, with nothing left to lose by staying in. together with the eventual hope of getting rid of the sanctions. The sanctions could be dragged out for a very long time as a perpetual pressure lever under such circumstance perhaps longer than they would have been otherwise; and why not? This is not even to mention the weapons inspectors, hostile foreign entities, and perhaps even opposition figures moving everywhere throughout their country with impunity.

Of course we need not mention the potential labor benefits to Iraq resulting from an influx of Palestinians. Nor need we mention the confessional downside (or upside, depending on how one wants to look at it) of the importation into Iraq of large numbers of Sunni Muslims. Iraq is not Lebanon: Iraq has ten times Lebanon’s population, and hence a totally different sense of proportion. While the Palestinian refugees in Lebanon constitute 10 percent of the country’s population; in Iraq, with its population of more than 22 million, the addition of several hundred thousand or even one or two million Sunni Muslims would be virtually imperceptible. I

* The Dispersion scenarios

When the Iraqi option fell into disrepute for a period in the mid-1990s, a new one appeared on the horizon from Congressman Benjamin Gilman of New York, one of Israel’s strongest supporters in the US Congress. I first heard of this proposal from a Western press correspondent during a visit to Iran in 1997, then checked it out for myself. The subject was proposed to the six states of the Gulf Co-operation Council via a staff delegation of the International Relations Committee of the House of Representatives, which Gilman chairs. The delegation was led by one of Gilman’s chief assistants, Ms. Deborah Bohdlander, an individual with serious links to Israel. The other participants were Mr. Walker Roberts, another member of Gilman’s committee staff, as well as Mr. Christopher Kojm, from Congressman Lee Hamilton’s staff (though Mr. Hamilton has no known involvement, he is a ranking member of the committee and this was supposedly a committee operation). These individuals were sent to the Gulf countries to discuss two issues: Gulf security and the peace process. Included in the peace process discussion was Gilman’s proposal: That each of the six GCC states resettle 30,000 refugees from Lebanon in their respective countries, for a total of 180,000 refugees. They respectfully declined.[449] During travel to Yemen and Sudan, I was told by relevant individuals in each of those countries that they had also received unofficial requests from American quarters to receive approximately equivalent numbers of Palestinian refugees from Lebanon. These countries have also declined.

Other dispersion scenarios include the various Arab states together with Western countries such as Canada, France, the United States, and even countries as far away as Australia.[450] Canada does not appear to be interested in participating, whereas France, in particular, may be willing because it would help Lebanon.[451] Perhaps the most well-known and far-flung of the mass dispersion schemes is the one suggested by Donna Arzt, which comes complete with the numbers of refugees to be resettled in each country as new citizens (not permanent residents) of those countries.[452] Almost every conceivable country is included as a potential refugee receptacle (which is how she seems to conceive it), including Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, the North African countries, and the Western countries, in addition to Lebanon, Syria, Jordan, Iraq, and finally, Israel, which is asked to take back a token number of refugee elders (75,000) — all of which brings back the image of Sultan Abu al-Aynain’s “herds of cattle.” Obviously, refugee preferences and opinions did not figure into her analysis. This scheme was received unfavorably throughout the region, not least in the refugee communities in Lebanon.

The Jordan Scenario. In the summer of 1999 in the West Bank and Gaza Strip there was something known as the “Jordan option” floating all around the Palestinian Authority. Apparently, someone in Israel had thought of the idea of bringing Palestinian refugees from Lebanon into Jordan[453] to reside in a large refugee camp complex in the south of the country called Al-Azraq. Some personnel reported having actually seen the complex. It is said to be in two parts: the eastern camp near the Iraqi border, which currently houses Iraqi refugees, and the southern camp near the Saudi border, which is currently empty. These camps were supposedly built long ago as a contingency measure in case Israel ever decided to suddenly expel large numbers of Palestinians from the West Bank across the river into Jordan, during a time of future war or upheaval. In time of peace, however, someone apparently came up with the idea of sending the refugees from Lebanon to these camps. Jordan has since then publicly denied any intention to resettle Palestinian refugees from Lebanon on its territory.

The Jordanians are inclined to continue to house any refugees they currently host who do not wish to exercise their right of return, namely those with Jordanian nationality. But they are not prepared to take any more. In the words of King Abdallah II, “Everyone wants to solve their problem. But not at the expense of Jordan. The last thing we want is refugees from Syria and Lebanon to come to Jordan.”[454] To Jordan’s way of thinking, Jordan has already borne more than its share of the refugee burden. This also explains why the Jordanians have been shying away from any premature moves toward confederation with the Palestinian territories, since that could lead to the Hooding of the Kingdom with Palestinian refugees.[455]

Naturalization scenarios: The Lebanon Syria Jordan scenario. If the third-party resettlement efforts all end in failure, then Israel will feel compelled to return to the default option, which is leaving the refugees where they are, meaning in Syria, Lebanon, and Jordan (with scattered numbers elsewhere), and demanding they be given citizenship or permanent residence in those countries. Jordan would not object to this, provided that the other two countries also agree, and provided that they are financially compensated for it. However, it wants assurances from other

Arab states, like Syria and Lebanon, that all involved countries would do this simultaneously.[456] This has the political effect of collusion: an effort that would degrade the right of the refugees in all three countries to return. Syria has already indicated that it will not offer citizenship to the refugees in its country, thereby preserving the right to return. Financial resettlement assistance to Jordan means both lifting Amman’s $7 billion debt burden and setting aside some of the refugee compensation funds for the Jordanian government.[457] The PLO is opposed to this, holding that no one must compete with the Palestinian refugee families who have the right to the full benefit of individual compensation.[458] Lebanon, for one, has already said it will not accept, much less demand, financial assistance to resettle the refugees in Lebanon.[459]

In any case, even if the Arab states were to try to compete for such funds, their efforts could easily be nullified by Israeli claims against fellow Arab states as to compensation for the property and assets left behind in the Jewish immigrations to Israel back in the 1950s. Not surprisingly, as the final status of the refugees approaches, the Israelis have already begun researching possible claims in this direction.[460] The credibility of this equivalence, strangely enough, still persists, despite the fact that “the Arab Jews left their countries to occupy the homes of expelled Palestinians. Had the latter not been expelled, the former would not have been able to occupy their homes. They are thus beneficiaries rather than victims.”[461]

If the claims of the two groups are found by the current Israeli research to be equal or even close, Israel will then dispense with the issue by proposing that Israel compensate its own nationals, leaving the Arab states to compensate the Palestinians.[462] Thus, the appropriate counter-tactic would be for the Arab League to pass a binding resolution immediately as a preventive measure — one that would prevent any Arab state from ever having to face this inverted “compensation” proposal.

On the second front, the Israelis have been setting forth conditions for Palestinian refugee compensation that no Palestinian leader could possibly sign (such as the summary dissolution of both the refugee status category and UNRWA), and which additionally attempt to shift the burden of payment to the international community.[463] American officials have already reacted to the latter, stating:

If anyone is thinking about an agreement with Syria and Lebanon or a final-status settlement with the Palestinians in terms of tens of billions of dollars, including compensation for the refugees — he can just forget about it. The United States is not a cash machine.[464]

In any case, the Lebanese will not go along with this. They have said both repeatedly and forcefully that nationalizing the Palestinians in Lebanon is totally unacceptable to them because it would upset the balance of their country. Palestinian leaders in Lebanon are also opposed for reasons concerning the right of return, and have drafted a common memorandum to this effect with Lebanese counterparts.[465]

There is also the unspoken Lebanese historical rationale, which concerns the almost absolute empowerment of the PLO as a military and political force in certain areas of Lebanon during that country's civil war. An unfortunate aspect of Lebanon's internal reconciliation has been the scapegoating of the Palestinian organization, and by extension the Palestinian people in Lebanon, and attributing to them a somewhat exaggerated level of complicity in that war.

The Palestinians are also blamed for the repeated Israeli incursions into Lebanon, peaking with the 1982 Israeli invasion and leaving them with an Israeli occupation force in the south of their country, on the logic that these things would not have happened had the Palestinians not been there. Obviously, this is reversed logic. It has been said that "the Palestinians did not choose to be in Lebanon,"[466] but popular logic often contains a cruel aspect — that the Palestinians are somehow responsible for Israeli attacks on Lebanon simply because they were trying to return to their country from the territory in which they happened to find themselves. Nevertheless, what all this adds up to is that the Palestinians have no future in a Lebanon that obviously does not want them, which refuses to have them, and which obviously bears no responsibility, as Israel does, for creating their plight.

There have even been efforts at third-party mediation, in an attempt to convince Lebanon to reconsider. France was one such third party which attempted to do just that.[467] Lebanon not only rejected it, but objected to it. The French then denied that they had ever even suggested it; and now they are standing solidly behind — and reinforcing — the Lebanese position.[468] Lebanon continues to maintain that there will be no peace agreement with Israel without a solution to the Palestinian refugee situation outside of Lebanon. According to the Lebanese prime minister, the issues of Palestinian refugees and Lebanon's water resource are not up for negotiation: He states, "Lebanon has nothing to concede on these two issues."[469] The latest variation is a new proposal that Lebanon has received, namely, to allow Palestinian passports for the refugees there, while according them special travel status in European and other Western countries.[470] This idea is presumably offered with the real intention of encouraging the refugees' semi-permanent emigration from Lebanon. The PLO has vehemently denied even considering such proposals.[471]

In addition, the Syrian side has injected into the conversation the point that it will not agree to a comprehensive peace solution that contains the provision of Syrian citizenship for Palestinian refugees currently resident in Syria.[472] This intervention probably came about in response to proposals such as those forwarded by Donna Arzt and others calling for dual nationality for Palestinian refugees in exile as a cover for naturalizing them inside the countries currently hosting them,[473] an idea that Jordan has likewise already rejected.[474] Apparently, Syria is trying to defuse this "solution" before it gets off the ground, though it is difficult to see how Damascus could enforce a condition that lies outside Syria's bilateral track with Israel. Syria continues to insist that the Palestinian refugees in Syria have the right to return to their country. Although Syria has given them almost all the rights and benefits accorded to Syrian citizens, and given that Syria would have nothing to lose by offering citizenship to the Palestinians, we must conclude that the Syrians are refusing such suggestions on the grounds that they would pre-empt and thereby deflate the right of the refugees to return.

The difference between the Syrian and Lebanese refusals is, of course, that Syria is not insisting that the Palestinians physically depart Syria as a condition for a peace agreement with Israel; to the contrary, the personal situations of the Palestinian refugees are secure there. However, the Syrians are not willing to take on any additional refugees originating in third countries like Lebanon, for much the same reasons as the Iraqis. They have nothing to gain by doing so, and quite a bit to lose — though not as much as Iraq. In the case of Syria, the losses would all be expressed in the interArab level of Middle East politics, specifically in terms of Syria's credibility as a nationalist state with regional leadership aspirations and protective of its national responsibilities.

 Realism and Lack of Realism on the Right of Return

In order to preserve the element of realism, it is necessary to briefly outline the practicalities and impracticalities as they pertain to the PLO position.

* Signing away the right of return

PLO Chairman Y asser Arafat cannot sign away the right of return and then claim to represent the refugees, especially those in exile outside the Palestinian Authority area. Those refugees taken together constitute two-thirds of the Palestinian people. Therefore he would be signing away his claim to national leadership of the Palestinian people, and this he will not do. As PLO veteran Shafiq El-Hout recently noted:

“I do know that were Arafat or any other Palestinian leader to renounce officially the right of return he would be signing his own death warrant. For Palestinians, this would be the ultimate act of treason.” Furthermore, the PLO’s own position on this matter is solid. Daoud Barakat, PLO Deputy Head of Refugee Affairs, has made a critical historical interpretation, namely, that “UN Resolution 194 is an integral part of UN Resolution 242. ”[475]

He adds:

In regards to the refugee issue, we will state clearly that there will be no peace agreement between the PLO and Israel, unless an agreement for a just solution of the refugee question is achieved. The term “just solution” will be defined as the Israeli acceptance of the Palestinian refugees’ right of return as outlined in LIN Resolution 194. Once agreement is achieved on the principles, the Palestinian delegation will be ready to discuss modalities regarding implementation.[476]

No other party could or would step forward to represent the refugees outside the PLO framework; to do so would be to deprive the refugees of their Palestinian national dimension. No other party except the PLO can credibly represent Palestinian national aspirations as a whole. At the present time, none of them has the numbers or the national following to pose a credible alternative to PLO representation.

* Signing away the right to implement the “right of return”

Arafat cannot sign away the right to implement the right of return and still tell his people he believes in the right of return, because to do so is tantamount to permanently signing away his possibility of implementing a right. This would be seen as a contradiction and a deception. If someone has an acknowledged right to do something, logically he has the right to then proceed to do it, or at least to keep it open as a future option. To Palestinians, the right of return is seen as an inalienable right, one that is also recognized by the community of nations, as affirmed by UN resolutions. Inalienable rights cannot be signed away; only the intention to exercise those rights at a particular point in time.

* Sovereignty

As a practical matter, the Palestinian Authority may be interested in bringing some of the 1948 refugees into the West Bank and helping them continue to fight for their right of return to their nearby home towns. However, Israel may presently be interested in limiting the number of refugees the future Palestinian state will be allowed to admit to the territory it will control. Yet if the Palestinian state is to have sovereign control over its external borders. West Bank Jordan and Rafah Egypt, together with entry and exit to the airport and to the seaport in Gaza, then realistically, Israel would not be able to regulate the entry of refugees. If it is not real independence — a real state — that is being negotiated, if Israel is to control Palestine’s gateways to the world, then it is a different story because it means that what has been termed “remote control occupation” will be continued by Israel indefinitely under the banner of a false statehood. This subject falls under the heading of what is called the “integration of the Palestinian refugee issue into the right to self-determination.”[477] As Arafat said. “When the Palestinian state is established, it will have the right to receive its citizens.”[478] Statehood and independence, especially with regard to admitting and expelling people, and control of borders, are synonymous. Israel might attempt to write limitations to entry into a final status agreement, but it seems unlikely that it could enforce them in practice[479] if the Palestinians do indeed achieve sovereign control over their borders with Jordan and Egypt. Alternatively, Israel may not really need those limitations.[480] It may therefore use them as a "concession" or card to be traded away for something of a much higher value.

* The relationship to the settlements

Palestinian researcher Salman Abu-Sitteh has turned the Israeli "empty land"[481] argument on its head, noting the large concentrations of Israeli population in small territorial areas,[482] the same way the Israelis talk about population concentrations among the Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza as a justification for settlements. Israel can do that because it thinks it has a right to settle in the West Bank and Gaza, regardless of the effect on the future of Palestinian existence as an independent nation-state. The Palestinians can do it because they believe in their right to return, regardless of the effect on future Israeli existence as a Jewish entity; hence the mirror image of the refugees and the settlers, just as it was with the original settlers in the 1948 areas who displaced the population and turned them into refugees.

Israel may believe that the settlement of Jews anywhere within the borders of mandatory Palestine is an inalienable right in the same way the Palestinians believe the return of their exiles to any place within the borders of mandatory Palestine is an inalienable right. Stephen Cohen of the Center for Middle East Peace, for instance, stated: "You have two groups of people in this negotiation who are totally indigestible by the other side — the settlers and the refugees."[483] Along these same lines, the Israeli Peace Now movement has compared Israel's restraint in not settling more Jews in certain places in the West Bank (e.g., in the middle of Hebron), to a signing away of the will not to exercise a right in the name of practicality; thus the Israelis might therefore demand that Arafat do this with regard to the right of return. The Palestinian refugees who want to return are like the Jews who want to settle in Hebron according to Peace Now: "They have the right of return. But they don't have the right to realize that right."[484]

However, there are several important differences that negate the concept of an equivalence.

First, the settlers already have a country in which they can live — pre- 1967 Israel. This situation, which was created at a very high cost — the dispossession of the 1948 Palestinian population and the creation of the original refugee problem — came about precisely so that these Jews would not have to live elsewhere.

Secondly, the Palestinian refugees do not have their own country in which to live, precisely because most of that country was lost to the original settlers of 1948. The Palestinian state they may gain in the final status might not be large or fertile enough, or may not possess enough real independence to be able to absorb all of the refugees. This is because the post-1967 settlers and the Israeli state apparatus, in combination, have taken over much of the land. There is also the factor of the Israeli closure, instituted in 1993 to prevent the normal movement of Palestinian citizens within the West Bank and Gaza Strip, a situation that may or may not persist into the final status. If it does, the Palestinian economy will remain in a virtual shutdown mode as it is now. It will continue to be unable to provide normal lives even for the Palestinians native to those areas into the indefinite future, much less to provide them to returning refugee communities.

Thirdly, those Jews who moved from Israel proper into the West Bank to settle there were not displaced by anyone from anywhere, certainly not in Israel. To the contrary, they chose to relocate by themselves for both ideological and economic reasons.

Fourthly, the perceived right of the settlers, unlike the right of the Palestinian refugees, not only lacks the backing of UN resolutions; but rather, it has the condemnation of the very same UN resolutions. These days, UN resolutions have been accorded a kind of absolute status everywhere in the world, especially in the Middle East. This can be seen in the way such resolutions have been used to establish a controlling influence on world relations with Iraq.

The Palestinian refugees do have the internationally sanctioned right to live anywhere in what they understand to be their own country, just as the settlers are able to do now. So even by the Israeli logic which essentially says, “We would allow all the refugees to ‘return’ to the Palestinian state if only there were more space.” If the settlers and the Israeli military are planning to take parts of the West Bank and Gaza Strip for themselves, then the Palestinian refugees, to the degree that the remaining parcels of the West Bank cannot absorb them, should as a practical measure be able to return to their original locations in the Galilee and elsewhere.

It must now be fully understood that the real Israeli argument is not about “space” or an economic “inability to absorb,” which is a problem which would not discriminate between different types of people. Israel is ready to absorb” as many Jewish immigrants as it can — in fact it is trying with all its might to obtain more. So we know there would be neither a problem of space nor economic absorption capacity if a certain percentage of Palestinian refugees from 1948 were to express a desire to rebuild their hometowns in Israel proper. So let us dispense with these arguments once and for all. The real Israeli objection is about politics and demography — it concerns the ethnic makeup of the State of Israel.

If we were to apply the same argument to the West Bank and Gaza Strip as the only practical arenas for a Palestinian state, then it would make sense that the Palestinians should have the same ability to shape their political demography, which means that the entire area should be made available for them to exercise their independent statehood. Presently (1999), Israel’s Ehud Barak seems reconciled to allowing Palestinian refugees to return to areas under the jurisdiction of the Palestinian Authority. However, Salim Tamari, a Palestinian member of the Refugee Working Group, has expressed concern that the West Bank and Gaza Strip territory may not be conceived by Israel to be synonymous with the territory available for the return of Palestinian refugees.[485] It must also be noted that the 1967 “displaced” may receive first priority because Israel has already agreed to their return in the Oslo agreement, and all that remains now is to delineate the “modalities” for that return.[486] This means that any 1948 refugees who could be taken in would be brought in on top of the potentially large numbers of the 1967 “displaced,” who would come first; thus, the number of 1948 refugees whom it would be possible to bring inside would be diminished by precisely the number of 1967 “displaced” who chose to return.

If we are going to apply Israel’s ethnic argument only to Israel but not to the West Bank and Gaza Strip, then in the name of equality of the two peoples, we must dispose of the ethnic argument altogether. In other words, if Israel is going to retain Jewish populations and military outposts in any part of the West Bank and Gaza Strip, making those areas unavailable for a Palestinian state, it makes even more sense to consider the possibility of a refugee return to areas in Israel proper. What is not practical, or ethical, is to eliminate both of these options. To do so would be to eliminate the possibility of Palestinian existence in any part of Palestine for the vast majority of the Palestinian population. This takes us back to the most important right of all for the Palestinians, as Edward Said has commented, which is “the right of Palestinians to coexist on an equal footing with Israeli Jews.”[487]

Let us clarify: the remaining argument, the Israeli concept of exchanging numbers of refugees for numbers of settlers as described by Salim Tamari[488] and reported in the Jerusalem Post.[489] must now be dispensed with once and for all. First, as has been explained, there is no logical, ethical, or temporal equivalence between the two groups of people — the 1967 occupiers on the one hand and those Palestinians displaced from the original occupation on the other. Secondly, the problem in Palestine is not about people; it is about land, and not merely the West Bank and Gaza Strip land. For the 1948 refugees, it is about Galilee land and coastal land. The West Bank and Gaza Strip were never meant to hold the refugees from 1948, nor is it capable of holding them all. The shortage of land in the West Bank and Gaza Strip is not only about the settlements of 1967; it is exactly about the land that Israel appropriated from the original refugees in 1947 and 1948.

 Recommendations to the Interested Parties

(1) Stop the schemes, and get constructive! The most important suggestion I can make is to emphasize that these deceptive subterranean schemes should be put to an end.

(2) Involve the local camp leaders in any discussions relevant to their fate. The people concerned, the refugees themselves, through their local leaders inside the camps, should not only be consulted but actually involved in the discussions regarding their fate. This is much more valuable and eminently more practical than conducting “opinion polls” asking ordinary people what they think about various aspects of complex negotiations. Presently the discussions are taking place without any direct input from those most concerned. These leaders are struggling day and night simply to acquire real-time information about what is being discussed in secret regarding their fate. This is both unethical and politically unwise. These leaders should be involved and informed at every stage, in every detail, and in real time not after the matters in question have already been decided and have become crystallized in the minds of other participants. The fact that some of them are not allowed by host countries to travel outside or to formally join the talks is not an excuse: they can be included by way of continuous contact by telephone, fax, and other benefits of modern technology.

Certainly these leaders would have the right, which they may take upon themselves, to scuttle anything that was done to their people without their consent. Rather than the powers that be trying to exclude them from discussion with the objective of presenting them with a fait accompli, it is far better to involve them directly and obtain their input and consent to those matters that will decide their future. That is what Palestinian self- determination is all about — the right of the Palestinian people everywhere, not only those inside, to collectively determine their future. Even Israel (and the US) acknowledge that the Palestinians have a right to “participate” in determining their future, but these principles are not being applied in practice. The refugees in exile are being accorded neither of these rights; and now that the refugee issue is at the top of the Middle East peace agenda, it is high time these rights were given.

(3) Layering and prioritizing the return. In dealing with the refugee situation realistically, it may be necessary to determine priorities for a return program in phases. A future Palestinian state will need to set priorities, but here we provide the original example. These phases and their organization will, by the definition of sovereignty, fall entirely within the Palestinian sovereign domain, assuming the achievement of sovereign Palestinian authority over their external borders with Egypt and Jordan. The return should be in phases, and according to PLO/PA established priorities, since it will not be practically feasible to return all the refugees at once. Some of them will have to wait for a specified length of time; some must return immediately. It is up to the Palestinian leadership to determine these priorities based on objective criteria as to whose situation is most urgent, then to go to the other refugee communities and reach an understanding with them so that they will agree to wait as a nationalistic duty, and not feel that they have been left out in the cold.

In terms of the overall exile population, we are talking about perhaps four million people. Probably one million of these are safe and sound in the Western diaspora and would be happy with the right of return, even if they would not exercise it except for intermittent visits. Being in no immediate danger, they stand at the very bottom of the priority list. Practically speaking, many of them will not want to leave their luxurious standards to take up residence in refugee camps or makeshift towns, even in a Palestinian state.

The two million Palestinians in Jordan, in their relatively stable situation, would have the next lowest priority. Not all of them will want to return. Some will want to stay; and King Abdallah has indicated that anyone who wants to stay will be allowed to.

That leaves us with about one million people in camps or in insecure situations. Breaking this down, we have next on the priority scale those 350,000 or so Palestinians in camps in Syria, who live in a secure situation but some of whom might want to resettle closer to home.

Next, there are another 100,000 or so Palestinian refugees in countries as Libya and Egypt where their existence is either insecure and unviable politically (Libya and Egypt) or is economically desperate as in Iraq. In all of these cases, these countries are far away; and because of that situation, these Palestinians should be allowed to leave.

* Emergency preparations to save the Lebanon refugees from third-country transfer as the most immediate priority

At the very top of the priority list, then, are the 350,000 or so Palestinians in Lebanon, whose situation is both politically and financially desperate, and whose immediate future is additionally in danger. Their situation must be treated with the utmost urgency, because they are, unlike the other refugees, facing the possibility of a sudden fait accompli. If time runs out and they are suddenly sent away from Lebanon and scattered among a multitude of faraway locations, no force in the world will be able to save them from a permanent and desolate exile. In fact, even if they are exiled to a different nearby area or permanently resettled in Lebanon itself, their problem will be declared solved, and their existence as they know it will be over. However, if they are embraced by the Palestinian state and an internal contingency plan is developed to bring them inside it not as a “return” but as a step toward the return — they will have a fighting chance.

It should be mentioned that the threat of transferring the Lebanese refugees to Iraq or to any other third country by force is not only antithetical to international law; it would constitute a forced mass deportation, categorized by international law as a war crime. In the wake of the notorious forced marches that took place during the Second World War, the 1949 Geneva Convention in Article 49 prohibits “individual or mass forcible transfers ... regardless of their motive.” This may not even be enough to stop it, although there are indications that a more deceptive or subtle means might be used: that of opening the doors of immigration to Western countries such as Australia, Canada and the US, to which the refugees may be drawn by economic desperation resulting from Lebanon’s prohibition on Palestinians there to earn a living. Of course, such a mass scattering, by appealing to people’s concerns for their immediate families, would destroy these people’s existence as Palestinians forever, and it must be opposed. Collectively, the people must be kept safe from such a dispersal, whatever it takes.

It is perfectly realistic from an objective standpoint that the refugees in the camps, especially in Lebanon, be given physical nationality rights in a sovereign Palestinian state similar to any 1948 refugee currently residing in the West Bank or Gaza Strip camps, without prejudicing their personal or political rights in the original return. However, this should be a fallback position, that is, ready to implement immediately on an emergency basis should a transfer threat from Lebanon to distant countries (or resettlement in Lebanon itself) suddenly manifest itself. This fallback position should be ready and waiting to be offered as a counter-measure should the danger of transfer or re-resettlement in Lebanon become imminent.

Of course, the best scenario of all would be for the Lebanon refugees to have top priority for a return to the 1948 areas, should this become possible in the negotiated forum. This would leave additional room in the West Bank areas for the 1967 “displaced” who are actually from there, to return there. But it should be understood in either case that the situation of the Lebanon refugees is many times more urgent than that of the 1967 “displaced,” and it should therefore be afforded the higher priority. At the very least, the 1967 “displaced” are living as Palestinians, with Palestinians, and in Palestinian communities close to Palestine, and are not facing the imminent danger of “mass transfer” or dispersion to faraway locales.

 Refugee Referendum

The task itself belongs to the Palestine Liberation Organization as the sole legitimate representative of the people in question. Therefore, it should be the organization’s primary responsibility to conceive it and then carry it out. It would be hoped that the PLO. in executing this immense but important task, would have the assistance and cooperation of the international community. The most important form of assistance outside parties could provide would be to convince reluctant parties to allow the process to proceed in their countries. Other than this, the PLO would need logistical help in obtaining the data to locate and then centralize the Palestinian residents in each of the individual countries into this process.

The purpose of this exercise is not to determine how many Palestinians possess the right of return — since all of them do — but on how many refugees actually would return today, and to where, if the possibility were offered to them. This referendum should be given to every Palestinian, including small children, to be completed by their parents — whose current primary residence (to distinguish students and workers abroad only temporarily) is anywhere but his or her original home town in Palestine. I realize that a variety of suggestions — the census, the opinion poll, and so forth — have already been made. However, this one differs from the others in that it is a numbers game; its aim is to imbue the return with a sharp practical attribute. If it is done, it will remove a certain vagueness from the Palestinian negotiating position on the return, strengthening it by virtue of granting it the practical dimension. This way, since rights would not be under negotiation — rights that simply exist — PLO negotiators would have the potential to refocus the discussion on the return from an argument about rights to an argument about practicalities.

For our purposes, the term “Palestinian” includes everyone with at least one Palestinian parent (mother or father, so as not to discriminate by gender, in conjunction with the original PLO National Charter of 1964). The objective here is not to practicalize the return or create false hopes, but to help the PLO/PA and other interested parties gain information on how many people we are really dealing with, how many people wish to exercise that right today or tomorrow as opposed to how many people theoretically have that right but would probably not exercise it anytime in the foreseeable future. The practicalities of any type of return cannot be gauged, nor can priorities for a staggered return be discerned or negotiated, unless we know how many people we are actually talking about.

The term “refugee” is to be understood here not in its legalistic sense, i.e., whether or not the person is registered with UNRWA — which is more a measure of poverty than anything else — but in its political sense, since we are dealing with a political question. The term “refugee” should be understood here as synonymous with the terms “involuntarily exiled from his or her hometown” and “descendant of an individual involuntary exiled from his or her home town.” This will obviously include a number of 1948 Palestine refugees currently living in the West Bank and Gaza Strip as well as those abroad.

The questions in this referendum would be as follows:

1. Did your family leave Palestine voluntarily as a permanent emigre, or were you forced out? (This question is not about morality or the ethics of responsibility for the refugee issue; rather it is designed to separate refugees from emigres. Those Palestinians who voluntarily undertook what they considered to be a permanent emigration still have a right to return, as everyone in the world possesses the right to return to their country, but they are not likely to want to exercise it. It is likely that many of these permanent emigrants, and particularly their children and grandchildren born overseas, would not (do not) even go back for short visits on a regular basis, much less likely they would want to return wholesale.)

1. In which country or territory are you currently living, and how long have you been living there? In which other countries have you previously lived, if any, and how long did you live in each one?

1. Are you from the West Bank or Gaza Strip, or from the part of Palestine that became the State of Israel in 1948? (This is to separate those whose original hometowns lie within the areas that could become part of a future independent Palestinian state from those whose hometowns have become part of Israel).

(a) If you are from the 1948 areas, if you were given the opportunity to return unconditionally and live permanently and exclusively in your hometown in Palestine, with a Palestinian passport, would you do it? (The term “permanently and exclusively” is to separate real returnees from elite international individuals who would actually spend most of their time living outside while retaining technical residence in Palestine for political reasons.)

(b) If you are from the 1948 areas, if you were given the opportunity to return unconditionally and live permanently and exclusively in your hometown in Palestine, with an Israeli passport, would you do it?

(c) If you are from the 1948 areas, if you were given the opportunity to live permanently and exclusively in an independent Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, with a Palestinian passport, would you do it?

(d) If you are from the 1948 areas, do you possess an Arab or foreign passport or are you technically stateless? (These questions are not to negate any of these people's right to return, but to determine, again, the likelihood that a given individual would want to return.)

- If you possess an Arab or foreign passport and were forced to choose between it and a Palestinian passport with residence in your hometown in Palestine, which would you choose?

- If you possess an Arab or foreign passport and were forced to choose between it and a Palestinian passport with residence in an independent Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, which would you choose?

- If you are stateless, are you currently seeking an Arab or foreign passport?

- If you are seeking an Arab or foreign passport, would you cancel your application in exchange for a Palestinian passport with residence in your hometown in Palestine?

- If you are seeking an Arab or foreign passport, would you cancel your application in exchange for a Palestinian passport with residence in a Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza Strip?

- If you are seeking an Arab or foreign passport and the answers to the two preceding questions were both “no,” are you currently a legal permanent resident of the country in question? (This is to discover the likelihood that the Arab or foreign passport seeker will actually obtain one, given that although they would rather live outside permanently, they might have nowhere else to go).

(e) If you are from the West Bank or Gaza Strip, if you were given the opportunity to return unconditionally and live permanently and exclusively in your hometown in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, with a Palestinian passport, would you do it?

(f) If you are from the West Bank or Gaza Strip, if you were given the opportunity to return unconditionally and live permanently and exclusively in some other town in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, with a Palestinian passport — assuming your home town is likely to be annexed by Israel — would you do it?

(g) If you are from the West Bank and Gaza Strip but living in exile, do you possess an Arab or foreign passport or are you technically stateless?

- If you possess an Arab or foreign passport and were forced to choose between it and a Palestinian passport with exclusive residence in your hometown in the West Bank or Gaza Strip, which would you choose? (This question again is not to diminish anyone’s right to return, but to get a sense of how likely they are to want to return.)

- If you possess an Arab or foreign passport and were forced to choose between it and a Palestinian passport with exclusive residence in some other town in the West Bank or Gaza Strip — assuming your hometown is likely to be annexed by Israel — which would you choose?

- It you are stateless, are you currently seeking or likely to receive an Arab state or foreign country passport with permanent residency rights in that country in the foreseeable future?

- It you are seeking an Arab or foreign passport, would you cancel your application in exchange for a Palestinian passport with exclusive residence in your hometown in the West Bank or Gaza Strip?

- It you are seeking an Arab or foreign passport, would you cancel your application in exchange for a Palestinian passport with exclusive residence in some other town in the West Bank or Gaza Strip, assuming your hometown is likely to be annexed by Israel?

- If you are seeking an Arab or foreign passport and the answers to the two preceding questions were both “no,” are you currently a legal permanent resident of the country in question? (Again, this is to discover the likelihood that the Arab or foreign passport seeker will actually obtain one, given that although they would rather live outside permanently, they might have nowhere else to go.)

 Conclusion

These results should be statistically collated and cross-referenced. This procedure will generate categories of necessary and likely returnees as well as differing levels of urgency. The seven categories thus generated are here ranked in terms of the priority and sequence of a proposed staggered return process:

1. 1948 Palestine refugees currently stateless, living outside the boundaries of mandatory Palestine, and not seeking Arab or foreign passports. This will generate the bulk of the refugees in Lebanon and Syria, together with small numbers of others scattered in other Arab countries such as Egypt and Libya.

1. 1948 Palestine refugees with Arab passports living outside the borders of mandatory Palestine. This will generate the bulk of 1948 refugees with Jordanian passports living in Jordan, as well as small numbers of refugees who have been given citizenship in Lebanon, Syria, and other Arab countries. Much of this is due to marriage or religion. In instances of marriage to another Arab national, especially in the case of female refugees, some of these people might find that their husbands will want to stay abroad, and hence, they would not be included in the category of practical returnees.

1. West Bank and Gaza Strip refugees with Arab passports living outside the borders of mandatory Palestine. This will generate the bulk of the 1967 “displaced” with Jordanian passports living in Jordan.

1. 1948 Palestine refugees currently stateless living within the boundaries of mandatory Palestine. This will generate the bulk of the refugees in the Gaza Strip.

1. 1948 Palestine refugees with Arab passports living in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. This will generate the bulk of 1948 refugees with Jordanian passports living in the West Bank.

1. 1948 Palestine refugees with foreign passports or actively seeking them, living outside the boundaries of mandatory Palestine. This will generate the bulk of 1948 refugees and emigres living outside of the Arab world.

1. West Bank and Gaza Strip refugees with foreign passports or actively seeking them, living outside the borders of mandatory Palestine. This will generate the bulk of the 1967 “displaced” and emigres, living outside the Arab world.

Each category will generate two sets of numbers: the number of Palestinians who want to return, and those who do not wish to undertake their right to return at this time, but who will receive compensation. The numbers of those who want to return now, and to where, could then become the Palestinian negotiating position on the practical aspects of the return. This could be offered together with an exact timetable of a staggered return for the groups in each of the above categories, ranked in order of urgency and priority, 1–7. Those in category #1 would be placed first on the timetable, comprising the initial wave of return, and so on.

In conclusion, the lending of a practical aspect to the return is imperative to the logical strength of the Palestinian negotiating position in the final status. I believe these ideas to be in line with the “voluntary repatriation” concept of Salim Tamari, and likewise, consistent with his strategic advice to focus on the “non-final terms and modalities of residency, return and compensation that will be acceptable to the Palestinians” because, as he says, “it does not mean that the Palestinians give up their historical rights to return to the country.”[490] These proposals will also help to protect the ethical and moral weight of the subject at the international level, since they would serve to transform the negotiation from the negotiation about rights that it is now, that it should never have been, into a negotiation about implementation — a negotiation about precise actions to be taken, in a specific sequence.

In short, what is outlined here is a proposal for the practical implementation of United Nations Resolution 194.

[414] Interview with PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat, al-Nahar (Beirut), September 10, 1999, in BBC Summary of World Broadcasts, September 13, 1999.

[415] Address by Lebanese Prime Minister Salim El-Hoss to the United Nations General Assembly, New York, September 23, 1999, via FB1S. Lebanon’s former prime minister, Omar Karaim, says there are only 250,000 Palestinian refugees currently in Lebanon, that the rest have “either returned to Palestine or been granted Lebanese citizenship,” as quoted in Deutsche Presse-Agentur, July 21, 1999. In fact, many more of this number have left Lebanon out of economic desperation to join relatives already resident in Scandinavia and other Western regions. Hezbollah’s

Fadlallah, similarly, cites Palestinian research sources in Lebanon as claiming the number of Palestinians in Lebanon has diminished to the 200,000–250,000 range, see the interview with Hezbollah spiritual leader Mohammad Hussein Fadlallah by Tawfiq Abu Bakr, al-Sharq al-Aw sat (London), December 2, 1998: 12, via FBIS.

[416] Agence France Presse, “Lebanese president warns unilateral Israeli pullout will not bring peace,” November 9, 1999.

[417] Interview with Abu Ali Mustafa, Assistant Secretary General of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, by cd-Ayyam (Ramallah), September 27, 1999: 11, via FBIS.

[418] Interview with then Col. Sultan Abu al-Aynain by Ahmad Faqih, al-Diyar (Beirut), August 6, 1999: 6, via FBIS.

[419] Reported by al-Quds al-Arabi (London), in “Resettling the Palestinian refugees,” Mideast Mirror, November 10, 1999.

[420] As observed by Lebanese Interior Minister Michel Murr, quoted in Mounir B. Abboud. “Refugees await return to Palestine,” Saudi Gazette, September 16, 1999.

[421] Address by Lebanese Prime Minister Salim El-Hoss to the United Nations General Assembly. New York. September 23, 1999, via FBIS\ and “Losers, always,” The Economist, August 28, 1999.

[422] Radio Lebanon (Beirut), July 25, 1999, in BBC Summary of World Broadcasts, July 27, 1999: Hoss made similar remarks to Madeleine Albright during her visit to Lebanon, notably, “We cannot accept the saying that the matter will have to be relegated to final status talks. We think we should be a party to such talks,” in “‘Iraq option’ resurfaces as Albright, Lebanese PM differ on refugees," Mideast Mirror, September 6, 1999.

[423] Graham Usher, "Arafat returns to Lebanon," al-Ahram Weekly no. 444, August 26-September I, 1999.

[424] Agence France Presse, "Lebanese president says any peace must be comprehensive," November 12, 1999; Deutsche Press Agentur, "Vedrine acknowledges Lebanon's fears on an Israeli unilateral withdrawal,' November 12, 1999.

[425] This position is echoed in the Beirut press, as reported in "Palestinian official to visit Lebanon, solving sentence dispute." Xinhua News Agency, November 4,1999.

[426] al-Watan al-Arahi (Paris), November 6, 1998: 18–20, via I BIS.

[427] Interview with then Col. Sultan Abu al-Aynain by Ahmad Faqih, al-Diyar (Beirut), August 6, 1999: 6, via FBIS.

[428] "Fatah militia leader denies Palestinian camps' involvement in illegal activities," al-Safir (Beirut), November 11, 1999, BBC Summary of World Broadcasts, November 13, 1999.

[429] Intisar El-Wazir, Palestinian Authority Minister of Social Affairs to al-Ahram (Cairo), November 3, 1998: 8, via FBIS.

[430] Aluf Benn, quoting an Israeli official involved in the talks, in "Facing the refugee problem," Ha'aretz, October 12, 1999..

[431] Muhammad Baqir Sharri, “Al-Asad’s Syria and the National Authority: the motto ‘return of the refugees’ is stronger than the motto ‘rejection of their settlement, “ al-Diyar (Beirut), August 11, 1999: I, via FBIS.

[432] Palestinian Authority Information Minister Yasser Abed Rabbo, quoted in Middle East Newsline, September, 1999.

[433] As’ad Abdel Rahman, head of the PLO Refugee Affairs Department, to al-Sharqal-Awsat (London), November 18, 1998: 7, via FBIS.

[434] As’ad Abdel Rahman, director of the PLO Refugee Affairs Department, to al-Ayyam (Ramallah), March 1, 1999: 5, via FBIS.

[435] As reported in “Losers, always/’ The Economist. August 28, 1999.

[436] Interview with PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat, al-Nahar (Beirut), September 10, 1999, in BBC Summary of World Broadcasts. September 13, 1999.

[437] Initial signs of a strategy of inside-outside geographical separation can be found by a close reading of Shlomo Gazit, “Refugee solution,” Jerusalem Post. November 9, 1999: 8.

[438] Ramzi Mansour, “PM sees no point in talks with Israel, spurns invitations to ’Partners in Peace,’” Daily Star (Beirut), September 23, 1999.

[439] Mounir B. Abboud, “Refugees await return to Palestine.” Saudi Gazette. September 16, 1999.

[440] Iranian former President Hashemi Rafsanjani’s version: Rafsanjani also claims to be in possession of documents to this effect, reported in “Israel accused of planning to transfer Palestinian refugees to Iraq,” Xinhua News Agency, January 15, 1999.

[441] Primarily Kuwaiti reports, e.g., Kuwait’s al-Watan. as reported in “Iraq to make deal with Israel.” Xinhua News Agency, August 10. 1994. See also speculation about the contents of an “Iraqi message” for the United States to be delivered via King Abdallah II of Jordan, “Jordan’s King Abdallah to deliver Saddam message to Clinton,” Mideast Mirror. October 7, 1999; and Bahrain’s al-Ayyam. “Saddam reportedly sends proposals to USA via Jordanian king,” October 18, 1999, in BBC Summary of World Broadcasts. October 20, 1999. For the same accusation leveled in the context of the recent US congressional staff delegation to Iraq, see Said Al-Qaysi, “Two million Palestinians to save Saddam Hussein’s head,” al-Watan al-Arabi (London), September 24, 1999. King Abdallah later denied the very existence of the Iraqi message in an interview, Mideast Mirror. November 12, 1999.

[442] As reported by the Voice of Palestine (Ramallah), November 6, 1999, in BBC Summary of World Broadcasts. November 8, 1999.

[443] Including early reports of Palestinian “go-betweens” to a willing Iraq, “Iraq’s Israeli option,” Mideast Mirror. June 21, 1994; also al-Watan (Kuwait), as reported in “PLO, Iraq, consider settling 800,000 Palestinians, Xinhua News Agency, August 28, 1994. For reports on PA complicity in the Gulf resettlement scheme, see the denial by PA Preventive Security — West Bank chief, Jibril Rajoub, quoted by the Xinhua News Agency, “Palestinian refugees have sacred right to return home — official,” November 10, 1999.

[444] “Iraqis and Palestinians won’t swap exiles,” Mideast Mirror. June 25. 1997.

[445] Relating to Israeli calls to resettle Palestinians in Iraq dating back to the 1950s, in /bid.

[446] Fouzi El-Asmar, “Right to repatriation,” al-Riyadh (Riyadh), September 30, 1999: 16, viaFB/S.

[447] Contrary to some media reports, e.g., “al-Hayat reports an informal offer to Iraq: take the Palestinians of Lebanon and escape the embargo.” Mideast Mirror. October 4, 1993.

[448] al-Bayan (Dubai), April 14, 1997, quoted in BBC Summary of World Broadcasts. April 16, 1997.

[449] My initial research into this matter (and the disclosures I received on the Iraqi matter) have since been cited and reaffirmed by Abdallah al-Nafisi, a member of the Kuwaiti parliament, as reported in al-Watan (Kuwait) and al-Khaleej (UAE), for a summary of these in English, see “US scheme to resettle Palestinian refugees in Iraq,” Mideast Mirror. October 13, 1999.

[450] Joseph Samaha in al-Hayat. reproduced as “Lebanon’s outcry against Palestinian resettlement,” in Mideast Mirror. September 3, 1999.

[451] The French offer is in “France offers to resettle Palestinians,’’ Middle East Newsline. September 22, 1999.

[452] Donna Arzt, Refugees into Citizens: Palestinians and the End of the Arab-Israeli Conflict (New York: Council on Foreign Relations, 1997).

[453] An earlier version of this proposal coincides with the timing of the original Iraq proposal, “al-Hayat reports an informal offer to Iraq: take the Palestinians of Lebanon and escape the embargo,” Mideast Mirror. October 4, 1993; for Jordan’s current concern regarding re-settling the Palestine refugees from Lebanon in Jordan, Zvi Bare!, “Lebanon has its own Palestinian problem,” Ha’aretz, Septembers, 1999.

[454] “Jordan’s King Abdallah to deliver Saddam message to Clinton,” Mideast Mirror, October 7, 1999.

[455] Interview with former Jordanian Prime Minister Fayez Tarawneh in “Former Jordan PM warns against confederation,” Middle East Newsline. June 17, 1999; also remarks by the current prime minister Abdel Ra’uf Rawabidah, “Prime minister says no plans to settle Palestinian refugees in Jordan,” Jordan Times. August 10, 1999.

[456] “Resettling the Palestinian refugees,” Mideast Mirror. November 10, 1999.

[457] A new variation on the Gulf states scheme, as well as the Jordan Syria Lebanon scheme, are both recently reported by al-Quds al-Arahi (London) as being of US origin, in “Resettling the Palestinian refugees,” Mideast Mirror. November 10, 1999.

[458] “Jordan’s role in final status analyzed,” Jordan l imes. September 19, 1999, via EBIS; this line is also advocated in Mamduh Nawfal, “Baraq’s tactics should be encountered with a clear and constant negotiating strategy,” al-Ayyam (Ramallah), October 11, 1999: 18, via EBIS.

[459] “‘Iraq option’ resurfaces as Albright, Lebanese PM differ on refugees,” Mideast Mirror. September 6, 1999.

[460] Eli Wohlgelernter, “Campaign to identify Jewish property in Arab countries, Jerusalem Post. May 5, 1999, quotes David Bar-Ilan, director of policy planning under Netanyahu, as saying: “If claims to Arab property are raised, then obviously Israel will have to counter them with claims to property that are immeasurably greater.” Also see “Israel launches hunt lor lost Jewish property in Arab world,” Agence France Presse, January 16, 1999; “A scheme to settle 5 million Palestinian refugees in the region and the world,” al-Sharq al-Awsat (London), January 17, 1999; Itamar Levin, “WJC starts battle for compensation to Jews of Arab countries,” Globes, June 22, 1999.

[461] From Salman Abu-Sitteh, al-Hayat, reported in “Compensation for Palestinian refugees? forget it,” Mideast Mirror, August 26, 1999.

[462] Douglas Davis, “US plan seeks to re-settle Palestinian refugees,” Jerusalem Post, January 22, 1999, A13.

[463] The conditions were described by Salman Abu-Sitteh in Al-Hayat and reported in “Compensation for Palestinian refugees? forget it,” Mideast Mirror, August 26, 1999. These conditions are virtually identical to those later elaborated in Aluf Benn, reporting on Barak’s position, in “Facing the refugee problem,” Haaretz, October 12, 1999.

[464] Nitzan Horowitz and Aluf Benn, “US reluctance on aid casts shadow over talks,” Ha’aretz, October 20, 1999.

[465] “Lebanon wants Palestinians to retain refugee status,” Middle East Newsline, July 1, 1999.

[466] Interview with Hezbollah spiritual leader Mohammad Hussein Fadlallah by Tawfiq Abu Bakr, al-Sharq al-Awsat (London), December 2, 1998: 12, via FBIS.

[467] “France ‘urges Lebanon to resettle Palestinian refugees,’” Mideast Mirror, September 22, 1999; and “France reportedly proposes Lebanon settle Palestinians,” al-Sharq al-Awsat (London), September 22, 1999, in BBC Worldwide Monitoring, September 23, 1999.

[468] Jihad Khalil, “Vedrine denies Palestinian refugee plan,” United Press International, October 5, 1999; Agence France Presse, “Lebanese president says any peace must be comprehensive,” November 12, 1999; Radio France Internationale (Paris), November 13, 1999, in BBC Worldwide Monitoring, November 13, 1999.

[469] Quoted in Zvi Barel, “Lebanon has its own Palestinian problem,” Haaretz, September 8, 1999.

[470] al-Bay an (Dubai), September 9, 1999, via FBIS.

[471] Interview with Daoud Barakat, Deputy Head of the PLO Refugee Affairs Department, by BADIL Resource Center, September 21, 1999.

[472] “Syria does not want Palestinian refugees after deal with Israel,” al-Masa’iyah (Amman), August 3, 1999, in BBC Monitoring Middle East, August 4, 1999.

[473] Arzt, Refugees into Citizens.

[474] Barry Rubin, “Forced to choose,” Jerusalem Post, October 26, 1999, p. 9.

[475] Quoted in Graham Usher, “Arafat returns to Lebanon,” al-Ahram Weekly, no. 444, August 26-September 1, 1999.

[476] Interview with Daoud Barakat, Deputy Head of the PLO Refugee Affairs Department, by BADIL Resource Center, September 21, 1999.

[477] Fanny Germain, “The new diaspora system.” Palestine Report, January 29, 1999.

[478] Interview with PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat, al-Nahar (Beirut), September 10, 1999, in BBC Summary of World Broadcasts, September 13, 1999.

[479] This opinion is echoed in Barry Rubin, “Forced to choose,” Jerusalem Post, October 26, 1999, p. 9.

[480] This is the opinion expressed in the press release of the BADIL Resource Center, October 14, 1999.

[481] Benjamin Netanyahu, A Place Among the Nations: Israel and the World (New York: Bantam Books, 1993).

[482] Salman Abu-Sitteh’s argument is outlined in his “Palestinian refugees and the permanent status negotiations/’ Policy Brief no. 7, Center for Policy Analysis on Palestine, November 16, 1999; and in a press release of the BADIL Resource Center entitled “The right of return of Palestinian refugees,” April 28, 1999.

[483] Quoted in Thomas L. Friedman (New York Times), “The crunch issue: the refugee-settler tradeoff is at root of any Mideast peace deal,” The Gazette (Montreal), November 11, 1999, p. B3.

[484] Mossy Raz, general secretary of Peace Now, to the Israeli Independent Media Review and Analysis, July 2, 1999.

[485] Interview with Salim Tamari by Tom Abowd, News from Within, July 27, 1999.

[486] Ibid.

[487] Edward Said, “By birth or choice?” al-Ahram Weekly, October 28- November 3, 1999.

[488] Interview with Salim Tamari by Tom Abowd, News from Within, July 27, 1999.

[489] Ben Lynfield, “A point of no return,” Jerusalem Post, October 29, 1999, p. 1B.

[490] Interview with Salim Tamari by Tom Abowd, News from Within, July 27, 1999.

* Part II: Policy Positions and Solutions

 17. Solving the Refugee Problem — An Israeli Point of View

[[Shlomo Gazit]]

This chapter is not the Israeli position but just one individual Israeli's point of view. Furthermore, knowing Israeli public opinion, my proposal here belongs to the Israeli left wing; it is not the most extreme left position, but it is some distance from the mainstream positions. Another important point is that we did not come to negotiate here in Oklahoma, and this chapter is not intended to serve as my opening bargaining position. As far as I am concerned, if what I say here is not acceptable to the Palestinians, then there is no deal!

Listening to the Palestinian presentations together with the Israeli ones reminds me of an old Jewish story. A couple with many problems in their conjugal life went to their rabbi to present their differences.

First comes in the husband. The rabbi listens carefully to his claims and complaints, nods his head again and again and agrees, saying, "You are right, you are right!"

Next comes the woman's turn. Again, the rabbi listens patiently to all her grievances and nods his head, and says, "You are right, you are right!"

The rabbi's wife reproaches her husband saying "But this utterly impossible! How come you listen to the husband and tell him that he was right, and then you listen to the wife, and you tell that she was right?"

The rabbi sighs, and responds, "You know what? You are also right!"

Unfortunately, this story reflects the tragedy of the Palestinian refugee problem. For both sides there are legitimate views, and for both sides the past is not clear-cut. We need to look for solutions and not waste energy discussing the past. More than 50 years have passed since the war in 1948. The political solutions that might have worked had there been no war or even the solutions that were offered and discussed immediately after the war, are no longer viable. The reality (and the facts that go with that reality) is totally changed. For example, the various UN resolutions that were adopted 50 years ago were proposed and agreed in a very different situation from that which exists today.

Israel and the Palestinian Authority are now in the process of bilateral discussions. Both sides are making a serious attempt to reach a workable and lasting solution to the conflict. Neither side has any illusions that it will get one hundred percent of its claims and expectations. Palestinian independence and statehood, Jerusalem, borders, Israeli settlements, security, water and economic relations — all these issues have to be resolved. And of course, the Palestinian refugee problem has to be resolved. Were either party to enter these final status negotiations without flexibility, without willingness to listen to compromise solutions and with insistence on receiving all their demands, the result would be failure.

Addressing the refugee problem in a vacuum, without taking on board the other issues that are being addressed simultaneously, brings with it an additional problem. The end solution calls for clear and cruel priorities. Each party will have to decide which of the issues is more important? On which of the issues is Israel ready to go for a crisis and a breakdown of the talks? On the other hand, where can Israel show more flexibility, where can Israel be more forthcoming to the other side's demands?

With a gentle reminder that I am stating my personal position, let me begin by saying that I am a pessimist. I do not believe that the Middle East is ready for real and lasting peace in the foreseeable future. I am referring not only to the relations between Israel and its Arab neighbors. I believe that antagonisms among all neighboring countries will be characteristic of the Middle East, and that problems will flare up on the Iranian-Iraqi border, the Iraqi-Kuwaiti border, the Egyptian-Sudanese border, etc.

The media never ceases talking about “peace in the Middle East,” but it is pertinent to ask why Israel is trying to achieve a political agreement in an unstable area and world. My understanding of “real peace” is that the two parties do not threaten each other, and that they do not fear the possibility of a political change or of a revolution that may throw the parties once more into a violent conflict.

Recall that we saw no real peace in western Europe until the last 40–50 years. From a legal point of view there was “peace” in Europe before 1914, just as there was peace between 1919 and 1939. There was a French embassy in Berlin and a German embassy in Paris; there was commerce going in both directions; and tourists came and went. And yet — almost from one day to another — this “peace” collapsed.

My concept of “real peace” is the kind of relations we see today in western Europe, between France and Germany or between the United States and Canada.

I am a strong supporter of the political process. I very well understand why people prefer to call it the “peace process.” I very much hope that the parties will reach a political agreement; and this agreement — Inshalla - will launch a very long process of, on one hand, implementing the agreement and resolving the issues, and on the other hand, gradually dissolving the deep emotional feelings on both sides. Without these gradual changes and developments there is no chance to ultimately see real peace.

 Israeli Priorities

Let me list Israel’s national priorities as I see them. My top priority is the continued existence of Israel as a Jewish state — a Jewish state and not an Israeli state. The possibility that Jews will become a minority in Israel is a nightmare for me. I do not want to live in such a state. I did not come to this part of the world in order to replace my being a minority in the US, in Europe, or elsewhere with my becoming a minority in a state where the majority will be Arab-Palestinian.

I am a Zionist that believes that the only solution for the Jewish people is the establishment of one single independent and sovereign state in which we Jews will be the majority. Any political agreement between Israel and the Palestinians that will endanger the Jewish character of my state is totally unacceptable to me.

This national priority has two immediate and practical implications. First, when discussing the future borders between Israel and Palestine, I will be very careful not to admit to any new and major Arab-Palestinian communities within Israel’s new borders. Secondly, I am categorically against the return of Palestinian refugees into Israel.

There is already a large slice of non-Jews within Israel, about 18 percent. Taking note of and into consideration the difference between existing Jewish and Arab demographic trends, this is already a problem. Thus my first priority is that any future political solution should guarantee the Jewish character of the state.

My second national priority deals with security. And this is the direct conclusion from my pessimistic forecast as for the chances of seeing real peace in the foreseeable future. Any future political agreement should include strong and reliable security guarantees. It should serve a double purpose — on one hand, if something in the process does go wrong I would not like to face an existential threat to Israel; on the other hand, the very existence of these security guarantees may, hopefully, serve as a deterrent. The very knowledge that Israel cannot be taken by surprise may deter a possible Arab enemy from initiating such a military move. I am not unduly worried about a Palestinian capability to attempt an all out military offensive against Israel. But with respect to the security aspects of Israel's bilateral agreement with the Palestinians:

- I would like to have a clear Palestinian guarantee not to allow any outside Arab military forces to enter its territory;

- I insist on the continued presence of limited Israeli forces at strategic locations in the West Bank, serving both for early warning purposes as well as a tripwire and first military interception of any Arab force making an attempt to enter from the east;

- And last but not least, there has to be a clear and unequivocal Palestinian undertaking not to allow any terrorist operations from its territory against Israel.

Such security arrangements are an important element in our political agreement with Egypt. Israeli troops have withdrawn completely from the Sinai Peninsula. Nevertheless, because of the above arrangements, Israel does not consider its security along the Egyptian border to be affected. The security problems between Israel and Jordan do not have such a high priority in our agreement. At the same time, there are some important understandings in this agreement too. For example, Jordan has undertaken not to allow any foreign forces to enter its territory.

At some point in the future, Israel hopes to negotiate and to reach a political agreement with Damascus. I am sure that security will be one of the most important criteria in that agreement.

My third and final national priority is to see this agreement as the beginning of a lasting and comprehensive settlement of the conflict, a true conclusion of the Arab-Israeli conflict. I very much believe that both parties should remove, dismantle and diffuse every single “mine” — whether rhetoric or threat — in this huge minefield in which the people of the Middle East have been living for the last fifty years. Leaving unresolved problems would be like leaving live non-diffused mines; the end result would only be who and when one party would suffer and blame the other. Blaming the other party can no longer be the means of political discourse between nation states in the Middle East.

 The Priorities in Resolving the Refugee Problem

The above three priorities lead me to my personal view and solution to the refugee problem.

The first priority is the need to have two entirely separate political entities. Two states with clearly defined borders to separate them. Separate borders do not necessarily mean closed borders, with fences and minefields.

I would like to see two countries that allow movement in both directions, but only through recognized crossing points. In this situation, there would be movement of goods and of people. I hope that we shall see the end to the present phenomena of some 40,000 vehicles that are stolen every year from Israeli private owners and smuggled into Palestinian territory.

To reiterate the argument presented above — there should be no return of Palestinian refugees into the present or future borders of Israel. The future borders between the two countries will be on the agenda of the bilateral negotiations and I assume that the agreed borders will not be the old Green Line. Within these future borders, there should be no return of refugees and no right of return.

The current balance between Jews and non-Jews in Israel is delicate. Growth of the Arab population in Israel may encourage Arab irredentist movements that will call for independence from and their separation from Israel. This is something Israel cannot afford, bearing in mind that the present size of Israel is approximately some 10,000 square miles.

There are some 3 to 3.5 million Palestinian refugees that claim the right of return. Had they returned in 1948, in accordance to the famous UN resolution 194. they could have returned to their original homes, property and villages. This is no longer possible. What people fail to understand is that were the Palestinian refugees to return to Israel today, nothing is available. There would be only two possibilities. One possibility would be to remove several million Israelis that have been living in Palestinian's former houses for the last 50 years. Many of these properties are now occupied by universities, hospitals and other major installations. The other possibility would expect Israel to absorb the returning Palestinian refugees somewhere in Israel, irrespective of their original homes and villages. The obvious question to be asked is, if we are not calling for the literal return to original homes and property, why not resettle the refugees in countries that have a similar religious and cultural background?

I assume that the present Israeli policy will continue and that we shall allow the entrance of individual Palestinians, on a humanitarian basis. This policy had been going on for the last 50 years, in small numbers, and I very much recommend that it continue. But it is an Israeli decision, and neither the Palestinians nor any outside power have the right to impose on Israel the number of refugees that will be allowed to enter, nor where and when they be allowed to enter. Thus, if a Palestinian Arab living in Nazareth or in Kafr Kassem has a close relative living in Lebanon, he will have the right to apply for family-reunion. It will be a humanitarian act on Israel's part to agree to reunite the family but such reunions should not be part of an annual quota.

With respect to the Palestinian demand and expectation that Israel should admit responsibility for the refugee problem, as well as for the 50 years of refugee suffering, it must be made clear that Israel refuses to accept any responsibility for the refugee problem. I oppose the idea of any Israeli admittance of guilt. The Jews in Palestine did not start the 1948 war. Israel accepted the UN resolution 181 of November 29, 1947 when the Arab side rejected this UN resolution, and the Arabs and others started a violent war against the Jewish community. The Arabs were quite confident that they would win the war, that the Jews in Palestine would be exterminated, and that the Arabs would establish an independent Arab state in all Palestine.

There were also a small number of Jewish refugees during that war. All Jewish villages that were captured during the war by Arab forces were completely destroyed and all their Jewish population (including women and children) were killed or taken as prisoners of war.

In spite of the invasion of foreign Arab armies in support of the local Palestinians, the Arabs lost the war. They lost major parts of the land that had been allocated to them according to the UN partition plan. Furthermore, some 650,000 Palestinians lost their homes and became refugees.

In the years that followed there was consistent Arab refusal to recognize Israel, to negotiate with Israel, or to make peace with the Jewish State. The Palestinian side cannot now come to the table ignoring what took place in 1947 and 1948, ignoring their stubborn refusal to resettle the refugees, and now say to Israeli Jews: “We have lost the war, but now, 52 years later, do allow us to go back to our homes!” The clock cannot be turned back. It is totally wrong to ignore what happened in this part of the world during those 50 years.

The Palestinians demand an Israeli public declaration in which Israel would acknowledge responsibility for the creation of the refugee problem. But there was a war and there was suffering on both sides. Israel lost one percent of its male population. I personally lost many of my closest friends in the 1948 war. Indeed, both my brother and myself were wounded.

I do not even want to think what would have been the consequences for the Israelis had we lost the war. We know, of course, that Palestinians did suffer and that they are still suffering. And the majority of Israelis are sorry that the refugee problem has not yet been resolved. It is a painful humanitarian problem that should be dealt with as soon as possible. But we Israelis are not the responsible party, nor are we prepared to share responsibility.

We are facing nowadays “new historians” that try to tell us that there was no possibility that Israel could have lost the war. I know what were my feelings and those of my friends during those long months of incessant fighting. We never thought that our victory was guaranteed. The only question that we asked again and again was which of our friends will be buried next.

I know very well that the Palestinians have suffered for the last 50 years and are still suffering today. I gladly recognize openly their suffering. But it is neither our doing nor our responsibility.

If the Palestinians greatly desire an Israeli declaration, even if it isn’t true, why should we not please them? Why should we not make that gesture in order to please them’? Why should we not give them the satisfaction that may perhaps allow a solution to the problem?

My answer is very simple: Were Israel to admit responsibility for the refugee problem, we would automatically also be responsible for the 1948 war. We would automatically be responsible for the “rejection” of UN Resolution 181 of November 29, 1947, as well as for many other ‘crimes’ against Palestinians for which Israelis are erroneously blamed for having “committed.”

 The Compensation Issue

I realize that I represent a rather small Israeli minority in terms of the need to compensate the refugees for the properties they left behind — properties we now hold and occupy in Israel. There are many estimates as to the value of these properties. Even according to the most modest evaluations, Israel is incapable of carrying this burden by itself. It will have to be an international project, with Israel raising its limited share. But I simply cannot see how we Israelis have the right not to offer the Palestinians compensation. This is not a political issue, it is a humanitarian problem (as well as a justice problem), and we should treat it as such. The compensation issue has to be part of a package that solves the refugee problem; it has to be within the context of an Israeli-Palestinian peace treaty and political settlement. But it has to be done.

For the sake of fairness I want to also mention the Israeli arguments against these compensation:

First comes the claim, of course, that all these lost properties were the result of a war initiated by the Palestinians and by their Arab neighboring countries, a war they lost. The Palestinians have no right to come today and to say — “Well, we want to forget all the history and circumstances. We want to be compensated for our losses.”

Next comes the claim that the very same war that created the Palestinian refugee problem also created a Jewish refugee problem. Most of the Jewish communities in the Arab world were forced to flee and to find shelter in Israel. None of these Jewish refugees were compensated for their properties, while Israel fully absorbed and integrated them. The Jewish refugees were resettled, in many cases, in vacated former Palestinian villages and neighborhoods.

The third Israeli argument refers to the size of the problem. Israel simply does not have the financial resources to fully compensate the refugees.

Beside the obvious urgent need to solve the compensation problem, I am a strong supporter of the need to solve the refugee issue as a political problem. I strongly believe that the refugee problem will play a key role in the overall complex arrangements leading to a comprehensive resolution of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Israelis are repeatedly concerned with a very intriguing question, that is: Are the Palestinians sincere in their promises to see the future political agreement as the conclusion of all their claims? On almost every of the standing issues, Israel will be expected to “give” something to the Palestinians, while the Palestinian party’s real intentions will not be put to test. Resolving the refugee issue will bring the Palestinians over to the “giving” side.

I assume that once we reach an agreement, the Palestinian leadership will have to address its Palestinian constituency with a very clear message, perhaps along these lines:

“My fellow Palestinians, I am happy to tell you today that our conflict with Israel has come to an end. After so many years of struggle, we have won the war! We are going to have our independent and sovereign Palestinian State. At long last, we shall have our independence, we shall develop our country and we shall show the Jews and the Israelis, as well as the rest of the world, what a beautiful country it is going to be!”

But to this statement, it will be necessary to add:

“This is the good news. The bad news is that our refugee brothers, those that have been living and suffering in the camps for more than 50 years, will not return to their homes in Israel. This is part of the agreement that we have negotiated and signed today. The refugee problem will be resolved in three ways:

First, the Palestinian State will have a Palestinian ‘Law of Return’. Every refugee, wherever he or she may live today, will have the right of choice to return to his own independent Palestinian State, and the Palestinian State will attempt to assist returnees to live in the Palestinian environment and to share the challenge of developing our own land.

Second, we have reached an agreement with our Arab brothers in Jordan, Syria and Lebanon. All refugees presently living in those countries will have the right of residence there. They will have a choice between the citizenship of their host countries, Palestinian citizenship, or dual citizenship;

And last, but not least, both Israel and the international community, will help us in financially compensating, resettling and rehabilitating the refugees."

The above should not be just a declaration. It has to become a commitment of the Palestinian State, other Arab States, Israel, and the international community. In due course there should be no more refugees or refugee camps.

Next, I would expect the Palestinian leadership to undertake another difficult task. That of approaching the Secretary General of the UN and to ask him to dissolve UNRWA. The host countries should assume all of its services. The administration and the personnel should remain in place but as part of the local national administrations. And of course, there would no longer be any Palestinian carrying the formal status of "refugee."

And lastly, the real and most important test would be the implementation of this agreement — the process of resettlement and rehabilitation of the refugees. Do not expect miracles. Nothing will happen from one day to another — it will take years, and most probably, decades. But through this process Israel would be able to see the Palestinian "give" as well as a mutual process of confidence building measures.

The Palestinian refugee problem is considered to be one of the most difficult problems on the mutual Palestinian-Israeli agenda. Once the parties understand the need and are each ready to slaughter a 'sacred cow', the solution will be quite simple. Palestinians have to understand that there will be no return to their original homes inside Israel; Israel will have to undertake to compensate the refugees. Once the parties accept these terms, the resolution of the problem will not only be relatively simple but this process will play an extremely important role in the overall solution of the complex Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

 18. A Predicament in Search of an Innovative Solution

[[Munther S. Dajani]]

Before tackling the problem of the Palestinian refugees. I would like to begin by establishing our hopes and aspirations as we stand poised on the eve of the final status negotiations. I would like to speak at first in general terms, then focus on the refugee problem.

 The General Atmosphere on the Eve of the Final Status Negotiations

One of the most complex issues in reaching a final settlement in the Arab-Israeli conflict concerns building trust and confidence between two peoples who have lived in armed conflict for nearly a century. Throughout this struggle we've learned a valuable lesson: Although it may be important to sign treaties or agreements between governments, the people's acceptance to these agreements and how they are actually implemented are even more important.

In order to sustain the peace promised in the treaties and make it a warm peace, treaties must be accepted, not only by the leadership, but also by the people whose lives are daily affected by such agreements. All parties to the agreement must develop a win-win mentality. To achieve these goals, we must first acknowledge the adversarial relations which exist between the occupiers and the occupied, then attempt to transform this relationship to that of a partnership. We can also start by learning from each other. While it may never be possible for either party to love, or even like, the other, we must begin by developing business partnerships that would mutually benefit both sides.

Both sides must change their basic attitudes toward each other and begin thinking of the other side as a partner in peace rather than as an adversary.

The Israelis, who have always had the upper hand in the negotiations, must start this process by ceasing and desisting in their condescension toward the Palestinians and by putting an end to the hegemony that has resulted in an occupier-occupied/master-slave mentality which continues to jeopardize the entire peace process. Palestinians observe this paradigm even when Israelis negotiate among themselves, then attempt to impose their own consensus on the Palestinians, in an assumption that that which is in the best interests of Israel must be accepted by the Palestinians. This logic constitutes an unacceptable basis on which to build a sustainable and lasting peace.

The Israelis continue to confiscate Palestinian land, to expand their settlements, and detain prisoners. Whether in the name of Israeli security, or for religious or historical reasons, such actions will always remain obstacles toward building a meaningful peace. The Palestinian people need to feel that there can be a significant change from conflict to harmony, from war and agony to peace and happiness, from bombs and destruction to building and reconstruction, from economic strangulation to economic prosperity.

While it is true that the Palestinians are currently in a weak bargaining position, the Israeli leadership must be magnanimous and visionary enough to base present policy on long-term goals that will serve the longterm interests of both parties. Lessons from history continue to remind us that the balance of power changes, alliances shift, and above all nothing is permanent in a modern world full of surprises. Some day the shoe may be on the other foot. As a partner in the peace process, the Israelis should reassess and re-evaluate their long-term policies toward their next door neighbors, especially the Palestinians. It is not feasible, nor sensible, to create a cold peace with those who live next door, let alone those sitting on one's lap. The Israelis must not continue to take unfair advantage of their current strength to undermine the position and credibility of their partners in the peace process who have staked everything on its success. A continuation of current policy will eventually lead to a treaty that, as time passes, will cause bitterness and shame and become a common nightmare; the old treaty, namely the "Versailles" Oslo Treaty of 1999, will become a source of public shame and humiliation which must be corrected or it will lead to a crisis caused by loss of face.

In the 1930s, bad agreements resulted in an unstable political environment which in turn resulted in the creation of the motto "Let's Go to War." This motto became a popular means of ridding the shame brought on by the old treaties instigated by an ancien regime. Bad agreements, resulting in situations similar to the current Palestinian refugee camps, became fertile grounds for planting the seeds of hatred and revenge.

At some point the Israelis must face the truth and begin the reconciliation process by accepting responsibility for injustices inflicted on the Palestinians in general, and the refugees in particular. This will open the way to usher in the Palestinians as equal partners. While it is true that it has taken the Palestinians a long fifty years to finally accept the Israelis, it is my sincere hope that it will not take the Israelis another fifty years to accept the Palestinians. Unfortunately, it appears to be taking the Israelis much longer than expected to accept the Palestinians as partners in the peace process. Perhaps this process can begin by accepting the fact that both peoples must share the land they live on, the water they drink, the air they breathe, the natural resources of the country, and the environment around them. Both must accept that each must have his fair share, but only his fair share.

As the Palestinians have recognized the State of Israel, so must Israel reciprocate by recognizing the State of Palestine as an independent sovereign state. The current logic that seems to state “what is mine is mine, and what is yours must be negotiated” is not, and will never be, acceptable. History has demonstrated beyond a reasonable doubt, that over the long run, the best and longest-lasting treaties, are the win-win treaties, not the zero-sum treaties.

Israelis must view Palestinians not as terrorists and laborers, but as equals and partners. Palestinians are proud to number among its people highly specialized doctors, pharmacists, dentists, lawyers, engineers, scientists, entrepreneurs and businessmen who can make a difference, if given the opportunity to cooperate on important viable projects. We live in a highly dynamic world, a world village, being made increasingly smaller every day by a technological and communications revolution. In the final analysis, considering the progress made over the past five decades, including the fact that many individuals have survived wars in which neither party has successfully been able to rid itself of the other, we had better accept the fact that peace can only result in a catholic marriage.

 The Refugees’ Problem

I would like to begin by defining the term refugee in order to establish a common ground upon which we can discuss first, generalities, then the specifics, of the case of the Palestinian refugees. The term refugee, as defined by a number of international jurists and political scientists, is a person who, “owing to oppression, occupation or foreign domination or even events disturbing public order, in either part or whole of his country of origin or nationality, is compelled to leave his place of national habitat in order to seek refuge in any place outside his country of origin or nationality.” The Organization of American States has defined refugees as “people who are unwilling to return to their countries of origins.” Thus the main problem of refugees has evolved around two notions:

1. Providing a new place of settlement for those who seem to be unable to return in the short term. (Resettlement)

1. Protecting such individuals from persecution or bodily harm in their country of origin once they return to it.

The Palestinian refugee situation is a little more complicated than this. Due to oppression, occupation, and foreign domination of their country of origin, Palestine, they have been compelled to leave their place of national habitat in order to seek refuge in a number of places outside their country of origin. They are a people who are willing to return to their country of origin, but who still cannot do so for a variety of political reasons. The Palestinians did not displace a people, but were themselves displaced by a people.

The Palestinian refugees, among whom my parents and family numbered, left their homes in Palestine in 1948; they left the food cooking on their stoves and their personal belongings intact in their homes, hoping to return in a few hours, or at most, in a few days. Sadly for them, they were replaced by waves of Jewish immigrants who simply settled into the homes of those they displaced. Therefore, the Palestinian refugees have been unable to return to their homes due to the simple fact that their homes are no longer available for them to return to. This difficulty became further compounded after the Israeli Knesset passed the law of 1961, which prevented the Palestinians from exercising their “right of return.”

In an attempt to deal with reality, the Palestinians have chosen to accept

UN Resolution 194. The Palestinian leadership has looked for a way out by modifying their demand for “right of return” from the right of return to the original homes of individual families, to the right of return to the Palestinian homeland. The implication of this change in policy is to restrict boundaries of the future State of Palestine to those established in 1967.

Also implied is a choice to return and compensation for loss of land and property for those who choose not to return. Implementation through the final status negotiations would require evacuation of all Jewish settlements in the Occupied Territories of 1967, followed by a subsequent return of the Palestinian people to these areas. It is unacceptable to speak of peace, or an Israeli right of return, while millions of Palestinians still populate refugee camps in Syria, Lebanon, Jordan, and Egypt.

To circumvent the refugee problem in Oslo, the Israeli and Palestinian leaderships stipulated in the Declaration of Principles (DoP) of 1993 the creation of an Israeli-Palestinian committee, which also included representatives from Egypt and Jordan, charged with the responsibility of discussing the displaced of 1967, while leaving the fate of the refugees of 1948 to the decisions of the final status negotiations. The Palestinian leadership is extremely committed to solving the refugee problem through their return or by any other acceptable solution. They, as well as many Arab leaders, are convinced that there can be no sustainable peace without a final resolution to the refugee problem. Why? Why not simply maintain the status quo? After all, the refugee question is simply a bureaucratic problem or merely a statistical problem on paper.

 The Palestinian Refugees’ General Conditions

Of the close to six million estimated Palestinians worldwide, more than two-thirds are designated as refugees and displaced persons, many of whom reside in refugee camps. The first group of refugees were those displaced in 1948, the second group was displaced in 1967, the third following the civil war in Lebanon and the fourth following the second Gulf Wan

The Palestinian camps have many common characteristics, whether located in neighboring Arab countries, on Palestinian soil in the West Bank, or in the Gaza Strip. They are generally located on small areas of uncultivated land, or in some cases on abandoned military campsites. At first, all were very primitive in nature with no infrastructure; they often had open sewage systems, not enough running water, and naked earth or sand which became disastrous in winter. Later some areas were covered with cement or asphalt.

In many areas, tents gradually gave way to shacks which were in turn replaced privately by the refugees themselves with brick and mortar family dwellings with private or shared toilets. Even so, the open, above-ground sewage system still exist in most of the refugee camps, regardless of host country or area, and serves as a breeding ground for huge numbers of mosquitoes, bacteria, and bad smells. Needless to say. winter flooding poses major health and environmental problems. The population of the camps doubled in the first twenty-five years and tripled in the next twenty- five years, especially as the infant mortality rate improved. This in turn resulted in another problem, severe overcrowding. According to the latest international population statistics, Gaza is considered to have one of the highest population densities in the world. The physical conditions are tangible and quantifiable; however, the social and psychological trauma these people have suffered in the last fifty years, as well as the political oppression they have suffered at the hands of the host governments, has been tremendous. For all parties involved, there are no easy solutions, merely bitter pills to swallow. All involved must be ready to make serious concessions on all fronts.

 A Futuristic, Practical Approach

Before attempting to solve the problem, we must look creatively at how it can be approached following two basic assumptions:

1 An independent Palestinian state must be created on the Palestinian territories occupied in 1967.

2 All parties must negotiate in good faith and with flexibility to concede issues they have considered at some point as non-negotiable or unacceptable in order to solve the refugee problem.

Once an independent Palestinian state is created from the occupied territories of the J une 1967 war. there can be no problem with displaced persons returning to their homes within the newly recreated Palestine. Once this is accomplished, dealing with the really tough nut, the problem of those displaced in 1948, becomes much more manageable.

I would like to propose that a study be sponsored by an international agency such as the United Nations, to determine how many of the Palestinian refugees of 1948 would actually like to return to the newly recreated Palestinian state on the West Bank and Gaza Strip, how many would like to remain in the host country, and how many would like to emigrate from the host country and where they would like to immigrate to. Based on this information, teams could be formed to implement the findings. Returning residents and subsequent repatriation, and compensation to those who choose not to return, should occur simultaneously. Israel has already asserted at the International Forum of the United Nations that it is willing to allow 100,000 150,000 refugees to return to their homeland of 1948. Reaffirming this already stated intent would pave the way for the Palestinian leadership to demand that settlements in former Palestinian areas be evacuated. Repatriation of such a number of Palestinian refugees should not cause undue hardship for the Israeli government, which has already absorbed at least one million (some estimates give 1.2–1.4 million) Russians.

The aforementioned study would be utilized in screening those Palestinians who declare their desire to return, and in selecting those who will actually be allowed to return. Repatriating these refugees should encourage the Arab countries to extend their hospitality to the remainder, since this step would be an indicator of both parties' desire for a sustainable peace. This would ease the fear of the Arab regimes, especially the Syrians and Lebanese, about future political problems or military incursions by one group or another. It will also assure the neighboring Arab governments of the seriousness of Israel's commitment toward the peace process, and their good will toward the Palestinian refugees in creating and sustaining a lasting peace. It would be considered a major step toward building trust and confidence, yet no one has yet taken that first bold step in implementing this agreement. In the last year alone (1999), Israel has imported 400,000 workers from eastern European countries such as Romania; why can't they also accept the 100,000 Palestinian refugees they have already agreed to allow? Such acts merely increase the tension already existing between the two parties in the negotiations.

The Arab-Israeli relations have long been characterized by mutual fear, hatred and distrust. It is increasingly important that all parties concerned concede some important issues in order to decrease the animosity over fundamental differences of the main issues. All parties must stop blaming each other for the misfortunes of the other and start looking for a common ground upon which to build the future of the next millennium once peace prevails. If we don’t, what will happen in the future as ever more sophisticated weapons of destruction become even more accessible and available on the open market?

The refugee situation must be rectified by compensation, repatriation or resettlement, either in host countries or in the evacuated Israeli settlements on the West Bank or the Gaza Strip. It is naive to ignore the refugee problem and pretend it does not exist. A non-resolution of this problem will sustain a very precarious state of tension and a semi-unofficial state of war that could easily last several more generations. For Israel, resolution of this problem is a bitter pill which must be swallowed. Admitting 200,000–250,000 Palestinians might pose a psychological problem, but not an impossible or unacceptable one. Compensation can be placed in the hands of an international voluntary group, and many of the Palestinians can be relocated to their own independent Palestinian state, thus strengthening and preserving the Jewishness of the present Israeli state. Plans for economic development and prosperity for all are already being implemented.

In conclusion, we must look for ways to sustain the peace process and to continue investing in new projects being built daily. After all, we, the peoples of the region, clearly understand what is desirable, what is probable and what is acceptable to all involved.

 19. The Historical Development of the Refugee Camps in Jordan

[[Hussein Ramzoun]]

Several social scientists have considered the twentieth century as the century of human rights. During this period such classical concepts as slavery, feudalism, and capital punishment have vanished, while democracy and the rights of women and children have come to be recognized by members of the United Nations. Unfortunately, the twentieth century has also witnessed a sad increase of forced refugees throughout the world due to war and civil riots. The Middle East, in particular, has witnessed several waves of forced migration as well as voluntary migration due to a lack of stability in the region.

The Middle East is strategically located where a number of regional and international trade routes meet, and it is here that three major world religions have arisen and co-exist in an uneasy peace. It is this unrest that has led to the present problem regarding the Palestinian refugees.

Following the establishment of the Jewish state on the site of the former Palestine in 1948, more than 800,000 Palestinians were forced to leave their homeland and resettle in surrounding Arab states, particularly in Jordan. Approximately 41 percent of these refugees migrated to major cities in Jordan. This was followed by another wave of Palestinian refugees after the 1967 war, when an additional 385,277 refugees migrated to Jordan.

This essay aims to trace the historical development of the Palestinian refugee camps in Jordan by focusing on the following issues:

1. The reasons why the refugees chose to immigrate to Jordan;

1. The spatial distribution of the refugee camps and the population structure; and

1. The design and structure of the camps.

I use a variety of sources and would like to recognize Hussein Ismail's research in his 1989 Ph.D. dissertation at Michigan State University, "The Socio-Economic Experiences of Families of Migrant Workers in Jordan."

 Why the Refugees Chose to Immigrate to Jordan

Before the colonial period, the eastern Mediterranean area — the modern countries of Syria, Jordan, Palestine, and Lebanon — was considered one nation, called Greater Syria, or Shaam. Even at the time of the Ottoman Empire, the Turks divided the area into administrative districts from east to west connecting Hebron, Nablus, and Tobass in Palestine with Kerak, Salt, and Irbid in Jordan. Such administrative connections encouraged trade between Palestine and Jordan, as well as an exchange of peoples and cultures, which resulted in the development of strong relations between the Jordanian and the Palestinian peoples.

When the Jewish militant groups began to attack the Palestinian villages and towns, and when the Israeli army started to occupy parts of Palestine, Palestinian families escaped killing by fleeing to Jordan, a country with which they had long been familiar and had long ago established friendship ties. This is the real reason why, as Mousa Samha wrote in 1995, such a large percentage of Palestinian refugees have lived in Jordan since their first exodus in 1948 and the second in 1967. Jordan and the West Bank, what was left of Palestine after the Jewish state was established in 1948, became united as one state called the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan. This unity was welcomed by both peoples; the people of Jordan shared with their Palestinian brothers food, land, and a large number of other things. Today, Jordan lies in an area between 29.5 and 32.5 degrees north latitude that is blessed with a moderate climate and encompasses a total area of 88,950 square kilometers.

Before 1948, the total population of Jordan totaled about 400,000 people, and the limited food and water resources were scarcely enough for that number. Only about 1.1 percent of the country receives an annual rainfall between 500 and 600 millimeters, enough to support a large concentration of people; 91.4 percent of the country receives less than 200 millimeters of annual rainfall. Most importantly, 92.2 percent of the rainfall evaporates, leaving only 7.8 percent of ail rainfall to replenish underground water sources. These limited resources have become stretched further in the past fifty years following the influx of refugees from Palestine, and of course their subsequent natural population growth. According to the Refugee and Displaced Persons Report, by 1997 the total population of Jordan numbered more than three and a half million. Today, Jordan hosts approximately 1.2 million Palestinian refugees, of whom <br’approximately 240,000 still live in camps, the remainder of whom live in major towns and cities.

The Jordanian government plays an active role in caring for the refugees in conjunction with UNRWA, offering basic services such as education in nutrition and literacy, immunization, and childcare services. The Jordanian government covers the shortages in other services, especially for those living outside of the camps. Such support costs the Jordanian government approximately $300 million per year, i.e., 22 percent of the total Jordanian budget. The Jordanian government also provides Palestinian refugees with Jordanian citizenship and passports. This entitles the refugees to live and work in Jordan, own land, vote in elections and even leave the country for work in other Arab oil countries, Europe and the United States. Jordan is the only Arab state in the region that offers such a service that has enabled thousands of Palestinians to migrate and seek residence in Canada, Europe, and the United States. Now only about 20 percent of all Palestinian refugees in Jordan live in refugee camps. The skilled and educated Palestinian refugees have been able to obtain employment and thus live outside of the refugee camps, leaving only the poor and uneducated in the camps.

 Spatial Distribution/Population of Refugee Camps

Table 19.1 depicts the distribution of the Palestinian refugees in the camps in Jordan.

Table 19.1 Distribution of the Palestinian refugees in the camps in Jordan

| Name of Original Present Number | Refugee Camps Capacity of Refugees |

| 1948 | 1 Al-Hussein, Amman | 8,000 | 27,301 |

| | 2 Wehdat, Amman | 6,000 | 36,474 |

| | 3 Zarqa, Zarqa | 8,000 | 14,143 |

| | 4 Irbid | 4,000 | 17,444 |

| 1968 | 1 Baqa’a | 26,000 | 63,276 |

| | 2 Jarash | 11,500 | 16,176 |

| | 3 Souf | 8,000 | 9,943 |

| | 4 Housoun | 12,500 | 16,083 |

| | 5 Markah | 15,000 | 30,677 |

| | 6 Talbieh | 6,000 | 6,860 |

| Totals: | 10 Camps | 103,000 | 237,477 |

Statistics used for Palestinian migration after the 1948 war from the administrative districts established during the Ottoman period are:

| 1 Palestinians in the North: | 10% to Syria
12% to Lebanon
2% to Iraq |

| 2 Palestinians in the South: | 32% to Gaza |

| 3 Palestinians in the East and central parts: | 44% to Jordan |

After the unification of the East and West Banks, the 1948 Palestinian refugees became free to live wherever they wished. Many of those who had previously moved to Syria and Lebanon decided that Jordan was a better place to live and moved there to join their relatives. Therefore, according to Mousa Samha (1994), about 55.4 percent of the Palestinian refugees subsequently moved to Jordan. Most moved to the capital city of Amman or to the two major cities in the north, Irbid and Zarqa. Thus the 1948 refugees came to be concentrated primarily in these three major cities in camps which are now located at the hearts of those cities.

After the 1967 war, most of the Palestinian refugees, approximately 175,000 of them, left the West Bank to live in Jordan; and as before, they migrated to the same three major cities. The Jordanian government decided that such settlement would pose political threats due to crowded conditions and therefore built new refugee camps in mountainous areas outside the major crowded cities. The Department of Palestinian Affairs' Atlas of Palestinian Refugee Camps in Jordan (1999) shows that the total number of Palestinian refugees in Jordan jumped from 341,767 in 1948 to more than 500.000 in 1967. This meant that the demographic structure of Jordan began to change dramatically due to such a large influx of refugees.

 Camp Design and Structure

Upon their arrival in Jordan, the Palestinian refugees depended on donations and assistance from the Jordanian government, from local and international non-governmental organizations (NGOs), and from other Arab states. At first, the refugees were confident that they would be able to return to their homes in the near future. But after several years had passed without their being able to do so, they gave up hope for return. At this point the United Nations established the UNRWA in order to take care of the needs of the refugees in terms of food, housing, education and health care, in cooperation with the host governments.

In Jordan, the refugee camps were built on lands owned by the government or rented from the private sector for a period of 99 years. The camps established in 1948 were located near the major cities or near main highways to provide for easy transportation of goods and services to and from the camps, as well as easy ingress and egress into and out of the camps. The camps built in 1967, on the other hand, were built in rural areas far from the major cities.

At first, the camps were built of tents organized in lines approximately one hundred meters long, with a main road cutting the camps into two sections. Later on, the tents were replaced by buildings constructed of sheet metal, and later by cement block and wood structures. Each original unit had one bedroom, a kitchen, and a fence around the unit to provide privacy. At first, each unit was one storey high, though now they are allowed to be two or three storeys high. Water used to be carried from public outlets, of which there were approximately five per camp. Approximately ten public restrooms were also provided for each camp. Now each home has running water and a restroom, though a sewage system was not available until recently when a modern sewage system was installed. Electricity was not available at first, except at neighboring villages or complexes. Now it is available for every unit.

Each camp was provided with a health clinic, a center for food distribution, schools, and a police station. Such basic services were provided by UNRWA and the Jordanian government. For example, security, laws and courts, roads, and other official and legislative services were provided by the Jordanian government; while health care, education and similar services were provided by UNRWA.

All refugees w’ere free to come and go to and from the camps at any time. There were also free to live outside the camps, to open businesses, or to work for the government. Thus skilled workers and educated persons never lived in the camps or left as soon as they were able to secure employment. These individuals were able to rent houses in the major cities and enjoy normal lives. This fact has caused many Palestinian refugees to seek education as a means of escape from the farming profession. And this explains the high ratio of educated persons among the refugees.

Due to the limited number of schools in the refugee camps, the schools have been forced to run two shifts, one in the mornings and one in the afternoons six days per week, in order to provide the education necessary for the ever increasing number of students. Many of the schools have been rented and many classes have more than sixty students in them. Following secondary education, there is one college of educational science and a vocational training center in Amman.

 In Conclusion

Jordan became the largest host of the Palestinian refugees. More than ten camps now exist in Jordan. Such camps have continuously been improved due to the joint efforts of the Jordanian government and the UNRWA, which have both expended great effort and resources to achieve this goal. Some of the camps are no longer refugee camps in terms of the original meaning; they function more as independent villages. Yet this should not divert us from the fact that there is a human dimension attached to the lives of the refugees. Their lives have come under threat of danger, they have experienced a sense of isolation, a loss of freedom and basic rights, and have suffered a sense of humiliation at this loss as well as for the way they have been forced to live as refugees all these many years. And though conditions in the camps have greatly improved over the years, the fact exists that those who live there remain refugees.

 20. The Role of UNRWA: Refugee Statistics and UN Resolutions

[[Abraham Badran]]

In the briefest historical detail, the demographic structure of Palestine has changed dramatically since 1900. The Jewish immigration began to escalate, especially during the British Mandate of Palestine from 1917 to 1948. As a result of the military conflicts which took place before and in the aftermath of the fall of Palestine and the creation of Israel, approximately one million Palestinians were forced to leave their homes, property and country, and seek refuge elsewhere.

Most of these refugees were small landowners, traders, farm workers, and laborers. The bulk arrived in neighboring Arab countries, mainly Jordan, Lebanon, Syria, and Egypt; thousands were dispersed all over the world. However, a good portion of the refugees took refuge in that part of Palestine which Israel could not seize, i.e., the West Bank and Gaza strip.

Upon Israel’s refusal to implement 1948 UN Resolution 194 Item II, which called for the return of the refugees and compensation for those who could not return, the prospects for a quick settlement to the refugee problem soon diminished, and the plight of the refugees grew worse.

In its Resolution 302, of December 8, 1949, the UN General Assembly established the United Nations Relief and Work Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (UNRWA). The Agency assumed its duties on the first of May 1950. When UNRWA commenced its duties, there were 910,000 registered Palestinian refugees. By 1998, that number had grown to 3.5 million registered refugees through both natural population growth, and as a result of the Israeli occupation of the West Bank and Gaza strip in 1967.

To facilitate its operations, UNRWA defined a Palestinian refugee as:

A person whose normal residence was Palestine for a minimum of two years before the 1948 Arab-Israeli war, and who, having lost both home and livelihood as a result of the conflict, has taken refuge in one of UNRWA’s five fields of operation.

In the five areas of refuge (the West Bank, the Gaza Strip, Jordan, Syria, and Lebanon) camps were erected hastily. Every one of the refugees — particularly women, children, and the elderly — has had to suffer all the difficulties, pains, and deprivations that are associated with expulsion from one’s home and country, from 1948 to the present time. Gradually, some refugees began to leave the camps and start new lives. By 1998, more than one million refugees were still living in 62 official camps.

 Palestinian Refugee Statistics

According to UNWRA’s records, the total number of those who registered as refugees was less than the number of refugees who were effectively expelled from Palestine. This record does not include well-off refugees not in need of relief services when UNRWA began its operation, those not considered as “needy people,” Palestinians who were not residing in Palestine prior to the 1948 war, nor refugees who took refuge outside of UNWRA’s five fields of operations.

Table 20.1 demonstrates the differences between UNRWA statistics for registered Palestine refugees and other independent estimates that attempt to reach the actual figures of all refugees. UNRWA uses a figure of 3.5 million, while Palestinian and Israeli researchers assign a figure of 5 million as an average. Table 20.1 gives different estimates of refugees by Palestinian and Israeli sources.

 Present State of the Refugees

Palestinians who left Palestine in 1948 have remained in that condition since. The Israeli occupation of the West Bank and Gaza in 1967 created additional refugees. Politically, the refugee issue is one of the five main issues of the final status talks between the Palestinian Authority and Israel. Socio-historically, no similar cases were actually solved by simple naive replacement of homelands. Learning from the Israelis, if not through their national feelings, the refugees find themselves more qualified than that of the Jews for a “right of return,” comparing their 50-year-old claim to the 3,000-year-old claim of their counterparts. Hence, it is only right to state that the refugees in the host countries and elsewhere are adamant concerning their right to go back to their homes and receive compensation for the damages, injuries, and pains they suffered, and are still suffering.

On the humanitarian level, the matter is alarming. It is regrettable that after 50 years of commendable efforts by the Palestinians, host countries, donor countries and UNRWA, the living conditions of the refugees, and particularly those in the camps, have not radically improved. Furthermore, disruptions caused by wars, as well as restrictions imposed by Israel in the occupied West Bank and Gaza Strip, have added to the refugees’ difficulties, frustrated their efforts to improve their own conditions, and hampered UNWRA’s efforts over the years.

The principal activity of UNRWA is the provision of primary education, health, relief, and social services to eligible refugees. The $801 a year per capita that UNRWA spends falls very short of the actual needs of the individual refugees. Approximately one-third of the registered refugees live in the 62 camps which are partially served by UNRWA and host countries, at different levels of service. The camps are no longer made up of tents and makeshift huts; but, perhaps with the exception of the Lebanon camps, they resemble very impoverished suburbs of towns and villages in the host country.

From 66 to 80 percent of the refugees live outside the camps in the towns and villages in Syria, Lebanon, Jordan, the West Bank, and Gaza. Despite the huge amount of work that is still badly needed to make the camps more inhabitable, donor countries reduced their donations drastically after the Oslo Agreement in 1994. UNRWA’s 1997 budget was the lowest in per capita terms since 1991; while in the same period, the refugee population grew by 3.6 percent. Its report of July 1996-June 1997 states that there has been a drop of 29 percent in the average expenditure per refugee in the last four years from $100.40 in 1992 to $78.20 in 1996.

Table 20.1 Estimates of numbers of refugees (in thousands)

| Host country | (1) UNRWA | (2) Salmon Abu Sitta | (3) Donna E. Arzt| (4) Ha’aretz |

| Jordan | 1,463 | 1,742 | 1,832 | 2000 |

| Syria | 366 | 445 | 352 | 303 |

| Lebanon | 365 | 408 | 373 | 480 |

| Gaza | 773 | 766 | 880 | 700 |

| West Bank | 555 | 852 | 1,200 | 1,116 |

| Other Arab Countries | — | 393 | 542 | 388 |

| Total | 3,522 | 4,606 | 5,179 | 4,987 |

1. UNRWA Registration Statistical Bulletin for the Second Quarter, 1998-. Amman, July 1998.

1. Salman Abu Sitta. Palestine 1948:50 years after a l-Na kba (a map and tables).

1. Donna E. Arzt. Refugees Into Citizens: Palestinians and the End of the Arab-Israeli Conflict (Council on Foreign Relations Press, 1997).

1. Ha’aretz, July 21, 1995.

 UN Resolutions and Refugees

The UN has provided the appropriate legal framework to solve the problem of the 1948 Palestine refugees and the 1967 displaced persons. Two fundamental resolutions are considered to be key to a just solution. The first was adopted by the General Assembly in 1948 (Resolution 194 of December 1948), and has been repeated annually until the present day. It:

resolves that the refugees wishing to return to their homes and live at peace with their neighbors should be permitted to do so at the earliest practical date, and that compensation should be paid for the property of those choosing not to return and for loss of or damage to property, which under principles of international law or in equity should be made good by the governments or authorities responsible.

Secondly, Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338 call for the withdrawal of Israel from the occupied territories of the West Bank and Gaza and the immediate return of the displaced persons who were forced to leave their homes. The numerous resolutions issued by different UN organs and their specialized agencies dealing with the Palestinian issue and the situation in the Middle East can be grouped into five main categories:

- Arab-Israeli conflict

- Refugees and the “right of return”

- The inalienable rights of the Palestinian people

- Violation of human rights

- Peace in the Middle East

In the first category, it is worth noting the recommendation on the “Partition Plan of Palestine” (General Assembly Resolution 237 of May 11, 1949), the establishment of UNRWA (General Assembly Resolution 302 of December 8, 1949), and the granting of “observer status” to the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) (General Assembly Resolution 3237 of November 22, 1974).

UN resolutions which were issued following the Partition Plan in 1947 until the late 1960s focused on the individual and human rights of Palestinian refugees. Only superficial attention was paid in those resolutions to the refugees as a “people.” In 1969, the General Assembly acknowledged the Palestinians as a people having rights under the United Nations Charter. The first preambular paragraph of General Assembly Resolution 2535 B of December 10, 1969 recognizes:

that the problem of the Palestine Arab refugees has arisen from a denial of their inalienable rights under the Charter of the United Nations and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

General Assembly Resolution 3236 of November 22, 1974 represented “another milestone toward the recognition of the inalienable rights of the Palestinian People in Palestine,” including:

- the right to self-determination

- the right of national independence and sovereignty

- the right to return to their homes

- the right to regain their rights by all means

 Refugees and Human Rights

It is obvious that the Palestinian refugees have been wronged since 1948, when they left their homes and properties to save their lives and those of their children, or because they were expelled by force. Moreover, even after the UN Assembly adopted its Resolution 194 of 1948, the refugees were neither allowed to return to their homes nor were they were compensated for the losses of their homes, properties, businesses, lost relatives, or injuries and sufferings. This is diametrically opposed to human rights' principles as stipulated by the Universal Declaration of Human Rights of 1948 and other relevant conventions and treaties.

Articles 15, 16, 17, 25, 26, 27, 28, and 29 of that Declaration refer to rights to protect one's family, the right to own property, the right to participate in government and in free elections, the right to an adequate standard of living for health and well being, the right to education, the right to participate in the cultural life of the community, the right to social order assuring human rights, and the responsibility to community essential to free and full development of the individual respectively.

Every item of human rights is grossly violated in the case of the Palestinian refugees. This violation not only applies to past or present generations, but also to subsequent generations — to women and children of the refugees' community.

Shimon Peres describes Israel as " a nation of refugees," stating, "We (the Jews) carry in our collective memory the history of being twice deported from our country, from our ancestor land." Here Peres refers to historical incidents that took place 3,000 years ago. What about the incident of the Palestinian refugees that took place 50 years ago?

The Commission on Human Rights of the United Nations issued many resolutions reaffirming the rights of the Palestinian people (the refugees being the major part) to their unalienable rights. It referred inter alia to the principles of international law; the charter of the UN; the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights; the International Covenant of Civil and Political Rights; the Vienna Declaration; programs of action adopted by the World Conference on Human Rights in June 1993; Security Council resolutions; General Assembly Resolutions; etc.

 The Arab-Israeli Conflict

Through 50 years of a state of war, it became clear to everyone that this complicated problem cannot be solved by force, but only through peaceful means and direct negotiations. Any peace settlement has to be based on international law and UN resolutions, and has to take into consideration;

- The right of the Palestinians to self-determination

- Solution of the refugee problem

- The recognition of the rights of every nation in the area to live in peace with normal relations between neighboring countries

It is quite evident to Israel, the Palestinians, and the international community that the passage of time is not the solution. On the contrary, the past 50 years of Arab-Israeli conflict have shown that the refugees are now more aware of their misery, more aware of their rights, and more ready for realistic solutions.

Although the humanitarian side is of major significance, the political dimension is of the same importance when the stability of the Middle East is taken into consideration. Shimon Peres, the Israeli leader who is a great believer in peace, says in his book, The New Middle East: “ We must find an acceptable solution that is acceptable both to Arabs and Israelis alike. The solution must be fair in order to bring justice for the two parties." Peres continues:

It is quite difficult to separate the misery of the Palestinian refugees from their demands to apply the right of return. For the first generation of the refugees we find that the refugee experience and the culture that develops in parallel with it works as a foundation of the awareness of the "refugee." For him, he is being negated by the "other," denied the place of birth, has lost his homeland, his home, his land and properties, the familiar sceneries from childhood, and the graves of fathers and beloved persons. Despite all this, the refugee hopes to return to his home.

The second and the third generations inherited this experience, which is charged with great emotional power and increases in intensity and strength in the midst of devastating poverty and miserable, insulting conditions in the refugee camps.

 The Solution

Is there a possible solution to the refugee problem? And is a possible solution practical and realistic? The answer is yes. There must be a solution, and the passage of time makes it more and more reachable.

The signs of possible compromise are getting stronger. The different partners in the conflict are ready to come nearer to a mid-way solution, but any solution should be based on internationally accepted and recognized principles. Two wrongs do not make a right. The persecution of Jews by the Nazis and others in Europe does not justify the persecution of Palestinians by the Jews. The absorption of Jewish immigrants to Israel does not justify the expulsion of Palestinian refugees from their homes. The rights of the individual to his properties, means of living and homeland cannot be nullified by a change of the sovereign state. Any innocent person is entitled to compensation for the loss of property and for the injury or pain suffered.

International law and principles of human rights should always be observed. UN resolutions represent the commitment of the international community to this effect.

Financial and human investment in peace is far less than the corresponding investment in a non-peace or conflict process. Political solutions imposed by force cannot bring peace, stability, and prosperity if they cannot respond to the indigenous rights of the society. People become more tolerant if they are recognized and their rights acknowledged. Justice, equality, UN resolutions and international law, rather than the decisions and attitudes of politicians, extremists or dogmatists, should be the basis for practical problem solving.

Human rights are the very personal rights for every human being as an individual. Whatever “good” is done for “others” does not close the file of an episode of violated rights. All theories, philosophies, ideologies, doctrines and practices based on religious or racial supremacy or divine- rights-against-others are no longer accepted. They never help in regional stability or co-existence between nations.

The United Nations and the international community, in addition to the peace advocates regionally and internationally, have, during the past fifty years, paved the way for a practical solution to the Palestinian refugee issue, perhaps along the following framework.

In 1971, Golda Meir, the Prime Minister of Israel, said, “There are no Palestinians.” In 1998, Ehud Barak, the leader of the same party as Golda Meir, accepted the idea of a Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza.

* Chapter (1): Recognition of the rights

A declaration of principles for the solution of the refugee problem can be signed by the core parties to the effect that they accept UN Resolution 194, and the refugees have the right to return or the right to compensation. The return and compensation would be regulated along a practical span of time that extends for several years. Those of the refugees who would like to stay where they are in the host countries will be welcomed to do so and receive their compensation.

* Chapter (2): Funding of the rights

An International Conference on Palestinian refugees funding can be held with the purpose of:

- creating a Palestinian Refugee Compensation Fund

- creating a technical body to develop and manage the compensation process

- qualifying refugees and host countries to compensation according to evidence

The money for such compensation funds is not beyond the means of the major leading countries of the world. On the contrary, such countries will pay less than what they are paying now to support the military power of the parties.

The total military expenditure of Israel and the surrounding Arab countries from 1970 to 1990 exceeded $180 billion, or an average of $9 billion a year. The international community through bilateral or multilateral arrangements contributed at least 30 percent of that spending (i.e., $3 billion per year). US official military aid to Israel has been $1.8 billion per year since the Camp David Agreement in 1979.

* Chapter (3): Development

The final settlement would require substantial investment in socioeconomic development. Such investment can be directed toward job creation, education, health services, infrastructure etc. This can be implemented through:

- Middle East development agencies

- regional projects

- research institutions

- manpower development centers

The funds for such activities can be easily allocated if only 30 percent of military expenditures are diverted from military to civil projects. Such funds would be directed to help the integration and resettlement of the refugees in the places where they choose to settle.

The scope of development is unlimited, yet the following fields are cardinal to any substantial development, stability, and final solution of the refugee problem:

- roads, railways and other transportation and communication systems

- science and technology, especially in water, environment, arid areas, etc.

- tourism

- petrochemical and minerals industries

The solution may look very theoretical and need years and years to implement. Yet we have to remember that the conflict has been ongoing for the last 100 years, and the refugees have been suffering for the last 50 years. During this century of conflict, hundreds of thousands were killed or injured, hundreds of billions of dollars in equipment were used, hundreds of billions of dollars of opportunities were lost, and decades of lack of development were experienced.

 Stability of the Middle East

It has to be reemphasized that the refugee question is one of the major five categories of stability in the Middle East. But it is the most critical and vital one of all. Without settling this issue, which cannot be suppressed either by force or by neglect, the Middle East will continue to remain unstable. The Arab-Israeli conflict is complex. It has historical, cultural, national, geographic, demographic, humanitarian, legal, regional, and political elements. This explains why the entire Middle East is affected by the Palestinian question, and why the refugee issue is the most critical.

Comprehensive peace between Israel and Arab countries based on the Madrid Principles, UN resolutions, international law, human rights, and international community support would help bring coexistence and cooperation to all the countries concerned.

 21. A Jordanian Perspective

[[Rateb Amro]]

On October 12, 1991, just before the convening of the Madrid Conference, in an address to the nation, His Majesty the late King Hussein declared:

Peace demands no less courage than war. It is the courage to meet the adversary, his attitudes and arguments, the courage to face hardships, the courage to bury senseless illusions, the courage to surmount impeding obstacles, the courage to engage in a dialogue to tear down the walls of fear and suspicion. It is the courage to face reality.

The treaty of peace between Jordan and Israel has produced more than thirty protocols and agreements by July 1999. It is, therefore, reasonable to ask: “Are we on the threshold of a new era?” From a purely bilateral angle, Jordanian-Israeli prospects are bright and promising. But the reality of the present becomes less bright and more complex on the thorny issue of the Palestinian refugees of 1948 and 1967.

The Palestinian community in Jordan was granted Jordanian citizenship in the early 1950s. Nevertheless, the Palestinian community was given, and is still given, the right to restore Palestinian citizenship whenever new reality is created within the implementation of peace agreements between host countries and Israel. I shall limit my remarks to one host country, which is my country: The Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan.

 Palestinians in Jordan

The Palestinian community in Jordan, approximately less than half the population of the country, is a typically Jordanian community. Nevertheless, at the same time, it is typically Palestinian. The aspiration toward a Palestinian home on the soil of Palestine remains paramount. The dream of return is an everyday dream. Notwithstanding these feelings and aspirations, the Palestinian community does not manifest any feelings against being Jordanian.

To make an analogy, I would think of the Jewish community of New York or California, who are composed of US citizens. The Jewish community, however, in the US or any other country, can always choose to live in Israel and enjoy their Israeli citizenship in application of the Israeli Law of Return of 1950.

This option has proved to be mostly theoretical, especially for the Jewish community oi the US, whose “return” to Israel is almost non-existent. The spiritual and emotional value of belonging to a home is, nonetheless, great and cherished by both Israeli and US citizens as well as by the Palestinian community in Jordan.

The Baqa’a camp, one of the largest Palestinian refugee camps and one of thirteen similar camps in Jordan, is home to Palestinians who fled their homes in the West Bank after the 1967 war. Many of the camps residents are originally refugees from 1948. During His Majesty King Abdulah’s visit to the Baqa’a camp, he said:

The problem of refugees was shared by every Jordanian. The 1988 decision to sever administrative and legal ties with the West Bank did not mean a severance of links within the one Jordanian people, nor did that decision mean that Jordan would give up its support for the prime Arab cause that is Palestine.

 Legal Status

“There are no Palestinians” — so said Golda Meir, as quoted in The Sunday Times on June 15, 1969.

As a result of the establishment of the state of Israel in 1948 and the Arab-Israeli war of 1967, almost 1.5 million Palestinians became refugees. Today there are an estimated 5 million Palestinians in the world, half of whom hold refugee status.

According to the UN definition, a Palestine refugee is “A person whose residence was Palestine for a minimum of two years immediately preceding the outbreak of the conflict in 1948, and who, as a result of this conflict, has lost both his home and means of livelihood. “ The conscious and deliberate policy of “emptying” the land is now well documented. Israeli politicians and decision-makers have admitted to their plans to drive the Palestinians into an exodus from a time as early as the 1930s.

Israel’s first Prime Minister, David Ben-Gurion, stated this Zionist plan as a fact when he wrote, according to Israeli publications of that time, “we must expel the Arabs and take their places ... ”

The right of the Palestinian refugees to return has been continuously reaffirmed since 1949 by the United Nations and by international law.

The Arab population of Palestine in 1948 was 1,400,000. When the Israeli state was established on 77 percent of mandated Palestine in 1948, 770,000 Palestinians became displaced. Only 120,000 Arab Palestinians remained in Israel.

On June 14, 1967, less than a week after the end of the 1967 Arab-Israeli war, the United Nations Security Council passed resolution 237, which called on Israel to facilitate the return of over 300,000 inhabitants who had fled since the outbreak of hostilities. Israel has still not complied. Only 25,000 were allowed to return.

It is evident that the international political consensus, as emphasized in United Nations resolutions, gives the Palestinians the right to return to their homes, but more than 90 percent of Palestinian Arabs have never been allowed to return.

Israel’s Law of Return (1950, 1954, 1970) states: “Every Jew has the right to immigrate to the country ...” It says nothing of non-Jews. Palestinian Arabs, as far as Israeli citizenship and return laws are concerned, don’t exist.

 Palestinian Refugees and the Peace Treaty

War always brings in its wake a harsh reality. The Palestinian refugees in Jordan are still there and a solution is not apparent. The peace treaty between Jordan and Israel has two important references to the refugee question. One is in the preamble; the other is Article 8 of the agreement.

The preamble in the Jordanian-Israeli peace treaty, October 26, 1994, states:

The Government of the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan, and the Government of the State of Israel:

Bearing in mind the Washington Declaration signed by them on 25th July 1994, and which they are both committed to honor.

Aiming at the achievement of a just and comprehensive peace in the Middle East based on Security Council resolution 242 and 338 in all their aspects. Paragraph 2 (b) of 242 affirms the necessity “For achieving a just settlement of the refugee problem.” Article 8

Refugees and Displaced Persons

Recognising the massive human problems caused to both Parties by the conflict in the Middle East as well as the contribution made by them towards the alleviation of human suffering, the Parties will seek to further alleviate those problems arising on a bilateral level.

Recognising that the above human problems caused by the conflict in the Middle East cannot be fully resolved on the bilateral level, the Parties will seek to resolve them in appropriate forums, in accordance with international law, including the following:

(a) In the case of displaced persons, in a quadripartite committee together with Egypt and the Palestinians,

(b) In the case of Refugees,

(1) In the framework of the Multilateral Working Group on Refugees; (ii) In negotiations, in a framework to be agreed, bilateral or otherwise, in conjunction with and at the same time as the permanent status negotiations pertaining to the territories referred to in Article 3 of this Treaty,

(c) Through the implementation of agreed United Nations programs and other agreed international economic programs concerning refugees and displaced persons, including assistance to their settlement.

Also, article 12 of the Oslo DoP defines one dimension of the regional aspects of the question. It reads:

Article 12 of the Declaration of Principles (DoP), September 13, 1993. The two parties will invite the Government of Jordan and Egypt to participate in establishing further liaison and co-operation arrangements between the Government of Israel and the Palestinian representatives, on one hand, and the Governments of Jordan and Egypt, on the other hand, to promote co-operation between them. These arrangements will include the constitution of a Continuing Committee that will decide by agreement on the modalities of admission of persons displaced from the West Bank and the Gaza Strip in 1967, together with necessary measures to prevent disruption and disorder. Other matters of common concern will be dealt with by the Committee.

Over and above these contractual texts, there is the Gaza-Jericho first agreement, the Paris Agreement, Taba, Cairo and the three memoranda of understanding: Hebron, Wye River I, and Wye River II (Sharm el-Sheikh Agreement) between the Palestinian Authority and Israel. There is also the international forum of the multilateral peace talks especially at the Refugee Working Group (RWG).

If the word and spirit of these texts are honored, and if a reasonable amount of good will and sincere intentions are exercised, the parties who are aware of the need for co-existence of Jews and Arabs can iron out creative ways and means of solving the problem in compliance with international law and universal humanitarian practices. But if the spirit behind the words is ignored by the parties, then little room will be left for creative thinking that would lead to a practical solution of the problem of Palestinian refugees in general and the Palestinian community in Jordan in particular.

In talking about the spirit behind words and creative thinking that is really needed in such a complex situation, it is pertinent to refer to Mr. Shimon Peres book The New Middle East. Although his book should be read as an indivisible text, this notable paragraph is especially important.

It is hard to separate the miserable plight of the Palestinian refugees, the experience of being a refugee and the culture that grew up around it served as a basis for the consciousness of exile from the land of their birth — the loss of the country, house, lands, landscapes familiar from childhood, and family graves — alongside the hope of returning to their homes. The second and third generations have inherited this experience, a powerful emotive load that grows ever stronger amid crushing poverty and degrading conditions in the refugee camps. The claim to the right of return has to be seen against this complex historical background. However, it is a maximal claim; if accepted, it would wipe out the national character of the State of Israel, making the Jewish majority into a minority. Consequently, there is no chance it will be accepted, either now or in the future. No Israeli government would agree to the strategy that entailed the destruction of our national entity. In fact, the problem of the Palestinian refugees is not the only case in history where a maximal demand ruined the chances of settlement. Instead of this dead-end approach, I suggest that we look for a mutual optimum divided into stages: the negotiation stage, the transitional stage, and the permanent settlement stage.

I concur with Mr. Peres that we must look for a mutual optimum. A maximal position is not possible; it is not practical. But what is a mutual optimum?

 Proposed Solutions

Another dimension of special value in handling the question of the Palestinian community in Jordan is that of security. We in Jordan believe that the stability of each country in the region, particularly that of Israel and its bordering countries, is an integral component of the peace we hope to achieve, a peace that is conducive to normal and warm relations. The Palestinian refugee community in Jordan has maintained its integrity and dignity due to special management of the first Palestinian exodus to Jordan by the late King Abdullah I. His management became subject to worldwide appreciation. This humane and practical management, which included the granting of full citizenship rights, enhanced rather than weakened the Palestinian aspiration for return.

It is my strong belief that when almost half the population of Jordan is restless because of expectations of a solution for their final identity and status, real stability in Jordan — socially, economically, and politically — will always be compromised. These people are entitled to choose for good the identity and citizenship they would like to maintain and through hard work from all the parties, to do that within the context of a phased and final settlement. They should be able to choose to reside either in Jordan; in the Palestinian entity (hopefully, a future state) in the West Bank and Gaza Strip; or, whenever possible and mutually agreed, in their original homes.

I would venture, on a purely personal basis, not representing any Jordanian government position, to put forward some hopefully creative views for future deliberations on the issue of Palestinian refugees in Jordan:

(a) The 1967 Displaced Persons:

1. Some will be allowed to return to the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

2. Some will opt and be allowed to stay in Jordan.

Some will choose other alternatives like acquiring host country citizenship or residing in a third country.

If Jordanian-Palestinian mutual approval is achieved, some displaced persons may be allowed to keep their Jordanian citizenship status and continue to reside in Jordan. Others may choose to return to the West Bank and Gaza Strip as Palestinian citizens. A third category may choose not to return but to continue to reside in Jordan as Palestinians. The fourth category may choose to keep Jordanian citizenship but to reside in the West Bank or Gaza Strip.

(b) The 1948 Refugees:

The previous four options applicable to the 1967 displaced persons may apply to the 1948 refugees who resided in the West Bank and Gaza until 1967 and then moved to Jordan.

The 1948 refugees, with the mutual agreement of Israel, Jordan and the Palestinian Authority, may fall within the above categories too, but may also (a) become Israeli citizens and reside in Israel or (b) become Israeli citizens and reside in the West Bank, Gaza or any of the neighbouring countries.

Palestinian refugees who lost land, property and home and have acceptable proof may be compensated if the land and property cannot be recovered because of the status quo.

Negotiations on the status of 1948 refugees will start only upon mutual consent of Israel and the Palestinian Authority which, so far, has not happened.

In anticipation of various possible solutions, the management of the complex aspects of this issue will require the establishment of a data bank. Again Mr. Shimon Peres touched very skillfully on this vital organizational step in his book.

Forty-six years have passed since the onset of the Palestinian refugee problem, while the United Nations institutions continue to issue new refugee documents to the grandchildren of the 1948 refugees. This is part of the problematic and strange reality of the Middle East. Babies are born as refugees; but even so, there are no accurate numbers for the refugee population or data on distribution by place of residence.

 Resettlement is a Non-Option

After 52 years it should be clear to both the Israelis and the international community that absorption of the Palestinians outside Palestine, in particular those who are registered refugees, is a non-option. Just as the Israelis see themselves as separate unique people who can only live in Israel, the Palestinians see themselves as distinct people whose identity is so inherently connected to Palestine that it is the only place they are willing to settle permanently.

Since the State of Israel is capable of absorbing or at least making serious attempts at absorbing hundreds of thousands of Jewish immigrants from all over the world, it must repatriate all those original Arab inhabitants whom it dispossessed. As UN General Assembly resolution No. 394 (V) of December 14, 1950 urged, Israel should repatriate, socially and economically rehabilitate, and pay compensation to the Palestinian refugees.

[[Chapter 22]]

 22. The Refugee Question and Human Rights

[[Bahieldin Elibrachy]]

The refugee problem is an intrinsic component of the complex Palestinian problem, which can be solved as a package deal including simultaneous compromises and gains for each side. However, in trying to conceive solutions to the refugee problem, we extract it from its context. And in doing so, we overlook the necessary interactions that shall go into the formulation of the compromise final solution.

The refugee problem focuses the moral obligation of Israel. The Jews called for their right to seek a homeland that would preserve their culture and provide them with independence. It is, therefore, self-defeating for the morality of their cause to deny the same for the Palestinians. It is not possible to leave people in destitution and to deny them their right to preserve their culture, their right for political association. This is a basic human rights issue that implies a moral obligation as well as perpetuating grave political risks and instability.

 Aspects of the Palestinian Problem

To address the Palestinian refugee problem it is necessary to address two distinct issues. The first is the relocation of the refugees. The second is paying proper and adequate compensation.

The refugees who have been dislocated from Palestine/Israel need to become integrated into a political system with which they choose to associate. This problem does not apply to Palestinians who opted for citizenship of another country, with the exception of Jordan. By opting for the citizenship of another country, the former Palestinians has already voluntarily associated with a political community of his choice, and therefore surrendered claim for reintegration into a Palestinian community.

The moral grounds of such restrictions could be challenged on the basis that the voluntary association with another political community was made when an alternative Palestinian association was not available. It would be, therefore, a reflection of a practical necessity more than a willful abandonment of the Palestinian identity. This argument is both logically sound as well as politically powerful. It is politically powerful in view of the fact that many of the leaders of the Palestinians have disproportionately made the choice of electing alternative citizenship.

Nevertheless, this distinction seems fair in view of the fact that it would not be practically possible to relocate the entire Palestinian people to Israel and Palestine. It is, therefore, a practical necessity to selectively narrow down the scope of the problem by decreasing the number of eligible refugees allowed the “right of return.” It is appropriate to confine the right of return to those Palestinians who have never elected an alternative citizenship.

The confinement of the refugee problem to Palestinians without a current alternative citizenship should not apply, however, to those Palestinians who have acquired Jordanian nationality. This is because Jordan included Palestine as part of its nation. Therefore, acquiring the Jordanian citizenship does not imply voluntarily abandoning one’s Palestinian heritage.

I do not believe it helpful to draw distinctions between refugees on the basis of the years they have been refugees, because this is an historical coincidence of uncertain significance in defining the problem. Additionally, I do not believe it is helpful to draw distinctions based on whether a refugee willfully left or was forced to leave. This is because the distinction is probably illusory. Mass dispersion cannot and should not be deemed voluntary — I have assumed that it is always involuntary. Furthermore, voluntary immigration does not deny the immigrant the right to return if he or she has not acquired an alternative nationality.

All refugees should be provided with adequate compensation. Compensation should include the price of relocation, and should be paid to the hosting countries, whether the host country is the new Palestinian entity and/or any other country that offers to host significant groups of Palestinians, provided that Palestinian refugees agree to relocate to that country. The relocation compensation should cover the costs that the host country shall incur in providing the necessary public services to the refugees.

The other distinct aspect of the compensation issue is proper and adequate compensation to the refugees for their land and property from which they have been dispossessed. Egypt has been a good example in providing compensation for the Jewish property that was confiscated after the Jews' departure in the fifties and sixties. Priority was given to reinstating the property to such Jews. If the reinstatement was not possible due to the fact that the property rested with good-faith third party ownership, then compensation was granted. The compensation was calculated on the basis of the value of the property at the time compensation was allowed and not at the historical value of the property at the time of sequestration.

 Responsibility for Payment of the Compensation

Liability for compensation payment to the refugees falls squarely on Israel. Neighboring countries have a political interest in finding a solution, but not the moral responsibility to provide it. Temporary hosting of the refugees by countries such as Syria and Lebanon should not imply any responsibility by these countries to provide for a permanent solution.

Furthermore, although Palestinian refugees should not be obliged to accept an alternative to the “right of return,” it is legitimate that they voluntarily accept alternative citizenship. While alternative citizenship could possibly be provided to a certain segment of the refugees by the West, it seems to me that the broader segment of the population would only be attracted by neighboring countries that share a common culture with them.

Those Palestinians who do not accept alternative citizenship should be allowed the right of return to both Israel and Palestine. The allocation of Palestinians to either of the two countries should be mutually agreed upon.

In my opinion, it is a fundamental human rights requirement that Israel provide all dispossessed Palestinian refugees with proper compensation for their sequestered properties. In addition, Israel has to incur all costs related to the infrastructure requirements for creating hosting communities for the refugees.

 Alternative Solutions

As an alternative but not as an obligatory alternative, certain countries in the area could be host to certain refugees. For such countries to be attracted to provide such support, Israel could subsidize the infrastructural cost to create such communities. It should also make a technical and know-how contribution to help such communities be productive. Such communities would include a mix of the population of the host country in order to promote integration of the refugee community into that country. The communities should not be located on the borders of the hosting country in order to avoid any possibility of a future call for secession.

Several countries could perform this function. Egypt has a plan to expand from 4 percent to 25 percent of its land. This creates a vast opportunity to integrate refugees, provided that the huge costs related to the creation of such new communities be borne by the responsible party — Israel — in conjunction with substantial Western, and especially US, assistance. Other countries in the region could perform this function, such as Iraq and Sudan, even if this choice is not currently available for political reasons.

The host country would be obliged to confer — within an agreed upon time limit — citizenship onto the refugee members of the new communities. As an additional incentive for refugees, Israel should allow the refugees and their children the right to visit Israel and their families. Such a human rights gesture would increase the chance for positive and real regional integration. The right to visit could be limited to 90 days per year.

 23. Obstacles and Opportunities: The Ideological Dimensions

[[Tahseen Basheer]]

The last twenty years have offered both the Arabs and Israelis some profound breakthroughs in their mutual search for achieving a real and lasting peace. From this vantage point — and irrespective of all outstanding problems — I can see the inevitability of a long-term resolution of the key factors of the conflict. I can also see the transformation of the relationship between Israelis and Arabs to new levels of mutual advantage within a framework of stable peace.

To achieve these goals we have to recognize the challenges facing both sides:

- How to develop a relationship based on mutual recognition and respect;

- How to structure that relationship in political, economic, and cultural forms that allow integration and cooperation, and;

- How to maintain their cultural uniqueness in a relationship of cooperation and collaboration.

Finally, it is not “whether” but “when” challenges are faced that a synergistic relationship between Arabs and Israelis can emerge. A realistic awareness of the key features of the conflict and the full realization of the changes required to achieve a continuous process of reconciliation must be pursued with vision, ability, and continuity.

In these remarks, I am concentrating on viewing the relevant features of the conflict through the prism of ideology. The crucial issues that constitute the agenda for the final status negotiation will produce and crystallize many competing and conflicting alternatives. The fault line between the two parties is not limited to any specific technical issue. It takes place within an atmosphere clouded with ideological impediments and psychological roadblocks. The need to understand the challenge of the existing ideological kaleidoscope calls for an examination of the long-term evolution and historical change that both parties to the conflict must undergo. The resulting changes in perception and outlook will color the political stage and move the parties to behave in ways different from preconceived stereotypes and inherited political dogmas.

Awareness and revisiting of the ideological positions, and assessment of their impact, is a key factor in conditioning the parties to be more open to exploring the act of building structures of positive processes that can help them plan positive and mutually acceptable outcomes.

The refugee problem revolves around the people-to-people level, and as such, it evokes serious ideological concerns. The ideological dimensions, difficult as they are, cannot be ignored. They do not by themselves offer a master key to tackle the difficult disagreements; but without addressing them in a creative manner, the search for peace will be inflexible.

Ideological breakthroughs will open the door for a more sustainable solution, both on a people-to-people level as well as on the level of the respective political authorities. The clearing of the ideological jungle will facilitate the discovery of new ways to promote peace.

 Some Salient Features of the Conflict

The aim here is not to wallow in a replay of accumulated arguments; however, there must be an awareness of the aspects of the conflict in order to outline the key features that need to be addressed.

* The evolution of a dynamic ideology of conflict

The Arab-Israeli conflict has taken many shapes and assumed various dimensions as it has developed in complexity and pervasiveness. What started as a conflict over the land of Palestine has developed into an intractable and protracted clash spreading from the domestic stage of Palestine to the regional stage of the Middle East, transforming its focus to Arab versus Israeli dimensions. During the Cold War it became an international conflict.

As an intractable conflict, it has defied easy resolution. Historical dimensions of the conflict led to its becoming long and continuous. In its forms, the positions of the conflicting parties grew to be diametrically opposed and mutually exclusive.

* Irreconcilable claims

The modern history of both the Palestinians and the Jews emerged in different historical, political, and psychological landscapes. Both were seeking a stable haven to achieve a renaissance of their own cultures and political fulfillment of their contemporary national goals.

The Jews who immigrated to Palestine believed that their territorial claims had greater moral validity and political effectiveness than the claims and rights of the indigenous inhabitants, i.e. the Palestinians who were seeking independence and self-determination.

Early Zionists did not concern themselves with the Arabs of Palestine. Instead they concentrated their efforts on addressing the problem of the Jews, which prevented them from addressing the issue of Jewish-Arab relations in a more coherent way. They emphasized the potential for Arab-Jewish cooperation in Palestine and minimized the degree to which the Arab population was fearful of a growing Jewish presence. Mark Tessier, in his A History of Israeli-Palestinian Conflict, states that the reluctance to acknowledge and address Arab issues also reflected a desire to rebut the criticisms of European opponents of Zionism, some of whom charged that Jewish-Arab coexistence in Palestine was impossible.

Perhaps more significant is the fact that most Jewish leaders saw the problems of the Arabs as transient, and accordingly regarded them to be of secondary importance. Some moralists, as Ahad Ha’am, warned of a confrontation with the Arabs, and urged action to avoid such an outcome. Alas, the mainstream Zionist leadership continued to claim that Jews and Palestinian Arabs could live side by side, and that the Arabs could benefit from the Zionist enterprise. Even some Arab moderates advocated binationalism with parity, meaning that Jewish immigration should continue.

The dominant movement of Zionism never bothered to ascertain how Palestinian Arabs felt about their claims as such. The conflict escalated by acts not only of omission, but also of indifference and disregard. The Arabs were not consulted; no one sought their approval for the Zionist project of the Jewish state.

The manner in which the conflict evolved resulted in its transformation from a relatively limited political dispute into an intractable conflict with many layers and multiple dimensions. It became an umbrella conflict, which covered numbers of distinct and interconnected disputes relating to the issues of conflict, yet possessing distinct and separate features.

The two peoples and the two claims tragically encountered each other in a zero-sum approach escalating to a level of uncontrolled tragedy. This element of tragedy is a factor that cannot be ignored or dismissed. Like all tragedies it calls for understanding and at least a serious effort at expiation in symbolic and concrete action.

* The recasting of history

The narrative each side employs in explaining, justifying, and advocating its position has become itself a victim of the conflict. The respective narratives escalated into negative tones. The views of each reflected vindictiveness. This hostile posturing led each side to discount the rights and aspirations of the other. The rhetoric involved tended to blur their visions through language that reduced complex human interaction to a simple dichotomy between friend and foe.

The reinvention of the respective histories created a climate of either/or attitudes that diminished possible accommodation. It locked them in a “no exit” situation, with only two choices available to them: either continuing down the road of unrelenting conflict or accommodating each other’s clams and vital concerns by reaching a historical compromise that closes the chapter of being either victor or vanquished, and turns the page to a more harmonious relationship.

 Relevant Features of Reconciliation

* Levels of negotiation

Negotiations are conducted on two levels:

- Government-to-government (or authority)

- People-to-people

Governments can reach agreements on cease-fire or partial settlement, or conclude a peace agreement, without necessarily achieving an ideological reconciliation. Many states exist with other states in a precarious mutual animosity, or in a cold peace — in an atmosphere of ideological competition and adverse positions.

Peace between governments is necessary but not sufficient. A sustainable peace can be achieved only through relations between people.

The Palestinian-Israeli issue revolves around finding a lasting accommodation between the two peoples on the same geographical land. The refugees constitute the living incarnation of the conflict. Along with issues of territory and political self-determination, this group of people is the key to a resolution of the conflict. They are the factor underlining the nitty- gritty of the conflict, i.e. the real aspirations of the people.

* The three constituencies of peace

Any sustainable peace process has to address three interacting constituencies: domestic, regional, and international. Any successful peace process calls for the orchestration of the factors that impact on these three constituencies.

The peace process may not always move in a positive direction. Roadblocks will, at times, emerge as part of the dynamic force of change. The aim will always be the achievement of more progress to forgo stoppage and reverses.

* The tests of successful resolution of the conflict

The resolution of any conflict occurs when the parties freely agree to a solution that has the following characteristics:

- By joint agreement, the solution satisfies the needs and interests of the involved parties and attenuates the causes underlying the conflict.

- The parties will not wish to repudiate the solution, even if they are in position to do so later.

- The solution meets, in an overall sense, the standards of justice and fairness.

- The solution is sufficiently advantageous to all the parties so that it becomes self-supporting and self-enforcing.

* The importance of the Palestine track

The Palestinian dimension is the cornerstone of the conflict. It remains today the basic litmus test to the veracity of peace not only for the Palestinians and Israelis, but equally in the overall relations between all the Arabs and Israel. For if the Palestinians reach a stable and fair accommodation with Israel, then the historical core of the conflict will be essentially settled.

* The core scenarios of reconciliation

Sustainable peace will be achieved not by resolving all outstanding conflicts between the parties but by adopting policies acceptable to both sides while moving toward closer symmetry. This sustainable element is not always steady or stable; it goes through ups and downs and many detours. The outcome is the test of whether it reaches a sense of synergy or not. Then peace will become steadier as the permanent feature of this relationship. The movement toward peace will transform many negative stereotypes and reshape past views and insecurities of both sides. The aim is not to achieve a zero-sum position but instead a position of mutual benefit both for the present and future.

Seminars and simulations are not substitutes for real negotiations. Complex negotiation is the key factor necessary to reach a package of concrete agreements. Only the parties in negotiations can achieve an acceptable package.

The ideological interpretation of the relevant Resolutions 194, 242, etc. has to be tackled in practical approach. The literal school failed over the last 50 years to achieve a practical result. Forcing the either/or approach will continue to impede progress. But even if different points of view or interpretation of the often cited resolutions cannot be entirely reconciled, the legal frame of reference should be kept. The process of negotiation bridges a spectrum of diametrically-opposed positions. But for this very reason, it can create mutual grounds for agreement.

The refugee problem cannot be handled without looking at the issues of territoriality and cannot ignore the need to tackle the issues of the “right of return” in harmony with the issues of “the law of return.”

Even in the best case scenario there will be elements on both sides of the conflict that will refuse on particulars of the agreement. But if the mainstream of both sides reach an agreement then a new mutual understanding may come to dominate their conflictual relationship.

Experience in the Middle East and elsewhere has shown that ideology cannot be discounted by rhetoric. It is better to try to avoid rhetoric by reaching concrete mutual agreements, in furtherance of mutually acceptable relationship and discourse.

 In Conclusion

All efforts to study the different aspects of Palestinian-Israeli dimension should be viewed as serious endeavors to analyze and shed more light on the issues involved. These efforts should not be seen as negotiations. Whether they are conducted on the second track or third track, they at best represent pre-negotiation posturing.

Successful negotiation has as its target the formation of a “package” that the parties freely accept. This package outlines the trade-offs that are mutually acceptable. Only in negotiation can the parties reach the forms and contents of the agreed-upon package. This package has to achieve acceptance of the domestic constituents, the regional constituents, and the international constituents.

In the realm of ideology all pre-negotiation statements are positions provided to improve the bargaining power of each side. Ideology might not be amenable to direct reconciliation, so in theory these issues might be irreconcilable. But when it comes to the level of concrete application of suggested solutions and trade-offs, practical alternatives might emerge and gain acceptance even though each side will continue to invoke the legal frame of references that it believes supports their position.

The ideological dimension is not a crude debate between the “right of return” and the “law of return,” or between the literalist’s legal approach and the pragmatic outlook. For whatever common grounds might emerge, ideology will receive total support of the domestic constituency. Some individual refugees will stick to their legal rights despite any possible agreements reached between the Palestine Authority and Israel. But solutions that respond positively to human needs and demands can produce arrangements that meet the demands of individual refugees as well as the demands of the Palestine Authority and Israel.

Finally, and without indulging in negotiation, I venture to say that developing a fund with sufficient capital to deal with compensation to pay for some of the projects needed for refugee restitution could offer an objective alleviation of some of the deadlocks. This fund could start now without having to be preceded by common agreements on the conflictual claims. It would highlight a serious intention to tackle the problems in hand, and it would tend to underline that a solution will be reached in peace and cooperation. Past Jewish and Israeli experiences in raising funds to alleviate the pain of the Holocaust could be used for the raising of the funds needed now. This could be a positive step in turning the conflict into cooperation, and might usher in a period of synergy through Arab and Israeli cooperation.

 24 The Economic Capacity of the Palestinian State to Absorb the Refugees: The Employment Perspective

Onn Winckler

On the eve of the signing of the Declaration of Principles (DoP) between the PLO and Israel in September 1993 (known as the “Oslo Accords”), the Palestinian economy was in its worst state since the Israeli occupation in the June 1967 war. The economy suffered from high unemployment rates and a declining standard of living, resulting from the Intifada, the 1990–1 Gulf crisis, and almost three decades of restrictive Israeli economic policy. It was a very small economy, with a high dependence on the Israeli economy in almost all aspects, thus making it vulnerable to any political and economic changes in the region.

While many studies have been conducted on the development of the Palestinian economy since the Oslo Accords, only a few have focused on the employment aspect, particularly on the future employment options for the Palestinians in light of the current high unemployment and underemployment rates in the Palestinian territories. Moreover, since the population growth rate in the West Bank and Gaza Strip (WBGS) during the 1990s was one of the highest worldwide, even without a mass return of the refugees,[491] supplying sufficient work opportunities for the rapidly growing workforce remains one of the major socioeconomic challenges facing the Palestinian National Authority (PNA).

This chapter will examine the following areas: the major demographic characteristics of the Palestinian population in the WBGS and their longterm implications for the size and composition of the workforce, particularly regarding the creation of the wide-based age pyramid; Palestinian employment trends following the Israeli occupation until the signing of the Oslo Accords; developments in the area of Palestinian employment in the post-Oslo period; and finally, future employment options tor the Palestinians in the neighboring labor markets of Jordan, the Arabian Gulf oil-exporting countries, and Israel.

 Major Demographic Characteristics of the WBGS Palestinian Population

Prior to the examination of the employment situation in the WBGS, it is necessary first to examine the major demographic characteristics of the Palestinian population, since these constitute the most fundamental factors determining the composition of the workforce and its future direction. By 1949, and the end of the war, the total Palestinian population was estimated at 1.316 million, of whom 670,000 were in the West Bank (WB), including East Jerusalem, and 240,000 in the Gaza Strip (GS), representing 67 percent of the total Palestinian population in the Middle East at that time.[492]

As a result of the Israeli occupation of the WBGS during the June 1967 war, approximately 310.000 Palestinians from these areas took refuge in Jordan, 265,000 from the WB and 45,000 from the GS.[493] According to the Israeli census conducted in the WBGS in September 1967, the total population of these areas amounted to 985,600 — 595,900 in the WB and 389,700 in the GS.[494] Janet Abu-Lughod claimed that between June 1967 and December 1968 some 250,000 WB residents and at least 75,000 GS residents were driven from their homes.[495] In the late 1960s and throughout the 1970s, however, there was a large-scale emigration from the Palestinian territories, particularly from the WB, and according to the various estimates, 424,000 Palestinians emigrated from the WBGS during the period from the June 1967 war until 1982.[496]

According to the Israeli Central Bureau of Statistics (ICBS) figures, by the end of 1992 the de facto population of the WBGS totaled 1,768,300: 1,051,500 in the WB and 716,800 in the GS.[497] However, several alternative studies suggest that a downward bias in the ICBS figures regarding the WBGS population approximated 10 percent 15 percent.[498] In that case, the total Palestinian population in the WBGS, not including East Jerusalem, was roughly between 1.95–2.03 million. According to the population census conducted by the PNA in December 1997, the total Palestinian population in the WBGS numbered 2.602 million, with 1.600 million in the WB and 1.002 million in the GS.[499] This number does not include 210,209 Palestinians living in East Jerusalem.[500]

Thus, despite sustained emigration from the Palestinian territories, particularly from the WB, both prior to and following the Israeli occupation, which also continued during the 1970s and the 1980s, there was a considerable population growth in the WBGS. This rapid growth was an outcome of the high natural increase rates, increasing from 2.2 percent in the WB and 2.3 percent in the GS in 1968 to 3.4 percent and 3.9 percent, respectively, in 1995 (see table 24.1). Thus, during the 1990s, the natural increase rates in the WBGS were the highest in the Middle East region, after Saudi Arabia, and one of the highest worldwide.[501]

Table 24.1 Natural increase rates among the Palestinians in the WBGS, 1968–1995

| Year
Country | 1968 | 1980 | 1995 |

| | CBR | CDR | NI
(%) | TFR | | CBR | CDR | NI
(%) | TFR | | CBR | CDR | | NI
(%) | TFR |

| West Bank | 43.9 | 21.7 | 2.2 | 7.6 | | 42.1 | 10.4 | 3.2 | 7.0 | | 41.2 | 6.9 | 3.4 | 5.6 |

| Gaza Strip | 42.0 | 19.5 | 2.3 | 6.9 | | 47.6 | 10.1 | 3.8 | 7.3 | | 45.4 | 6.7 | 3.9 | 7.4 |

CBR = Crude birth rate per 1,000 people

CDR = Crude death rate per 1,000 people

NI = Natural increase (%)

TFR = Total fertility rate

Sources: PCBS, Health Statistics in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, Current Status Report Series, No. 4 (mallah, July 1995); idem, The Demographic Survey in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, Final Report (Ramallah, August 1997); ICBS, Statistical Abstract of Israel, 1980–95, various issues, Jerusalem.

[[e-j-edward-j-perkins-and-joseph-ginat-the-palestin-1.jpg][Figure 24.1 Natural increase rates among the Palestinians in the WBGS, 1968–1995]]

The major consequence of the prolonged high natural increase rates among the WBGS Palestinian population was the creation of a wide-based age pyramid. According to the 1997 census results, 57.6 percent of the WBGS Palestinian population were under the age of 20.[502] The meaning of this age pyramid composition is that more than half of the population are not included in the working age group, leading to low labor force participation rates. This has a profound influence on the per capita income through the ratio between dependants and breadwinners.

Table 24.2 Labor force and unemployment rates in the WBGs, 1968–1998

Year	Total Labor Force (in thousands) (%)	Unemployment Rate (%)
1968	{1}156	13.6
1973	198	1.0
1978	217	1.1
1982	230	1.3
1985	251	3.6
1988	{2}289	2.6
1990	308	3.7
1992	333	4.2
1993	339	6.7
1994	428	10.0
1995	443	18.3
1996	469	24.9
1997	558	19.3
1998	585	14.4

{1} 1968–86 — The labor force is for population aged 14 years and over.

{2} 1986 onward — The labor force is for population aged I 5 years and over.

Sources:

1968–92: ICBS, National Accounts of the Judea, Samaria and the Gaza Area, 1968–1993, Special Report No. 1012 (Jerusalem, 1996), p. 123, table 23.

1993–96: EIU, Country Profile, Israel, the Occupied Territories, 1999–2000, p. 78, reference table 2.

1997: PCBS, Population, Housing, and Establishment Census — 1997, Census Final Results — Summary (Ramallah, 30 November 1998), pp. 72–76, tables 15–17

1998: UNESCO, UNSCO Report on Economic and Social Conditions in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, Gaza, 30 April 1999), p. 18, table 9; PCBS, Labour Force Survey, Annual Report: 1998 (Ramallah, April 1999), p. 24.

[[e-j-edward-j-perkins-and-joseph-ginat-the-palestin-2.jpg][Figure 24.2 Total and per capita GDP growth rates in the WBGS, 1994–1998 (in percentages)]]

The second consequence of the wide-based age pyramid is that for at least the coming three decades, rapid population growth will continue, even if the current high fertility rates substantially decrease, resulting from the declining crude death rates. Thus, while according to U.N. Economic Social Council for West Asia (ESCWA) projections the crude birth rate of the WBGS Palestinian population is expected to decline to 33.6 per 1,000 people on average during the period 2010–15 (from more than 40 per 1.000 in 1995), the crude death rate is also expected to decline to 3.5 per 1.000 people (from almost 7 per 1,000 in 1995), leaving the natural increase rate at a very high level of 3 percent annually.[503] Thus, despite fertility reduction, the number of jobs needed will continue to grow until the number of those entering the labor market, namely, those in the age group of 20–24, will be equal to those leaving the workforce at the age of 60–65.[504] According to the 1997 census results, the number of those in the age group of 0–4 was five times higher than those in the age group of 40–44.[505]

The 1997 census data indicates that the total Palestinian workforce amounted to 557,671 (501,146 males and 56,525 females), representing 21.4 percent of the total WBGS population, without the residents of East Jerusalem. One year later, in 1998, the working age group (15–64 years) in the WBGS was estimated at 1.1 million, and the labor force amounted to 585,000.[506] In comparison with a workforce of 156,000 in 1968, this represents a huge increase of 276 percent during a period of only one generation (see table 24.2), despite the large-scale emigration taking place since the Israeli occupation.

Moreover, women’s labor force participation rates have been steadily increasing during the past two decades in accordance with the improvement in their educational level. According to the 1998 Labour Force Survey, while the overall female labor force participation rate (age 15 and over) was 11.3 percent, this rate increased to 16.3 percent for women in the age group of 25–34.[507] Thus, the future demand for work opportunities is expected to grow even further, despite the expected fertility reduction, due both to increasing female labor force participation rates and the wide-based age pyramid. In addition, due to the sharp improvement in the education of the overall working-age group, the Palestinian authorities will soon have to deal not only with the problem of a shortage in work opportunities, but also with their diversification, due to an increasing demand for employment in skilled and professional occupations.

However, despite the rapid increase of the WBGS workforce, the labor force participation rate still remained low. In addition to the wide-based age pyramid and low rates of women labor force participation, the migration pattern of the Palestinians also contributed to the low rates of labor force participation insofar as the migrants were predominantly males.[508] However, as emigration slowed down in the early 1980s, and even more so following the establishment of the PNA, the labor force participation rates began to rise, as the sex and age composition of the WBGS population normalized.

 Trends in Palestinian Employment in the Pre-Oslo Period

In general terms, since the Israeli occupation, the economic history of the WBGS can be divided into two major periods: the first period, lasting until the early 1980s, was characterized by rapid economic growth and a sharp rise in the standard of living; the second period, beginning at the end of the “oil decade” in 1982, was characterized mainly by economic stagnation and recession.

* The First Period (1968–82): “The Bonanza Time”

With the end of the June 1967 war, two opposing approaches toward the nature of the economic relationship between Israel and the WBGS emerged. The first approach, initiated by Minister of Defense Moshe Dayan, advocated the free movement of both goods and labor between the two economies. The second approach, adopted by Minister of Finance Pinhas Sapir, rejected the free movement of Palestinian labor to Israel.[509] In the end, the integration approach prevailed and is still in force at the time of writing this essay (December 1999). However, as emphasized by Arie Arnon and associates, this integration “first was involuntary. Second, it was partial in two respects: a protectionist policy biased in favor of Israeli agricultural goods, and restrictions on entrepreneurship within the territories.”[510] On the other hand, the adoption of the “open bridges policy” enabled the Palestinians to continue to export their agricultural and industrial goods to Jordan and to other Arab countries.

In the early stage of the Israeli occupation, from 1968 until 1972, the GDP (Gross Domestic Product) of the WBGS increased rapidly, reaching an annual average growth rate of 15 percent in the WB and 11 percent in the GS.[511] This rapid economic growth was mainly due to the opening of the Israeli labor market to Palestinian workers. Consequently, the unemployment rate in the WBGS declined from almost 14 percent in 1968 to approximately I percent in the early 1970s (see table 24.3). However, it must be noted that from the beginning, almost all the Palestinians working in Israel were employed in unskilled jobs, mainly in construction, agriculture, and services.[512] This occupational pattern is still prevalent in the market today.

Throughout the 1970s, the Palestinian economy continued to enjoy rapid economic growth. In real terms, during the period of 1970–80, the GDP of the WB and GS increased by 160 percent and 73 percent, respectively. This rapid growth was the outcome of several factors, the most important being the sharp increase in the scale of remittances of the Palestinians working abroad, both in Israel and in the Gulf oilexporting countries. The number of the Palestinian workers in Israel increased from 53,800 in 1972 to 80,700 in 1982,[513] representing 35 percent of the WBGS total workforce (see table 24.2).

[[e-j-edward-j-perkins-and-joseph-ginat-the-palestin-3.jpg][Figure 24.3 Unemployment rates in the WBGS, 1968–1998 (in percentages)]]

During the period 1975–81, the net migration balance from the WB to both the Gulf countries and Jordan was estimated by the ICBS at 10,000 annually.[514] However, in contrast to the Palestinian workers in Israel, in the Gulf oil-exporting countries they were employed mainly in professional and managerial occupations. Overall, during the “oil decade” (1973–82), it was estimated that approximately 40,000 Palestinians from the WBGS were working in the Gulf oil-exporting countries. At the peak, in the late 1970s and the early 1980s, the remittances of the Palestinians working in the Gulf oil-countries constituted approximately 10 percent of the WB’s total GNP.[515]

The sharp rise in the scale of remittances transferred by the Palestinian workers abroad not only led to a corresponding increase in the standard of living in the WBGS, but also to growth in activity in domestic construction, agriculture and, to a lesser extent, industry. The rapid increase in per capita income found expression in a substantial improvement in household conditions, with a many-fold rise in the possession of consumer durables and in water and electricity connections. This improvement, it should be noted, covered almost the entire WBGS population. However, the Palestinian economy continued to be based mainly on workers’ remittances and was not an outcome of internal development of the Palestinian economy, except in the agricultural sector. Thus, as Leila Farsakh noted rightly: “While the economic base of the WBGS gradually weakened, labor Bows to Israel allowed for improvements in standards of living and income distribution in these areas.”[516]

* The Second Period (1983–93): Economic stagnation and the Intifada

The rapid expansion of the Palestinian economy started to slow during the early 1980s, due mainly to two reasons. The first was the reduction in the number of Palestinian workers in the Arabian Gulf oil-exporting countries, resulting from the sharp drop in oil prices at the end of the “oil decade” in 1982, which led to a substantial decline in the financial allocations of the Gulf governments to socioeconomic development projects. In addition, from the early 1980s onward, a clear preference has been shown in the Gulf labor markets for workers from Southeast and Central Asian countries at the expense of Arab workers, including the Palestinians. This preference was the outcome of much lower wage demands among the Asian workers than among the Arabs, as well as the tendency of the Asian workers, in contrast to the Arabs, to come alone to the Gulf without their family members.[517] Thus, the net migration balance from the WBGS decreased from 21,000 in 1981 to 11,000 in 1982 and only 3.700 in 1983,[518] leading to an obvious decline in workers’ remittances to the WBGS.

The second factor for the economic stagnation in the WBGS since the early 1980s was the parallel economic recession in Israel during that time, resulting from hyperinflation, which reached a peak of 445 percent in 1984.[519] The immediate outcome of these events was an increase in the unemployment rate in the WBGS from 1.3 percent in 1982 to 3.6 percent in 1985 (see table 24.3). Overall, during the five years prior to the outbreak of the Intifada, the average GNP growth rate in the WBGS was 3.2 percent, leading to stagnation in per capita terms.[520]

The onset of the Intifada caused further economic recession in the WBGS. Employment, trade, and industry activities were adversely affected by a combination of periodic closures, strikes, curfews, and shop closures. Since the outbreak of the Intifada, while the number of Palestinian workers in Israel continued to increase (except for 1991), the number of hours and days worked started to decline steadily. According to the various estimates, there was roughly a 20 percent decline in employment in terms of hours worked, for both the domestic and the Israeli markets.[521]

The expulsion of approximately 300,000 Palestinians from Kuwait in 1991, due to the support of Arafat for the Iraqi side during the 1990/91 Gulf crisis, caused a further decline in the Palestinian economy. This was a result of the considerable reduction in both workers' remittances and financial assistance to the Palestinians from the Gulf countries.[522] The return of many Palestinians from the Gulf to the WBGS led to a positive migration balance of 10,000 annually in 1990 and 1991, leading to a rapid population growth of 4.7 percent annually in the WB and 5.3 percent in the GS during those years.[523]

Thus, from early 1991, the dependence of the Palestinians on the Israeli labor market increased sharply. By the end of 1992, at the peak, 115,600 Palestinians were working in Israel,[524] and their income constituted more than 40 percent of the GDP of the WBGS. However, in mid-1993, as a result of the total closure of the WBGS in April 1993, unemployment rates reached approximately 25 percent in the WB and 40 percent in the GS. The closures eliminated free movement between the WB and the GS and severely diminished trade between Israel and the Palestinian territories. Moreover, the closures deprived the WBGS Palestinians of access to East Jerusalem — the major Palestinian trade area. In 1993, the World Bank estimated that every day of complete closure caused a loss of income of $1.1 million in labor earnings, in addition to a loss of almost $600,000 in exports lor the WB and a loss of $700,000 in labor earnings, as well as $250,000 in exports for the GS.[525] Thus, as reported by UNCTAD in mid-1993,

"unemployment and the need tor job-creation have become perhaps the most overriding challenges now facing the Palestinian economy."[526]

 Trends in Palestinian Employment Following Oslo

The signing of the DoP in September 1993 led to high expectations for rapid growth in the Palestinian economy and for considerable improvement in the standard of living. The major economic priorities of the Palestinians following Oslo were: increasing employment opportunities in the WBGS; improving productive capacity, mainly in agriculture and industry, through large-scale investments of both foreign and domestic origin; enhancing private sector activities; improving social services, mainly in the areas of health care and education; and most importantly, decreasing economic dependence on Israel. According to the April 1994 Paris Economic Protocol. Israel and the Palestinians agreed to continue the free movement of labor and goods for an interim period of five years.

Unfortunately, despite the high expectations, the Palestinian economy deteriorated steadily in the five years following the signing of the Oslo Accords, and started to slightly recover only in the second half of 1998. According to IM F figures, the GDP of the WBGS declined during the years 1995–7 by an annual average of 2.7 percent in real terms, resulting in a cut of 25 percent in the per capita income for that period.[527] This deterioration was the outcome of the sharp decline in the number of Palestinians working in Israel and the disruption to trade between Israel and the WBGS. Such a state of affairs was caused by the frequent closures imposed by the IDF (the Israeli Defense Force) in response to the murderous attacks on Israeli citizens conducted by the Hamas and the Jihad Islami. In 1998, the World Bank estimated the damage of the closures on the WBGS to be $6—$10 million per day.[528] Overall, during the period of 1994 7, an average of less than 70,000 Palestinians were working in Israel, as compared with 116,000 in 1992.[529]

During the early 1990s, the Israeli economy experienced rapid growth as a result of the peace process, as well as massive immigration from the former Soviet Union. The rapid economic growth led to a parallel increase in the demand for workers, particularly in the construction sector. However, the unstable supply of Palestinian workers due to the frequent closures, led to a massive import of workers from overseas, mainly from Southeast Asia and Central Europe. The number of overseas documented workers in Israel increased from less than 20,000 in 1993 to approximately 116,000 in mid-1997.[530] By late 1999, the total number of overseas workers in Israel was estimated by Kav LaOvech[531] at 185,000, with 85,000 documented and approximately 100,000 undocumented.[532]

This process naturally led to a sharp increase in the unemployment rates in the WBGS. According to the December 1997 census data, the total number of unemployed in the WBGS was 107,735 (94,243 males and 13,492 females), representing an overall unemployment rate of 19.3 percent (15.5 percent in the WB and 27.5 percent in the GS), down from almost 25 percent in 1996 (see table 24.3). By 1998, an average of only 44,400 permit-holding WBGS workers were employed on a daily basis in Israel, in the Israeli settlements in the WBGS, and in the industrial zones. In addition, approximately 55,000 Palestinians were working in Israel unofficially. Although the 1998 figures are considerably lower than those from a decade earlier, they still represent an increase of 17 percent over the daily average of 38,000 documented workers in 1997. Overall, by 1998, nearly 22 percent of the WBGS workers were employed in Israel, as compared with approximately 17 percent in 1997, and only 8 percent in 1996.[533]

This means that, as the security situation has improved and the number of closures imposed by the IDF has substantially declined, the number of Palestinians working in Israel has once again increased, although it has not returned to the pre-Oslo level. Thus, in 1998, unemployment rates in the WBGS have remained high, amounting to 14.4 percent: 11.2 percent in the WB and 20.9 percent in the GS.[534] In 1998, GNP and GDP per capita in the WBGS were estimated at USS 1,750 and USS 1,450, respectively. In that year, the overall daily net wage was 57.7 NIS ($13.8),[535] with 50.0 NIS ($11.9) for those working in the WB, 40.0 NIS ($9.5) in the GS, and 100.0 NIS ($23.8) for those working in Israel and the Israeli settlements in the WBGS. Taking into consideration 23–24 monthly work days, the average monthly wage for a Palestinian worker in 1998 was 2,350 NIS ($560) for those working in Israel and the Israeli settlements, 1,175 NIS ($280) for those working in the WB, and 940 N1S ($224) for those working in the GS.[536] The real GDP growth rate in 1998 was 4.1 percent, and for the first time since the beginning of the interim period in 1994 was sufficient to marginally raise the per capita GDP by 0.2 percent (see table 24.3).

Table 24.3 Major economic indicators of the Palestinian economy, 1994–1998

| Economic Indicator | 1994 | 1995 | 1996 | 1997 | 1998 |

| Real CDP growth (%) | 11.8 | -3.8 | -4.3 | 2.4 | 4.1 |

| Real CDP per capita growth (%) | 5.4 | -9.1 | -8.7 | -1.6 | 0.2 |

| Exports of goods and services ($US millions) | 366 | 550 | 582 | 632 | 693 |

| Imports of goods and services ($US millions) | 1,433 | 2,012 | 2,368 | 2,497 | 2,532 |

| Donor financing (US$ millions) | 665 | 795 | 735 | 716 | 549 |

| Donor financing (% of CDP) | 21 | 24 | 22 | 21 | 16 |

Source: IMF, West Bank and Gaza Strip: Economic Developments in the Five Years Since Oslo (Washington, D.C., 1999), p. 7, table 2.1.

[[e-j-edward-j-perkins-and-joseph-ginat-the-palestin-4.jpg][Figure 24.4 Palestinian labor force in the WBCS, 1968–1998]]

Thus, the recovery of the Palestinian economy in 1998–9 was due to an increase in Palestinian employment in Israel and not as a result of an increase in available work opportunities in the WBGS. The rapid fluctuation in the unemployment rates in the WBGS since the onset of the Intifada demonstrates, more than any other economic indicator, the extreme dependence of the Palestinian economy on Israel.

As the data indicates, the real GDP growth rate since 1993 was considerably higher than the real GNP growth rate. This was a result of the expansion in the public sector under the administration of the PNA, which employed 89,319 persons in 1998, as compared with 40,000 in 1994, as well as the construction boom of 1994–5.[537] Overall, during the period of 1994—98, the real GDP growth rate in the WBGS was estimated at 2 percent annually on average, well below the population growth rate during the same years. As a result, the percentage of those living under and at the poverty line in the WBGS (defined as $650 annually income per capita) increased from 20 percent in 1995 to 40 percent in 1997.[538]

 Options for Future Palestinian Employment outside the WBGS

Considering the current situation of the Palestinian economy, particularly the high unemployment rates in the GS, it seems that the creation of sufficient work opportunities for the currently unemployed, as well as the large number of newcomers to the workforce, amounting to more than 30,000 annually, is far beyond the current capacity of the Palestinian economy. Thus, in the short and the medium terms, it would appear that the solution for the absence of work opportunities in the WBGS lies outside the Palestinian territories.

* Jordan

Following the October 1973 “oil boom” until the mid-1980s, Jordan enjoyed rapid economic growth which was accompanied by a very low unemployment rate, estimated at only 1.6 percent by 1976.[539] By 1987, the per capita GNP in Jordan was $1,560, as compared with only $370 in 1972.[540] This rapid economic expansion resulted mainly from extensive foreign grants, reaching a peak of $1.3 billion in 1980, and the large-scale remittances of the Jordanians working abroad, which amounted to $1.1 billion, on annual average, in the mid-1980s. By 1980, the number of Jordanian citizens working abroad was estimated by 305,000,[541] increasing to 328,000 in 1985.[542] Thus, during the first half of the 1980s, about 40 percent of the Jordanian indigenous workforce were working outside the Kingdom. At the same time, due to this massive labor emigration, Jordan was forced to become a labor-importing country. By 1985, the foreign workers in Jordan numbered 186,500.[543]

However, in the late 1980s the economic situation in Jordan started to deteriorate and the unemployment rate began to rise, amounting to 10 percent in 1989.[544] The economic recession in Jordan during the late 1980s was highly related to the drop in oil prices at that time. First, the economic recession in the Gulf led to a sharp decline in foreign grants to other Arab countries. By 1987, the Arab aid to Jordan fell to only $600 million,[545] less than half the amount received in the early 1980s. Second, the decline in oil prices caused a temporary reduction in the labor demands in the Gulf, narrowing the number of work opportunities for Jordanians and Palestinians in the Gulf from the mid-1980s onward.

The economic situation in Jordan further deteriorated following the support of Jordan for Iraq during the 1990/91 Gulf crisis, when Jordan was forced to absorb approximately 350,000 Jordanians and Palestinians returning from the Gulf countries, particularly from Kuwait.[546] Jordan, like the other major Middle Eastern labor-exporting countries, was not prepared to absorb hundreds of thousands of returnees in such a short period of time. Consequently, the unemployment rates in Jordan increased rapidly from early 1991 onward, amounting to 23 percent by October 1991, according to official figures, and as high as 35 percent according to unofficial estimates.[547] In addition, since Iraq was the largest importer of Jordanian goods and services, the damage of the international embargo imposed on Iraq cost Jordan $3 billion according to an official Jordanian estimate.[548]

Despite the high expectations for rapid growth of the Jordanian economy as a result of the peace agreement with Israel in October 1994, the economic situation in Jordan has improved only slightly during the past five years. In 1996 and 1997, the GDP growth rates in real terms were 0.8 percent and 2.7 percent, respectively, meaning a reduction in per capita terms.[549] According to preliminary data, during the first half of 1999 the GDP growth rate was only 1.3 percent in annual terms,[550] well below the population growth rate. By 1997, the per capita GDP in Jordan was $1,590,[551] similar to the level in the WBGS. In addition, due to the high natural increase rate, the Jordanian labor market is already receiving an average of 51,000 newcomers every year.

However, despite the high unemployment rates in Jordan during the 1990s, the number of foreign workers in the Kingdom continued to be very high, estimated in 1998 at 250,000–300,000,[552] not including approximately 120,000 Iraqis which were working in Jordan at that time.[553] These foreign workers are employed in the lowest occupational rungs of the Jordanian labor market. Thus, in light of such high unemployment rates and the easy availability of cheap foreign workers, even from a purely economic point of view, not to mention the political obstacles, it seems that the creation of a vast number of work opportunities for the Palestinians in Jordan is not a realistic solution, at least not in the foreseeable future.

 The Gulf oil-exporting countries

As mentioned earlier, tens of thousands of Palestinians from the WBGS were working in the Gulf oil-exporting countries, particularly in Kuwait, until the 1990/91 Gulf crisis. Although the political relationship between the Palestinian leadership and the Gulf oil-exporting countries has improved during the past few years, the Gulf labor markets are no longer relevant for absorbing a large number of WBGS workers. This is mainly because the vast majority of the foreigners currently working in these countries are earning less than $500 monthly,[554] and are employed mainly in domestic services, agriculture, and other “blue-collar” positions in both the private and the public sectors. In addition, the traditional occupations of the Palestinians in Kuwait, mainly in teaching and governmental bureaucracy, are now occupied by Kuwaiti nationals, as the educational level of the Kuwaiti national workforce has sharply improved during the past two decades. Thus, achieving some relief from the employment pressures in the WBGS through temporary employment in the Gulf oilexporting countries, as in the 1970s and the first halt of the 1980s, is no longer a realistic option.

* Israel

During the period 1997—9, as a result of the economic stagnation, unemployment rates among Israeli citizens sharply increased, amounting to more than 9 percent in late 1999. However, despite the high unemployment rate, there is still a considerable shortage of workers in the Israeli labor market. While the number of unemployed in Israel in late 1999 was approximately 170,000, the number of foreign workers, including both Palestinians and overseas workers, was estimated at 285,000 or even higher, meaning a net shortage of more than 100,000 employees. The combination of high unemployment rates and large numbers of foreign workers is largely the result of the undesirability of many available positions in the Israeli labor market to Israeli citizens, mainly in construction, agriculture, and domestic services, either due to relatively low income or low occupational status.[555] Thus, it is likely that a large foreign workforce will continue to be needed in Israel, at least for the foreseeable future.

However, contrary to the current situation in the Israeli labor market, as well as the official and unofficial employment approaches, it seems that the better option for Israel would be to fill the unoccupied positions with Palestinians rather than with overseas workers, due to three main reasons:

1. The Palestinian workers are not living in Israel; they are coming in the morning and returning back to their homes in the WBGS in the evening. In contrast, the overseas workers are naturally living in Israel and thus need access to various public services — primarily health care, housing etc. Likewise, overseas workers are in many cases either coming to Israel with their family members or bringing them after a short period of time, therefore availing themselves of social and public services for their family members as well. Thus, by employing Palestinians rather than overseas workers, Israel can realize considerable savings in public expenditures.

1. While the incomes of the overseas workers are largely transferred to their home countries and thus do not contribute to increasing the demand for Israeli goods and services, a major part of the incomes of the Palestinian workers are spent on Israeli goods and services, either by acquiring them directly in Israel or by importing them into the WBGS.

1. While the salaries of the Palestinian workers in Israel are paid in NIS, the salaries of the overseas workers are paid in USS, thus increasing the balance of payments deficit. According to the estimate of the Bank of Israel, in 1998 the total remittances of the overseas workers in Israel (including undocumented workers) amounted to $1.42 billion.[556]

The major argument of those rejecting the preference of Palestinian workers at the expense of overseas workers is the lack of security involved in the employment of Palestinians and the unstable supply of workers in cases of security events and closures. However, the establishment of an independent Palestinian state with clear and secure monitored borders with Israel would provide a solution to this problem. Therefore, it seems that increasing the number of Palestinian workers in Israel at the expense of overseas workers is not only in the interests of the Palestinians, but in the interests of Israel as well, from both the economic and sociopolitical points of view.

 Summary, Conclusions, and Outlook

The fluctuations in the Palestinian economy since the Israeli occupation until the present time have been, in most cases, an outcome of political and economic events occurring outside the Palestinian territories without any ability of the Palestinians themselves to influence these events or even to prepare for them. The major difference between the period of the pre-Oslo Accords and that following the Accords is that during the first period, particularly until the onset of the Intifada, the level of economic development in Israel was the major factor dictating the number of Palestinians working in Israel; during the second period, on the contrary, it was the political factor, particularly the security situation, that determined the scale of Palestinian employment in Israel.

However, large-scale Palestinian employment in Israel can be only a temporary solution. In the long run, the Palestinian economy must be able to create sufficient work opportunities for its current and future additional workforce. This, in turn, requires open borders and free access to other markets besides the Israeli one. It seems that the establishment of an independent Palestinian state, with full autonomy to determine both monetary and fiscal policies, will boost Palestinian industry, which currently represents only a small fraction of the Palestinian GDP, Until today, the absorption of the WBGS within the Israeli tariff system has actually forced the import of Israeli goods by the Palestinians. The abolishment of this obligatory system will provide an important lever for increasing Palestinian industrial activities, particularly in the fields of import-substituting products and highly labor-intensive industries (mainly in food and textiles), in which the Palestinians have a clear relative advantage due to a much cheaper workforce than in Israel. Another major lever for increasing Palestinian industrial activities will be free access to foreign markets, mainly those of Jordan and the Gulf oil-exporting countries.

In addition to investments of the Palestinians themselves in the industrial sector, investments of Israelis and others from abroad also have the potential to increase Palestinian industrial activities. The 1999 IMF report on the Palestinian economy recommends that: “To combat unemployment, more private investment is essential, and serious efforts are required to create an environment conductive to private sector investment.”[557]

Since the establishment of the PNA, it has enjoyed substantial foreign aid. Over the five years following the September 1993 DoP, the PNA received $2.95 billion in assistance, outside of the aid from nongovernmental organizations (NGOs). The European Union is the largest donor at $2.91 billion.[558] In the future, a large segment of the foreign aid should be devoted to socioeconomic development in order to create as many work opportunities as possible.

However, the high natural increase rates in the WBGS have imposed a severe obstacle with regard to employment. Given current annually population growth of approximately 4 percent, economic growth rates need to rise above that level for a long period of time. Moreover, as a result of the wide-based age pyramid, the current number of 30,000 annual newcomers to the workforce is expected to grow in the coming years. During the period of 1994–8, while the WBGS workforce increased by 147,000, only 92,000 new work opportunities were created, both in the public and the private sectors, leading to an employment gap of 55,000.[559][560] Thus, in order to reduce the employment pressure in the future, as well as to increase the labor force participation rates, the Palestinian authorities should adopt a national family planning policy, similar to that operating in Tunisia and Egypt, as soon as possible.

In conclusion, only by achieving stable and substantial economic growth in parallel to decreasing fertility rates and increasing labor force participation rates, particularly among women, will the future Palestinian state be able to enhance its validity as a sovereign and prosperous state. Moreover, consideration of the rate and shape of the absorption of the Palestinian refugees in the future Palestinian state must go beyond political calculations and take into account socioeconomic conditions, particularly employment possibilities.

 Notes

The Hebrew version of this essay will be published in Hamizrah Hehadash [The Near East] journal.

[491] According to the latest available figures of UNRWA (UN Refugee and Works Agency) from June 30. 1999. the total number of the Palestinian refugees was 3.63 million, of whom 1.51 million were in Jordan, 374,521 in Syria, and 370,144 in Lebanon ([[http://www.un.org/unrwa/pr/pdf/uif.pdn] [http://www.un.org/unrwa/pr/pdf/uif.pdn]].

[492] Gad G. Gilbar, “Trends in the Demographic Development of the Palestinians, 1870–1987,” Occasional Papers (Tel Aviv University, The Moshe Dayan Center for Middle Eastern and African Studies), No. 108 (September, 1989), p. 18, table 7; Fawzi A. Gharaibeh, The Economies of the West Bank and Gaza Strip (Boulder: Westview Press, 1985), p. 29.

[493] Peter Gubser, Jordan: Crossroad the Middle Eastern Events (Boulder: Westview Press, 1983), p. 12; Asher Susser, “Demography and Politics in Jordan,” in Ami Ayalon and Gad G. Gilbar (eds.), Demography and Politics in the Arab States (Tel Aviv: Hakibutz Hameuchad, 1995), p. 133.

[494] State of Israel, Central Bureau of Statistics (ICBS), Statistical Abstract of Israel-1991 (Jerusalem, 1991), p. 710, table 27.1.

[495] Janet L. Abu-Lughod, ’“The Demographic Consequences of the Occupation,” in Naseer H. Aruri (ed.), Occupation: Israel Over Palestine (Belmont: Association of Arab-American University Graduates, 1989), p. 402.

[496] Gharaibeh. The Economies of the West Bank and Gaza Strip, p. 32.

[497] ICBS, Statistical Abstract of Israel — 1993, p. 758, table 27.1.

[498] See: The World Bank (WB), Developing the Occupied Territories: An Investment in Peace, Vol. 6 (Washington, D.C., 1993), p. 7.

[499] This number does not include the uncounted population according to postenumeration study.

[500] Palestinian National Authority, Central Bureau of Statistics (PCBS), Population, Housing, and Establishment Census, 1997. Population Report, Palestinian Territory, First Part, Statistical Reports Series, 002 (Ramallah, May 1999), p. 46, table 1.

[501] For comparison, see: UNICEF (United Nations Children’s Fund). The State of the World’s Children 1999 (Published for UNICEF by Oxford University Press, 1999), pp. 110–13, table 5; UN, Department for Economic and Social Information and Policy Analysis, Report on the World Social Situation 1997 (New York, 1997), p. 17.

[502] PCBS, Population, Housing, and Establishment Census, 1997, Statistical Reports Series, 002, p. 49, table 4.

[503] ESCWA (UN Economic and Social Commission for Western Asia), Statistical Abstract of the ESCWA Region, 19th Issue (New York, 1999), p. 50, table 1–5.

[504] See, for example, Philippe Fargues, “Demographic Explosion or Social Upheaval?” in Ghassan Salame (ed.). Democracy Without Democrats? The Renewal of Politics in the Muslim Word (London and New York: I. B. Tauris, 1994), pp. 157 -42.

[505] PCBS, Population, Housing, and Establishment Census 1997. Census Final Results Summary (Ramallah, November 30, 1998), p. 42, table 2.

[506] UNSCO (United Nations Office of the Special Coordinator in the Occupied Territories), The Economy of the West Bank and Gaza Strip: A Retrospective on the 1990s and Future Challenge (Gaza, January 1999), p. 3.

[507] PCBS, Labour Force Survey, Annual Report: 1998 (Ramallah, April 1999), p. 21.

[508] Radwan Shaban, “Palestinian Labour Mobility,” International Labour Review 134 (5–6) (1993): 660–3.

[509] Shlomo Gazit, The Stick and the Carrot: The Israeli Administration in Judea and Samaria (Tel Aviv: Zmora, Bitan Publishers, 1985), pp. 147–50 (in Hebrew); Moshe Dayan, The Story of my Life (Jerusalem and Tel Aviv: Eidanim Publishers in collaboration with Dvir Publishing House, 1976), pp. 502–5 (in Hebrew).

[510] Arie Arnon, Israel Luski, Avia Spivak, and Jimmy Weinblatt, The Palestinian Economy: Between Imposed Integration and Voluntary Separation (Leiden: E.J. Brill, 1997), p. 5.

[511] ICBS, National Accounts of the Judea, Samaria and the Gaza Area, 1968–1993, Special Report, No. 1012 (Jerusalem, 1996), p.17.

[512] On the eve of the onset of the Intifada, only 2 percent of the Palestinian workers in Israel were engaged in professional, technical, and clerical occupations. See: WB, Developing the Occupied Territories, Vol. 1, p. 5.

[513] New Israeli Shekels.

[514] Bank of Israel, Research Department. An Economic Analysis of the Palestinian Economy: The West Bank and Gaza, 1968–1991, by Arie Arnon and Daniel Gottlieb, Discussion Paper, No. 93.07 (Jerusalem, 1993), p. 44, appendix table

[515] On the demographic development of the Palestinians prior to the Intifida, see: Gad G. Gilbar, Population Dilemmas in the Middle East (London and Portland: Frank Cass, 1997), ch. 1.

[516] WB, Developing the Occupied Territories, Vol. 1, p. 6; p. 140, table 6.

[517] Leila Farsakh, The Implementation of Labor-related Articles in the Protocol on Economic Relations between the Government of Israel and the PLO: A Critical Review (Jerusalem and Ramallah: Palestine Economic Policy Research Institute, November, 1999), p. 1.

[518] Mostafa H. Nagi, “Migration of Asian Workers to the Arab Gulf: Policy Determinants and Consequences,” Journal of South Asian and Middle Eastern Studies 9 (3) (Spring 1986): 19–34; Onn Winckler, “Gulf Monarchies as Rentier States: The Nationalization Policies of the Labor Force/’ in Joseph Kostiner (ed.). Middle Eastern Monarchies: The Challenge of Modernity (Boulder and London: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 2000), pp. 237–56.

[519] ICBS, Statistical Abstract of Israel — 1991, p. 710, table 27.1.

[520] Bank of Israel, Annual Report — 1999 (Jerusalem, March 2000), p. 363 (in Hebrew).

[521] Gilbar, Population Dilemmas in the Middle East, p. 60, table 3.4.

[522] WB, Developing the Occupied Territories, Vol. 2, p. 11; Gil Feiler, “Palestinian Employment Prospects,” The Middle East Journal 47 (4) (Autumn 1993): 643–7.

[523] UNSCO, The Economy of the West Bank and Gaza Strip, p. 1.

[524] UNCTAD (United Nations Conference on Trade and Development), Developments in the Economy of the Occupied Palestinian Territory, UNCTAD’s Assistance to the Palestinian People (Geneva, July 26, 1993), p. 14.

[525] It is important to emphasize that the official (Israeli) figures on the number of the Palestinian workers in Israel until 1993 was believed to be underestimated by 10–15 percent. See: Farsakh, The Implementation of Labor-related Articles in the Protocol on Economic Relations between the Government of Israel and the PLO, p. 5, note 2.

[526] WB, Developing the Occupied Territories, Vol. 2, p. 10.

[527] UNCTAD, Developments in the Economy of the Occupied Palestinian Territory, p. 16.

[528] EIU (Economist Intelligence Unit), Country Profile, Israel, The Occupied Territories, 1999–2000, p. 66.

[529] EIU, Country Profile, Israel, The Occupied Territories, 1998–99, p. 58; IMF, The Economy of the West Bank and Gaza Strip (Washington, D.C., 1998), p. 13.

[530] Farsakh, p. 29.

[531] Yinon Cohen and Yitchak Haberfeld, “Israelian Labor Migration,” in Mohammad Shtayyeh (ed.), Labor Migration: Palestine, Jordan, Egypt and Israel (Jerusalem: Palestine Center for Regional Studies, 1998), p. 110.

[532] Kav LaOved is a non-profit organization committed to the defense and protection of workers employed in Israel.

[533] Data provided by Ms. Hanna Zohar, the manager of Kav LaOved.

[534] UNSCO, ENSCO Report on Economic and Social Conditions in the West Bank and Gaza Strip (Gaza, April 30, 1999), p. 3.

[535] PCBS, Labour Force Survey, Annual Report: 1998, p. 24.

[536] By late 1999, 4.2 N1S was equal to one USS.

[537] PCBS, Labour Force Survey, Annual Report: 1998, p. 23; IMF, West Bank and Gaza Strip: Economic Developments in the Five Years Since Oslo (Washington, D.C., 1999), p. 52.

[538] IMF, West Bank and Gaza Strip: Economic Developments in the Five Years Since Oslo, p. 55; UNSCO, UN SCO Report on Economic and Social Conditions in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, pp. 1,21, table 11.

[539] Sara Roy, “De-Development Revisited: Palestinian Economy and Society Since Oslo,” Journal of Palestine Studies 28 (3) (Spring, 1999): 80.

[540] Ahmad H. Hammouda, “Demographic Aspects of Unemployment in Jordan,“Dirasat Sukaniyya [Population Studies] 53 (April/June 1980): 19, table 2.

[541] WB, World Tables, 1989 90 edition (Baltimore and London: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1990), pp. 332–3.

[542] al-Dustur (Amman), March 24, 1981 (in Arabic).

[543] The Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan, Department of Statistics, Statistical Yearbook — 1989 (Amman, 1990), p. 83, table 4/2/3.

[544] HRD base Ltd., Lloyds Bank Chambers. Socio-Demographic Profiles of Key Arab Countries (Newcastle, May, 1987), pp. 44–5, tables 3.2 and 3.3.

[545] Jordan Times (Amman), 1–2 September 1989.

[546] Eliyahu Kanovsky, “Jordan’s Economy: From Prosperity to Crisis,” Occasional Papers (Tel Aviv University, The Moshe Dayan Center for Middle Eastern and African Studies), No. 106 (May, 1989), p. 41.

[547] MEED (Middle East Economic Digest), August 14, 1992, p. 19; Nicholas Van- Hear, “The Impact of Involuntary Mass ‘Return[1] to Jordan in the Wake of the Gulf Crisis,” International Migration Review 29 (2) (1995): 364–9.

[548] Jordan Times, October 14, 1991.

[549] Jordan Times, October 1, 1995; EIU, Country Profile, Jordan, 1995196, pp.13–14.

[550] Jordan Economic Monitor (August 1998), p. 4.

[551] Jordan Times, November 18, 1999.

[552] Jordan Economic Monitor (August 1998), p. 4.

[553] Jordan Times, December 28, 1999; Tayseer Abdel-Jaber, “Jordanian Labor Migration: Social, Political and Economic Effects,” in Mohammad Shtayyeh (ed.). Labor Migration: Palestine, Jordan, Egypt and Israel (Jerusalem: Palestine Center for Regional Studies, 1998), p. 94.

[554] Reuters, July 19, 1998.

[555] See, for example, Sulayman Halaf and Saad al-Kobaisi, “Migrants’ Strategies of Coping and Patterns of Accommodation in the Oil-rich Gulf Societies: Evidence from the UAF,” British Journal of Middle Eastern Studies 26 (2) (November 1999): 271–98; MEED. April 5, 1996, p. 56.

[556] See, for example, Yedi’ot Aharonot (Tel Aviv), January 4, 2000 (in Hebrew).

[557] Bank of Israel, Annual Report — 7999, p. 57.

[558] IMF, West Bank and Gaza Strip: Economic Developments in the Five Years Since Oslo, p. 51.

[559] EIU, Country Profile, Israel, The Occupied Territories, 1999–2000, p. 75.

[560] IMF, West Bank and Gaza Strip: Economic Developments in the Five Years since Oslo, p. 47.

 25. How the Palestinian and Israeli-Jewish Publics Perceive the Issues

Ephraim Yuchtman-Yaar and Tamar Hermann

As a consequence of the 1948–9 Israeli-Arab war, some 750,000 Palestinians became homeless refugees, scattered in various countries, mostly in the Middle East. During the half century since then, their number has increased to about 3.5 million.[561] Some of these refugees, like those who sought refuge in Jordan, have been integrated, at least formally, in the hosting society. Others have looked for individual solutions through immigration to richer and more hospitable countries, largely in the West. However, most of the refugees and their descendants are still living in separate communities, or rather enclaves, within the confinement of “refugee camps,” typically under difficult economic, social, and political conditions.

Given these circumstances, there is little doubt that the problem of the Palestinian refugees will be one of the major issues on the agenda of negotiations between Israel and the Palestinian Authority toward the achievement of a lasting peaceful solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Evidently because of its importance and complexity, this problem was one of the few issues that the Declaration of Principles (DoP) in the Oslo Accords deferred to the final status negotiations between the two sides. Indeed it is not too hard to imagine that the Israelis and Palestinians will come to the negotiating table with opposing views on how to solve the problem of the refugees, particularly in light of their differing narratives about its origins. From the Palestinian perspective, all the refugees are entitled to return to their original homes and places of residence. This view is supported by the United Nations which, already in December 1948, decided that: “Refugees wishing to return to their homes and live at peace with their neighbors should be permitted to do so at the earliest practicable date ... ”[562] From the Israeli viewpoint, this demand is not acceptable on at least two grounds: first, Israel maintains that the return of such a large number of Palestinians would virtually amount to its destruction as a Jewish state. Secondly, according to the Israeli narrative, the burden of responsibility for the creation of the refugee problem and its continuation over time lies mainly with the Palestinians themselves, and with the Arab world as a whole. This view stands in sharp contrast to the Palestinian narrative according to which the Israeli forces forcibly expelled most of the Palestinians from the towns and villages taken by Israel during the war of 1948, thus turning them into homeless refugees.[563]

It is reasonable to expect that the sentiments and attitudes of the Palestinian and Israeli-Jewish publics on the refugee issue are largely compatible with the views of their respective political leaderships. After all, in situations of protracted conflict, each nation tends to construct a collective memory in a way that supports its righteousness with regard to the origins of the conflict and its evolution over time. In other words, in such situations it is hard to find objectivity, even among professional historians, particularly when it comes to accounts about the role of “our” nation vis-a-vis the depiction of the other side. Accordingly, we anticipate that the large majority of the Palestinian public puts the entire blame of the refugee problem and the responsibility for its solution on Israel. In contrast, the Israeli public sees the problem as an inevitable consequence of the Arab policies since 1947 and, therefore, as an internal Palestinian- Arab responsibility.

Notwithstanding the assumption that the Israelis and Palestinian publics have adopted a unilateral approach to the refugee problem, it seems reasonable to expect some systematic differences between them with respect to the degree of uniformity and divergence in their attitudes. Specifically we suggest that the Palestinian views on the refugee problem are likely to be more uniform and slanted in comparison to the Israelis on the following grounds.

First, regardless of the question of responsibility for the problem, the fact remains that the Palestinian refugees were the ultimate losers and victims of the 1948 war. The suffering caused by their dislocation and its prolongation, coupled with the continuous economic and social progress made by the Israelis, the victors and beneficiaries of that war, makes it difficult for the Palestinians to view their predicament in a detached way. In other words, individuals and groups in agony cannot afford the luxury of empathizing with the other side, particularly when the latter is perceived as the perpetrator of their predicament.

Secondly, the Palestinians are still in the early stages of their struggle for national independence. History has taught us that under such circumstances, the desire to achieve the ultimate national goal supersedes all other considerations and discourages internal cleavages as well as tolerance for divergence and pluralism. In this respect, the Palestinian society of today is reminiscent of the Israeli society in the years prior to the achievement of independence and even in later years, when the political culture under the hegemony of the labor movement showed little tolerance for nonconformity. Israeli society has come a long way since then, becoming politically more pluralistic and open to dissent, including the voice of those who challenge the Zionist principles on which Israel was established.

Taken together, these considerations have at least two potential implications: On the one hand, the Israeli and the Palestinian publics should be expected to have dissimilar, if not sharply contrasting, views about the causes of the Palestinian refugees problem and its solution. On the other hand, the views of the Israeli public on these issues are likely to be less uniform and less unidirectional in comparison with the attitudes of the Palestinian public. Aside from the theoretical interest in testing these hypotheses, it must be realized that the assessment of public opinion with regard the problem of the refugees, as well as the other controversial issues between the Israelis and the Palestinians, is also significant for practical reasons. In both societies public opinion plays an important role in policy-making in two complementary ways: First, it provides vital input to the process of negotiations between the two sides; second, it serves as the ultimate test of legitimacy for whatever peace accord they may reach.

 Methodology

In order to examine the attitudes of the Israeli and Palestinian publics on the refugees' problem, we have used empirical data based on personal interviews with adult respondents (age 18 and above), who constitute representative samples of the Israeli and Palestinian populations in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. The Israeli respondents (N — 1000) consisted of two groups: Jews (N = 500) and Arabs (N = 500). The Jewish respondents were contacted by means of telephone interviews while the Israeli Arabs and the Palestinians (N = 1200) were interviewed face to face. The surveys were held a few days apart, during the second half of October 1999. The questions were formulated jointly by Ephraim Yuchtman-Yaar and Tamar Herman of the Tami Steinmetz Center for Peace Research at Tel Aviv University, Ghassan Hatib and Jamil Rabah of the Jerusalem Media and Communication Center, and by Elia Zureik of Queen's University, Canada. In this chapter our analysis concentrates on the comparison between the attitudes of the Israeli Jews and the Palestinians. However, in the tables presenting the empirical findings, the responses of the Israeli Arabs are also included. The reader may notice from these tables that, with a few exceptions, the attitudes of the Israeli Arabs are very similar to those of the Palestinians.[564]

The questions discussed in this chapter pertain to four principal aspects of the refugee’s problem, as follows:

1. The relative importance of this problem vis-a-vis other issues pertaining to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

1. Perceptions concerning responsibility for the creation of the problem.

1. Views on how the problem should and should be resolved.

1. Evaluations concerning the scale of the problem.

 Empirical Findings

* The importance of the refugee problem

Our first set of findings pertains to the importance of the refugee issue in the eyes of the Israelis and Palestinians in comparison with other outstanding issues discussed within the peace-negotiating framework. Respondents were presented with a list of six such issues and asked to indicate which they considered to be the most important, the second most important and third most important (table 25.1).

Table 25.1 reveals that the future status of Jerusalem is clearly the most important issue for Israelis and Palestinians alike. In fact, compared with all the other issues, Jerusalem forms a league of its own, surpassing them by a wide margin. Thus, 48.4 percent of Israelis and 51.0 percent of Palestinians consider it to be the most important issue, whereas the highest percentages for other issues chosen as the most important are 13.8 and 15.8 percent among the Israelis and Palestinians, respectively. Another way to assess the importance of the six subjects is obtained by calculating an overall score for each of them, based on the weighted frequencies of the first, second, and third choices.[565] Accordingly, Jerusalem received scores of 64.0 among the Israeli and 67.2 among the Palestinians, whereas its nearest rivals obtained respective scores of 27.2 and 34.4.

Notwithstanding the binational consensus on the centrality of Jerusalem, table 25.1 also points to significant gaps between the Israeli and Palestinian respondents regarding the importance of some of the other issues. As can be seen, the largest gap pertains to the refugees' issue. Among the Palestinians it ranks third as a first priority, and second to Jerusalem in terms of overall scoring (34.4); whereas among the Israelis, its importance is ranked next to last as a first choice and the very last in terms of overall scoring (17.5).

Taken together, these results seem to be consistent with the assumption that the Israeli and Palestinian publics tend to follow the priorities allotted to the various issues by their national political authorities. Thus both the Israeli and Palestinian leaders never fail to emphasize that Jerusalem is a coveted city for their own nation and that no peace agreement can be achieved unless their (contrasting) demands with regard to the future political and religious status of Jerusalem are fully satisfied. However, while the Palestinian leadership has also repeatedly raised the issue of the Palestinian refugees, Israelis officials as well as the Israeli mass media have usually said little about it. These observations suggest that the importance of the refugee problem in the mind of the Israeli public may increase to the extent that it will become a salient subject in the peace negotiations between the two sides.

* Who is responsible for the problem?

During the last decade there has been an ongoing debate among Israeli historians and sociologists as to the historical events that caused the refugee problem in the first place. According to the traditional Israeli version, the Table 25.1 In your opinion, which of the following issues are the three most important for the two sides to find an agreeable solution to?

| The most important issue | Palestinians (%)
n = 1200 | Israeli Jews (%)
n = 500 |

| Palestinian state | 15.8 | 13.8 |

| Jerusalem | 51.0 | 48.4 |

| Borders | 4.8 | 12.1 |

| Refugees | 9.3 | 5.2 |

| Water | 5.5 | 6.4 |

| Jewish settlements | 10.4 | 4.6 |

| Other | — | 2.8 |

| No answer + don’t know | 3.2 | 6.6 |

| The three most important issues (weighted scores based on the frequencies of the 1st 2nd & 3rd choice) | Palestinians
n = 1200 | Israeli Jews
n = 500 |

| Palestinian state | 27.3 | 27.2 |

| Jerusalem | 67.2 | 64.0 |

| Borders | 16.7 | 28.6 |

| Refugees | 34.4 | 17.5 |

| Water | 14.6 | 17.7 |

| Jewish settlements | 31.0 | 20.8 |

| Other | — | — |

| No answer + don’t know | 7.0 | 17.2 |

Palestinians who left Israel during the war of 1948 war did so voluntarily, either on their own initiative or under the influence of Arab leaders who encouraged them to leave. Those who support this version argue that at least in some places, notably Haifa, the local Arabs left their home despite attempts made the local Jewish leadership to convince them to stay. Thus by this account, many left their homes because of fears of reprisal by Israeli forces and general mistrust of the Jewish community, while others were led to believe that their departure was only temporary and they would be able to return home following the expected Arab victory. In contrast to this interpretation, some of Israel’s “new historians,” such as Benny Morris and Ilan Pappe,[566] have argued that a sizable number of Palestinians were forced to leave their homes in 1948 by Israeli troops, either because of security reasons or broader political considerations. To what extent have such criticisms of the Zionist narrative gone beyond the circle of intellectuals and affected the rank and file of the Israeli public? Some evidence about the answer to this question is given in the results presented in tables 25.2 and 25.3.

Turning first to the answers of the Palestinians respondents, it can be seen from table 25.2 that a large majority among them (59%) attributes the origins of the refugee problem to expulsion by Israeli forces. By contrast, only 4 percent believe that the refugees left of their own initiative and 6 percent believe that they were encouraged to leave their homes by Arab leaders. Of the remaining respondents, nearly 20 percent see the cause of the problem as a combined effect of expulsion, encouragement by Arab leaders (15.4%), or voluntary departure (3.3%). In other words, about 78 percent of the Palestinians blame Israel for the refugee problem, either exclusively or in combination with other factors. As for the Israeli respondents, table 25.2 indicates that their attitudes on this issue are considerably more evenly distributed. While 30 percent of this group believe that the refugees left of their own free will, an almost equal number of 31 percent accept the view that they were forced to leave by the Israeli army. Of the remaining respondents, about 17 percent blame the Arab leadership, while 23 percent could not identify the main cause for the creation of the problem.

Table 25.2 What caused the 1948 Palestinian refugee problem in the first instance?

	Palestinians n = 1200	Israeli Jews n = 500
Mainly, the refugees left voluntarily	4.0	29.9
Mainly, the refugees were told to leave by Arab leaders	5.9	17.3
Mainly, Jewish Forces expelled the refugees	59.0	31.0
Mainly, the refugees were told to leave by Arab leaders + Jewish forces expelled the refugees	15.4	2.6
Mainly, the refugees left voluntarily + Jewish forces expelled the refugees	3.3	2.5
Mainly, the refugees left voluntarily + Arab leaders	—	—
Others	5.8	4.7
No answer + don’t know	6.6	23.3

These results are highly consistent with our initial hypotheses regarding Israeli and Palestinian attitudes on the refugee issue. On the one hand, both sides tend to view this issue according to their own national perspective and place the blame on the other side. On the other hand, while the tendency of one-sidedness is highly pronounced among the Palestinians, the Israelis display a more even distribution of opinions, as nearly one-third of them depart from the conventional Israeli position and, in effect, accept the Palestinian view on this problem. The extent to which the attitudes of this group were influenced by the debate raised by the “new historians” is of course unknown. Nevertheless, it appears that their critical approach to the circumstances surrounding the origins of the refugees’ problem is shared by a significant number of Israelis. Also noteworthy to observe in this context is that nearly one-quarter of the Israeli respondents (23.3%) could not tell who was responsible for the problem.

We have used a somewhat different way to explore the views of the Israeli and the Palestinian interviewees on the question of responsibility for the refugees' problem on the basis of the following question: "There are different opinions as to who is responsible for the refugee problem in 1948, the Israelis or the Arabs?" The figures pertaining to the respondents' answers to this question are given in table 25.3.

Table 25.3 There are different opinions on the question who is responsible for the creation of the refugee problem in 1948, Israel or the Arabs. In your opinion, who is the responsible side?

| | Palestinians
n = 1200 | Israeli Jews
n = 500 |

| Only Israel | 17.1 | 4.8 |

| Mostly Israel | 32.8 | 7.0 |

| Israel and the Arab side to the same extent | 42.6 | 35.0 |

| Mostly the Arab side | — | 22.2 |

| Only the Arab side | 3.7 | 21.1 |

| No answer + don't know | 3.8 | 9.9 |

As can be seen from table 25.3, each side clearly avoids accusing its own nation as culpable: Among the Palestinian respondents, only 3.7 percent place the entire blame on their other side, while the comparable figure for the Israelis is 4.8 percent. Nevertheless, relatively high proportions of Israeli (35%) and Palestinian (42.6%) respondents also avoid putting the entire blame on the other side, believing the Israeli and Arab sides to be equally responsible for the problem.[567] These findings suggest that sizable numbers of Israelis, as well as Palestinians, do not accept their own national narrative about the historical circumstances underlying the emergence of the refugee problem.

 Solutions for the Problem

We have examined the attitudes toward various aspects of potential solutions to the refugee problem. The first aspect concerns the possibility of allowing the refugees to resettle in their original places of residence within Israel. Three approaches to this idea of solution were distinguished: (I) Implementation of the right of return for all refugees according to UN Resolution 194. (2) Allowing the return of a limited number of refugees, while compensating the others on the basis of a negotiated agreement between Israel and the Palestinians. (3) Giving Israel the right to decide who should be allowed to return and compensation to those who do not return. Respondents were asked to express their opinions about these possibilities in two ways: first, which they considered as the most just solution and, second, which one was perceived as the most feasible solution “under the present circumstances.” The results for the two questions are given in tables 25.4 and 25.5.

Table 25.4 Which of the following solutions to the refugee issue is most just in your opinion?

| | Palestinians
n = 1200 | Israeli Jews
n = 500 |

| The solution should be based on 194 UN Resolution which calls for the right of return to all the Palestinian refugees and compensation to those who do not return. | 81.7 | 4.5 |

| The return of a limited number of Palestinian refugees to Israel and a suitable compensation for those who do not return, this should be decided by negotiations between Israel and Palestinians | 11.0 | 14.9 |

| Only those who are approved by Israel should be allowed to return and compensation for those who do not return | 2.9 | 56.8 |

| None of the above is just | — | 12.7 |

| Other answers | 0.3 | 6.2 |

| No answer + don’t know | 6.6 | 23.3 |

Looking first at the distribution of respondents' opinions regarding the three solutions as per the criterion of justice, it can be seen that they are very slanted in both groups and in the expected direction. The large majority of the Palestinians regard the right of return to all refugees as the most just solution, whereas among the Israelis a clear majority considers as most important just the return of only those refugees that will be approved by Israel. However it should be noted that the size of the majority that favors the Palestinian view among the Palestinian respondents (81.7%) is much larger than the size of the majority of Israelis (56.8%) who support the conventional Israeli view. At the same time, only an insignificant minority on each side accepts the idea of justice as expressed by the majority of the other side. In other words, the Israelis and the Palestinians are in almost total disagreement on the meaning of justice as regards the solution for the refugee's problem.

Is there a difference between considerations of justice and reality in regard to the solution of the refugees' problem? Comparing the findings of tables 25.4 and 25.5, it appears that some Israelis and Palestinians make a distinction between the ideational and practical levels. Thus, only 63.6 percent of the Palestinians believe that the solution involving the return of all the refugees is most feasible — a significant decrease in comparison to 81.7 percent who see it as the most just solution. Similarly, barely one-half of the Israeli respondents (50.8%) consider the solution based on Israel's exclusive right to approve who should return as most practical. However, the figures shown in table 25.5 also indicate that the two sides are quite far apart from each other even when taking into account the dimensions of feasibility.An issue intimately related to the debate over the principle of the right of return is the question of how many refugees should be allowed to return, if at all. The answers given to this question by the Israeli and Palestinian respondents in effect show very large discrepancies between the two groups, as can be seen from table 25.6.

Table 25.5 Under the present circumstances, which of the following solutions looks most feasible to you?

| | Palestinians
n = 1200 | Israeli Jews
n = 500 |

| The solution should be based on 194 UN Resolution which calls for the right of return to all the Palestinian refugees and compensation to those who do not return. | 63.6 | 4.7 |

| The return of a limited number of Palestinian refugees to Israel and a suitable compensation for those who do not return, this should be decided by negotiations between Israel and Palestinians | 18.8 | 20.8 |

| Only those who are approved by Israel should be allowed to return and compensation for those who do not return | 6.4 | 50.8 |

| None of the above is possible | — | 10.6 |

| Other answers | 0.4 | 5.9 |

| No answer + don’t know | 10.8 | 7.2 |

An overwhelming majority of the Palestinians (79.6%) believe that any refugee wishing to return should be permitted to do so. Among the Israeli respondents only 11.5 percent agree to this right, while the rest hold the opinion that none should be allowed to return (42.7%) or that this opprtu-nity should be limited to a few hundred (21.9%) or a few thousand (10.7%) only. A complementary picture is obtained regarding the question of where the refugees should be permanently settled (see table 25.7). Whereas 53.8 percent of the Palestinians maintain that the right place for this purpose should be their original homes inside Israel, a similar percentage of Israelis (57.2%) hold the view that the refugees should be settled mainly in their present locations in Arab countries or in some other places. Interestingly, almost identical percentages of Israelis (32.3%) and Palestinians (29.7%) believe that the main permanent place of settlement should be inside the territory of the future Palestinian state.

The last aspect examined by us, related to the question of a solution, concerns the issue of compensation. While it is generally agreed, also in Israel, that any way of solving the refugees’ problem involves financial compensation, the question of who should carry this burden remains unanswered. We expected that, similar to the other aspects of solution, the Israeli and Palestinian views would differ greatly. However, granted that the issue of compensation involves practical considerations, in addition to its moral dimension, it seems reasonable to expect that responsibility for this endeavor will be allocated among several sources by the Israeli and Palestinian respondents alike. The extent to which this proposition is empirically supported can be seen from the figures shown in table 25.8.

Table 25.6 What is the number of refugees who should be allowed to return?

| | Palestinians
n = 1200 | Israeli Jews
n = 500 |

| None should be allowed to return | 1.3 | 42.7 |

| Few hundreds should be allowed to return | 3.1 | 21.9 |

| Few thousands should be alllowed to return | 10.8 | 10.7 |

| Anyone wishing to return should be allowed to return | 79.6 | 11.5 |

| No answer + don’t know | 5.2 | 13.1 |

The findings presented in table 25.8 indicate that the large majority of Palestinians hold the view that Israel should compensate the refugees. However, relatively few of them (21%) believe that Israel should do so exclusively. This percentage is just slightly higher than the percentage of Israelis who hold the same view (17%). In fact, the majority of Palestinians believe that responsibility for compensation should be shared between Israel and other sources, including international bodies, such as the United Nations, as well as Arab governments. The main difference between the Israeli and Palestinian respondents is that the former tend to exclude Israel from this obligation and to put the burden of compensation on international bodies, the United States, and Arab governments.

Table 25.7 Where should the Palestinian refugees be resettled permanently?

| | Palestinians
n = 1200 | Israeli Jews
n = 500 |

| Mainly in their original homes inside Israel | 53.8 | 5.3 |

| Mainly in places inside the Palestinian State | 29.7 | 32.3 |

| Mainly in the Palestinian state and inside Israel | — | — |

| Mainly they should be resettled in their present locations in the Middle East or anywhere else | 7.3 | 57.2 |

| No answer + don’t know | 9.2 | 5.2 |

Table 25.8 Who should compensate the refugees?

| | Palestinians
n = 1200 | Israeli Jews
n = 500 |

| Noone | 1.8 | 17.0 |

| Israel | 21.0 | 18.3 |

| International bodies such as the UN | 13.9 | 41.3 |

| Arab governments | 5.5 | 29.9 |

| US | — | 11.4 |

| Israel + others | 47.4 | 10.3 |

| Israel and US | — | 2.9 |

| International bodies such as the UN + US | — | 5.6 |

| Arab governments + us | — | 3.9 |

| Other combinations | 6.5 | 8.2 |

| Any combination of the above (indicate which ones) | — | — |

| No answer + don’t know | 9.2 | 5.2 |

 The Scale of the Problem

At the beginning of this chapter we observed that the numbers of the original and the current Palestinian refugees are still being debated, with the estimates varying among Israeli, Palestinian, or UN sources. Given these differences, it seems relevant to find out to what extent the estimates of ordinary Israelis and Palestinians come close to the figures given by their own sources. This question may be relevant because, among other things, such estimates may affect the public attitudes on various aspects of a solution, such as place of resettlement and financial compensation. On the basis of our initial assumptions concerning the fundamental asymmetry between the Israelis and the Palestinians, we have hypothesized that the Israelis would be inclined to underestimate the actual number of refugees for at least two reasons. First, being less involved and concerned with the problem, they are probably less motivated to acquire knowledge of its scale. Moreover, as noted earlier, unlike its centrality in the daily life and public agenda of the Palestinians, little attention has been paid to the problem of the refugees in the Israeli society. Secondly, the Israeli public generally tends to mistrust the Arab sources under the belief that their figures concerning the number of refugees are exaggerated for political reasons.

Table 25.9 What do you think is the overall number of the Palestinian refugees today? (The term Palestinian refugees refer to those who left or were forced to leave their homes because of the 1948 war and their descendants).

| Up to one million | 11.1 |

| 1–2 million | 18.3 |

| 2–3 million | 18.0 |

| 3–4 million | 18.7 |

| 4 or more | 19.5 |

| No answer + don’t know | 14.4 |

Table 25.9 presents the figures provided by the respondents of both groups in response to the following question:

The two distributions of the estimated numbers of refugees generally confirm the hypothesis that the Israeli public tends to underestimate these numbers or to have no knowledge of them. Thus 31.7 percent of the Israeli respondents believe that there are less than one million refugees, while 37.3 percent have no idea of what is the right number. The comparable figures for the Palestinians are 11.1 percent and 14.4 percent. However, despite these differences, it is difficult to avoid the observation that a significant number among the Palestinians themselves tend to underestimate the current number of the refugees. Keeping in mind the figures of 3.5 million refugees, as given by the agencies of the United Nations, and of 4 to 5 million, according to various Palestinian estimates, the estimates given by the Palestinian respondents are somewhat perplexing. Nearly one-half of them (47.4%) believe that the number of refugees is less than 3 million, and about 30 percent think that this number is even less than 2 million. These results suggest that our initial hypothesis regarding the bias in the estimation of the number of the Palestinian refugees should be refined and elaborated. Specifically, it would be of both theoretical and practical interest to find out why the Palestinian public tends to underestimate the current number of Palestinian refugees.

 Concluding Comments

The overall conclusion that can be drawn from the results that we have presented is that the perceptions of the Israelis and Palestinians with regard to the origins of the refugee problem and its modes of solution are generally in wide disagreement. We have also found that the distribution of the Israeli’s attitudes toward various aspects of the problem tend to be somewhat more varied and less slanted as compared with the attitudes of the Palestinians, consistently with our a priori considerations.

Nevertheless, from a practical viewpoint, the main lesson from these results is that both the Israeli and Palestinian publics tend to view this problem from the perspective of their own national narrative and in accordance with their own national interests. Consequently, assuming that the Israeli and Palestinian leaderships will make genuine efforts to reach an agreement on this issue in the framework of peace negotiations, and granted that such an agreement will be based on some forms of compromise, both sides will still have the difficult task of convincing their own constituencies that the agreement is worthwhile and serves the interests of their nations. In order to achieve this purpose, the Israeli government should bring to the mind of its own public the plight of the refugees and the role that Israel has to fulfill in solving their problem. Similarly, the Palestinian authority should inform the Palestinian public about the Israeli needs, particularly with respect to its perspective on the risks involved in the implementation of the “right of return.”

[561] These figures are based on United Nations sources. Estimates by Arab sources are typically higher while those of Israeli sources tend to be lower.

[562] United Nations General Assembly Resolution 194 (III) of December ll, 1948.

[563] For a detailed account of the Israeli and Palestinian positions on the problem of the refugees and its solution, see: Alpher Joseph and Shikaki Khalil, 1998: The Palestinian Refugee Problem and the Right of Return, Paper No. 98–7. Program on International Conflict Analysis and Resolution, Weatherhead Center for International Affairs, Harvard University. For different individual perspectives on the refugee problem also see the special issue of the Palestinian-Israel Journal 11 (4) 1995.

[564] Dr. Zureik has written a report entitled “Public Opinion and Palestinian Refugees,” submitted to the International Development Program, December, 1999, in which he analyzes in detail the attitudes of the three groups.

[565] Respondents were asked to indicate which of the six issue is the most important, the second most important and the third.

[566] For a short but a representative “new “historian” perspective, see Ilan Pappe, “The New History and Sociology of Israel: A challenge to the Old Version,” Palestine-Israel Journal 11 (3) (1995): 70–6. For a critical view of the “new historians” school, see Ephraim Karsh, Fabricating New History (London: Frank Cass, 1997). Also see Benny Morris, The Birth of the Palestinian Refugee Problem, 1947–1949 (Cambridge University Press, 1989).

[567] Due to a technical error, the answering category of “mostly the Arab side” was omitted in the Palestinian survey. For this reason the absolute figures of the two surveys are not directly comparable. For example, respondents who might have preferred the omitted category turned as an alternative choice to the adjacent middle category of equal responsibility.

 Concluding Remarks

Joseph Ginat and Edward J. Perkins

This volume consists of a collection of papers dealing with the issue of the Palestinian refugees from diverse angles. Some of the authors proceed to suggest practical solutions. The papers and proposals are written by Palestinian. Jordanian, Egyptian, Israeli, and American scholars, several of who claim that without Israeli acquiescence to the right of return there is no solution to the conflict at large. Others claim that Israel has to acknowledge the right of return without necessarily implementing it. Some proposals indicate that Israel must acknowledge the right of return, and the actual return of refugees would be to the Palestinian State. Several advise that Israel absorb a symbolic number of several tens of thousands of the refugees. Still other proposals focus on a method to compensate the refugees for their losses.

A study based on empirical fieldwork asserts that already three generations have been born in the refugee camps. The marriage patterns of these people show that some married spouses from refugees of different geographical areas. Others married spouses from the geographical area where they currently were living. Displacing them now would be the equivalent of uprooting them, and from a practical standpoint it would be an undesirable solution. The proposal suggests transforming the current refugee camps into modern towns, complete with infrastructure, various public buildings, and also industrial parks to provide them with work.

This book reflects a variety of proposals that must be brought to the governments in the region, especially to the Palestinian Authority and Israel, as well as to the countries who have hosted refugees since 1948. It must also be brought to the Secretary General of the UN, the European Union, and the United States Government. Any solution that will be agreed upon by the parties will also need the support of international financial resources.

The nature of our conference did not necessitate the arrival at one specific conclusion. Nevertheless it seems that this volume is a significant contribution not only to the academic community but can be a great help towards finding a solution to an enormous tragedy.

Usually books that are collections of papers are published several months or more after the conference. These concluding remarks are being written half a year after the beginning of the “Al-Aqsa Intifada,” or as the Palestinians call it. the “Second Intifada.” At the time of the conference, the participants did not foresee that the peace process would be put on hold by this Intifada, the consequences of which have been great tragedy. Neither did they expect that the Camp David Summit would end in uprising. We thought and emphasized that the two main stumbling blocks to be solved in the negotiations were and continue to be the status of Jerusalem and the Palestinian refugee issue. The breakdown of the talks proves not only were we right about the refugee issue, but also that this issue is even of more importance than the Jerusalem issue. According to US President Bill Clinton’s proposal, which was approved by Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak, Palestinian Chairman Yasser Arafat could receive sole sovereignty on the Temple Mount. When Yasser Arafat did not sign a peace treaty with Israel at Camp David, the Palestinian leader said that the proposal did not adequately deal with the refugee issue. Some Palestinian leaders said that had Yasser Arafat signed the proposed agreement without Israel recognizing the right of return in some form, he would have certainly lost his political power if not more than that.

In an interview to Maariv Magazine on April 13, 2001, James Rubin, who was a US State Department Spokesman, said that at Camp David Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak offered the Palestinians a fair deal. “Barak did exactly what the world thought he had to do,” said Rubin. However it appears that Rubin does not understand Arafat’s reaction. “Arafat, as a reflection of Palestinian public opinion embodies exactly its inherent contradictions. On one side there is realism towards Israel. Israel is here and is not going anywhere, and there is a need to find an end to the conflict. On the other hand there is a big anger and frustration that feeds the continuation of the struggle against Israel. These two ‘Arafats,’ the two ideologies of Arafat, contradict one another. And in this stage the struggle overrides the realism.” However, Rubin and in fact the entire Western World are puzzled that Arafat could have refused such a generous offer.

During the course of the summit, it was perceived that the Palestinian leadership was not yet disposed to demonstrate flexibility during negotiations. We surmise that the leadership of the Arab World had not assured Arafat of its continued support were he to take a more flexible stance. In contrast, the positions presented by Israel at the Summit are said to have been well received and to have been accorded support by the US hosts. The perception of the Palestinians as inflexible and the Israelis as forthcoming during the negotiations became the consensus view of many in the Western World following the breakdown of the talks. The authors of this book think differently. We believe that neither Arafat nor any other Arab leader could sign any accord, even one giving them Jerusalem, the Jordan Valley, and the Temple Mount, if it still lacks agreement on the refugee issue.

It seems that the reason many people do not understand that Arafat’s refusal of the Clinton proposal is related to the marginalization of the Palestinian refugee issue. From 1948 until 1967 the refugee issue had been at the top of the agenda, with a unified Arab demand for the right to return. Following the 1967 War the Palestinian public focus has shifted towards demanding self-determination. Moreover since the Oslo accords the emphasis has shifted almost entirely towards creating a Palestinian state.

On the other hand, the Palestinian refugees still living in scattered refugee camps cherish and preserve their Palestinian identity. When Ginat conducted his survey of the refugee camps in the West Bank, Gaza, Lebanon, and Jordan he discovered how even those refugees of the second and third generation identified with their village of origin. The hosting countries tried also to keep the distinction between the refugees and the general population, albeit not very successfully. When there are intermarriages, it is difficult for the governments to prevent assimilation. The authors of this volume believe that in Israel as well as in the Western World politicians are unable to comprehend how the issue of the right of return has not disappeared or become replaced by the issue of self- determination.

In an interview to Ma’ariv on April 6, 2001, Ami Ayalon, the former head of the Israeli Security Services (Shin Bet) said, “The basic issue is the Palestinian Diaspora. I claim that this subject is exactly the gap between an ideological versus pragmatic approach. We [the Israelis] must accept that they [the Palestinians] will always have the desire to return to Jaffa, to Ramie, to Lod, the same as we always would like to go to Nablus (Shekhem), Hebron, and Jericho. Jews always dreamt about the return to Jerusalem, where the Palestinians will always dream to go back to Jaffa. We must distinguish how to live with their dream, but on the other hand to stay rooted in reality. We are not allowed to try and erase their dream, we have to study how to live with it.”

The question is that if Israelis find a way to live with this dream, will that be enough to achieve a peace agreement. In the array of opinions presented here we see very clearly that the Palestinians and Arabs distinguish between the demand of Israel to recognize the right of return and actual return to within the boundaries of Israel. While it appears that there is no flexibility in their demands for the right of return, compounding this has been a consensus in Israeli policy and public opinion throughout the process against accepting that demand. On the April 22, 2001, the Israeli Minister of Defense Benjamin Ben-Eliezer stated that he is willing to make many concessions, but is not willing to allow Palestinian sovereignty on the Temple Mount or to recognize the Palestinian right of return. It should be indicated that Ben-Eliezer was a member of Ehud Barak's cabinet, where there was a different and even more conciliatory approach to the solution over the Temple Mount.

Over half a year has passed since the Intifada began. Unfortunately there seems little doubt that it will continue for more months, and there still looms the possibility of a costly escalation. Nevertheless, inevitably the Palestinians and Israelis will have to return to the negotiating table. We have to assume that when this day comes, the marathon approach utilized at Camp David will not be repeated. We anticipate that an incremental approach will take its place, and that such talks may well begin prior to a ceasefire, not withstanding the current official Israeli government position that talks cannot be held under fire. In reality there are talks, they are simply being defined as contacts designed at achieving a cease-fire.

The authors of this volume believe that the more dialogue, official or non-official negotiations, the sooner a cease-fire and ultimately a peace accord can be reached. When the sides reach the stage of official negotiations, the Palestinian refugee issue will be unavoidable. Neither Arafat nor any other Palestinian leader will be able or willing to avoid the issue of the Palestinian refugees. This volume has not come up with a single magical solution to the problem, yet as has been mentioned earlier, there are several serious proposals in this collection. To us, the authors of this book, it is clear that despite the difficulty for Israel, it is imperative to find a new formula designed to break the deadlock over the right of return. Many of us do not think that Israel must agree unconditionally to the Palestinian version dictating that Israel must recognize the right of return. Instead, there is a need for a creative formula that will include a constructive ambiguity allowing each of the sides to be satisfied by its own explanation. Perhaps this will include the proposal that Israel must absorb several tens of thousands of refugees.

Finally, the international community must begin organizing itself and prepare resources to facilitate the rehabilitation of the refugees. In any kind of solution, it does not appear that most of the refugees will move to the Palestinian state, so the issue of reparations is extremely significant. Similarly the issue of citizenship or dual citizenship of the refugees has to be resolved. A combination of a formula that will extract the sides from the current catch-22 and a willingness to absorb a symbolic number of refugees could be the key for the solution not only of the Palestinian refugee issue specifically but the conflict as a whole.

 Contributors

Taisir Amre is Director General of the Ministry of Economy and Trade of the Palestinian National Authority. He holds a doctorate in economics. He served as a member of the Quadripartite Committee concerning the issue of Palestinian displaced. He is the author of many papers in different fields and contributed to, The Jordanian-Palestinian-Israeli Triangle, Smoothing the Path to Peace and co-authored Introduction to the Palestinian Cause.

Rateb Amro is Director General and founder of Horizon Center for Studies and Research in Amman, Jordan. He was Director of the Occupied Territories of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. He is a retired colonel of the Jordanian Army Forces.

Donna E. Arzt is Professor of Law and Director of the Center for Global Law and Practice at Syracuse University College of Law, where she teaches human rights, refugee law and international criminal law. She is the author of Refugees into Citizens: Palestinians and the End of the Arab-Israeli Conflict (Council on Foreign Relations Press, 1997).

Abraham Badran is Director General, Department of Palestinian Affairs in Jordan. He is also Supervisor of the Human Rights Unit in the Prime Ministry. He has been head of the Jordanian delegation, Refugees Working Group, Multilateral Negotiations of the Middle East peace process.

Tahseen Basheer was press attache in the Egyptian mission to the UN during the Suez Crisis, special assistant to Minister of Information during the Nasser government, official spokesman for the Egyptian delegation at the Geneva Peace Conference December 1973, and official spokesman for President Anwar Sadat. He served as the Egyptian Ambassador to Canada. He then worked as the permanent representative of Egypt to the Arab League.

David L. Boren became the thirteenth president of the University of Oklahoma in 1994. Prior to coming to the University, he served in the US Congress as a senator from Oklahoma and earlier as governor of Oklahoma, the first person in history to hold all three positions. President Boren is widely respected for his longtime support of education, his distinguished career as a reformer of the American political system, and his innovations as a university president. A graduate of Yale University in 1963, he majored in American history, graduated in the top one percent of his class, and was elected to Phi Beta Kappa. He was selected as a Rhodes scholar and earned a master’s degree in politics, philosophy, and economics from Oxford University in 1965. In 1968, he received a law degree from the University of Oklahoma College of Law, where he was on the Law Review, elected to the Order of the Coif, and won the Bledsoe Prize as the outstanding graduate by a vote of the faculty. As a United States senator, Boren was the longest-serving chairman of the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence. Boren has served as a member of the Yale University board of trustees and as chairman of the Department of Political Science and chairman of the Division of Social Sciences at Oklahoma Baptist University. He is the co-editor of a book and the author of a number of published articles.

Munther S. Dajani currently teaches at Al-Quds University where he chairs the Department of Political Science and Diplomatic Studies. He is the coauthor of Economic Sanctions: Ideal and Experience, Economic Diplomacy: Embargo Leverage and World Politics, Politics: Theories and Concepts, Introduction to the Jordanian Political System, Research Methodology for Political Science, and Democracy and Pluralism.

Laura Drake is an adjunct Professor of International Relations at the American University, and a Middle East consultant specializing in the political-military affairs of the Arab-Israeli and Gulf area.

Dale F. Eickelman is Ralph and Richard Lazarus Professor of Anthropology and Human Relations at Dartmouth College (USA). His recent books include The Middle East and Central Asia: An Anthropological Approach, 4th edn. (Prentice Hall, 2002) and Muslim Politics (Princeton University Press, 1996), co-authored with James Piscatori.

Bahieldin Elibrachy is a lawyer educated in Egypt with advanced degrees from the United States. He is part of Ibrachy & Dermarkar Law Firm. He is a member of numerous professional, business and international organizations.

Kais M. Firro is Professor of History in the Middle Eastern Department at Haifa University. He is the author of Silk in Lebanon, 1860–1914, A History of the Druzes, and The Druze in the Jewish State: A Brief History.

Shlomo Gazit completed 33 years of service in the Israeli Defense Forces. Following the 1967 Six-Day War he served as coordinator of Israeli Government Operations in the occupied territories (1967–1974) and following the 1973 Yom Kippur War, he served as the IDF Director of Military Intelligence. Among his many writings on Israeli and Middle East strategic affairs are The Carrot and Stick (1985) and Trapped (1999) on Israel’s policy in the occupied territories as well as editing The Middle East Military Balance during the years 1990–1995.

Yoav Gelber is Professor of History, chairman of the School of History, Department of Land of Israel Studies and the Herzl Institute for Research and Study of Zionism, all at the University of Haifa.

Joseph Ginat is Professor of Social and Cultural Anthropology at Haifa University. He is a former chairman of the Israeli Academic Center in Cairo and a former chairman of the Jewish Arab Center at the University of Haifa. He is the director of the Center for Peace Studies at the International Programs Center at the University of Oklahoma. He is the author of many books and articles on Middle East.

Mohanna Haddad received his Ph.D. at the State University of Utrecht. His Ph.D. thesis was titled “Arab Perspectives of Judaism: A Study of Image Formation in the Writings of Moslem Arab Authors 1948–1978.” He holds the rank of professor at Yarmouk University, Irbid-Jordan. Professor Haddad has some six books published in Arabic and some 60 articles published in Arabic and English. He became the first professor from an Arab country to spend his sabbatical year at Israeli universities in 1999/2000.

His Royal Highness Prince El Hassan bin Talal born the son of King Talal bin Abdullah and Queen Zien El Sharaf, and the younger brother of his late majesty King Hussein, Prince El Hassan earned from Christ Church, Oxford University in England, a B.A. (Hon.) in Oriental Studies, followed by an M.A. He has been awarded many honorary degrees and prizes from around the world. His Royal Highness was officially invested as Crown Prince to the Hashemite Throne of Jordan in 1965 and served as King Hussein’s closest political adviser, confidant and deputy, as well as acting as Regent when the King was absent from the country. The Prince has initiated, founded and is actively involved in numerous Jordanian and international institutes and committees. Among his multiple prestigious international activities, he is the Co-Chair of the UN Independent Commission on International Humanitarian issues. He serves on the boards of many other UN organizations. His Royal Highness has honored the Center for Peace Studies by serving as Chairman of the Board of Advisors. The Center members are the Jordanian Horizon Center for Studies and Research, Haifa University, Bethlehem University, and the University of Oklahoma. In the field of religion his contacts and meetings have evolved into a systematic interfaith dialogue among Muslims, Christians and Jews; and in Jordan, he set up the Royal Institute for InterFaith Studies in 1994. He has promoted sports within the Kingdom. Prince El Hassan is the author of four books and has contributed to newpapers, and magazines. He is fluent in Arabic, English, and French, has studied Bibical Hebrew, and has a working knowledge of German, Spanish and Turkish.

Manuel Hassassian is Professor of International Politics and Relations and currently the Executive Vice President of Bethlehem University. His latest books are Palestine: Factionalism in the National Movement 1919–1939, (English) and The Historical Evolution of the Armenian Question and the Conflict over Nagorno Karabagh (English). He has published extensively in academic journals on the PLO, the peace process, democracy and elections. He is also the President of the Rectors' Conference at the Palestinian Ministry of Higher Education.

Mohamed Hawary is Professor of Hebrew and Jewish Studies, Department of Hebrew Studies, Faculty of Arts, Ain Shams University, Cairo, Egypt. He has been teaching Hebrew Language in the Dept, of Arabic Language at King Saud University, Riyadh, Saudi Arabia. He was a Visiting Fellow at the Center for Near Eastern Studies, UCLA and as a Fulbright Scholar, was Visiting Researcher at the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York. In addition he was a Visiting Fellow at Oxford Centre for Hebrew Studies.

Tamar Hermann is a senior lecturer in Political Science. She is the chair of the political science and sociology department in the Open University of Israel and the director of the Tami Steinmetz Center for Peace research, Tel Aviv University. Her main fields of academic research are public opinion and foreign policymaking, extra-parliamentary politics, and in particular, peace activism and conflict resolution theories and practices.

Menachem Klein is a senior lecturer in the Department of Political Science of Bar-Ilan University, Israel, and a Senior Research fellow at the Jerusalem Institute for Israel Studies. His latest books are Jerusalem: The Future of the Contested City and the forthcoming Breaking a Taboo: Negotiating Final Status Agreement on Jerusalem, 1994–2001 plus a number of articles on the PLO's policy and ideology, Jerusalem as a frontier city, and the ambivalent relationship between intellectuals and politicians.

Joshua Landis received his Ph.D. in Near Eastern Studies from Princeton and his Master's from Harvard. He grew up in Lebanon in the 1960s, taught there and attended the University of Damascus as a Fulbright-Hayes Scholar in the 1980s, and now teaches at the University of Oklahoma. His dissertation on Syria during the early independence era won MESA's Kerr prize in 1997, and he is presently working on a history of Syria from 1918 to the present for Oxford University Press.

Moshe Ma'oz is Professor of Islamic and Middle Eastern studies and former director of the Truman Research Institute for the Advancement of Peace at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. He has published several books and many articles on Middle Eastern issues, notably on Syrian and Palestinian history and politics, Arab-Israeli relations, and ethnic minorities.

Emanuel Marx is Professor Emeritus of Social Anthropology at Tel Aviv University. He has published widely on Bedouin in the Negev (Israel) and in Sinai (Egypt), on bureaucratic behavior and violence in an Israeli new town, and on Palestinian refugee camps.

Norma Masrieh-Hazboun holds a Ph.D. in Politics/Political Sociology from the University of Leeds, UK. She is presently the Chairperson of The Social Science Department at Bethlehem University. Her areas of specialization are refugees (mainly Palestinian), human rights, civil society, social movements, women and youth. She has published extensively on Palestinian refugees and the Palestinian society. She is actively involved as a board member or consultant in a number of institutes in the West Bank.

Don Peretz is Professor Emeritus of Political Science at the State University of New York (Binghampton). He is a former fellow of the Ford Foundation, the Rockefeller Foundation, and the US Institute of Peace. He is the author of Israel and the Palestine Arabs, The West Bank, and The Middle East Today (6th edn.). In 1949, he was a representative of the American Friends Service Committee with United Nations Relief for Palestine Refugees.

Edward J. Perkins is William J. Crowe Jr. Chair Professor of Geopolitics and executive director of the international Programs Center at the University of Oklahoma. Prior to his current position, he was appointed as US ambassador to the Commonwealth of Australia; US representative to the United Nations, with the rank and status of ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary; US representative in the UN Security Council; director general of the Foreign Service; US ambassador to Liberia; and US ambassador to South Africa. He received his B.A. from the University of Maryland and his M.P.A. and D.P.A. from the University of Southern California. Perkins has received numerous awards, including the Presidential Distinguished and Meritorious Service Awards and Kappa Alpha Psi Fraternity’s highest honor, the Laurel Wreath Award for Achievement and Distinguished Diplomatic Service. As ambassador to South Africa, he worked to end apartheid. Perkins is the co-editor of a book and has published numerous articles in his area of expertise.

Hussein Ramzoun is Assistant Professor at Alzaytounah University in Jordan. He had been a social researcher at the Ministry of Social Development.

Onn Winckler is lecturer in the Department of Middle Eastern History at the University of Haifa and Deputy Director of the Jewish-Arab Center, University of Haifa, Israel. His recent publications include Demographic Developments and Population Policies in Ba’thist Syria, Modern Syria: From Ottoman Rule to Pivotal Role in the Middle East as well as articles in other books and journals. His research specializes in the demographic and economic history of the modern Middle East.

Ephraim Yuchtman-Yaar is Professor of Sociology and former Dean of the Faculty of Social Sciences at Tel Aviv University. He is the current Head of the Tami Steinmetz Center for Peace Research and the incumbent of the Rapoport Chair in Sociology of Labor. In 1997, he was named the first recipient of the Special Fulbright Itzhak Rabin Award, for his academic achievements in the study of peace and democracy. He has had several books published as well as numerous articles in academic and intellectual journals. Since 1994, he writes a monthly column entitled “The Peace Index” for the Israeli daily, Ha’aretz.

 Index

<biblio>

Abdallah II, King, I In, 209, 218, 265

Abdel Rahman, As’ad, 203

Abdullah Ibn Hussein, King of Jordan annexation of Arab Palestine, 25, 154, 155

Arab-Israeli war (1948), 26

civil war (1947–8), 24

management of first Palestinian exodus, 268

Abram, Eliahu, 69, 76n

Abu Ah Mustafa, 201

Abu Aynain, 198, 201, 202, 209

Abu Mazin, 53

Abu Sitta, Salman, 165, 257

Abu Zayyad, Ziad, 122–3, 134n

Abu-A’yyash, Radwan, 51

Abu-Libdeh, Ghasan, 4

Abu-Lughod, Janet, 283

Abu-Sharif, Basam, 49

Abu-Sitteh, Salman, 214

Abul Haija, ‘Abdel-Karim, 165

Acre, 92, 93

Adelman, Howard, 173

Africa, refugee problems, 31

Ahad Ha’am, 277

al-Ahmad, Azzam, 206

‘Ajlun, 158

Alexander II, 170

Algeria, 187

Alpher, Joseph, 12/7, 141, 146

Amal militia, 195, 198

American civil war, 21

Amman Agreement (1985), 48

Amman Conference (1999), status of

Jerusalem, ix-x, I In Amman-Rusaifa, 158

Amre, Taisir, 8, 169–78

Amro, Rateb, 10, 264–70

Antonius, G., 154

Arab Higher Committee (AHC), civil war

(1947–8), 20, 22

Arab League

annexation of Arab Palestine by Transjordan, 25

Arab property losses, 95

Arab- Israeli war (1948), 25, 26 civil war (1947–8), 20–1, 22, 150

Israeli counter compensation, 210 refugee settlement in Syria, 81, 84 rejection of UN Partition Resolution, 19 responsibility of defending Palestine, 150

Arab Legion, 24, 25, 29, 154

Arab Liberation Army (ALA)

Arab-Israeli war (1948), 26, 27

civil war (1947–8), 20–1,22,24

Arab nationalism, 81, 85, 153, 155

Arab Peninsula states, 31

Arab Socialist Party, 81

Arab states

adoption of UN resolutions, 19, 32

Arab-Israeli war (1948), 19, 23, 25, 26

Israel’s responsibility for compensation, 88, 97, 99, 273

Jewish property in, 98

Jewish refugees, 98 9, 103–4, 109, 113, 115, 120,239

military expenditure, 262

reconciliation issues with Israel, 29 32, 278–80 refugee separation from indigenous population, 31

refugees, 40–2

refusals to recognize Israel, 32 resettlement of refugees, 55, I 18, 126, 209–12

right of return, 180–1

as source of compensation payments, 99

trade, 107

see also individual states

Arab-Israeli conflict

early US foreign policy, 77–8 ideological dimensions, 10, 275–81 salient features of, 276 8

Arab-Israeli war (1948), 5, 17–20, 23–4, 25–9

Arab armies invasion, 19, 23, 26, 29 armistice agreements (1949), 17, 29 revisionist historians, 18–19

Arab-Israeli wars, 57

Arafat, Yasser

Black September, 42

Camp David Summit, 318–19

Fatah forces in Ein al-Hilweh, 202

Iraq resettlement scenario, 206 location of refugees, 200

Palestinian diaspora suspicion of, 126 PLO in Lebanon, 194–5 refugees in Lebanon, 206 resettlement of refugees, 204 right of return, 49, 50, 51, 124, 212, 213, 214 support for Iraq during Gulf War, 290 territorial jurisdiction, 204 war of the camps, 195

archival material, 17

Argon, 171

Armenians, 21

armistice agreements (1949). 17, 29

Arnon. Arie, 288

Arzt, Donna E.

estimates of numbers of refugees, 257 Israeli gesture, 7, 122–38, 209 refugee citizenship, 145, 146, 211–12 resettlement of refugees, 208–9

‘Arub refugee camp, 142, 144

Ashkelon, 143

El-Asmar, Fouzi, 207

Athamna,‘Abdel-Basid, 151

Atlas of Palestinian Refugee Camps in

Jordan, 252

Australia, 129, 163, 164–5, 208, 219

Ayalon, Ami, 319

A yen al-Helua refugee camp, 198

Azeris, 21

Al-Azraq. 209

Badran, Abraham, 9–10, 255–63

Baghdad Pact, 79

Baker. James, 193

Balfour Declaration, 153, 170

Balkans, 21,31

Balqa. 157

Bangladesh, 38

Bank of Israel, 297

al-Baq’a refugee camp, 158, 159. 251, 265

Baqa’a, 74

Barak, Ehud

acceptance of Palestinian state. 261 Camp David Summit, 318

Canadian interest in absorbing refugees, 4 declaration on accepting refugees, 4 expressions of regret, 89, 110 family reunification, 4 four “No’s”, 180 right of return, 124, 216

South Lebanon security zone, 198

Barakat, Daoud, 212

Basheer, Tahseen, 10, 275–81

Ba’th Party, 81

Begin, Menahem, 170–1

Beishan, 152

Bellagio Conference (1998), x

Ben-Ami, Shlomo, 171, 175

Ben-Eliezer, Benjamin, 319–20

Ben-Gurion, David, 28, 30, 78, 79. 265

Ben-Porath, Mordechai, 103

Bernadotte, Folke, 35

Bethlehem University, x, 2

Bevin, Ernest, 79

The Birth of Israel (Flaban), 171

Bissan, 93

Black September, 42, 47, 155, 156

Blanford, Nicholas, 84

Bohdlander, Deborah, 208

borders, importance of in public opinion polls, 307

Boren, David, ix-xii

Bosnians, 21

Bouez, Faris, 205

Britain

Arabs dependence on for arms, 27 defense organization for Middle East, 78, 79,81

land holdings records, 91

Lausanne Conference, 78

Mandate period, 92–3, 153, 255

Palestinian-Jewish civil war (1947–8), 19, 21,24–5 refugee settlement in Syria, 79, 80–5

Brynen, Rex, 99, 102

Bucaille, Laetitia, 141 building structures, as compensation issue, 90, 93

Buwayz, Faris, 197

Cahana, Shamay, 102

Cairo agreements (1994), 68, 267

Camp David peace treaty, 30, 70

Camp David Summit, 318–19

Canada

addressing of refugee issue, 2 interest in absorbing refugees, 4

and Israel, 163

refugee citizenship, 125

Refugee Working Group (RWG), 65. 72

refugees in Lebanon, 205

resettlement of refugees. 129, 164 -5,208, 219

Canadian International Development Research Center, 97

Center for Peace Studies, ix-xii, 2–3, I \ n

Central Bureau of Statistics, 4

Chetnik refugees, 31

Christian churches, 164, 165

civil rights, 37

see also human rights

civil war (1947–8), 19–23, 24–5

characteristic tactics of, 20

Palestinian flight, 21–3

Clapp Mission, 96–7

Clinton, Bill, 4, 318

Cohen, Stephen, 214

Cold War, 77, 79, 85

Commission on Human Rights, 61,259

Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian

People, 2, 63–4

Committee of Experts on Compensation, 90–1 communism, western fear of, 78 compensation, 6–7

Amre’s proposals, 176–7

Arab view of Israel as responsible for, 88, 97, 99, 273 for building structures, 90, 93 determined by third party, 117

as distinct from reparations, 71

as final status negotiation, 102 forms of payment, 97–8 identification of property and non-material items, 90–3

as inalienable right, 37

individual versus collective, 71,96–8, 100,

103, 105, 112, 113, 114–15, 118, 120

Israeli compromise solution, 113, 114–15,

118, 120

Israeli responses, 39, 89–90, 96, 102–7, 239–41

Jewish refugees, 98–9, 113, 115, 120, 210, 272–3

Jordan, 116. 166

Khalidi’s recommendations, 71

for land, 90–3

Palestinian compromise solution, 111 12, 118, 120

as part of resettlement solution, 147, 210 for property, 90–5

public opinion, 312–14

recipients, 96–8

refugees in Jordan, 165–6

regional solution, 272–3 responsibility for, 88–90, 273 sources of payments, 99–100, l l 7, 262

Tamari’s recommendations, 71

UN Conciliation Committee, 35, 62,

90–1,96

UN Resolution 194 (1948), 36, 50. 62, 88, 96, 109–10, 255, 258,262

valuation of property and non-material items, 94–5

Council on Christian-Muslim Dialogue, 146

Croats, 21

Custodian of Jewish Property, 98

Cyprus, 106

Czechoslovakia, 31

Dajani, Munther S., 9, 242–8

Darwazeh, Mohammad, 188

Davidson, Ronald, 186

al-Dawalibi, Ma’ruf, 80

Dayan, Moshe, 184, 287–8

Dead Sea potash works, 98

Declaration of Independence, 48–9

Declaration of Principles (1993), 48, 52 effect on multilateral groups, 172 reaction from Syria and Lebanon, 195 references to refugees, 64 refugee question, 64, 70, 245 refugees as final status negotiation, 245, 303

right of return, 64, 70, 172, 176

see also Oslo Accords (1993)

Deir Yasin massacre, 152, 170–1

Department of Palestinian Affairs (DPA), 152 development agencies, 80

Dheisha refugee camp, 144

DPA, 152

Drake, Laura, 9, 200–29

East Bank, refugee numbers, 151, 152 economic cooperation and development, multilateral working groups, 65

Economic Social Council for West Asia (ESCWA), 286

Egypt

Arab nationalism, 81, 85

Arab-Israeli war (1948), 26

Camp David peace treaty, 30, 70 family planning policy, 298 freezing of Jewish property, 98 Jewish compensation, 272–3 land holdings records, 91 and Palestinian Jewish civil war, 19–26 quadrilateral standing committee, 52, 53, 64, 70, 72–3, 245

refugee citizenship, 29, 40

refugee settlement in Syria. 81, 85 refugees, 218, 223, 255 registration of 1967 refugees, 52–3 resettlement of refugees, 209, 273 4 security agreement with Israel, 236 territorial issues with Israel, 30

Eickelman, Dale F., 7–8, 139–49

Ein al-Hilweh refugee camp, 202, 203

El Salvador, 131

Elibrachy, Bahieldin, 10, 271 4

England, 163

environment, multilateral working groups,

65

Eran, Oded, 124

Ethridge, Mark, 78

Europe, war refugees, 23–4, 31, 172

European Union

aid to Palestinian Authority, 298

Refugee Working Group (RWG), 65

Export/Import Bank. 78, 80

Fadlallah, Hussein, 225/7

Fafo Institute for Applied Social Science. 2,

4. 12/7. 157, 158, 163

Faisal, Prince, 4–5

family planning policies, 298

family reunification, 54. 59, 145. 237

Barak’s declaration, 4

Israeli compromise solution, 113, 114.

115,120

OSCE documentation, 133

Oslo Accords (1993), 68

Palestinian compromise solution. 119

Refugee Working Group (RWG), 68–9, 73

Fanon, Franz, 184

Farsakh, Leila, 289

Fatah, 198,202

Fedayeen, 185

Feiler. Gil, 107

Fertile Crescent, 153

“Financing Palestinian Refugee

Compensation”, 99

Firro, Kais M„ 8, 193–9

Flaban, Simha, 171

France, 163,208,211

Futuwa, 20

Fuwar refugee camp, 144

Galicia, 31

Galilee

absentee property. 92

civil war (1947–8), 23

Gaza Strip

absorptive capacity of. 59

birthrate. 140. 284, 286

demography, 4, 282, 283–7, 290

employment trends, 287–93

international financing of projects, 195

Israeli resettlement policy, 8, 143–4, 179–92

Jewish settlements, 136-7/7, 145,214–17 labor force, 285, 286–7 movement of Palestinian citizens, 215

occupation by Israel, 29

opinion polls on right of return, 134/7

poverty, 4, 190/7

refugee separation from indigenous population, 31

refugees, 29, 35, 58, 141, 153, 204, 223–4. 255, 257

refugees displaced (1967), 52

right of return, 164

UN Resolutions, 258

unemployment rates, 285, 288, 290,

291–2

Gaza-Jericho first agreement. 267

Gazit. Shlomo. 9. 134/7, 233–41

cessation of UNRWA. 129

Israeli involvement in resettlement, 146

Israeli offer of moral compensation.

146–7

refugee camp representatives, 141 refugee compensation, 71, 89–90. 96.

239–41

refugee numbers, 141–2

regrouping of issue clusters geographi

cally, 204

right of return, 124, 235, 237

Gelber, Yoav, 5, 17–33, 110

Geneva Conventions. 37. 219

Georgians. 21

Germany

and Israel, 163

Jewish compensation, 176

refugee problems, 31

Volksdeutsche, 24

al-Ghuwayriyya, 159

Gilbar, Gad, x

Gilman, Benjamin. 208

Ginat. Joseph, ix-x. 1–13, 139–49, 317–20

Greater Syria, 153, 250

Greece, 106

Green Line. 30

Gulf Co-operation Council, 208

Gulf States

Palestinian workers, 289–90. 295–6

refugee citizenship. 40

Gush Etzion, 23. 24

Haaretz, 257

Habibi, Amirah, 154

Habitat for Humanity, 144

Hadawi, Sami, 90, 95

Haddad, Mohanna, 8, 150–68

Haganah

Arab-Israeli war (1948), 26–7. 28. 67

civil war (1947–8), 20, 21, 23, 24, 152

Haifa, 23,25, 152, 308

Haifa, University of, x, xi. 2

Hamas, 291

Hamilton, Lee, 208

Hammarskjold, Dag, 181–2

Haqq al-A\\‘da see right of return

al-Hariri, Rafiq, 197

Harvard University, 2, 12//, 105

El Hassan bin Talal, viii, x

Hassassian, Manuel, x, 6, 57 76

Hatib, Ghassan, 305

Hauran, 22

Hawary, Mohamed. 5, 34 45

Hawrani, Akram, 81

Hebron, 98

Heller, Mark A., 146

Hermann, Tamar, I 1, 303–16

al-Hinnawi, Sami, 80

Hirschon, Renee. 106

AH is t o ry’ of Is ra el i Pci les I in i an Con fli c t

(Tessier), 277

Hittin refugee camp, 159

Hnaikin refugee camp, 159

Holocaust, 89

Holy Fighters see Jihad al-Mukadas holy places, rights of visitation, 37

Horani, Hani, 151

Horizon C enter for Study and Research, x, 2–3 al-Hoss, Salim, 201,225/?

Hourani, Akram. 85

Housoun refugee camp. 251

El-Hout, Shafiq. 212–13

human rights

basic principles, viii. 249. 261

Commission on Human Rights. 61. 259

inalienable rights of refugees. 36–7. 48.

59–60, 67.213, 258–60, 271–4

International Covenant on Economic.

Social and Cultural Rights. 183. 259

PLO’s political-ideological trinity, 48

Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

37, 60, 259

see also compensation: right of return humanitarian assistance, right to, 37 al-Husaini, Faisal, 51

Al-Husn refugee camp. 159. 162. 251

Hussain Ben Ali, 153

Hussein bin Talal. King. 135/7. 264

Hussein. Saddam. 40. 50

Husseini family, 153 identity, sense of, 60. 153 7. 160 1. 184 ideological dimensions. 10.275 81

illiteracy, 4

IMF, 291.298

The Independent, 176

India

New Delhi Accord, 132

refugee problems, 31

Indyk, Martin, 206

Institute for Global Conflict and Cooperation, 2

Inter-Uni versit} Consortium for Arab

Studies, 2

International Bank, 80

International Conference on Human Rights (1968), 37

International Conference of World Jewish

Leaders, 51

International Court of Justice. 43

International Covenant of Civil and Political Rights, 259

International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, 183, 259

International Development Research

Centre. 2

International Monetary Fund (IMF). 291.

298

International Programs Center, xi

International Red Cross. 24. 36

Intifada. 156. 184. 186. 187. 290, 318. 320

Iraq

annexation of Arab Palestine by Transjordan, 25

Arabism, 153

domestic subversion, 25

freezing of Jewish property, 98 international embargo, 206. 295 Israeli compensation claims, 98 refugees, 41, 218 resettlement of refugees, 181, 200–1.

205–8.209.212,219,274

and Syria, 84. 85

Irbid, 158

Irbid refugee camp, 159.251

Irgtm Zvai Leumi (IZL), 25

Ismail, Hussein, 250

Israel

“100.000 proposal” (1949), 127–8, 176 absorption of Jewish refugees, 103–4.

109, 140, 239

admission to United Nations, 174 annexation of Jerusalem (1967), 32 Arab owned land, 90 3, 94–5, 104

Arab owned movable property, 93 4

Arab states refusal to recognise. 32

Arab Israeli war (1948), 5, 17–20. 23–4, 25–9

Arab Israeli wars. 57

Arabs regard as responsible for compensation, 88, 97, 99, 273 armistice agreements (1949), 29 attacks from PLO in Lebanon, 194 5 bilateral discussions with Palestinian Authority, 234

Camp David peace treaty, 30, 70

Camp David Summit, 318 civil war (1947–8), 19–23, 24–5 compensation compromise solution. 113.

114–15. 118, 120 compensation counterclaims. 98–9. 113.

115. 120,210, 272–3

Israel (continued)

compensation issue, 39, 89–90, 96, 102–7, 239–41 conference document on status of

Jerusalem, 11/7

declaration of independence (1948), 17, 60, 150

definition of displaced persons, 70

destruction of Arab villages, 38

early US foreign policy, 77, 78, 85 estimates of numbers displaced, 34 family reunification, 4, 54, 68, 69, 73, 113, 114, 115, 120, 145,237 invasion of Lebanon, 103, 211

Jerusalem policy, 74

Jewish settlements, 93, 140, 214–17

as a Jewish state, 235

Khalidi’s recommendations, 71

land holdings records, 91

Law of Return, 38, 66, 265, 266 marginalization of refugee problem, viii, 72

military expenditure, 262 minorities protection, 131–2 naturalization scenario, 209–12 occupation of land after 1967 war, 62 occupation of West Bank and Gaza

Strip, 29

overseas workers, 291, 296–7

Palestinian Arab population, 117, 127, 131,237

Palestinian attitude to State of Israel. 162

Palestinian compromise solution, 111–13, 119

Palestinian workers, 107, 288, 289, 290, 291,292, 296–7 peace agreement with Jordan, 70, 72, 113, 116, 147, 264, 266–7 position on refugees, 65–6 principles of compromise and concession, 32–3 priorities, 235–6

public opinion on refugees, 11, 303–16

public opinion on right of return, 303–4, 317

quadrilateral standing committee, 52, 53, 64, 70, 72–3, 245

recognition of State of Palestine, 244, 261 reconciliation issues with Arab states, 29–32, 278–80 reconciliation with PLO, 48, 52, 141

refugee citizenship. 125, 131, 161

refugee compromise solution, 113–15, 119–21

Refugee Working Group (RWG), 66, 68–9, 74, 105 ” refugees in Lebanon, 200, 201,205–9 refusal to accept responsibility for refugees, 54, 66–7, 89, 103, 109, 119, 124,170–2, 237–9, 304, 307–8 regrouping of issue clusters geographi

cally, 204

repatriation of 1967 refugees, 36

resettlement as answer to refugee issue, 5,

31,39, 103–4, 205–9

resettlement in Iraq scenario, 205–8 resettlement policy in Gaza, 8, 143–4, 179–192

revisionist historians, 18–19

right of return, 3, 37–8, 61,64, 66, 102–4, 109, 110, 124, 180, 181,216, 245,317

right of return compromise solution, 113, 118,119–20 right of return symbolic gesture, 7, 119, 122–38, 209 security concerns, 61,66, 74, 235–6 separation of Jerusalem issue from other issues, 203

separation of refugees issue from other issues, 203–4

sharing of Jerusalem with Jordan (1948), 32

Sharm el-Sheikh Agreement, 267

sovereignty of the Palestinian Authority, 213–14 statement of acknowledgment, 114 territorial issues, 29–30

tripartite agreements, 116

trust and confidence building, 242–4

UN Resolution 181, 174, 238, 239

UN Resolution 194 (1948), 36, 64, 110,

119, 174, 175, 255

UN Resolution 237 (1967), 36, 62, 266

UN Resolution 242 (1967), 36, 62–3, 258

unemployment, 296

western reversal of attitudes, 18 withdrawal from Lebanon, 202

Za’im’s Syrian government proposals, 79 see also Arab-Israeli conflict;

Declaration of Principles (1993); Oslo

Accords (1993)

Israel Defense Ministry, 124

Israel Land Authority, 99, 104

Israeli Central Bureau of Statistics (ICBS),

283, 289

Israeli Civil Administration, 69

Israeli Custodian of Absentee Property, 90, 93,94, 99, 125–6

Israeli Defense Force (IDF)

Arab-Israeli war (1948), 23, 26–8, 110,

154 border closures, 291

civil war (1947–8)

Israeli Preconditions for Palestinian

Statehood. 89

Israeli-Palestinian Framework Agreement, 123

IZL, 25

Jabal refugee camp, 159, 185

Jaffa, 23, 25, 93, 152

Jalazon refugee camp, 105, 144

Japan, Refugee Working Group (RWG), 65

Jarash refugee camp, 159, 251

Jazira, 77, 79

Jenin, 142

Jerusalem

Arab-Israeli war (1948), 26

as crucial element in peace process, 1

Declaration of Principles (1993), 64 importance of in public opinion polls, 306–7 international conferences on status of, ix-x, 11 n

Israeli policy, 32, 74

Israeli strategy of separation from other issues, 203

Israeli war damage claims, 98

as major issue in Arab-Israeli reconciliation, 32

and the refugee question, 59, 74

Jerusalem corridor, 92

Jerusalem Media and Communication

Center, 143

Jerusalem Post, 216

Jewish Agency, 93

Jewish communities

Muslim countries, 17

Palestine, 170, 277

Jewish National Fund, 93

Jewish settlements, 128, 136—7/?, 145,

214–17

on absentee property, 93, 140

Declaration of Principles (1993), 64 importance of in public opinion polls, 307

Jihad al-Mukadas, 20

Jihad Island, 291

Johnson, Joseph E., 39

Johnston, Eric, 96–7

Jordan

Amman Agreement (1985), 48

Black September, 42, 47, 155, 156

compensation, 116, 166

definition of displaced persons, 70

demography, 150–3,250–1

development of Palestinian identity, 154

devolution of UNRWA functions, 99

diplomatic row with Lebanon, 40 economy, 294–5 federation program, 47

incorporation of West Bank, 29, 150, 250

Israeli compensation claims, 98

Khalidi’s recommendations, 71

land holdings records, 91

Madrid Peace Conference, 157

Palestinian compromise solution, 113

Palestinian workers, 294–5

peace agreement with Israel, 70, 72, 113, 116, 147, 264, 266–7 permanent settlement of refugees, 118, 166, 209–12 and the PLO, 116, 156

quadrilateral standing committee, 52, 53,

64, 70, 72–3, 245

refugee attitude towards, 163

refugee camps, 9,41, 141, 152, 157–60,

162, 249–54, 265

refugee citizenship, 29, 41, 58, 113, 125,

140, 146, 154–5, 161, 173, 251, 264, 272

refugees, 150–68, 204, 218, 223, 249–54,

255, 257, 264–70, 298-9/?, 303 refugees’ living conditions, 157–9 registration of 1967 refugees, 52–3 resettlement of refugees from Lebanon,

209 security agreement with Israel, 236 sharing of Jerusalem with Israel (1948), 32

tripartite agreements, 116

unemployment, 294, 295

wish to negotiate directly with Israel, 120–1

see also Transjordan

Jordanian Palestinian Committee for the Study of the Living Conditions of the Refugees in the West Bank, 151

Jordanian Palestinian confederation, 116

Journal of Refugee Studies, 2

Judea, 26

justice, 33, 43, 54, 59,75, 174–5 al-Karak, 158

Karami, Omar, 225/?

Karkoteskm, Amon-Raz, 187 8

Katamon, 74

Katz, Yossi, 124

Kav LaOved, 291

Kelman, Herbert C., 12/?, I 10

Khalidi, Rashid, 52, 54, 70 1, HO kibbutzim, civil war (1947 8), 23

Klein, Menachem, 5 6, 46 56

Knesset Finance Committee, 93

Kojm, Christopher, 208

Konikoff, A., 151

Kosovo, 188

Kubursi, Atif, 90, 95, 97

Kuwait

Palestinian workers, 290, 295 refugee citizenship, 40–1 resettlement of refugees, 209

Labor Force Survey 1998, 287 labor migration see migrant workers Lahoud, Emile, 198, 200 land, as compensation issue, 90–3 Land Office (Government of Palestine), 91 Land Settlement Act, 91,92

Land Transfer Regulations (1940), 94–5 Landis, Joshua, 6, 77–87

Lausanne Conference (1949), 29, 30, 78, 127

Lausanne Protocol, 30

Lausanne Treaty (1923), 106

Lawyers Committee for Human Rights, 130–1

League of Arab States, 2

Lebanon

Arab-Israeli war (1948), 26

Arabism, 153

civil war, 21

close of shipping routes from Libya, 41 Declaration of Principles (1993), 195 devolution of UNRWA functions, 99 diplomatic row with Jordan, 40 Israeli invasion of, 103, 211 Israeli withdrawal from, 202 Khalidi’s recommendations, 71 and Palestinian Authority, 202–3 Palestinian compromise solution, 113 Palestinian struggle, 156 permanent settlement of refugees, 179, 201,205,209–12,219

PLO control zone, 194–5, 202, 211

PLO departure from (1982), 197, 201 refugee camps, 4, 29,42, 141, 195–6, 198, 202–3, 257 refugee citizenship, 29, 40, 42, 146, 176 refugees, 2, 8–9, 35, 40, 42, 58, 145, 173–4, 179, 193–9, 200–29, 255, 257, 298-9/7

al-Tawtin, 196, 197–8

territorial issues with Israel, 30

tripartite agreements, 116

war of the camps, 195, 198

Libya

close of shipping routes to Lebanon, 41 refugees, 41, 218, 223

Lifta, 74

Lithuanian refugees, 186

Little Triangle, 92

Lod, 153

Lydda, 93

Ma’an, 158

Maariv, 318, 319

McGhee, George, 78, 83

McGhee, Robert, 181

McGill University, 2

Madaba, 157

Madaba refugee camp, 159

Madrid Peace Conference, 195, 197

Jordan,157

Palestinian Liberation Organization

(PLO), 50

refugees, 64–5, 122

refugees in Lebanon, 193

UN Resolution 242 (1967), 42, 64

Mahafza, ‘Ali, 151

Majdal, 93

Malaya, 187

Ma’oz, Moshe, 7, 109–21

al-Maqdah, Munir, 203

Marka refugee camp, 159, 251

Marx, Emanuel, 6–7, 102–8, 187

Masamiyya, 143

Masrieh-Hazboun, Norma, 8, 179–92

MEDO, 79

Meir, Golda (Meyerson), 25, 261, 265

Middle East Command, 79

Middle East Defense Organization

(MEDO), 79

migrant workers, 107, 133, 288, 289, 290,

291, 294–7

Mijdal, 143

minority populations, 131–3

Molosevic, Slobodan, 188

Montagu-Pollock, Sir William Horace

KCMG, 83–4

Morris, Benny, 67, 124, 171, 308

Mubarak, Hosni, 11/7

Muhammad Ali, 22

mush’a land holdings, 92–3

Mutual Security Program, 82, 84

Naharayim, 98

Najada, 20

Napoleon, 22

Nashashibi family, 153

Nasser, Gamal Abdul, 81

national independence, right to, 37, 48, 49, nationality, right to, 37, 48

180,259

NATO, 79, 188

al-Nazif refugee camp, 159

Negev, 30, 94

Netanyahu, Benjamin, 72

Netherlands, 129

New Delhi Accord (1950), 132

The New Middle East (Peres), 260, 268, 269–70

New York Times, 186

New Zealand, 129

Nusseibah, Sari, 146

objective responsibility, 125

Oklahoma, University of, ix-xii, 2

Conference on Palestinian refugees (1999), xi, 11/7

Organization of American States, 244

Organization of the Islamic Conference, 2

Organization on Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE), 132–3

Oslo Accords (1993), 197

family reunification, 68

as important breakthrough in peace process, 1

Netanyahu’s dislike of, 72 reception in Lebanese refugee camps, 141

refugees, 64, 69–70, 109, 117, 303

refugees in Lebanon, 193

see also Declaration of Principles (1993)

Ossetians, 21

Ottoman Empire, 153, 250

Oxford University, 2

Oxford University Press, 2

Pakistan

New Delhi Accord (1950), 132

refugee problems, 31

Palestine, 170

British Mandate, 92–3, 153, 255

Palestine Red Crescent Society (PRCS), 196

Palestinian Authority

bilateral discussion with Israel, 234 conference document on status of

Jerusalem, 11/7

definition of displaced persons, 70 devolution of UNRWA functions, 59, 99 employment perspective, 282–302 foreign aid, 298 infrastructure needs, 53

institution building, 53

Khalidi’s recommendations, 71

and Lebanon,202–3 marginalization of refugee problem, viii opposition groups to leadership, 53 Palestinian identity, 157

Palestinian population growth. 4 quadrilateral standing committee, 52, 53, 64, 70, 72–3, 245

refugee attitude towards, 162

return of 1967 refugees, 53

right of return, 67, 103

Sharm el-Sheikh Agreement, 267 sovereignty, 213–14

Palestinian Compact (1968), 104

Palestinian Diaspora and Refugee Centre, 2

Palestinian economy, 106–7

Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO)

Amman Agreement (1985), 48

control zone in Lebanon, 194–5, 202, 211

Declaration of Independence, 48–9 departure from Lebanon (1982), 197, 201 differential realization of right of return, 51–2, 54 disregard of the right of return, 49–50 doctrine of liberation, 46–8 emergence of, 153

Iraq resettlement scenario, 206

and Jordan, 116, 156

Madrid Peace Conference, 50

military activities from inside Lebanon, 194 naturalization scenarios, 210 observer status, 258

Palestinian diaspora suspicion of, 126

Palestinian national identity, 155 reconciliation with Israel, 48, 52, 141

refugees in Lebanon, 193, 194–5, 196–7,

206, 210, 211

registration of 1967 refugees, 52–3

regrouping of issue clusters geographi

cally, 204

right of return, 5–6, 46–56, 67, 109–10, 212–13,220

right of return as national-collective return, 48, 50, 51 right of return realization in pre-1967 territories, 50–1, 52 separation of refugee issue from other issues, 203

as sole representative of Palestinians, 116,

1 17, 120, 156, 220

support for Saddam Hussein, 40, 50 trinity of rights, 48

tripartite agreements, 116

UN Resolution 194 (1948), 48, 50, 51–2,

54, 109–10, 203

UN Resolution 242 (1967), 46, 47, 63

see also Declaration of Principles (1993);

Oslo Accords

Palestinian Losses in 1948: The Quest for Precision, 97

Palestinian National Charter (1964), 46, 220

Palestinian National Charter (1968), 46–7

Palestinian National Council (PNC) (1st),

46

Palestinian National Council (PNC) (12th), 47

Palestinian National Council (PNC) (18th), 49, 50

Palestinian National Council (PNC) (19th),

48

Palestinian National Council (PNC) (20th), 50

“The Palestinian Refugee Problem” (Gazit), 89

The Palestinian Refugee Problem and the Right of Return, 2, 12/7

Palestinian Refugee Research Net (PPRN), 2, 97

Palestinian researchers, estimates of numbers displaced, 34

Palestinian state

absorptive capacity, 112, 113–14, 125 economic factors, 10–11, 125, 177, 282–302

establishment of, 176, 177

importance of in public opinion polls, 307

Israeli recognition, 244, 261

right of return, 112, 113–14, 118, 121,

145, 164, 240, 247

as trade-off against absolute return, 112, 126

Palestinians

Arab owned land in Israel, 90

Arab-Israeli war (1948), 5, 17–20, 23–4, 25–9 awareness of limits on refugee numbers, 4 become Israeli citizens, 29

civil war (1947–8), 19–23, 24–5

desire for justice, 33, 43, 54, 174–5 emphasis on right of return, viii, 67, 102,

104–5, 122–3, 180, 182, 256, 303 family as an influential unit, 184

First World War, 22

illiteracy, 4

Israel’s responsibility for compensation, 88, 97, 99, 273

need for economic solution, 4 opposition to Zionism, 18, 19 population estimate, 35 population growth, 4

public opinion on refugees, 11, 303–16

rebellion (1936/9), 22, 38

recede from political scene, 29

Refugee Working Group (RWG), 68–9, 74, 105, 172–3

rejection of UN Partition Resolution, 19

revisionist historians, 18–19

territorial issues with Israel, 30

trust and confidence building, 242–4

Pappe, Ilian, 67, 155, 165, 308

Paris Agreement, 267

Paris Conference (1951), 97

Partition Resolution see United Nations Resolution 181

peace concept of, 234–5

constituencies of, 278–9

Peace Now, 214

peace process

refugee question, 1, 57, 64–70, 122, 169, 175–6

see also Camp David peace treaty; Madrid Peace Conference; Oslo Accords (1993)

Peres, Shimon. 259, 260. 268, 269–70

Peretz, Don, 6, 71, 88–101, 102

Perkins, Edward J, ix-x, 1–13, 317–20

PNC see Palestinian National Council (PNC)

Point Four money, 81, 82

Poland, refugee problems, 31

Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP), 201

PPRN see Palestinian Refugee Research Net(PPRN)

PRCS, 196

property, as compensation issue, 90 5

“Proposals for a Legal Formula to Convene the International Conference for Peace in the Middle East”, 48

Protestant churches, 164, 165

Qalandiyya refugee camp, 142, 144

Qastina, 143

Quray’a, 197–8

Qutb, Ishaq, 145

al-Quwwatli, Shukri, 78–9

Rabah, Jamil, 305

Rafah refugee camp, 143–4, 185

Ramleh, 93, 153

Ramzoun, Hussein, 9, 249–54 reconciliation, 29–32, 131–3, 278–80 refugee camps, 58, 140–1,256 conditions, 140, 246, 252–3, 257

dissolution of, 111, 112, 114, 118

in Gaza under Israeli rule, 143–4

Israeli plans to eliminate in Gaza, 184–6 in Jordan, 9,41, 141, 152, 157–60, 162, 249–54, 265

in Lebanon, 4, 29, 42, 141, 195–6, 198, 202–3, 257 reasons for remaining in, 140, 142–3 social organization, 142–3 status as permanent towns, 144–5

in Syria, 29, 141

refugee documents (RDs), 40

Refugee Project of the Lawyers Committee for Human Rights, 130–1

Refugee Studies Centre, 2

Refugee Working Group (RWG), 66, 72–4, 172–3, 174, 267

agenda of, 65

family reunification, 68–9, 73

refugees in Lebanon, 205

right of return, 105, 172

refugees

from European wars, 23–4, 31, 172 world-wide problems in twentieth century, 31 refugees, Jewish, 103–4, 109, 140, 239 compensation, 98–9, 113, 115, 120, 210, 272–3 refugees, Jordanian, due to Arab Israeli war (1967), 34 refugees, Palestinian agricultural assets lost, 58 assistance to returnees, 129–31 attitude to Palestinian Authority, 162 attitude to State of Israel, 162 attitude to State of Jordan, 163

as crucial element in peace process, 1, 57, 64–70, 122, 169, 175–6

Declaration of Principles (1993), 64, 70, 245

definition of, 141–2, 244, 255, 265

due to Arab-Israeli war (1948), 1, 17, 34, 52, 54, 57, 60, 64, 88–9, 109, 113, 152, 170–2, 249, 255

due to Arab-Israeli war (1967), 34, 52–3, 62, 64, 249, 255, 283

early US policy, 6, 77–87

in Egypt, 218, 223, 255

estimates of numbers displaced, 34–5, 52, 57–8. 127, 141–2, 151–2, 249. 256, 257, 266, 298-9az, 303,314–15

as final status negotiation, 8, 109, 117, 139, 169–78,200–29, 245,303 full citizenship in Jordan, 29. 41. 58, 113, 125, 140, 146, 154–5, 161, 173,251, 264, 272 in Gaza Strip, 29, 35. 58, 141, 153, 204, 223–4. 255, 257 geographical distribution, 57–8 growing fragmentation among, 53 historic evolution of, 59–64 historical perspective, 170

ID cards, 111

identity history, 153–7, 160–1, 184

importance of in public opinion polls, 306–7

inalienable rights, 36 7, 48, 59 60, 67, 213,258–60, 271-4-

Israeli compromise solution, 113 15, 119–21

Israeli position, 65–6

Israeli refusal to accept responsibility for, 54, 66–7, 89, 103, 109, 119, 124, 170–2, 237–9, 304, 307–8

Israeli strategy of separation from other issues, 203–4 in Jordan, 8, 10, 35, 41–2, 58, 145, 150–68. 204. 218, 223, 249–54, 255, 257, 264–70, 298-9/?, 303 lack of citizenship rights, 29, 40, 140, 146 lack of forms of identification, 58

in Lebanon, 2, 8–9, 35, 40, 42, 58, 145, 173–4, 179, 193–9, 200–29, 255, 257, 298-9/7

legal-political status, 111, 118 living conditions in Jordan, 157–9 loss of properties, 58

Madrid Peace Conference, 64–5, 122

as major issue in Arab-Israeli reconciliation, 31–2, 34,278

marginalization of problem, viii, 72

Oslo Accords (1993), 64, 69–70, 109, 117, 303

Palestinian compromise solution, 111–13, 119–21

Palestinian narrative, 109 principles desirable in a solution, 111

public opinion, 11, 303–16

public opinion on responsibility for problem, 307–10 referendum of, 220–3

registration of 1967 refugees, 52–3

repatriation of those displaced in 1936–39

Arab rebellion, 38

repatriation of those displaced in 1967, 52–3, 62, 69–70,216

separation from indigenous population, 31

in Syria, 35, 58, 204, 209–12, 218, 223, 255, 257, 298-9/7

in West Bank, 29, 35, 58, 141, 204, 223^, 255, 257

see also compensation; refugee camps; resettlement; right of return refugees, Sinai Peninsula, due to

Arab-Israeli war (1967), 34

refugees, Syrian

due to Arab-Israeli war (1967), 34

Register of Deeds, 91–2 rehabilitation projects, 96–7 religious rights, 37

reparations, 71

repatriation see right of return

resettlement, 39–40, 59, 96–7, 144–7

in Arab states, 55, 118, 126, 209–12 and Arafat, 204, 206

in Canada, 129, 164–5,208,219

Canadian interest in, 4 direct Israeli involvement, 146

in Egypt, 209, 273–4

in Gaza under Israeli rule, 8, 143–4,

179–92

in Iraq, 181, 200–1, 205–8, 209, 212, 219, 274

as Israeli solution, 5, 31, 39, 103–4, 205–9

in Jordan, 118, 166, 209–12

Palestinian compromise solution, I 12 permanent settlement as part of compromise solution, 118

refugees in Lebanon, 179, 200–1,205–12, 219

in Syria, 6, 77–87, 181,209–12

al-Tawtin, 196, 197–8

in Transjordan, 31, 181

in United States, 129, 164–5, 208, 219

revisionist historians, 5, 18–19

The Revolution, 170–1 right of return alternative options, 102 Amre’s proposals, 176–7 Arab states, 180–1

Arafat, 49, 50, 51, 124, 212, 213, 214

Declaration of Principles (1993), 64, 70, 172, 176

differential realization, 51–2, 54 full realization in pre-1967 territories, 50–1, 52 fundamental meaning of, 46–8

Gazit’s opposition to, 124, 235, 237 and human rights, 37–40 as inalienable right, 36–7, 48, 59–60, 67, 213,258–9

Israeli “100,000 proposal” (1949), 127–8, 176

Israeli attitude, 3, 37–8, 61, 64, 66, 102 4, 109, 110, 124, 180, 181,216, 245, 303–4, 317

Israeli compromise solution, 113, 118, 119–20

Khalidi’s recommendations, 71 national-collective versus individual, 48, 50, 51 numbers involved, 111–12, 119–20, 121, 125,127–8

Palestinian compromise solution. 111 12, 118, 119

Palestinian emphasis on, viii, 67, 102, 104–5, 122–3, 180, 182, 256,303

PLO disregard of, 49–50

PLO policy, 5–6, 46–56, 67, 109–10, 212–13,220

PNA asked to give up, viii as a political tool, 48–9 principle of, 59–61, 67 prioritizing of, 217–18, 223–4 public opinion, 134a?, 310–12 Refugee Working Group (RWG), 105, 172 refugees with alternative citizenship, 271–2

refugees in Jordan, 164–5

satisfaction of certain conditions, 128–9 symbolic Israeli gesture, 7, 119, 122–38, 209 to the Palestinian state, 112, 113–14, 118, 121, 145, 164, 240, 247

UN Conciliation Commission for Palestine (CCP), 35, 36, 62, 127

UN ratification, 35–7, 38, 43, 51–2, 60, 61–3

UN Resolution 194(1948), 35–6, 43,48,

50, 51–2, 61–2, 63, 64, 104, 109–10, 128, 172, 181, 189m, 245, 255, 258, 262

UN Resolution 237 (1967), 36, 62, 181,

Roberts, Walker, 208

Robertson, General Brian, 83

Rockefeller Foundation, ix-x

Rubin, James, 318

Rural Property Ordinance, 94

Russian civil war, 21

Rutenberg electric plant, 98

RWG see Refugee Working Group (RWG)

Sadat, Anuar, 32

Safad, 92

Safed, 25

Safwat, Isma’il, 26

Said, Edward, 184, 216

Sa’id, Nuri, 25

Salem, Nawaf A., 146

Salem, Walid, 123

Salloum camp, 41

al-Salt, 158

Samaria, 26

Samha, Musa, 151, 152, 250, 252

Sanbar, Elias, 51, 53

Sapir, Pinhas, 288

Saudi Arabia, 79

population growth rate, 284

refugee citizenship, 40

resettlement of refugees, 209

Sayegh, Yusuf, 90, 95

Sayigh, Rosemary, 141, 193

Scandinavia, 129

Schiff, Ze’ev, 89

Schneller refugee camp, 159

SEATO, 79

security

Declaration of Principles (1993), 64

Israeli concerns, 61, 66, 74, 235–6 multilateral working groups, 65

need to redefine, viii

self-determination, right to, 37, 48, 49, 51,

60,180,259

Sephardi Jews, 98–9

Serbs, 21

Sha’ath, Nabeel, 176

Shaml, 2

Sharett, Moshe, 98

Shari’a Islamic religious law, 92

Sharm el-Sheikh Agreement, 267

Sharon, Ariel, 185

al-Shatti refugee camp, 144, 185, 186

al-Shawbak, 158

Sheikh Radwan Resettlement Scheme, 183,

185, 186

Shenhav, Yehouda, 103

Sherif of Mecca, 153

Shikaki, Khalil, 12/2, 141, 146 al-Shishakli, ‘Adib, 80, 81, 82, 83–5 Silesia, 31

Silo, General, 82

Sinai Peninsula, 34, 236

Souf refugee camp, 159, 251

South Africa, 131

sovereignty

need to redefine, viii

right to, 37, 49, 259

Soviet Union, 21, 78, 81, 85

Spanish civil war, 21

Stern forces, 152

Sudan, 208, 274

Sudeten, 31

Al-Sukhna refugee camp, 159

The Sunday Times. 265

Supreme Porte, 22

Switzerland, 129

Syria

Arabism, 153

Declaration of Principles (1993), 195

devolution of UNRWA functions, 99

freezing of Jewish property, 98

land holdings records, 91

military coups (1949), 78–80

Palestinian compromise solution, 113

refugee camps, 29, 141

refugee citizenship. 29. 40, 125

refugees, 35, 58, 204, 209–12, 218, 223, 255, 257, 298-9/?

resettlement of refugees, 6, 77–87, 181, 209–12

territorial issues with Israel, 30

tripartite agreements, 116

western plans to settle refugees, 6, 77, 78–9, 80–5

Taba Agreement, 267

Tafilah, 158

Ta’if agreement, 197, 198

Talbieh, 74

Talbieh refugee camp, 159, 251

Tamari, Salim, 71, 74, 123, 126, 216, 224

Telhami, Shibley, 123 territorial issues, as crucial element in peace process, 1,29–30

Tessier, Mark, 277

Tiberias, 25, 152

Tirah, 146

Transjordan

annexation of Arab Palestine, 25

resettlement of refugees, 31, 181

see also Jordan

Truman, Harry S., 77, 78, 81, 82

Truth and Reconciliation, 131

Tunisia, family planning policy, 298

Turkey, 106

UN Economic Survey Mission, 96–7

UNCTAD, 290–1

UNDP, 129

UNESCO, 2

UNHCR, 129–30, 131, 172

United Nations

arms embargo (1948), 27

compensation payments, 35, 96–7 internationalization of Jerusalem (1948), 32

Israeli admission, 174

Jewish settlements, 215

Palestinian right to self-determination, 60, 259

resettlement of refugees, 186

right of return, 35–7, 38, 43, 51–2, 60, 7 7 7 7 7 7

61–3

as source of compensation payments, 99 United Nations Conciliation Commission for Palestine (CCP), 29, 30 abandoned refugee property, 90–1, 93, 94, 95

compensation issue, 35, 62, 90–1, 96

numbers of refugees, 34

right of return, 35, 36, 62, 127

Syrian military regime, 79

United Nations Economic and Social

Council, 61

United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), 129–30, 131, 172

United Nations Relief and Works Agency (UNRWA), 53, 58, 173

devolution of functions, 59, 99

dissolution of as part of solution, 111,

112, 114, 118, 147, 204,210, 241 establishment of, 172, 190/?, 194, 252,

255, 258

Israeli distrust of, 129 numbers of Palestinian refugees, 257

numbers of refugees, 34, 35, 141, 151, 152, 170

refugee camps in Jordan, 157, 159–60, 161,253,254

refugee settlement in Syria, 80, 84

refugees in Lebanon, 193, 196 repatriation of 1967 refugees, 36 resettlement of refugees, 182, 186 right of return, 38 role of, 9–10, 155, 190/7, 255–63

United Nations Resolution 181,43, 60, 61, 171

Arab denial of, 18, 19, 170, 238

Israel, 174, 238,239

United Nations Resolution 194 (1948) compensation, 36, 50, 62, 88, 96, 109–10, 255, 258, 262 global versus individual compensation, 96

Israeli refusal to accept, 36, 64, 110, 119, 174, 175, 255

PLO response, 48, 50, 51–2, 54, 109–10, 203

right of return, 12, 35–6, 43, 48, 50, 51–2, 61–2, 63, 64, 104, 109–10, 128, 172, 181, 189/7, 245, 255, 258, 262

UN failure to enforce, 193

United Nations Resolution 212 (1948), 194

United Nations Resolution 237 (1967), 36, 62, 181,266

United Nations Resolution 242 (1967), 43, 174

Israel, 36, 62–3, 258

Madrid Peace Conference, 42, 64

PLO response, 46, 47, 63

United Nations Resolution 273 (1949), 174

United Nations Resolution 302 (1949), 194, 255, 258

United Nations Resolution 338 (1973), 43, 64, 258

United Nations Resolution 394 (1950), 270

United Nations Resolution 2535 (1969), 258

United Nations Resolution 3236 (1974), 259 United Nations Resolution 3237 (1974), 258 United States active role requirement, 176

American civil war, 21

compensation payments, 96

defense organization for Middle East, 78, 79, 81

early policy toward refugees, 77–87

Iraq embargo, 206

Iraq resettlement scenario, 206–7

and Israel, 163, 262

Kosovo, 188

Lausanne Conference, 78, 127

Lithuanian/Vietnamese refugees, 186 refugee settlement in Syria, 6, 77, 78–9, 80–5

Refugee Working Group (RWG), 65, 72 refugees in Lebanon, 201,205, 206–7 regional bank proposal, 147 resettlement of refugees, 129, 164–5, 208, 219

as source of compensation payments, 99–100

Universal Declaration of Human Rights, 37, 60, 259

UNRWA see United Nations Relief and Works Agency (UNRWA)

Ustacha refugees, 31

Vienna Declaration, 259

Vietnam, refugee problems, 31

Vietnamese refugees, 186

Village Statistics, 90

visitation to holy places, right to, 37

Volksdeutsche, 24 water resources as crucial element in peace process, I importance of in public opinion polls, 307

multilateral working groups, 65

Weatherhead Center for International Affairs, 2, 7, 105, 110–21, 147

Weighill, Marie-Louise, 197

Weinstock, Nathan, 179

West Bank

absorptive capacity of, 59

birth rate, 284, 286

as crucial element in peace process, 1

demography, 283–7

employment trends, 287–93

incorporation into Jordan, 29, 150, 250

international financing of projects, 195

Intifada, 156, 290

Israeli war damage claims, 98

Jewish settlements, 128, 136-7/7, 145,

214—17

labor force, 285, 286–7

movement of Palestinian citizens, 215

occupation by Israel, 29

opinion polls on right of return, 134/7

Palestinian population growth, 4 population growth rate, 282, 283–6, 290

poverty, 4

refugee numbers, 151, 152

refugee separation from indigenous population, 31

refugees, 29, 35, 58, 141, 204, 223–4, 255, 257

refugees displaced (1967), 52

right of return, 164

UN Resolutions, 258

unemployment rates, 285, 288, 290,

291–2

West Jerusalem, 152

Wider gut mac hung, 176

al-Wihdat refugee camp, 159, 251

Winckler, Onn, 10–11, 282–302

WOJAC, 98

The Wolf Foundation, 188

Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars, 2

World Bank, 84, 290, 291

World Conference on Human Rights, 259–60

World Jewish Congress, 98

World Organization of Jews from Arab Countries (WOJAC), 98

Yemen, 41, 208

Yish u v

Arab-Israeli war (1948), 26, ‘ll

civil war (1947–8), 20, 22, 23

safeguarding of partition solution, 28

Yisraeli, Yaacov, 107

Young Arab movement, 153

Yuchtman-Yaar, Ephraim, 11, 303–16

Yugoslavia, 31

Za’im, Husni, 78–80

Zarka, 158

Al-Zarqa refugee camp, 159, 251

Zionism, 277

Israeli resettlement policy, 183, 184

negation of history of the land, 187

Palestinian opposition, 18, 19

Zureik, Elia, 140, 143, 152, 305

Zweil, Ahmad, 188
</biblio>

 [Back Cover]

Joseph Ginat is Professor of Social and Cultural Anthropology, with a focus on Middle East society, at the University of Haifa in Israel. A visiting professor at the University of Oklahoma in 1999–2000, he is the author of numerous books and articles on the Middle East. Edward J. Perkins, William J. Crowe Professor and Executive Director of the International Program Center at the University of Oklahoma, previously served as U.S. Ambassador to Liberia, South Africa, and Australia, as U.S.

Permanent Representative to the United Nations, and as Director General of the Foreign Service.

David L. Boren, President of the University of Oklahoma, is a former U.S. Senator and the longest- serving Chair of the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence.

University of Oklahoma Press

[[http://www.ou.edu/oupress][www.ou.edu/oupress]]

ISBN 0-8061-3393-7

9 780806 133935

#title Revolutionaries and Reformers

#subtitle Contemporary Islamist Movements in the Middle East

#author Barry Rubin

#date 2003

#source <[[https://sunypress.edu/Books/R/Revolutionaries-and-Reformers2] [sunypress.edu/Books/R/Revolutionaries-and-Reformers2]]>

#lang en

#pubdate 2024-08-02T00:15:13

#topics religion, anthropology, politics, philosophy

#cover b-r-barry-rubin-revolutionaries-and-reformers-1.jpg

#isbn 9780791456187

#publisher State University of New York Press

#DELETED temporarily

 [Title Page]

Revolutionaries and Reformers

Contemporary Islamist Movements in the Middle East

Edited by

<right>
Barry Rubin
</right>

State University of New York Press

 [Copyright]

Published by

State University of New York Press, Albany

© 2003 State University of New York

All rights reserved

Printed in the United States of America

No part of this book may be used or reproduced in any manner whatsoever without written permission. No part of this book may be stored in a retrieval system or transmitted in any form or by any means including electronic, electrostatic, magnetic tape, mechanical, photocopying, recording, or otherwise without the prior permission in writing of the publisher.

For information, address

State University of New York Press,

90 State Street, Suite 700, Albany, NY 12207

Production, Laurie Searl

Marketing, Michael Campochiaro

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Revolutionaries and reformers : contemporary Islamist movements in the Middle East / Barry Rubin, editor.

p. cm.

Includes bibliographical references and index.

ISBN 0-7914-5617-X (alk. paper)—ISBN 0-7914-5618-8 (pbk. : alk. paper)

1. Islamic renewal—Middle East. 2. Islam—Middle East—20th century. 3.

Islam and state—Middle East. 4. Islam and politics—Middle East. 5. Middle East—Politics and government. I. Rubin, Barry M.

BP60 .R46 2003

322.4’0917’671—dc21

10987654321

 Contents

Preface

1. Why Radical Muslims Aren’t Taking Over Governments

Emmanuel Sivan

2 Radical Islam in Egypt

A Comparison of Two Groups

David Zeidan

3 The Development of Palestinian Islamic Groups

Reuven Paz

4 Radical Islamist Movements in Turkey

Ely Karmon

5 Islamism and the State in North Africa

Bruce Maddy-Weitzman and Meir Litvak

6 Hizballah

Between Armed Struggle and Domestic Politics

Eyal Zisser

7 Balancing State and Society

The Islamic Movement in Kuwait

Shafeeq N. Ghabra

8 The Rise of the Islamist Movement in Turkey

Nilufer Narli

9 Fethullah Gulen and His Liberal ‘Turkish Islam’ Movement

Bulent Aras and Omer Caha

10 Islam and Democracy

Ali R. Abootalebi

11 Mediating Middle East Conflicts: An Alternative Approach

George E. Irani

12 Liberal Islam: Prospects and Challenges

Charles Kurzman

13 Inside the Islamic Reformation

Dale F. Eickelman

14 Islamist Movements in the Middle East

A Survey and Balance Sheet

Barry Rubin

List of Contributors

Index

 Preface

The politics of Islam has been one of the most controversial and tumultuous issues in the Middle East. Islamist movements have established regimes in Iran and Sudan, become the principal opposition groups in every other country of the region, and created revolutionary upheavals in Algeria and Egypt. Yet unable in most cases to gain power, these movements now face a serious debate over strategy and tactics that is likely to lead either to their relative decline or dramatic transformation.

This book looks at the Islamist movements seeking power today, analyzing both groups involved in armed struggle and those trying to gain power by operating within existing systems. At the heart of this situation stands a paradox: Islamist organizations cannot muster enough support or power to gain power through revolutionary means, but are also blocked by governments from transforming their societies through elections or persuasion. Even Iran's Islamist government faces a divisive conflict over alternative visions, a mirror image of this very same debate.

Consequently, these movements face difficult choices. Certainly, they can continue failed strategies of violence or frustrated electoral efforts. Violence is always psychologically appealing to some activists and government repression may justify such a stance or even forbid any other option. Remaining an opposition party brings certain advantages ranging from power for its leaders to the freedom to maintain a network of institutions. In each case, the movement professes to transform the whole society while in practice creating a small model of that ideal goal.

An alternative, still in the process of full formulation, is a rethinking of Islamist politics to function as a pressure group to make their societies more Islamic, to reinforce the walls of semiseparate internal communities, and to reinterpret Islam in more liberal ways. This process could also require, however, a credible renunciation of any goal of fully transforming society.

To draw a rough parallel to European history, radical Islamism has been in a 'Communist party' phase, whether employing armed struggle or seeking power through elections and agitation. It could enter a 'Social Democratic' phase that could bring broader appeal, more effective lobbying for change, and perhaps eventual entrance into government. In Iran, the course proposed by President Muhammad Khatami and his supporters represents the same basic concept in reverse, paralleling recent debates in the Soviet Union and China. Rather than a 'totally Islamic' polity, the goal would be some form of Islamic-oriented society.

Again, though, it should be stressed that such a transition will not inevitably be accepted by the movements themselves, nor would it necessarily be acceptable to the incumbent rulers of these states. By examining the Islamist movements in opposition, the roots of their struggle, and their internal debates, this book tries to clarify how they approach these problems and alternative options, as well as whether such different routes are within the realm of possibility or can succeed.

The emergence of a movement around Usama bin Ladin was not a result of the radical interpretation's success in winning over the masses; rather it was a desperate reaction to its failure. Having lost in every other way, bin Ladin and his followers tried to play the anti-American card, downgrading his opposition to the Arab regimes to the point where they might tolerate him and his movement as an asset or at least not as a threat. On September 11, 2001, though, they were too successful in attacking the United States. At first, this made them very popular in the Arab street and regimes rushed, each in its own way, to profit indirectly from the event. But America was too angry for Arab states or even Iran to risk its wrath by explicitly endorsing or protecting al- Qa'ida groups. Yet, as the debate continued, and whatever his own movement's fate, bin Ladin had struck a powerful doctrinal blow for a further radicalization of Islamist thought.

Bin Ladin's great innovation was to open up a new front against Americans and to give this strategy a justification. All the basic ideas he needed, however, had already been expressed by a range of radical Islamist thinkers, from the Egyptian Sayyid Qutb in the 1950s to Khomayni in the 1970s, and a score of Islamist thinkers thereafter. Killing Americans in east Africa (the 1998 attack on U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania), Yemen (the bombing of the USS Cole), and most spectacularly on America itself (September 11, 2001) was very popular in the Arab world.[1] Even those who claimed to mourn the victims cheered the gestures.

Bin Ladin had invented a new type of populist terrorism. Such activities brought Islamists not one inch closer to successfully making revolutions and seizing state power, but did make them feel and appear to be more powerful and successful. Most important of all, this type of action appealed to tens of thousands of Muslims who would never dream of becoming personally involved in violence.

The facts about Islamist politics have been clouded by Western ignorance and Islamist apologetics. It is necessary to apply the same kind of political analysis here that is used to study political movements and ideologies in other parts of the world.

Islamism has clearly become a leading factor shaping the Middle East and the main source for revolutionary, terrorist, and reformist groups alike that challenge current policies and structures. Of central importance is the fact that Islamist interpretations of Islam's political philosophy vary widely from state to state and also among different groups. The fundamentalist readings of Islam are certainly innovative and often arguably heretical in light of traditional views and practices. Thus, in this book we use the word Islam to indicate the religion and its theological aspect, and Islamist to designate political movements and philosophies that provide specific interpretations of that religion.

Among the broader questions discussed in this book are:

- How interpretations of Islam lend themselves to radical and moderate movements.

- Why radical movements have not gained more support, in part because of their unusual and unfamiliar interpretations of Islam.

- How different movements have chosen their strategy and whether they have been able to alter it in the face of changing conditions.

- Prospects for radical or reformist movements seizing power and transforming their societies.

- Strategies of governments to co-opt or repress Islamist movements.

To discuss these and other issues, the book's chapters cover the countries where Islamist movements have been most important. The book begins with case studies of revolutionary and reformist groups, followed by chapters discussing future alternatives for Islamist politics, presenting advocates and critics of a potential liberal, reformist, interest-group Islamism.

The failure of revolutionary Islamist movements to seize power is one of the most important factors in modern Middle East politics. The factors and reasons for this outcome are presented by Emmanuel Sivan. Following are four case studies of radical Islamist groups engaged in armed struggles. David Zeidan describes the doctrine, disputes, and failures of Egypt's militant Islamist organizations. A key point here is how their ideology broke with normative Islamic views. Among Palestinians, Islamist appeals have blended opposition to Israel with calls to transform society. Especially interesting is how Islamist movements have often been so appealing to those most exposed to Western thought and university training. Reuven Paz discusses the movement's origins and how it broke with the dominant nationalist movement.

In Turkey, Islamists who advocated armed struggle remained relatively marginal and dependent on Iranian sponsorship. This movement is analyzed by Ely Karmon.

Algeria and Lebanon are particularly interesting countries to examine, since they are arguably the two places where militant Islamist ideologies have won the highest proportional base of support. The Islamic Salvation Front in Algeria moved reluctantly from reformist to revolutionary tactics when the military regime there rejected its electoral victory in 1992. This situation, and its interesting contrasts to the evolution of Islamist movements in Morocco and Algeria, are described by Bruce Maddy-Weitzman and Meir Litvak.

In Lebanon, Islamism became very intermixed with ethnic-national conflicts. Thus, Hizballah was simultaneously involved in struggles to gain hegemony within the Shi'ite community, to take over Lebanon, and to lead a struggle against Israel. Following the Israeli withdrawal from southern Lebanon, Hizballah faced a difficult choice on what priority to put on these various functions. It had the opportunity to transform itself further into a political party seeking power within Lebanon, a challenge described by Eyal Zisser.

The book then presents two case studies of movements that have successfully established themselves in the context of electoral politics. In Kuwait, Islamist parties have become a regular part of the political scene, exercising influence on legislation and social life, as documented by Shafeeq N. Ghabra. Turkey is the only country where an Islamist party gained power as the result of electoral success, but the armed forces forced that government's resignation in 1997. This story is analyzed by Nilufer Narli. Turkey is also the home for one of the most coherent and advanced efforts to build a liberal, reformist Islamist philosophy, the movement of Fethullah Gulen, as described by Bulent Aras and Omer Caha.

Next, the book provides essays on three aspects of the potential development for a more liberal, reformist Islamism. Ali Abootalebi discusses the relationship between Islamist movements and democracy. George Irani suggests how traditional Islamic mediation techniques can be applied in politics. Charles Kurzman surveys the main developers and advocates of an alternative Islamist philosophy.

Finally, there are two concluding chapters that evaluate the state of Islamist movements. Dale Eickelman looks at the developmental changes that affect Islamic theory and practice, which may be underpinning a transition. Barry Rubin analyzes the status of Islamist politics across the Middle East, highlighting the paradox created in the failures of both revolutionary and reformist strategies. These factors will determine the direction of Islamist politics and, by extension, of the Middle East's future.

This book is a project of the Middle East Review of International Affairs (MERIA), which is part of the Global Research in International Affairs (GLORIA) Center of the Interdisciplinary Center. MERIA is a quarterly journal and monthly magazine on Middle East politics and research published and distributed through the Internet. Many of the chapters in this book originated as articles in MERIA Journal, and the authors were brought together through the project's activities. Additional books will be developed through MERIA in the future, bringing together the best scholarship from around the globe in the study of Middle East issues.

The article by Emmanuel Sivan is reprinted with the permission of the Middle East Quarterly. Thanks to Cameron Brown, Ozgul Erdemli, Elisheva Rosman-Stollman and Linda Sharaby for their help in preparing the manuscript.

[1] Cameron Brown, “The Shot Heard Round the World: The Middle East Reacts to September 11,” MERIA Journal, Vol. 5, No. 4 (December 2001), pp. 69—89, <[[http://meria.idc.ac.il][http://meria.idc.ac.il]]>; and Barry Rubin and Judy Colp Rubin, Anti-American Terror and the Middle East (NY: Oxford University Press, 2002).

 1. Why Radical Muslims Aren’t Taking Over Governments

Emmanuel Sivan

Twenty-odd years after its rise to prominence, radical Islam (or Islamism) is at bay. Its mixed record includes survival in the teeth of state repression, some impact on political decision-making, and sociocultural hegemony, but a general failure in the attempt to take power. This predicament of radical movements holds true particularly in the Arab-speaking world, those ancient countries where Islam has been ensconced for nearly fourteen centuries. Why has radical Islam reached this impasse?

Radical Islam has made tremendous inroads into the hearts and minds of Arabic-speaking Muslims. In the sociocultural realm, militant Islamic discourse maintains a hegemony in the public debate among Arabs, replacing Pan-Arabism and Marxism. Islamism has a profound impact on gender roles, fertility, and consumption habits, as well as on the marginalization of local Christians and the censorship of movies, plays, and books. Hyperrigorous religious practice has spread, leading to a growing social pressure toward conformity, the best example of which is the donning of the veil by women. Voluntary Islamic organizations proliferate; the popularity of Islamist media (notably audio- and videotapes) grows;[2] and religious activism resurges as the major avenue for venting both protest and the craving for change. The cultural success of radical Islam resides, above all, in the strength of voluntary Islamic associations.

Although the movement has always known a high turnover rate due to attrition or legal and administrative pressures, a large pool of new recruits, mostly young urban males in their teens, seems always to be available. As a result, the number of voluntary Islamic associations, far from declining, is on the rise; their activity, despite legal and bureaucratic harassment and some scandals (such as the bankruptcy of “Islamic” banks in Egypt), remains as strong as ever.

These associations remain the backbone of radical Islam. They carry out the work of da‘wa, spreading the word and establishing a countersociety to propagate the movement’s ideas, create support networks for members, and show that Islamic values can be fully implemented in the contemporary world. The continued vigor of the Islamic associations is a consequence, above all, of the budgetary woes of most Middle Eastern countries following the decline in oil prices after 1985, a decline that had implications not just for oil exporters but also for the poor countries, as Arab foreign aid dried up and employment for expatriate “guest workers” dwindled. For some states, these woes were further exacerbated by the demise of the Soviet Union and resultant loss of assured East European markets.

The revenue crisis helped the Islamists in two ways. First, regimes responded to this problem by breaking the unwritten covenant agreed upon with their subjects in the 1950s and 1960s, in which the subjects relinquished their claims to basic human and civil rights in return for the state’s undertaking to provide them with education and health care, employment, and subsidies for such necessities as staples, cooking gas, and transportation. The poorest and the young suffered these retrenchments the hardest.

The ‘retreating state’ of the 1990s thus created disgruntled citizens by the legion: university graduates no longer assured of a government job; workers barely able to eke out a living, let alone save for a dowry and establish a family; masses of recent rural migrants lacking such basics as shelter. All these groups provided a pool of possible recruits for Islamic associations.

Second, at a higher socioeconomic level, Islamic associations have sprung up among professionals (doctors, lawyers, journalists) whose growing wealth and sophistication enable them to act independently. They first try to shape decisionmaking within their respective professions, then reach out and take positions on public affairs in general. Islamism also has had political impact, though indirectly. It limits regimes’ room to maneuver; for example, any plan to slash subsidies must take into account the menace of Islamic-instigated mass demonstrations, for mass public demonstrations protesting austerity measures have often occurred.[3] Family-planning policies falter or advance in a haphazard manner due to the vituperations of Friday sermons in “free” (meaning nongovernmental) mosques. National security and regional power are often handicapped by the need to allocate resources to counterterrorism and the maintenance of public order. Da‘wa associations, always known for their idealism and probity, are now in demand more than ever.

The support networks thus created could serve as a base for an eventual rise to political power. But they have not. Only in Sudan did the radicals, in alliance with the army, manage to wrest power and hold it. Otherwise, radical Islamic movements in Arab countries have shown a persistent inability to become the major political player. In Algeria especially, a violent insurgency has led to many deaths but not to a takeover of the government, and the same holds to a lesser extent in Egypt and Tunisia. In Yemen and Jordan, they had a share in government as junior partners for brief periods, but exerted barely any influence on public policy. In all, the radicals have tried three avenues of approach to power— violence, da‘wa and parliament— with various degrees of failure.

Many radical movements have taken recourse to violence. Hoping to follow the Iranian, Sudanese, and Afghan examples, they have sought to seize power from above and thus control the major instruments of ‘heretical modernity’ (meaning the state). But, after two decades of mostly failed efforts, fewer and fewer radicals believe they can take power by force. The main obstacle has proven to be the stiff and increasingly effective resistance of existing governments.

Counterterrorist operations have been devised with ingenuity and daring, relying on “sting” operations, intelligence, and changes in legislation (which permit preventive arrest, search without warrant, and transfer of suspects to the jurisdiction of military courts). Security services in many Middle East countries cooperate with their counterparts in other Muslim countries (including Turkey and Pakistan) as well as in the West. Several dictatorial regimes physically wiped out the movement: Hafiz al-Assad of Syria did so in the 1982 Hama massacre; Muammar Qadhafi of Libya did so everywhere except in Wadi al-Anjil; Saddam Hussein of Iraq liquidated cadres in 1980 and quelled the March 1991 revolt.

Authoritarian regimes rarely go to these extremes (with the exception of Algeria), but have shown themselves capable of defending their resource base: oil and gas (in the Persian Gulf, Libya, Algeria), the Suez Canal in Egypt, and even the vulnerable tourism industry in many countries. Nor do the regimes neglect the battle for hearts and minds. To deprive Islamist violence of its legitimacy, they use the resources of the Islamic establishment (notably its audiotaped spokesmen) as well as the entertainment industry (the Egyptian one has produced such successful movies as “The Terrorist” and “Terror and Meatballs,” as well as the television miniseries “Layla and the Dervishes.”)

The achievements of these counterterrorist efforts vary. In Tunisia, the iron-fisted President Zayn al-‘Abidin ‘Ali has managed to stem the tide of terrorism in just a few years following his takeover from Habib Bourghiba in November 1987. In the Algerian civil war, the scales have been tipped against an Islamic victory. Both the Islamic Salvation Army (AIS) and the Islamic Salvation Group (GIA) have suffered heavy losses and are shunned by the bulk of the population. No more can their members believe that “power is within the range of our Kalashnikovs.” Protest, revenge, and extortion are the all-pervasive goals of the violence, which still goes on.

The Egyptian security services, in a sustained effort galvanized by the assassination attempt on Husni Mubarak in June 1995, have lowered the yearly level of violence to some 190 killed in 1996, compared to 1,100 in 1993, 700 in 1994, and 480 in 1995. While this deadly harvest is still greater than what Egypt experienced in the early years of the Mubarak presidency (30 killed per year), the improvement is evident. Further, the violence has been largely contained in Upper Egypt (particularly the Malawi region) far away from the loci of power and the large population centers.

Endemic violence, of the Shi'ite variety, can still be detected on a smaller scale in Bahrain, and on a sporadic scale in Morocco and Yemen. Perhaps as a result of the widespread antiterrorist activities, radical Islamic movements have experienced discord and disarray. It has reached the point that imprisoned leaders of the Jihad and Jama'at Islamiyya organizations in Egypt have called for an end to all acts of terror, despite the opposition of many leaders who are in hiding or abroad. A similar call was launched by most leaders of Algeria's Islamic Salvation Front (FIS) and its military arm, the AIS, only to be rejected out of hand by the Armed Islamic Group (GIA), which continues to massacre women and children in the countryside south of Algiers.

Discord is not a novelty in the history of radical Islam, which has known various splits and internecine wars, but its extent today is greater than anything the radical Islamic movement has known over the last quarter century.

If violent 're-Islamization from above' is on the decline, how about 'reIslamization from below,' the long-term infiltration into society's every nook and cranny as a way to gain eventual political control? This is, on the face of it, the Muslim Brotherhood strategy in Egypt and elsewhere. They engage in grassroots vigilantism to ban alcohol, pornography, and television satellite dishes, and to impose Islamic law, dress codes, and stricter regulation of tourists.

In Egypt, Lebanon, Jordan, and Kuwait, fundamentalists conduct court fights and press campaigns against “permissive” writers and artists. They mobilize popular protests against relations with Israel (a prominent topic in Jordan), launch strikes against the high cost of living (in Lebanon and Morocco), or demonstrate in favor of the constitution (in Bahrain).

Two key factors support this strategy. First, the Islamist message that the failure of the supposedly all-providing state is due to its moral dissoluteness and secularism is simple and effective, and it appeals to a deeply ingrained cultural tradition connecting private anxieties to public woes.

Second, the intricate yet elastic organizational structure of radical Islam is supple and decentralized, with a minimalistic hierarchy. This sort of ‘enclave’[4] (as anthropologists call it) ensures equality of status among members without hampering decision-making; it does so by promoting charismatic local figures. In this way, it hampers repression and endows the members with a sense of empowerment and group solidarity.

The radicals are resourceful in finding new locales in which to operate: Afghanistan served as a recruiting ground for militants to gain experience, contacts, and skills, then return to their home countries; Bosnia served this same function until the Dayton agreement of 1995. The North African movements, persecuted at home, transferred much of their activity (including propaganda, support networks for terrorism and even some terror operations) to migrant communities in Western Europe. Hamas expanded financing and support ventures in both Europe and North America. The Egyptian Jihad organization moved some of its operations to Ethiopia (where it tried to assassinate President Mubarak) and Pakistan (where it blew up the Egyptian embassy).

Militants living in Europe have achieved something else: improved coordination between the Islamist movements of various countries. Migrant workers recruited for the cause frequently shuttle across the Mediterranean along with family gifts, used cars, and electrical equipment. They carry propaganda material produced in the West, as well as funds. This supple network fulfills radical Islam’s claim to be an international movement that encompasses the whole umma (population of Muslims).

Thus do religious luminaries from one country sometimes act as the higher legal and moral authority in another country: Shaykh Yusuf al-Qaradawi of Egypt’s Muslim Brotherhood lives in Qatar and serves as the supreme mufti for the Palestinian Hamas. Shaykh Ibn Qatada, a Palestinian-Jordanian living in London, is mufti for elements of the Algerian GIA. An Egyptian and former Afghan volunteer, Shaykh Abu Hamza, is one of the GIA’s chief propagandists abroad.

The cause of radical Islam is advanced when regimes, realizing that the old nationalist and statist ideologies have lost their appeal, try to steal some of the radicals’ thunder by relying on religious legitimacy. They infuse the school system with heavy doses of Islamic contents so that many children thus educated are later amenable to accepting the radicals’ worldview, transmitted in what is for them a familiar discourse. Because schooling is predicated upon learning by rote (talqin), the young are conditioned to accept a dogmatic message with no sense of critical inquiry, just the mindset in which radicalism thrives.

All this helps explain the sociocultural and organizational survival of radical Islam, which is in itself quite a feat, but why have these factors not brought about an increase in political power?

The Islamist movement aims to stop, before it is too late, the seemingly ineluctable and rapid slippage of the Middle East toward apostasy, modernity and secularism. By nature a long-term effort, this campaign can hardly enthuse a membership made up in their crushing majority of people aged fifteen to twenty-five. Underlying the Muslim Brotherhood’s message is that, thanks to the ongoing crisis of the state and their own resourcefulness, they ultimately will infiltrate the elites and create a popular base to exert pressure upon these secularized elites to change. At the end of the road, they would bring to power new Islamized elites (for example, judges who would interpret cases in the light of Islamic law, the Shari‘a).

Experience has shown, however, that powerful, countervailing cultural forces operate: the audiovisual media emit hedonistic messages, which undermine the notion “Islam is the solution.” The consumer culture’s attraction, the lure of “Made in USA” sneakers and movies, bewitches many amongst the shabab (youth) upon whom the elderly leaders had pinned their hopes. More dismaying yet are the local knockoffs, such as the North African hybrid of Arabic and rock music, dubbed Rai. Increasingly, Islamist voices can be heard asking, “Perhaps all we can wage is a rearguard battle. Isn’t it likely that our present achievements are doomed to death by attrition?”

The deadend of violence and da‘wa leads Islamists to often give higher consideration than before to the parliamentary option. The proponents of parliamentarism point to its many virtues. It permits them to introduce legal reforms, shapes policy-making, and allocates resources to causes close to the radicals’ hearts (notably, Islamic education).

Opponents of parliamentarism retort with several arguments. First, they are ideologically against it. For them, democracy is a value only for the despised “Westoxicated” elites. It cannot stop society’s decline into infidelity, let alone reverse the curve. As a system predicated on the sovereignty of man, it runs counter to Islam’s attachment to the sovereignty of God. It can be accepted at best as an instrument, and as that it dismally fails.

Second, in countries where “parties of a religious character” are illegal, such as Algeria, Tunisia, and Egypt, the radicals are barred from running at all or are allowed to do so only under a subterfuge as independent candidates or in a joint list with another party. They are subject to constant harassment of da‘wa activities through control of voluntary associations, professional organizations, unofficial mosques, and preachers. Their activists do not enjoy freedom of expression and travel, may be subject to arbitrary search and detention, or may lose their government jobs.

In this respect, the distinction between Egypt and Jordan or between Tunisia and Morocco is simply one of degree. Many Islamists argue that Arab regimes offer, at best, a sort of democracia pactada of the type practiced in some Latin American countries during the transition period from military rule. These are democracies of what sociologists call ‘partial inclusion,’ built on shared rules of political competition including the right to vote and an electoral law designed to minimize the influence of extremist parties and favor more traditional-rural sectors (through a two-chamber system, for instance, as in Morocco and Jordan). These are top-down affairs whose creation presupposes the opposition’s willingness to content itself indefinitely with second-tier cabinet portfolios.

Some religious organizations would be included in the system, as is the Algerian Muslim Brotherhood, led by Shaykh Nahnah, who ran in the 1997 elections under the banner of the Social Movement for Peace. Others, such as the Algerian FIS, would not be permitted to run, though its members would one day perhaps be allowed to participate as individuals.

Third, skeptics note that no Arab opposition party has ever won power through the ballot; electoral returns are, in fact, tampered with almost everywhere. And, in the one instance in which a party came closest to winning power, the first round of the June 1991 elections in Algeria when FIS won a plurality, the results were annulled by the military.

Fourth, they say that Islamists have precious little to show for playing the parliamentary game and conclude that participation in government is an error. Their impact on legislation and policy is paltry. Sadat had promised enactment of taqnin al-Shari‘a (vetting existing laws for conformity with Islamic jurisprudence) but the Muslim Brotherhood of Egypt never succeeded even in pushing it through parliamentary committees. In Jordan, the large faction of the Islamic Action Front (also known as the Muslim Brotherhood) could neither block the signing of the “sacrilegious” peace treaty with Israel nor development of close ties with the Jewish state. The same holds true of Jama’a Islamiya (Sunni) and the Hizballah (Shi’ite) deputies in Lebanon and their counterparts in Kuwait, Bahrain, and Morocco. In Yemen, the Tajammu al-Islah party is still smarting from the debacle of the May 1997 elections and its subsequent ousting from the government.

Moreover, when an Islamic party does cross the apparently critical threshold and join the government, it has to make do with minor ministries where its efforts are quite often hampered. As a result, the party in question is discredited with its own electorate either as a sellout or as ineffectual, and loses votes in the elections following its ousting from government; this happened in Jordan in 1993 and in Yemen in 1997. Further supporting the skeptical view, last but not least, is the Turkish case, where the radical Necmettin Erbakan was actually permitted to become prime minister but was stymied in every initiative he took and forced out of power within a year.

Parliamentary initiatives create much discord. Within Tunisia's Nahda movement, a minority led by founder Rashid al-Ghannushi (now in exile in Great Britain) demanded a change in the movement's platform and its embrace of democracy; rebuffed, he set up a rival organization, the Tunisian Islamic Front (FIT). Young Muslim Brotherhood activists in Egypt are endeavoring to establish a new party (named Wasat, the median way) that endorses the parliamentary option despite the opposition of the Muslim Brotherhood leadership. Shaykh 'Imad al-Faluji, a founder of the Palestinian Hamas, established the dissident Islamic Salvation Party that competed in the 1996 elections, and he then joined Arafat's administration.

Yet in countries where this very option has long been pursued, it is now a controversial issue. In Jordan the Muslim Brotherhood decided by a majority vote in the leadership, and under pressure from mid- and low-level militants, to boycott the November 1997 elections. The predicament for fundamentalist Islam is not solely of the regimes' making. Even those liberal circles in the Arab ruling elites favoring a transition to democracy must take into account the antidemocratic nature of radical Islam, which being the most important opposition force in society, might be the beneficiary of such a transition, leading to an Iranian- (or Sudanese-) style regime. This scenario, feared by the modern middle class, recalls the situation in Latin America in the 1980s, when Marxist-Leninist parties were the ones likely to benefit from the replacement of military rule by democracy. Whether to accept democracia pactada Arab-style is not only the major question exercising the radicals, but also a major concern for many in Arab ruling elites.

Some independent-minded thinkers within the radical orbit have recently set this predicament in relief. Perhaps Munir Shafiq, a Christian convert to Islam from northern Jordan living in Lebanon, has done so with the greatest insight. Long active in the Palestinian movement Fatah, Shafiq later abjured nationalism and Marxism, converted to Islam, and became a widely read radical Islamist thinker. If radical Islam wishes to allay the fears it generates and join the political process, he writes, it must undergo a transformation, not a face-lift. It must wholeheartedly and as a matter of principle accept pluralism and toleration (in the modern sense, first elaborated by Spinoza). In this he includes the notion of alternation of power as well as basic human and civil rights for people of all hues and convictions. Shafiq calls for a rigorously honest rethinking of ideology and practice; mere window dressing, like the recourse to apologetic arguments, will not do, he warns.

Arguments maintaining that Islam equals democracy in that it holds to the principle of shura (consultation to elect a caliph) do not suffice. For one thing, apologetics are historically inaccurate: The shura was rarely implemented even in the Golden Age, and even then it encompassed notables only. For another, verbal juggling of this sort would never convince hard-bitten rulers, their ever- suspicious security services, or the liberal middle class—not after the experiences of Iran, Sudan, and Afghanistan, not after the long drawn-out confrontation with the violent brand of Muslim radicalism.

What is required, say Shafiq and his followers, is a serious effort of ijtihad (legal reinterpretation) to infuse the shura notion with modern pluralistic values. Furthermore, such values should then be injected into radical Islam’s own internal mode of governance, which is at present autocratic, if not worse. It’s a tall order. Some rethinking along these lines has been sketched out, but more remains to be done, as Shafiq would be the first to acknowledge.[5]

Moreover, voices like Shafiq’s are, for the moment, solitary. Most radical groups who choose the parliamentary option are content to mouth the cliches about shura equaling democracy.[6] They dodge issues such as the status of religious minorities or whether freedom of expression encompasses agnostics, atheists, or holders of iconoclastic (“heretical”) Muslim doctrines. They have come up with no constitutional-political guarantees to ensure alternation.

No wonder that all this is not enough to convince regimes or liberal public opinion, whose deep distrust of Islamists harks back to the days of Muslim Brotherhood violence in the 1950s. That Hasan al-Turabi, the most prolific writer on shura in the 1980s, has become a blood-stained leader of the present Sudanese regime certainly does not add to the credibility of the allegedly prodemocratic spokesmen in Islamist ranks.

When the exiled Tunisian leader Rashid al-Ghannushi announced a few years ago his conversion to democracy, then split the Nahda (Renaissance) movement he had founded over this issue, his past involvement in violence against the Neo-Destour Party was still a fresh memory. Doubts about his sincerity came not just from the autocratic Tunisian president and his henchmen but also from the Tunisian League of Human Rights, a bold opposition force. The Egyptian government denied a legal permit to the Wasat Party (the matter is still under appeal) and liberal opinion split over whether to believe the party’s declared commitment to democracy.

Poor as the Arabic-speaking radicals’ prospects for seizing power may be, it would be wrong to view them as doomed to political failure. Even in their present anti-democratic mindset, their top-down options may get a new lease on life due to changes in the economic and political environment. Power could yet be within their reach, through bullets or ballots, resulting from a military defeat, a succession crisis of the regime, or a drastic worsening of the economic situation.

[2] Emmanuel Sivan, “Eavesdropping on Radical Islam,” Middle East Quarterly, March 1995, pp. 13—24.

[3] In Algeria (1988); Egypt (1977, 1981, 1984, 1987); Jordan (1989, 1996); Kuwait (1989, 1990); Morocco (1984, 1988, 1996); South Yemen (1986, 1990); Sudan (1984, 1985, 1988).

[4] Emmanuel Sivan, “The Enclave Culture,” M. E. Marty and R. S. Appleby (eds.), Fundamentalism Comprehended (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1995), pp. 11–63.

[5] Munir Shafiq, Al-Nizam al-Duwali al-Jadid wa-Khiyar al-Muwajaha (Beirut: Dar al-Nashir, 1994); Munir Shafiq, Hawla Nazariyyat al-Taghyir (Beirut: Dar al-Nashir, 1995). See also, Majmu’at min al-‘Ulama’ [a pseudonym, possibly shaykhs Jamal Hammami and Jamil Salim], Al-Islam wal-Musharaka fil-Hukm (Nablus: n.p., 1996).

[6] Rashid Ghannushi, Al-Hurriyat al-‘Amma fil-Islam (Beirut: Markaz Dirasat al- Wihda al-‘Arabiya, 1993); ‘Ali Benhajj (Algerian), Risala ila Wazir al-Ittisal (n.p., 1995), pp. 53–58; Abu-l-Ala’ Madi (founder of the Egyptian al-Wasat party) interview, Al-Hayat Dec. 25, 1996; Mohammad al-‘Awwa (Egyptian Muslim Brotherhood), “Al-Ta‘addudiya min Manzur Islami,” Minbar al-Hiwar (Winter 1991), pp. 129.

 2. Radical Islam in Egypt: A Comparison of Two Groups

David Zeidan

History reveals cyclical patterns of Islamic revival in times of crisis. Charismatic leaders arise attempting to renew the fervor and identity of Muslims, purify the faith from accretions and corrupt religious practices, and reinstate the pristine Islam of the Prophet Muhammad’s day. Leaders of revivals tend to appear either as renewers of the faith promised at the start of each century (mujaddid), or as the deliverers sent by God in the end of times to establish the final kingdom of justice and peace (mahdi).[7]

In modern times, a new wave of revival was initiated by the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt, the main grassroots movement that emerged in response to the modern crisis in the Arab world. At a time when Egypt faced the challenges of colonialism, economic and cultural dependence, rapid industrialization and urbanization, and a massive population explosion,[8] the Muslim Brotherhood called for a return to the original fundamentals of Islam as the basis of Muslim social and political renewal. Suppressed by Nasser in the mid-1950s—after Egypt's revolution evoked nationalism rather than Islam as Egypt's main identity marker— the Muslim Brotherhood reemerged during the Sadat era (1970—1981) as a movement committed to nonviolent participation in the political process.[9]

Radical Islamic societies (jama'at) sprang from the Muslim Brotherhood drawing on the thought of its main ideologue, Sayyid Qutb (1906—1966), who endorsed a violent takeover of power.[10] While he himself belonged to the mainline Brotherhood, Qutb's radical reinterpretation of several key Islamic concepts inspired some to split off from the Brotherhood and use his writings to legitimize violence against the regime. For example, he argued that the existing society and government were not Muslim but rather dominated by "pagan ignorance" (jahiliyya). The duty of righteous Muslims was to bring about God's sovereignty (hakimmiyya) over society, denounce the unbelief (takfir) of the current national leaders, and carry out a holy struggle (jihad) against them.[11]

Two of the radical groups that emerged in Egypt in the 1970s were the Society of Muslims (Takfir wal-Hijra) and the Society of Struggle (Jama'at al- Jihad). These two organizations espoused drastically different ideologies and strategies for gaining power. The Society of Muslims (al-Takfir) had a passive, separatist and messianic ideology, delaying active confrontation with the state to an indefinite point in the future when it could reach a certain degree of strength. In comparison, the Society of Struggle (al-Jihad) followed an activist, militant ideology committed to immediate and violent action against the regime. This chapter compares these two Islamic groups and analyzes their differences in doctrine and strategy in the context of a broader examination of the history of militant Islamic groups in Egypt. The two societies furnish examples of basic types of radical Islamic movements. In addition, al-Jihad remains important in contemporary Egyptian politics and in that country’s internal struggle.

A number of factors led to the proliferation of radical groups during the 1970s in Egypt and across the Muslim world. These included, as had been true of the earlier Brotherhood, a response to the impact of modernity, Western encroachment, misrule by the national elite, and a whole series of massive economic and social dislocations. The result was a crisis of identity and a search for authenticity. Heavy-handed repression by military-backed regimes armed with their own powerful Arab nationalist ideologies left no avenues for protest except through the religious idiom.[12]

Equally, the oil boom enhanced the power of Islamic Saudi Arabia and channeled much financial aid to militant groups, encouraging their growth. The 1973 war against Israel and accompanying oil embargo against the West —which seemed to demonstrate Arab-Islamic power—as well as the 1979 Iranian revolution further fueled radical zeal.

Ironically, the state apparatus in Egypt also contributed to this trend. President Anwar Sadat encouraged the development of Islamist societies (jama’at Islamiyya) as a counterweight to the Nasserist-dominated professional associations and student unions. These societies extended their influence through a network of educational and social services at a time when government services had collapsed in the face of economic crisis and rapid increases in the number of students and the overall population. The Islamic societies, offering identity and community as well as social welfare, became a recruiting field for the revolutionary radicals. [13]

Another phenomenon that emerged during the 1970s was a dramatic rise in the number of independent private (ahli) mosques, not controlled by the government, that provided a safe meeting point for militants and recruits.[14]

One of the new radical Islamic groups that appeared in the 1970s was generally called Takfir wal-Hijra (hereafter Takfir) by the media and government security agencies. Takfir is the legal ascription of unbelief (excommunication) to an individual or group, while hijra signifies Muhammad's original flight from Mecca to Medina, serving as the group's model for contemporary disentanglement from Egypt's corrupt society and regime.

Takfir was led by Shukri Mustafa, a member of the Muslim Brotherhood in Asyut, who was imprisoned in 1965 and joined the radical disciples of Qutb while in prison. Released in 1971, he soon started building up Takfir but, following the kidnapping and murder of an ex-government minister in 1978, Mustafa was arrested and executed by the authorities.

Mustafa was an autocratic leader who expected total obedience from his followers. His control was strengthened by the belief that he was the predicted savior (mahdi).[15] Given this prestige, he was able to run Takfir as a highly disciplined organization, divided into action cells, recruiting groups, and logistic units. Labeling contemporary society "infidel," Takfir aimed to set up an alternative community that would work, study, and pray together. There were gradations of membership: Full members devoted themselves totally to the community, leaving their jobs and families. Errant members were excommunicated and punished.[16]

The Jama'at al-Jihad (henceforth al-Jihad) was founded in 1979 by Muhammad Abd al-Salam Faraj, a former Muslim Brotherhood member who was disillusioned by its passivity.[17] To explain his views, Faraj wrote a short book titled "The Neglected Obligation" (al-farida al-gha'ibah). But al-Jihad did not restrict itself to theory alone. It quickly became involved in sectarian conflicts and disturbances in Upper Egypt and Cairo. In October 1981, the group assassinated Sadat at a military parade. Faced with an all-out campaign to shut it down, al-Jihad supporters fought a three-day revolt in Asyut seeking to spark a revolution before being defeated.

In contrast to Takfir, al-Jihad was led not by one charismatic leader but by a collective leadership apparatus[18] in charge of overall strategy, and a ten-member consultation committee (majlis al-shura) headed by Shaykh Umar ‘Abd al-Rahman. Everyday operations were run by a three-department supervisory apparatus.[19] Members were organized in small semiautonomous groups and cells.[20] There were two distinct branches, one in Cairo and the other in Upper Egypt. The Cairo group was composed of five or six cells headed by emirs who met weekly to plan their strategy.[21]

In recruiting, both Takfir and al-Jihad relied heavily on kinship and friendship ties. Both attracted predominantly students from rural areas and lower and middle class backgrounds who had recently migrated to big cities and were alienated and disoriented in their new environment. Most members were well- educated, particularly in technology and the sciences.[22]

Takfir recruited mainly in Upper Egypt and was the only society to actively recruit women. Faraj recruited for al-Jihad in private mosques in poor neighborhoods where he delivered Friday sermons.[23] Al-Jihad succeeded in recruiting members from the presidential guard, civil bureaucracy, military intelligence, media, and academia.

Especially interesting are the differences between these two radical groups, which represent many streams of contemporary radical Islamic thought, as well as something of the traditional, still far more widely accepted Muslim theology and world view.

Both groups agreed that authentic Islam had existed only in the “Golden Age” of the Prophet’s original state in Medina and under the “rightly guided” first four caliphs (622–661). Muslims must rediscover their religion’s original principles, free them from innovations, and actively implement them in present society. This was in line with revivalist (salafi)[24] views, and contradicted the traditionalist view of Islam as the total of the sacred source texts of Quran and the Prophet’s example and traditions (Sunna), plus all scholarly interpretation and consensus over the ages. It also differed from the reformist view in stressing active political, rather than mere educational, activity.

The ultimate goal for both groups was the establishment of a renewed universal Islamic nation (umma) under a true caliph,[25] fully implementing Islamic sacred law (Shari’a) as God’s ideal form of Islamic government.[26] Until the establishment of this Caliphate (khilafa), the Islamic societies would form the embryo and vanguard of the true Islamic nation in its struggle against internal and external enemies. The takeover of power in individual Muslim states would be a necessary first step.

Takfir’s ambitions did not extend to the Middle East or the Islamic world alone. It claimed that the Prophet’s mandate was to fight all people in the world until they all would convert, pray, and pay the Islamic charitable tax (zakat). The fact that this had never before been achieved did not change the fact that it was Islam’s true goal.

The group also emphasized the importance of a charismatic leader—its own —for Islam’s triumph. After establishing its rule over one state, Takfir would call on all humanity to join Islam and submit to its Shari’a. The Islamic state would become the third superpower and extend its dominion over the whole world.[27] The views of al-Jihad were roughly parallel, though the group placed less emphasis on a single leader. Nonetheless, it agreed that true Muslims must wage war against the infidel rulers of all states, including Muslim states.[28]

In contrast to traditional religious scholars, who proclaimed the necessity of submission to any ruler claiming to be a Muslim, they insisted that acceptance of a government is possible only when the Islamic legal system is fully implemented.[29] Implementation of Shari’a becomes the sole criterion of the legitimacy of regimes.[30]

Traditional scholars viewed the concept of the ‘age of ignorance’ or paganism (jahiliyya) as an historic condition in pre-Islamic Arabia. In contrast, for both groups, ‘ignorance’ is a present condition of a society which is not properly Islamic because it does not implement the full Shari’a and hence is rebelling against God’s sovereignty. All the regimes currently in power in Muslim countries are thus not acceptably Islamic and it is both right and necessary to rebel against them.[31]

On some points, Takfir and al-Jihad differed in a way that made clear why al-Jihad was the more successful organization. Takfir claimed that both the regime and all of society were pagan and that true Muslims must separate from them. Takfir included in this condemnation all four traditional schools of Islam (madhabs) and all traditional commentators. It labeled these schools “puppets” of rulers, who had monopolized Quranic interpretation to their own advantage. Takfir accused the founders of the four schools of having closed the door of creative interpretation (ijtihad) and set themselves up as idols (tawaghit), serving as mediators between God and believers. Takfir thus actually repudiated both fiqh and hadith, accepting only the Quran from traditional Islam.[32]

Al-Jihad, in contrast, selected certain commentators it favored, including the famous Hanbali medieval scholar, Ibn Taymiyya. His writings were interpreted as showing that societies are partly Muslim even when the rulers are all pagans who legislate according to their own whims.[33] Al-Jihad accepted the four traditional schools of Islam, much of scholarly consensus, and some later commentators. Consequently, it would be much easier for a Muslim to join al-Jihad or find some truth in its teachings.

While traditional scholars and the Muslim Brotherhood would not denounce a Muslim as an infidel—accepting his claim to be Muslim at face value and leaving the judgment of his intention to God—both radical groups were ready to denounce Muslims as infidels, which could imply a willingness to attack or kill them. Since Egypt’s failure to implement the Shari’a made it an infidel pagan state placed under excommunication (takfir), all true Muslims were duty-bound to wage holy struggle (jihad) against the regime, an idea alien to traditional Islam.

Both Takfir and al-Jihad also agreed that the prime emphasis should be put on a national revolution first. Only when the infidel regimes of Muslim countries were overthrown and replaced by true Islamic states could the Caliphate be restored, occupied Muslim territories liberated, and Shari’a rule established throughout the world.

But in determining the targets and enemies of its revolution, Takfir declared that not only the regime but the society itself was infidel and under excommunication. This entailed two strategic decisions that ensured that Takfir would remain more of a cult than a revolutionary organization. First, it meant a personal withdrawal from society, which required a choice few people would make and a burden beyond what its infrastructure could sustain. Second, it called for a delay in action, which indefinitely postponed active militancy.[34]

While rejecting the state, Takfir also provoked it. Denouncing all symbols of the regime’s legitimacy—the religious establishment, the army, and all government services—members ignored its laws, including conscription into the army and the legal or educational system. The group also forbade members from working as state employees, a real economic sacrifice given the Egyptian system.[35]

Traditional scholars view Muhammad’s migration (hijra) from Mecca to Medina as an historical event that has spiritual, but not programmatic, relevance for Muslims today. Takfir, however, interpreted hijra as meaning that all true Muslims in every generation must reenact and emulate Muhammad’s model of flight as a physical separation from infidel society. By departing to a safe place, they could establish a new society and prepare for the stage of return and victory. Total separation (mufassala kamila) is a must in the temporary stage of weakness, ending only when the alternative community becomes strong enough to challenge the regime.[36]

This plan was aborted, however, by Takfir itself. Its use of violence against “apostate” members brought police intervention, which in turn led to a confrontation that destroyed the organization. Given its program, Takfir posed no immediate danger to the government since in practice the strategy it pursued was one of passivity for an extended period.

In contrast, al-Jihad was a self-proclaimed revolutionary group employing armed struggle. Al-Jihad rejected Mustafa’s insistence on total separation from society, nor would it postpone jihad until the phase of strength was achieved. While Takfir wanted to boycott state institutions, al-Jihad worked to infiltrate the military, security services, and other government institutions so as to successfully wage immediate jihad.[37]

Al-Jihad was just as determined in rejecting the regime, but much more flexible in dealing with Egyptian society. Certainly, it declared armed jihad a fundamental requirement (a sixth pillar, in its own words) of Islam. Many traditional scholars, the group asserted, had suppressed this fact. Indeed, jihad against unbelievers—including “Muslims” who did not observe the religion’s requirements properly—must be the top priority of all true Muslims.[38]

The regime and its employees were infidels, al-Jihad claimed. As historical justification, it cited Ibn Taymiyya’s criticism of the Mongol rulers of his day, who mixed Shari’a with customary law. In contrast to Takfir, al-Jihad advocated immediate revolt as both legitimate and imperative.[39] Such a revolution would be able to seize power and establish an Islamic state.[40] In tactical terms, Faraj argued that the assassination of Egypt’s president (whom it called the “evil prince” and “the Pharaoh”) would be an effective first step.[41]

While Takfir rejected traditional mainstream Islam as it had been practiced and defined, al-Jihad claimed that its principles and goals were the proper embodiment of that faith. Faraj insisted that most historically respected scholars agreed with al-Jihad’s positions of waging jihad and establishing an Islamic state.[42] Like many historic European revolutionary groups (but unlike Marxist doctrine), al-Jihad viewed political assassination and violence as acts that would mobilize the masses. A necessary assumption for this strategy to work was that people were already on al-Jihad's side and were just waiting to be shown the proper example and leadership. Indeed, this was al-Jihad's claim. Since God would grant success and the infidel regime's fall would miraculously cure all social ills, there was no need to prepare and establish one's strength beforehand.[43]

Yet such a strategy was not so easy to implement. For example, traditional Islamic doctrine was critical of killing fellow Muslims and, as noted above, viewed a government professing Islam as legitimate. Al-Jihad had to argue, using specific incidents and some commentators from Islamic history, that killing Muslims and overthrowing a Muslim-led government was the correct interpretation of Islam.[44]

While al-Jihad enthusiastically endorsed this position, its leaders knew that theirs was a distinctly minority view. Faraj criticized other groups, most importantly the Muslim Brotherhood, for their gradualist strategy and involvement in the political system. Such behavior, he insisted, only strengthened the regime. He also rejected widely accepted arguments that jihad should be postponed (as Takfir claimed) or that it required only defensive or nonviolent struggle (a widely held Muslim position).

In response, Faraj insisted they were all wrong and that active, immediate jihad would be the only strategy for achieving an Islamic state.[45] Al-Jihad immediately implemented its goals in the late 1970s by involvement in sectarian conflicts, riots, and acts of terrorism, culminating in the Sadat assassination.

Another characteristic of these two groups somewhat at odds with the traditionalist Muslim view was their strong antagonism to Christians and Jews, though even here Takfir and al-Jihad had contrasting views. Instead of seeing Jews and Christians as protected communities (dhimmis) and 'People of the Book,' the two groups viewed them as infidels both because they had deliberately rejected the truth and because of their connections to colonialism and Zionism.[46] They were accused of serving as a ‘fifth column’ for external en- emies,[47] a Trojan Horse of the West within Muslim societies.[48]

Takfir stressed an international Jewish conspiracy and the need to fight it, while Zuhdi’s group in al-Jihad viewed Christians as the first enemy to confront and was heavily involved in anti-Coptic activities. Shaykh ‘Abd al-Rahman issued a religious legal edict (fatwa) legitimizing the killing and robbing of Christians who were said to be anti-Muslim.

Both groups accepted the prevalent conspiracy theories that saw the Christian West, Jewish Zionism, and atheist Communism as planning to corrupt, divide, and destroy Islam. Rulers in Muslim states were puppets of these forces, leading their countries into dependence and secularization. This battle had started right at the inception of Islam, and the Jews and Christians of the seventh century were identical with the Jews and Christians of today.[49]

Takfir accused the Jews of seducing humanity to idol-worship and of spreading corruption and immorality all over the world, while al-Jihad accused Muslim rulers of obeying Jews and Christians and opening up Muslim countries to exploitation.[50]

Finally, both groups saw themselves as messianic (mahdist, in Islamic terminology). Takfir was radically mahdist, believing that the world was nearing its end and Mustafa, Takfir’s leader, was the Mahdi. Proof that the world was coming to an end was to be found in the prevalent state of disbelief, oppression, immorality, famine, wars, earthquakes, and typhoons.[51] Mustafa would be the caliph who would found a new Muslim community, conquer the world, and usher in God’s final reign on Earth.

Al-Jihad accepted the tradition of the Mahdi who will reveal himself at the end of time to establish justice in the whole world. However, in the meantime the West was in decline, and true Muslims had to actively engage in the struggle for the implementation of true Islam.[52] Lack of messianic leadership was no excuse for postponing the struggle, and leadership should be given to the best Muslims in the community, presumably al-Jihad's leadership.

After its suppression by the government and the execution of its leader, Takfir seemed to disintegrate and its members joined other underground groups such as al-Jihad. However, there are persistent rumors that a nucleus remains active underground and that its ideas have affected many other radical groups.[53] Radical Islamic groups with the same name have surfaced in other Arab states, though it is not clear if they subscribe to the same ideology. For instance, in Algeria a group by the same name is reported to be actively linked to the GIA (Armed Islamic Group) and is blamed for urban terrorism and for some of the killings of civilians and attacks on the security forces. In Lebanon, on December 31, 1999, a group called takfir wal-Hijra ambushed a Lebanese army patrol near Assun, killing four soldiers. The army responded by launching a crackdown on militants in the hills around Tripoli, killing some 25 radicals.[54]

Al-Jihad, in contrast, survived repression. Despite the imprisonment and execution of al-Jihad's leaders following Sadat's assassination, offshoots managed to regroup, declaring jihad against Mubarak's regime. Al-Jihad has continued to be linked to terrorist incidents and outbreaks of communal violence ever since.[55] It seems to have a narrow base of support mainly in the urban centers of northern Egypt, and many of its leaders live in exile in Western countries. One wing seems to be loyal to 'Abbud al-Zammur, one of the original founders now imprisoned in Egypt. Another wing is called Vanguards of the Conquest or The New Jihad Group, and appears to be led by Afghan war veteran Dr. Ayman al-Zawahiri.[56]

In July 1986, following riots started by mutinous Central Security Forces, 75 members of an offshoot were arrested.[57] In September 1989, members of Salvation from Hell, another offshoot, were sentenced for the attempted assassination of two ex-cabinet ministers and a journalist. Al-Jihad seemed to specialize in attacking high-level government officials and high-profile secularists; in 1990, five members of al-Jihad were arrested for the killing of the speaker of the National Assembly.[58]

In 1993, al-Jihad members attempted unsuccessfully to assassinate Interior Minister Hassan al-Alfi and Prime Minister ‘Atef Sidky. Al-Jihad maintains links with other international radical Islamic groups and figures such as Osama binLaden, the mastermind of the 1998 U.S. embassy bombings in Kenya and Tanzania, and of the September 11 attacks in the United States.[59]

Shaykh ‘Abd al-Rahman was exiled to the United States in 1985, where he was later implicated in the first bombing of New York’s World Trade Center, put on trial, and sentenced to imprisonment. He had kept his influence over al-Jihad as well as the other radical movement, al-Jama’at al-Islamiyya, operating both in Egypt and abroad.

In the 1980s members of both societies, like other radical groups in the Arab world, fought alongside the mujahidin in Afghanistan against the Soviets, gaining valuable experience in warfare and often specialist training from U.S. agents. After the Soviet withdrawal, many returned to their home countries, reinvigorating the violent struggle against the regimes in power.[60]

Studying these two groups reveals the impact of the new politicization of Islam in recent decades. Yet it should be clear that these groups’ theologies are no simple revivalist returns to sacred origins but reinterpretations of historically dominant views and sectarian-type modifications on the model of the early kharijis.[61] Even when they can claim historic precedents, such as Ibn Taymiyya, they use innovative approaches lying outside the framework of mainstream Islam.

Even though these groups have a large circle of sympathizers who agree with their goals and accept their methods, they remain a minority within Egypt. Examining their ideologies gives important clues as to why their support has remained limited.

First, as noted above, many of their views either revise or contradict traditionally accepted interpretations of Islam. Thus, joining or supporting the group requires a change in one’s original belief system.

Second, these groups are naive in their strategic conceptions. One could argue that, on a strategic level, both Takfir and al-Jihad were unconsciously pursuing a suicidal approach. Takfir’s isolation and al-Jihad’s launching of a revolution without preparation and wide support could only lead to defeat. Dependence on divine intervention is not a blueprint for success.

Third, many Egyptians will not accept their claim that a coup that establishes the Shari’a will miraculously solve all the country’s problems. The Iranian model shows that the capture of government does not automatically yield rapid progress or a just society. Even popular support can be difficult to maintain, while Islamist leaders may well disagree on goals, ideology, and methods. Their utopian presentation of the projected golden age of the reinstituted Caliphate fully implementing Shari’a inevitably raises high expectations that can never be fulfilled. Should they take power, it would mean dealing with the frustrations of unfulfilled expectations by totalitarian means. As in most revolutions, large numbers of people would have to be sacrificed on the altar of ideology. And even then, the original ideology itself might have to be sacrificed to pragmatic considerations.

[7] Hrair R. Dekmejian, Islam In Revolution: Fundamentalism in the Arab World (New York: Syracuse University Press, 1985), pp. 9—12,19—20. See also John L. Esposito, Islam: The Straight Path, (New York: Oxford University Press, 1988), pp. 117—118.

[8] Dekmejian, Islam In Revolution, pp. 3—7, 9—12.

[9] During the pre-revolution days, the Muslim Brotherhood had been equivocal on the issue of violence: while advocating participation in the parliamentary process, it had also founded a secret armed wing which was involved in some violent activities.

[10] Dekmejian, Islam In Revolution, pp. 912, 19—20.

[11] John L. Esposito, The Islamic Threat: Myth or Reality? (New York: Oxford University Press, 1992), pp. 133—135.

[12] Dekmejian, Islam In Revolution, pp. 8, 31. See also John O. Voll, “The Revivalist Heritage” in Yvonne Yazbeck Haddad et al. (eds.), The Contemporary Islamic Revival: A Critical Survey and Bibliography (New York: Greenwood Press, 1991), p. 23; Esposito, Islam: The Straight Path, pp. 162—164.

[13] Esposito, The Islamic Threat, pp. 138—139.

[14] Hamid Ansari, “The Islamic Militants In Egyptian Politics,” IJMES, Vol. 16, No. 3, (1984), p. 129.

[15] Dekmejian, Islam In Revolution, p. 95. Mustafa’s title was “prince of the princes” (amir al-umara’), rather than the more common amir used by most leaders of Islamic societies.

[16] Esposito, Islam: The Straight Path, pp. 136—137. See also Farzana Shaikh, (ed.), Islam & Islamic Groups: A Worldwide Reference Guide, (Harlow: Longman, 1992), p. 70.

[17] Nabeel Jabbour, The Rumbling Volcano, (Pasadena: William Carey Library, 1993), pp. 194–212.

[18] Dekmejian, Islam In Revolution, p. 97.

[19] Ibid., pp. 97–98. Shaykh ‘Abd al-Rahman became spiritual guide for both al- Jihad and the other extremist groups known as “Islamic societies” (al-jama’at al-Islamiyya) well into the 1990s issuing the religious legal decisions (fatwas) needed to legitimate their various activities. He is now serving a prison term in the United States for his involvement in the First World Trade Center bombing in New York.

[20] Ibid.

[21] Gilles Kepel, Muslim Extremism in Egypt: The Prophet and the Pharaoh, (London: Al-Saqi Books, 1985), p. 206.

[22] Dekmejian, Islam In Revolution, pp. 95–96.

[23] Afaf Lutfi al-Sayyid Marsot, “Religion Or Opposition: Urban Protest Movements in Egypt,” IJMES, Vol. 16, (1984), pp. 549. See also Kepel, Muslim Extremism in Egypt, p. 206.

[24] The Salafiyya movement was launched by Rashid Rida (1865—1935), disciple of the great Egyptian Muslim reformer Muhammad Abduh (1849—1905). Its goal was the revival of Islam not so much by harmonizing it with modern times as advocated by the reformers, but by a return to the pristine Islam of the pious forbears (salaf). Salafiyya was to some extent an amalgamation of reformist with fundamentalist Wahhabi trends.

[25] Ever since Ataturk dissolved the Ottoman Caliphate in 1924 in his drive for secularization, Islamists have viewed the revival of the Caliphate—the divinely appointed succession to the Prophet and the ideal form of state leadership—as essential to the revival and political resurgence of Islam.

[26] Ansari, “The Islamic Militants In Egyptian Politics,” pp 136. See also Walid Mahmoud Abdelnasser, The Islamic Movement in Egypt: Perceptions of International Relations, 1967–81, (London: Kegan Paul, 1994) p. 111; Muhammad Abd al-Salam Faraj, “The Neglected Duty,” in Johannes J. G. Jansen, The Neglected Duty: The Creed of Sadat’s Assassins and Islamic Resurgence in the Middle East, (New York: Macmillan, 1986), pp. 162–165.

[27] Abdelnasser, The Islamic Movement in Egypt, pp. 234–235.

[28] Ibid, p. 235.

[29] Ansari, “The Islamic Militants in Egyptian Politics,” pp. 136–137.

[30] Abdelnasser, The Islamic Movement in Egypt, pp. 258–259. See also Faraj, “The Neglected Duty,” p. 166.

[31] Abdelnasser, The Islamic Movement in Egypt, p. 197.

[32] Ibid. See also Esposito (ed.), The Oxford Encyclopedia of the Modern Islamic World, (New York: Oxford University Press, 1995), Vol. 4, pp. 179–181.

[33] Ibid. See also Faraj, “The Neglected Duty,” pp. 166–167,170,173–175.

[34] Abdelnasser, The Islamic Movement in Egypt, pp. 204–205.

[35] Jabbour, The Rumbling Volcano, p. 150. See also Kepel, Muslim Extremism In Egypt, p. 150; Abdelnasser, pp. 205–206.

[36] Jabbour, The Rumbling Volcano, pp 143–157. See also Kepel, Muslim Extremism In Egypt, pp. 95–96; Dekmejian, Islam In Revolution, pp. 92–96, 101; Faraj, “The Neglected Duty,” pp. 200–201.

[37] Abdelnasser, The Islamic Movement in Egypt, p. 111.

[38] Ansari, “The Islamic Militants In Egyptian Politics,” pp 137. See also Dekmejian, Islam In Revolution, p. 101.

[39] Ansari, “The Islamic Militants in Egyptian Politics,” pp. 123–144. See also Kepel, Muslim Extremism in Egypt, pp. 191–122; Faraj, “The Neglected Duty,” pp. 170, 173–175.

[40] Ibid.

[41] Esposito, Islam: the Straight Path, pp. 134–135. See also Kepel, Muslim Extremism in Egypt, pp. 195; Ansari, “The Islamic Militants in Egyptian Politics,” pp. 136–7; Abdelnasser, The Islamic Movement in Egypt, pp. 205–207.

[42] Johannes J. G. Jansen, “Tafsir, Ijma‘ and Modern Muslim Extremism,” ORIENT, Vol. 27, No. 4, (1986), p. 648. See also see Faraj, “The Neglected Duty,” p. 172.

[43] Jansen, “Tafsir, Ijma‘ and Modern Muslim Extremism,” p. 648. See also Faraj, “The Neglected Duty,” pp. 202—203.

[44] Faraj, “The Neglected Duty,” pp. 207—208, 210—213.

[45] Ibid., pp. 186–189.

[46] Esposito, Islam: The Straight Path, p. 171.

[47] Abdelnasser, The Islamic Movement in Egypt, pp. 242–243.

[48] Ibid, p. 239.

[49] Ibid, pp. 226, 240–241, 244, 254.

[50] Ibid, p. 226.

[51] Abdelnasser, The Islamic Movement in Egypt, p. 216. See also Derek Hopwood, Egypt: Politics and Society 1945–1990, (London: Harper Collins Academic, 1991), p. 118.

[52] Abdelnasser, The Islamic Movement in Egypt, pp. 234–235. See also Faraj, “The Neglected Duty,” pp. 163–164.

[53] Dekmejian, Islam In Revolution, pp. 96–97.

[54] “Massacres in Algeria: A Domestic Tragedy and the Show-Off Positions,” ‘Ayn al-Yaqeen, Internet, <[[http://www.ain-al-yaqeen.com/issues/19980121/feat3en.htm][http://www.ain-al-yaqeen.com/issues/19980121/feat3en.htm]]>. “Syria Roots Out Militants,” 7 January 2000, Global Intelligence Update, Stratfor, Internet, <[[http://216.30.41.7/SERVICES/giu2000/01700.ASP][http://216.30.41.7/SERVICES/giu2000/01700.ASP]]>.

[55] Shaikh, p. 69.

[56] Terrorist Group Profiles, Dudley Knox Libraries, Naval Postgraduate School, published on the Internet: <[[http://web.nps.navy.mil/~library/tgp/jihad.htm][http://web.nps.navy.mil/~library/tgp/jihad.htm]]>.

[57] R. Springborg, Mubarak’s Egypt, (Boulder: Westview, 1989), pp. 217.

[58] Esposito, Islam: The Straight Path, pp. 134–135.

[59] Hopwood, Egypt: Politics and Society, p. 188.

[60] Adel Darwish, “On the Threshold of the 7th Millennium,” The Middle East, June 1999.

[61] The khariji movement was a legalistic puritan group that arose in the early years of Islam during the rule of Muhammad’s son-in-law ‘Ali (d.661) as fourth caliph. It was the first Muslim sect. The kharijis rejected all Muslims who did not accept their interpretation of Islam as infidels worthy of death. They developed an ideology of continuous jihad and rebelled against all rulers until finally suppressed after some 200 years of bloodshed. Remnants of the original khariji movement survive today in the ibadis of Oman and in the mzabis of Algeria.

 3. The Development of Palestinian Islamic Groups

Reuven Paz

The story of how Palestinian Islamic groups evolved is one of the most interesting case studies in modern Islamist politics. By looking at the roots of these organizations and their recruitment techniques, one gets a far better appreciation of the nature, appeal, and strategy of these groups.

A key element in their development has been the struggle between Islamist and nationalist alternatives for the allegiance of individual Palestinians. Factionalism has also been an important dimension, given the multiplicity of groups deriving from the Muslim Brotherhood and Islamic Jihad tendencies. Also interesting is the relationship between Islamist organizations and educational institutions, which have served as important centers for finding, socializing, and mobilizing supporters.

Until 1967, organized Islamic groups in the West Bank and Gaza Strip (henceforth called “the Territories”) were situated in socioreligious centers and mosques run by the Waqf establishment, as well as several charity funds in Jerusalem and the West Bank. These groups drew most of their support from middle class traders who were beginning to develop in urban areas of the West Bank.

In the Gaza Strip, the Muslim Brotherhood, active under the Egyptian civil regime despite Nasser’s hostility to the Brotherhood’s Egyptian branch, were influential in several mosques run by their supporters. In fact, until 1967, Islamic groups maintained a strong hold on the population of the Gaza Strip with almost exclusive control of all social organizations. The only Islamic group not affiliated with the Muslim Brotherhood consisted of supporters of several shaykhs who had adopted a strict Salafi or Wahhabi line during their studies in Saudi Arabia. (Saudi Arabia supported the Egyptian Muslim Brotherhood during the course of its rivalry with Nasser’s regime during the 1960s.)[62]

The Muslim Brotherhood was also dominant in the Jordanian-ruled West Bank. The Brotherhood controlled the Waqf establishment, operated legally, and even participated in the Jordanian government in the 1960s, though Jordanian security services did supervise the group tightly. The Jordanians restricted its movements, arrested its followers, and barred it from certain actions.[63] The group’s only Islamic competitor was the Islamic Liberation Party (Hizb al-Tahrir al-Islami), which was banned and persecuted by the government. Thus, the Brotherhood, which enjoyed some backing from the Saudi regime, was able to play an ‘open game’ by mildly criticizing the government on internal affairs.

Until 1967, the Muslim Brotherhood faced no real competition from secular nationalist groups in the Territories, such as the banned Jordanian Communist Party or the Syrian and Iraqi Ba’ath party. These groups attracted a very narrow stratum of intellectuals and university graduates. In Gaza, leftist organizations were often forced to collaborate with the Muslim Brotherhood as a result of joint imprisonment.

Israel’s entry into the Territories in 1967 brought considerable change in the nature of Islamic activities there. Islamic groups now enjoyed more freedom than in the past. This newfound freedom, coupled with changes that took place during the 1970s in the organizational pattern of Palestinian society in the Territories as a whole, were central factors in the Palestinian Islamic resurrection of the 1980s.

One of the central factors influencing Palestinians in the Territories since 1967 had been socioeconomic development, to which the Israelis were indifferent. The armed struggle waged by the Palestinian nationalist secular organizations from the onset of the occupation until the 1993—1994 period diverted Israeli attention from Palestinian social processes. By the 1980s, these processes had brought about several important results, including:

- A vast increase in the Palestinian population due to a high natural birthrate and immigration beginning in the late 1970s, as the number of Palestinians employed in the Persian Gulf sharply declined.[64]

- A major drop in the average age in the Territories.[65]

- A significant rise in the level of education and the number of educational institutes in the Territories concomitant with an awakening national awareness of the importance of education to political, economic, and social development.

- An increase in the standard of living among Palestinians, especially during the first half of the 1980s. The loss of income from Palestinian employment in Gulf countries was more than made up for by an increase in the number of laborers working in Israel and heavy funding since the late 1970s from Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) affiliates.[66]

- The (conscious or unconscious) adoption of Israeli behavior and ways of thinking, modernization, and the forming of a middle class influenced by Israel as well as communication with the rest of the Arab world.

The combination of these factors, together with an effort by the PLO and pro-Palestinian foreign organizations, gave rise to a Palestinian sociopolitical organizational foundation. Israel offered ‘covert help’ in the sense that it did not interfere so long as it did not perceive an immediate military threat. This new foundation shifted the political national organizational weight from municipalities, which could easily be controlled by the Israelis, to a wide variety of new and growing institutions in the early 1980s.

The West Bank, and later also the Gaza Strip, saw the emergence of research institutes, newspapers, information offices, workers unions, professionals unions, student committees, liberal organizations, youth movements, women’s organizations, social organizations, and charity funds—all somehow connected to PLO factions. Also notable is the fact that this sociopolitical base was centered in East Jerusalem, which was regaining its importance in relation to West Bank Arab municipalities.

One of the main factors enhancing the development of this national foundation was the growth of higher education institutions in the Territories at the end of the 1970s. These bodies soon became central to Palestinian political and social development in the Territories. They offered social mobility to groups that previously did not have access to the higher education system. In the West Bank, for example, and even more so in Gaza's Islamic University, a large percentage of students came from refugee camps, small villages, and lower-income families.[67]

These colleges and universities not only enhanced Palestinian national political awareness but also introduced the PLO's structure to the Territories as a supraorganization comprised of several active groups such as ideological movements and even political parties.[68] Until this point, the PLO manifested itself only in the military-terrorist field and in the prisons where convicted terrorists were sent.

The political organization that developed across university campuses in the Territories and its social impact led to two processes that quickly influenced the entire population and its organizational structure. The first process was the almost total filling of the political void in the Territories. Gradually the entire younger generation—now the vast majority of the population—identified politically with either the PLO, an Islamic faction, the Communist Party, or Jordanian supporters. Even Israel, in the early 1980s, attempted (and failed) to start an organization of village associations that would lead a faction accepting the Israeli presence in the Territories.

The second process was the politicization of almost every aspect of Palestinian life. Relatively democratic election patterns and organizations were formed under Palestinian national political influence, perhaps also due to unconscious impression of Israeli democracy. Partylike structures developed in the Territories which allowed the PLO to exercise social, political, and economic control both from inside and from outside the Territories.

These processes—beginning in the early 1980s—were actually part of a larger transformation of Palestinian society toward creating a basis for a forthcoming state. The core of Palestinian nationalism was transferred inward, from the refugee camps in Lebanon to the Territories, and from external Arab patronage to direct struggle with Israel.

Along with these sociopolitical processes, another process was also taking place— an indigenous Islamic resurrection that aimed to mold the character of the Palestinian state-to-be, which could follow in an Islamic or national secular direction.

Because of the importance of universities in the Territories in shaping the ideologies of secular nationalist activists, Islamic factions decided to pour a heavy effort into their campus presence, especially since many students came from villages and refugee camps where Islam already had a relatively strong presence. It should be noted that for the Islamic groups, education, starting at a very young age, was a primary part of their sociopolitical activity.

The Muslim Brotherhood in particular focused on education. It had consistently abstained, from the beginning of the Israeli occupation until the Palestinian uprising—intifada—twenty years later, from any “armed struggle” against Israel, a main activity of all PLO-affiliated organizations. Just as the Muslim Brotherhood hoped to offer an alternative sociopolitical character to the future Palestinian state, it was also an alternative to violent protest until the uprising.

When, in the 1990s, the Palestinian national leadership chose to compromise with Israel and abandon terrorism, the Muslim Brotherhood remained an alternative and undertook terrorism in the guise of Hamas and Islamic Jihad. The twenty years preceding the forming of Hamas were for the Brotherhood a period of building and reinforcing its social foundation through its influence in the educational arena and in the almost total control it had obtained in the mosques.

For the Muslim Brotherhood, the development of sociopolitical organizations and their student activities gave the Islamic cause a significant push, which was crucial to the revolutionary faction of Islamic Jihad. The Islamic groups in the universities began forming as soon as the national secular groups did and an overt ideological rivalry soon developed.

While Islamic groups kept pace with their national secular counterparts in universities, they lagged behind in other fields. For example, no Islamic factions were formed in organizations such as workers unions, professionals unions, or economic and social societies. No bodies, such as unions or Islamic information centers, were created, apart from student bulletins and charity funds. Until 1988, several centers for the preservation of Islamic heritage were founded, but far fewer than similar centers founded by nationalist groups. For example, in January 1983, one such center was founded in Jerusalem by the Waqf administration, which mainly documented Arab and Turkish manuscripts. In 1986, a research center which doubled as an Islamic library from the estate of the al-Husayni family, was founded on behalf of the "Arab Child's House."[69] However, until the founding of Hamas at the beginning of the intifada, universities remained the main public arena where Islamic organizations concentrated their presence.

Several reasons explain why Islamic organizations failed to engage in a full range of sociopolitical activities, like their nationalist rivals. First, outside funding from the PLO, which was crucial to building up the nationalist base, did not reach Islamic groups. Similarly, these groups—which did not turn violent until late 1986—did not enjoy the large funds that supported terrorism or compensated the families of prisoners and dead activists.

Second, the Muslim Brotherhood senior leadership, which in the West Bank was relatively older than its nationalist equivalent, worked in the traditional ways of the 1950s and 1960s. To attain public influence, it invested in social communal activities, charity funds, and religious centers such as the Waqf and mosques. For some of them, activities such as charity, selling Islamic literature, preaching, and distributing cassettes were considered much more efficient than publishing newspapers and pamphlets or building a foundation of institutes taken from Western culture. The organized propaganda used by Hamas since its inception was engineered by younger activists who had learned from their nationalist colleagues in universities in the Territories or abroad.

Third, while the revolutionary faction of Islamic Jihad mimicked the activities of the Egyptian Islamic groups, where the student arena was also very central, other factions, especially the Salafi-based ones, were composed of people with little education who emphasized secret, armed activities and not building a large public base.

Fourth, the rivalry between Islamic groups and nationalist secular parties in colleges and universities very rarely reached the public sphere, and if so, it was almost exclusively in the Gaza Strip. Thus, there was no widespread competition for public support.

Fifth, the purpose of building an organizational infrastructure was to expand national awareness of the PLO as an exclusive Palestinian leadership ahead of future statehood. It was therefore built according to the accepted Arab national model. Islamic groups, on the other hand, envisioned the founding of an Islamic state at first narrowed to the entire land of Palestine and then enlarged to include the entire Islamic Arab world. Thus, their organizational emphasis was different.

Still, the Brotherhood’s limited focus is surprising given that the Egyptian Muslim Brotherhood—which served as a model for branches in other countries—had developed front organizations until the early 1950s similar to those of secular groups. The Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt, Jordan, and the Gulf states had published Islamic newspapers and periodicals, as did other Islamic groups in Europe and the United States.

While secular groups established financial institutes and became heavily involved in professionals or workers unions, Islamic groups centered their activities in mosques which served as a communal factor no less than a religious one. Through the mosques, Islamic groups promoted awareness (wa’i), religious education, preaching and ideological, political, and social indoctrination, financial activity through charity funds, sports activities, and more.

After 1967, due to the relative freedom Israel granted them and constant connections with the Jordanian regime and its supporters, the national secular network did not pose a significant threat to the Islamic groups' stable position. In addition, the national base in the West Bank, where most of the population was rural and even traditional, did not have a political manifestation contradicting the Muslim Brotherhood's ideology. In the Gaza Strip, where the Muslim Brotherhood was always popular, secular nationalist groups developed slowly, and sped up only in the middle of the 1980s. In fact, in Gaza's Islamic Univer- sity—which became a leading political and social center—the Muslim Brotherhood had almost full control over the administration and the male and female student councils.

To a certain extent, however, the Muslim Brotherhood underestimated the institutional strength of the PLO factions. This was proven at the onset of the intifada, when the nationalist leadership in the Territories succeeded in controlling the population and the uprising's course, even before the outside directive from the PLO. More so, the uprising itself was a manifestation of the mood fostered mainly by the nationalist factions and using their foundation built in the 1980s.

Colleges and universities, however, were an exception. Hence, they were very important to the organizational growth of the Islamic Jihad factions, especially its revolutionary one, though the Muslim Brotherhood's groups conducted the main Islamic activity.

What is special about these groups' publications is that they were locally produced, not imported like most of the Islamic literature being circulated. The percentage of local articles—as opposed to photocopied ones published in Islamic bulletins abroad—rose greatly in the 1980s. Previously, very few thinkers originated from Palestinian Islamic groups and until the establishment of Hamas, the groups imported all of their ideals.

The Islamic groups were independently organized in every one of the higher-education institutes closed down after the uprising began. Once a year the groups convened a quasigeneral assembly of their representatives, usually during al-Israa' wal-Mi'raj events in Al-Aqsa mosque. The last assembly prior to the uprising took place in April 1987[70] and dealt with current issues in the Islamic Arab world. The groups attacked Arab regimes—including that of the Palestin- ians—that supported a compromise with Israel. This hardline stance can perhaps be explained by the fact that the assembly took place at the same time as the National Palestinian Council meeting in Algiers, which brought the beginning of a turn toward a political solution.

The Islamic groups' main activities were focused on events and ceremonies for Islamic holidays or ancient Islamic history. They also organized exhibits of Islamic books and fairs and circulated bulletins, books, and sundry Islamic publications, mainly published from 1982. This year marked a new stage in the organizational pattern of the Islamic groups in institutions of higher learning.

More than one factor influenced the change in Islamic groups' orientation, including Israel's invasion of Lebanon and Sadat's murder, as well as the trials of Egyptian Jihad organization members. It appears that the 'Lebanese effect' had to do not only with the Israeli control over southern Lebanon, but also with the infiltration of Iranian forces and the fallout from Iran's Islamic revolution that spurred the growth of the revolutionary faction of the Islamic Jihad.

The first publications in the spirit of the revolutionary Islamic Jihad, which probably posed a certain threat to the Muslim Brotherhood and also hastened its own publications, came from the Muslim Youth Association in Jerusalem. It was a series of three booklets which were once published under different names:[71] Al-Nur, Al-Nur Al-Rabbani, and Al-Nur Al-Ilahi.[72] The first was published in May—June 1982, before Israel's invasion of Lebanon, and its content reveals the influence of the Egyptian monthly Al-Mukhtar al-Islami of the radical Islamic groups in Egypt. The main issues featured in this publication and in subsequent ones were copied from the Egyptian publication and written by Dr. 'Iz al-Din Ibrahim, then one of the literary pseudonyms of Dr. Fathi al-Shqaqi, the founder of the revolutionary Islamic Jihad in Gaza.[73]

The first publications of the Muslim Brotherhood groups were a combination of photocopied material from abroad and handwritten articles and news items, mostly discussing the situation of Palestinian higher education. For example, a publication named Al-Risalah was published in November 1982 by the Hebron University student council, then led by the Muslim Brotherhood.[74] It featured an interview with a student named Muhammad Harb, an active communist who repented and became a supporter of the Islamic Group (another name for the Muslim Brotherhood).[75] The interview, propaganda against the communists, also accused nationalist groups of creating disturbances in the university aimed at causing the Israeli army to arrest Muslim students. This claim occasionally reappeared to justify why Islamic groups did not participate in demonstrations against the Israeli army, since these were viewed as provocations with no “pure” intent.

The publication also contained a list of student council activities during 1982 that indicates the Islamic groups’ mode of operation. Consider the following examples:

- Opening two mosques, one for male students and one for female students.

- Distributing free robes to needy female students.

- The sale of discounted books.

- Performing a ceremony for the birth (mawlid) of the Prophet. Among those registered as present were leaders of the Muslim Brotherhood such as Shaykh Ahmad Yassin from Gaza and Muhammad Fuad Abu Zaid from Qabatya/Jenin.

- A medical services card.

- Performing wide scale fundraising in ‘Palestine’ raising 15,000 dinars.

- The noting of historic dates such as the Balfour declaration and the partition decision.

- Holding a Hebrew learning course.

- Collecting 1,600 dinars to pay for fines given to imprisoned students.

- Blood donations for several residents.[76]

One of the main issues preoccupying Islamic students was ‘immoral behavior’ in colleges and universities. Many students attended daily meetings between Muslims and Christians, some of whom were more liberal regarding cross-gender relations. Some Christians also belonged to the Marxist organizations that advocated relative equality between the sexes. As a rule, the move from a strict, closed village society into an open one with daily cross-gender interactions led to behavior strongly condemned by the Islamic groups.

In an al-Muntalaq issue published in al-Najah University’s bulletin, the immoral behavior of the student council—“corruption and debauchery”—is cited as a direct reason for the founding of the Islamic group in 1987.[77]

One of the issues at the top of the Islamic groups’ agenda was friction with the administrations of other universities, especially the two considered more secular and nationalist—Bir Zeit University and al-Najah University in the West Bank. In both, there was a connection (and sometimes common interest) between the administration and nationalist student parties. Apart from disagreements on mundane issues such as tuition and dorms, the Islamic groups confronted the administration while attempting to conduct separate events, usually with Islamic content, that were usually points of tension between the rival parties, interfered with studies, and led to conflicts that extended beyond university walls.

In both these institutions, and surely in Freres College (which became Bethlehem University), there was also Christian influence which added to the tension. In one al-Muntalaq issue, the university administration is called “the hostile crusade management.”[78] Reference to Christian students in the Islamic publications was rare.

The February 1984 al-Muntalaq bulletin surveyed the achievements of al- Najah University’s Islamic group six years after its establishment. It is interesting to see how the Islamic group’s followers classified the achievements in order of importance. The first was developing an Islamic personality and saving young men and women from moral and ideological deterioration; the second was building two separate mosques for men and women; the third was giving scholarships and loans to needy students; and the fourth was supplying Islamic books. Only in thirteenth place one can find activities which may be viewed as sociopolitical, copied from the nationalist groups and first introduced to the Territories by the Communist Party: one day of volunteer work in Gaza and two in the university itself.[79]

The volunteer framework was developed by leftist groups in the Territories as early as the second half of the 1970s and was adopted by Fatah supporters the following decade. It was turned into one of the main elements of the younger generation’s organization in all aspects of political and social life in the Territories in the framework of what was called “the youth committees for social work” (lijan al-shabibah lil-’amal al-ijtima’i), popularly known as “Shabibah.” Much of the volunteering consisted of charity work.

Volunteer days could be found only in the colleges and universities and were part of the Islamic groups’ influence there. The Islamic groups did not, however, form voluntary front organizations, as did the nationalist groups, with the exception of the Islamic group at Gaza’s Islamic University, which operated a voluntary labor committee. The dominant influence of the Muslim Brotherhood at Islamic University perhaps accounts for the rise of such a committee there. Indeed, an Islamic workers union also formed at the university, which doubled as an organizational center for the Muslim Brotherhood.[80]

Islamic groups were also concerned with the recurrent closings of educational institutions by the Israelis, whether due to violent clashes among students or to clashes with the army and riots. The Islamic groups placed the utmost importance on maintaining regular studies in the Territories, as demonstrated by an Al-Muntalaq editorial from December 1984:

<quote>

Owing to the reopening of the university after a forced closure of four whole months, we cannot but congratulate the new and senior brothers and sisters We appeal to the senior students to be sensible and serve the public interest and abandon the activities that bring the university to give our enemies a golden opportunity We call upon our new brothers to see things clearly and understand that regular studies and the opening of the university are the peak of constructive positive activity, and this is what our people and nation want.[81]

</quote>

This position also demonstrated the Muslim Brotherhood’s passivity regarding resistance to the Israeli regime. Until the uprising, this policy advocated carrying on with life as usual in order to enable the movement to establish itself.

The Islamic University in Gaza was different from other institutions in that it was established initially as an Islamic institute, although it also offered secular studies. The centerpiece of the Muslim Brotherhood’s power, it became the largest university in the Territories and the one with the most political and social weight in the Gaza Strip.

The Muslim Brotherhood controlled the student council at the university and also became the most organized of the Islamic groups in the Territories. Several active committees were established in the 1980s, including a cultural and educational committee, an art committee, a volunteer work committee, a mosque committee, and a sports committee. These became the movement's main propaganda tools in the Gaza Strip. The group distributed publications such as al- Shihab (on behalf of the mosque committee) and al-Nidaa' (on behalf of the student council) and also irregular ideological publications such as "From The Young Generation's Desk" (Bi-aqlam al-Shabab).[82] In 1986 and 1987, the student council's Islamic preaching and guidance committee published a series headed Voice of Truth, Power and Freedom (Sawt al-Haqq Wal-Quwwah Wal- Hurriyyah), a well-known slogan of the Muslim Brotherhood's in Egypt.[83]

The student council's culture committee was prolific, publishing some material that was openly circulated under the name of the Muslim Brotherhood.[84] The student council publications in Gaza were also more ideologically consolidated than those in the West Bank. Al-Nidaa's bulletins included ideologically richer material from local writers, knowledgeable in the Muslim Brotherhood's philosophy. As a rule, their bulletin and other publications were similar to those of Islamic groups abroad.

It should be noted, however, that the Islamic group's publications in Nablus' al-Najah University were better funded than those in Islamic University, probably due to the indirect Jordanian funding of the Muslim Brotherhood in Nablus and Samarea. The Jordanian Muslim Brotherhood was part of the Jordanian government even after 1967.

A prominent subject in all of the Islamic groups' publications was the rivalry with secular nationalist groups. In the West Bank, where the Muslim Brotherhood did not have as much control over popular centers as they did in parts of the Gaza Strip, the higher-education institutes became the main arena for competition between the two camps. The rivalry was most fierce in al-Najah University, which saw student clashes beyond the administration's control from the beginning of the 1980s until it was closed during the intifada.

The Islamic groups circulated pamphlets[85] which, at their core, represented the cultural and social rivalry between the two sides—a rivalry most manifested at the universities. The West Bank institutions, which employed not only secular Arab instructors but also Americans and Europeans, became the center of secular revolution for many young people who came from villages and refugee camps. Since most members of the Islamic group came from similar homes and social status, they fought hard to preserve a traditional lifestyle in the face of Western influence in the universities.

The issue of Palestine was also a prominent point of contention. The Islamic groups were mostly concerned with Islam in the Palestinian arena, though there was some mention of the jihad in Afghanistan and the trials of Muslim groups in Egypt and Syria. Mainly, the groups in the Territories addressed the PLO's political line and accused Arab governments of neglecting the Palestinian cause. They concentrated on Palestinian political problems or local problems arising from the Islamic-secular rivalry.

The Palestine focus is to be expected given that Islamic Palestinian groups grew within a conflict that was nationalist in essence. Islamic supporters were well-integrated into general Palestinian society. What is interesting, though, is that the Islamic groups were controlled by the Muslim Brotherhood, which, at least in the West Bank, was part of the Jordanian movement. But the Muslim Brotherhood's transformation into a mainly Palestinian group that viewed the problems of the Arab Islamic world and of creating a large, new Arab state as secondary was a direct result of the activities of Islamic groups in colleges and universities. Students during the 1980s had grown up fighting the Israeli occupation. Indeed, resisting the Israelis became the center of Palestinian political work in the Territories, which led Islamic activists to address a question that became significant in Palestinian society: establishing the character and nature of the future independent state.

Higher-education institutions in the Territories became one of the centers of fighting the Israeli regime, and Islamic resistance was prominent. In violent riots initiated by leftist students at Bir Zeit in December 1986, Islamic group members played an active role for the first time. Both of the students killed in these clashes belonged to the Islamic group and were residents of the Gaza Strip.[86] Their residency is noteworthy because it represents an increase in the number of Gaza Strip residents who studied in West Bank institutions and their influence on the Islamic activity in this area. This increase accelerated the militancy of Islamic groups in the West Bank.

In summary, it appears that the flourishing of sociopolitical life in colleges and universities as central to the national Palestinian foundation in the Territories accelerated the organizational development of Islamic groups. The political implications of these changes were mainly felt during the intifada when the Muslim Brotherhood, in the form of the Gaza-born Hamas, openly opposed the Israeli regime.

At the same time, though, a new Islamic opponent surfaced—the Islamic Jihad—which was more threatening ideologically than organizationally. The Muslim Brotherhood had difficulty coping with Islamic Jihad's rise in popularity in 1986 and 1987 after it committed itself to violence against Israel, something the Muslim Brotherhood had consistently refrained from doing until that point.

The strengthening of the organizational infrastructure of Islamic groups in colleges and universities gave impetus to the growth of the revolutionary faction of Islamic Jihad in the Territories. In contrast to the Muslim Brotherhood's leadership, which consisted of older, religious establishment figures, Islamic Jihad's leadership came from students and academics who had spent time in Egyptian universities in the 1970s and absorbed the revolutionary militancy of groups there.

The elitist concept of a revolutionary group whose role was to lead the masses found an attentive audience among university activists. Unlike the Muslim Brotherhood, the Palestinian Islamic Jihad was enthused by the success of Iran's Islamic revolution. From its mid-1982 founding at Islamic University in Gaza, the group publicized its disagreement with the Muslim Brotherhood over Iran's revolution. Its first publication[87] contained the movement's main ideas: Khomeini's call to the Muslims of the world; an article about the Islamic revolution of the oppressed led by 'Iz al-Din al-Qassam; a call for permanent and organized dialogue among the Islamic groups; the battle against the tyranny of the Arab regimes based on the philosophy of Sayyid Qutb; and raising jihad to the top of the Islamic struggle's agenda.

Next, the group ran in the 1982 student council elections under the name "The Independent Islamists" (Al-Islamiyyun al-Mustaqillun). In 1984, the group attempted to form a faction called "The Islamic Student Movement" (Al-Harakah al-Islamiyyah al-Tulabiyyah) and published and distributed handwritten promotional material at the end of 1983 at the Islamic University. This flyer attacked the old Muslim Brotherhood's student council for kindling the fire of disagreement instead of striving to unite the Islamic groups. It cited the council's ban on the circulation of the new group's publications and compared the Muslim Brotherhood to a repressive government.[88]

It is interesting that Islamic Jihad's first flyer in the Territories was published not in Gaza but rather in al-Najah University in Nablus in May 1983.[89] The flyer severely attacked the university's secular student council for publishing a long declaration against the Islamic movement on different issues, including the support of the Islamic revolution in Iran. One of the subjects raised in the Islamic movement's counterflyer was the Arab secular nationalists' neglect of the Palestinian cause.

The year 1985 marked a new organizational feat for Islamic Jihad. It succeeded in forming as a proper party in several universities in the Territories under the name "The Islamic Group" (al-Jama'ah al-Islamiyyah)—a name borrowed from Egyptian student groups. This name, signaling Islamic violence, was used until the university was closed during the intifada. The group became the student faction of the Jihad movement.

Islamic Jihad differed from the Muslim Brotherhood and the nationalist groups on three basic points. The first was their support of the Iranian revolution. The second concerned the Palestine issue. Islamic Jihad favored military action against Israel, which served as a common denominator with the nationalist groups, especially Fatah. Inherent in its publications was harsh criticism of the Muslim Brotherhood's passive stance. The third difference concerned the unity of Islamic groups, not only in the Territories but throughout the Arab world. Islamic Jihad was influenced here by Shi'ite Iran, which wanted to end discord with Sunni Muslims and rebuild the Caliphate state. Anyone who disagreed with Islamic Jihad's strategy was declared an enemy. (In contrast, the Muslim Brotherhood emphasized Islamic pluralism.)

The revolutionary faction within Islamic Jihad was the only one to act as an official party at the Islamic University and in the universities in the West Bank. It refrained from using the name "Islamic Jihad" until June 1987, when it distributed a flyer bearing the name "Islamic Jihad Organization" at Islamic University. By October and November of 1987, it was the only name used and became the permanent name of the group led by Shaykh As'ad al-Tamimi during the intifada. The group affiliated with Fatah in the Gaza Strip began calling itself "The Islamic Jihad Squadrons" (Saraya al-Jihad al-Islami) and in the West Bank it added the words "Jerusalem/the temple" (Bait al-Maqdes).

The Islamic Jihad's bulletins were dull in comparison to those of the Islamic groups of the Muslim Brotherhood and contained few details regarding their groups' activities in different institutes, revealing Jihad's inferior position in the higher-education institutions in numbers, organization, and finances.

Until the outbreak of the intifada, the revolutionary Islamic Jihad group was successful only in Gaza, where it originated. In Islamic University's male and female student union elections in 1984 through 1986, it obtained six to seven percent of the male students' votes and a lower percentage among the female students. In the 1987 elections, held immediately after the outbreak of the uprising, it polled 15 percent of the votes. One may assume that this relatively high percentage is mainly due to the military actions of the other Jihad factions.

It seems that the main importance of the revolutionary faction in colleges and universities in the Territories lay more in its challenge to other Islamic groups than in any of its own achievements. It did supply the ideological basis that encouraged the forming of armed Islamic Jihad groups in 1986 and 1987, which implemented the revolutionary group's callings. The group also contributed to accelerating militant processes that developed among the young generation within the Muslim Brothers. Its activity and mode of organization were based on the student arena, most strongly at Islamic University.

 Conclusion

The higher-education institutions in the Territories had a crucial effect on the development of most Islamic groups, particularly the Muslim Brotherhood and the revolutionary faction of the Islamic Jihad. It molded a new, young, and educated generation that filled important leadership positions in these groups. This generation, which grew up in the midst of the general Palestinian national struggle in the Territories, introduced Palestinian patriotism to the Islamic arena in lieu of the 'Islamic cosmopolitanism' that characterized the Muslim Brotherhood until the 1980s. It also emphasized the political and cultural struggle between Islamic groups and popular nationalist secular groups. Actually, until the December 1987 intifada, colleges and universities were the main arena for Palestinian-Israeli conflict, a prelude of what was to engulf the whole Palestinian community during the uprising. In time, the young veterans of the secularreligious conflict would form the indigenous leadership of the intifada against the Israelis.

This secular-religious conflict also had a cultural dimension. The universities and colleges in the Territories, especially those in the West Bank, accelerated the absorption of Western secular culture, particularly among the lower class, traditional folk who comprised the majority of the student population. Daily exposure to Israeli society also contributed a Western influence. Bir Zeit University and Bethlehem University became the centers of the cultural struggle, with a notable number of Christian professors, local and foreign, and even Israeli Arab citizens. Al-Najah University in Nablus, despite having a Muslim character and very few Christian students and professors, developed a relatively strong Marxist element side by side with labor and professional unions.

Attempts were also made in the universities to create Palestinian cultural roots by exhibiting clothing, food, agricultural tools, and buildings from the pre-1948 era. Similar attempts at emphasizing the Canaanite heritage of the Palestinians, especially in Samarea, increased to a large extent immediately after the establishment of the Palestinian Authority in the 1990s. As in other Arab and Islamic countries (Egypt with its Pharaonic culture, Lebanon with the Phoenic, Turkey with the Pan-Turan, and Iran with its pre-Islamic Persian culture), these attempts led to religious tension and were sometimes seen as part of an anti-Islam campaign. In general, Palestinian culture in the Territories (and outside them after 1967) developed along secular lines, largely influenced by left-wing artists.

During the second half of the 1980s—right before the uprising—the Muslim Brotherhood was a strong rival of the secular nationalists among PLO supporters in the Territories. Its popularity was based partly on its passivity in the struggle against Israel. The tension between the Muslim Brotherhood and the secularists is well illustrated by the booklets circulated by both sides during the 1987 student council elections at Islamic University.

In the Muslim Brotherhoods' al-Haqiqah al-Gha'ibah (The Absent Truth),[90] the group quite apologetically presents its contribution to the Palestinian struggle since the 1930s through the participation of the Egyptian Muslim Brotherhoods in the wars against Israel from 1948 until 1967. The booklet's main weak spot, exposed by the Muslim Brotherhood's opponents, was the fact that this contribution ceased in the same years in which "the Islamic holy places, foremost the al-Aqsa mosque, fell into the hands of the Jews." The movement could not claim any achievements for the liberation of Palestine between 1967 and 1987.

The combination of cultural and political battles was characteristic of the Palestinian students' activities in all the higher-education institutions from 1980 until the uprising. The uprising spread the battle to the entire Palestinian population. The establishment of the Palestinian Authority worsened the internal conflict. The centricity of the higher-education institutes to the development of both the Islamic and nationalist groups strongly points out two issues related to Israel that until now have not been given proper attention.

Israel completely ignored the growth of Islamic sociocultural and nationalsecular foundations in these institutions, as they were not violent. In certain respects, Israel's behavior was a historical repetition of British behavior toward Jewish universities during the mandate period, chiefly Hebrew University in Jerusalem and the Technion in Haifa. But unlike the British, who were foreigners and did not consider themselves responsible for the future of the country, Israel is sure to be closely involved in the development of Palestinian society even after a permanent agreement is reached.

Israel's apathy regarding Palestinian social developments in the Territories contributed to its inability to read the 'Palestinian map' correctly. It misjudged the intensity of hatred toward the Israeli occupation, the causes of the national uprising headed by the lower classes in refugee camps, and the growth of Islamic groups and their deep hold on society. This hold was achieved mainly by community sociocultural-educational activity centered in higher-education institutions.

A second point concerning Israel is its conscious and unconscious influence on Palestinian society in the Territories. Palestinian colleges and universities and social foundations, both on the Islamic side and on the nationalist-secular side, continuously nurtured the study of Israeli society—an ability to read the 'Israeli map' and analyze the events in Israel. The large-scale employment of Palestinians in Israel, which grew in the 1980s, naturally contributed to this understanding, but it was also common among the lower classes both in the Gaza Strip and in the West Bank.

When members of these classes became a main force in Palestinian higher education in the Territories, they used their familiarity with Israeli society as a means of personal and national advancement. Palestinian colleges and universities manifested the two most important elements of Israeli society: education as the key to personal and collective advancement, and democratic pluralism.

[62] Abu Amru, Ziad, Usul al-Harakat al-Siyasiyyah fi Quta Ghazah 1948–1967 (Acre: Dar Al-Aswar, 1987), pp. 70—74.

[63] Regarding the Muslim Brotherhood see, Amnon Cohen, Parties in the West Bank during the Jordanian Reign (Jerusalem: Magnes Publishers, The Hebrew University, 1980), pp. 128–193.

[64] Regarding the demographic developments in the Territories and in the entire Palestinian arena, see Gad Gilbar, Trends in the Palestinian Demographic Development, 1870— 1987 (Tel Aviv: Moshe Dayan Center, Tel Aviv University, No. 108, September 1989).

[65] The age group of 0—24 formed 69.5 percent of the population in the West Bank (including East Jerusalem) and Gaza Strip in 1986. Of these, 60.5 percent were in the age group of 0—19. This is one of the world’s youngest populations, and this affected the development of political awareness. The age group of 20—34, the potential age of students in higher-education institutes in the Territories, then formed 21.5 percent, more than one fifth of the population.

According to a study made by the Higher Education Council in East Jerusalem, the number of those studying in higher-education institutes in the school year 1982—83 was 10,295, which formed 0.84 percent of the population in the Territories (including East Jerusalem). See Majlis al-Ta’lim al-’Aali, Hawl al-Ta’lim al-’Aali fi al-Dafah al-Gharbiyyah wa-Quta’ Ghazah (Arabic) (Jerusalem, 1983), p. 170.

[66] Naturally, there is no data, not even in general, regarding the extent of funding from the PLO to the Territories, although this funding was not kept secret by the organization. The best-known fund for helping the national foundation in the Territories was established during the convention of the Arab League at Baghdad in 1978. The funds were to come from all the Arab states. According to Arab publications, what happened was that in the 1980s only Saudi Arabia and the Gulf States participated in the funding. In the 1980s, the Joint Jordanian-Palestinian Committee, which was to determine the distribution of the funds, operated on and off next to the Baghdad Fund. This committee's activity varied according to changes in Jordan's relations with the PLO. In July 1986 there was a long break in its activity after the expulsion of Khalil al-Wazir "Abu Jihad" from Jordan and the closing of most of the organization's offices in Aman. After that it seldom assembled, according to the state of the political relations between Jordan and the organization. For some details regarding the funding of the national institutes in the Territories see: Khalil Nakhleh, Mu'asasatuna al-Jamahiriyyah fi Filastin: Nahwa Tatwir Ijtima'i Hadif (Our Public Institutions in Palestine: Towards Comprehensive Social Development) (Geneva, January 1990. A PLO inner publication. Private copy with author). Dr. Nakhleh is a sociologist, an Arab Israeli citizen who left Israel in the 1970s and among other things was involved with the activities of Palestinian funds in Europe.

[67] Several studies regarding the social influence of the universities and the education of the Palestinian population in the Territories were published, some in the Territories themselves. See Samir N. 'Anabtawi, Palestinian Higher Education in the West Bank and Gaza: A Critical Assessment (New York: Keagan Paul International, 1987); Nabil A. Badran, "The means of survival: education and the Palestinian Community 1948—1967," Journal of Palestine Studies, Vol. 9, No. 4 (Summer 1980), pp. 44—74; Gabi Baramki, "Aspects of Palestinian life under military occupation, with a special focus on education and development," British Journal of Middle Eastern Studies, Vol. 19 No. 2 (1992), pp. 125—132; Gabi Baramki, "Building Palestine Universities under occupation," Journal of Palestine Studies, Vol. 17, No. 1 (Autumn 1987), pp. 12—20; Munir Fasheh, "Education under occupation," in Nasser H. Aruri (ed.), Occupation: Israel over Palestine (Belmont: Arab American University Graduates (AAUG), 1989), pp. 511—535; Sarah Graham-Brown, "Impact on the social structure of Palestinian society," in Nasser H. Aruri (ed.), Occupation: Israel over Palestine

(Belmont: AAUG, 1989), pp. 230—256; Muhammad Hallaj, “Mission of Palestinian higher education,” in Emile A. Nakhleh (ed.), A Palestinian Agenda for the West Bank and Gaza (Washington: American Enterprise Institute, 1980), pp. 58—63; Khalil Mahshi, “The Palestinian uprising and education for the future,” Harvard Education Review, Vol. 59, No. 4 (1989), pp. 470^83; Muhsin D. Yusuf, “The potential impact of Palestinian education on a Palestinian state,” Journal of Palestine Studies, Vol. 8, No. 4 (Summer 1979); Ahmad ‘Awad Munir, Al-Ta’lim al-’Aali fi al-Dafah al-Gharbiyyah wa-Quta’ Ghazah: Tatawwuruhu wa-Ususuhu (Nablus: Jami’at al-Najah al-Wataniya, Markaz al-Dirasat al-Rifiyyah, 1983). See also R. Shadid Muhammed, “The Muslim Brotherhood movement in the West Bank and Gaza,” Third World Quarterly, Vol. 10, No. 2 (April 1988), pp. 658–682.

[68] For a good, concise view of the nationalist groups in the higher education institutes and their political division, see Emile Sahliyeh, In Search of Leadership: West Bank Politics since 1967 (Washington D.C.: The Brookings Institution, 1988), pp. 115136.

[69] Hamuda Samih, “Marakiz al-Turath al-Islami fi Filastin” (The Centers for Islamic Heritage in Palestine), Al-Hilal Al-Dawli No. 15 (May 1–15 1988), p. 10.

[70] A flyer of the fourth student Islamic convention, Sha’ban 1407—April 1987.

[71] Changing the names of bulletins was a known method of circumventing the need to receive a permit from the Israeli military rule for publishing a newspaper. A onetime bulletin did not need a permit in the Territories nor in East Jerusalem under Israeli law. The method was to choose a word identifying the paper to the public, and add another word or words to every issue creating a different phrase, as if it were a one-time publication.

[72] Al-Nur al-Rabbani (The Celestial Light), one-time publication of the culture department of The Young Muslims Association in Jerusalem. Undated, 41 pages. According to its content, it was published during the first months of 1982. Al-Nur (The Light), one-time publication of the Young Muslims Association, July 26 1982, 77 pages. Al-Nur al-Ilahi (The Divine Light), one-time publication of the Young Muslims Association, October 19, 1983, 73 pages.

[73] This fact was related to the author from Dr. Fathi Shqaqi himself, during a discussion with him in February 1986 in the Gaza prison.

[74] Al-Risalah, one-time publication of the student council of Hebron University, undated. According to its content, it was published on November 1.

[75] Ibid., pp. 6–9.

[76] Ibid., pp. 34–37.

[77] Al-Muntalaq, the mosque committee of Al-Najah University’s bulletin, No. 8 (February 1984) pp. 16–17.

[78] Al-Muntalaq, No. 9 (April 1984), p. 49.

[79] Al-Muntalaq, No. 8, pp. 18–19.

[80] See, for example, the results of the union elections held on June 27, 1983, in which the Muslim Brotherhood won in all the faculties. Al-Nidaa’, a publication of the student council in the Gaza university, undated (according to its content, it was published in the summer of 1983), p. 22.

[81] Al-Muntalaq, No. 11 (December 1984), p. 3.

[82] At least four such undated publications were known to have been distributed by the culture committee in the student council. According to their content, they were published during the years 1983—1985. They included more ideological content than the group's bulletins and were probably meant to enhance the Islamic awareness.

[83] See, for example: Al-Haqiqah al-Gha'ibah (The Absent Truth), November 1987, 55 pages. This was the second booklet in the series.

[84] See, for example, the booklet titled "The Islamic Awakening and the Muslim Brotherhood," No. 1, a one-time cultural publication of the culture committee of the student council of the Islamic University in Gaza, undated.

[85] A flyer signed by the Islamic group in Al-Najah University in Nablus, September 11, 1987. It is noteworthy in that the tension at the Islamic University in Gaza in regard to the elections there continued in the first days after the outbreak of the Palestinian uprising. After the elections, Fatah supporters blamed the Islamic group for rigging the elections. See: Al-Fajr, December 7 and 9, 1987.

[86] "The Islamic group in Bir Zeit University Mourns its Dead," an undated flyer circulated in December 1986.

[87] Voice of The Oppressed (Sawt Al-Mustad'afin), a publication on the occasion of culture week at the Islamic University in Gaza, June 1986, 56 pages. The Koranic term Mustad'afin was occasionally used by the Muslim Brotherhood, but was much more widely used in the terminology of the Islamic revolution in Iran, almost synonymous with revolutionists.

[88] In July-August 1983, many members of the Islamic group that then called itself “The Islamic Forerunner” (Al-Tali’ah al-Islamiyyah), named after the bulletin they circulated by that name in the Territories, were arrested. The arrests were for distributing illegal and inciting material, and most were sentenced to short prison terms of up to one year. Among the imprisoned was their leader, Dr. Fathi Shqaqi. During their detention and trial several members of the group blamed the Muslim Brotherhood and the Islamic group in the University of Gaza for assisting the authorities in uncovering them. Their trial revealed that they were engaged then not in any violent activity against Israel, but only in subversive activities.

[89] “The War against Islam Continues,” a manifest of the Islamic student movement in al-Najah University, May 23, 1983.

[90] Al-Haqiqah al-Gha’ibah (Gaza, November 1987). This booklet was the second publication in a series named Sawt al-Haqq wal-Quwwah wal-Huriyyah (Voice of Truth, Power, and Freedom), a known slogan with the Muslim Brotherhood. It may very well be that the name of the booklet was chosen to deliberately resemble the name of the book by the engineer Muhamad ‘Abd al-Salam Faraj, the ideologist for the Egyptian Jihad group whose members murdered the late president Sadat: Al-Faridah al-Gha’ibah (The Neglected Obligation—in this case, Jihad).

 4. Radical Islamist Movements in Turkey

Ely Karmon

It has been argued that the marginality of violent Islamist groups in Turkey, in contrast to the vigorous armed opposition in Egypt or Algeria, is due to the Turkish political system’s pluralism and the Islamist Welfare Party’s (RP) full integration into this system.[91] But the leaders and sponsors of these extremist organizations think that by using violence against the secular symbols of the Turkish state, leading secular intellectuals and journalists, and representatives of “Imperialism and Zionism,” they will help install an Islamic state. The limited reaction by the authorities up to 1996 and the RP’s electoral victories seemed to provide reasons for this hope.

The military coup of 1980 was intended to end a long period of widespread terrorism and extremist violence throughout the country and also to hold back the threat of radical Islam embodied in the National Salvation Party led by Necmettin Erbakan.[92] But while the 1980—1983 military government did break up the extreme left and right, the Islamic movement survived and even grew in importance during the 1980s.[93]

In marked contrast to Turkey’s first two military coups, military authorities in the 1980s proclaimed the importance of religion in the nation’s political life[94] and forwarded a new ideological concept called “The Turkish-Islamic Synthesis,” which represented an attempt to integrate Islamists and nationalists.[95] The Islamist influence in the system was to contribute to Turkey’s territorial integrity and counter revolutionary sentiments, especially among the Kurdish youth. The Islamists offered an attractive alternative even for ex-communists after the collapse of communism in the Soviet bloc.[96]

On the foreign front, the Turkish-Islamic synthesis was supposed to help contain southward Soviet expansion and combat Iran’s radical Islam by constructing a coalition of U.S.-backed moderate Islamic states. Closer relations with Saudi Arabia were favored in order to gain big loans for the weak Turkish economy.[97] The geopolitical tumult of the early 1990s created a new international environment, which put Turkey in a key position, sometimes in direct competition with Iran for regional influence and economic assets.[98] Nevertheless, that strategy let the Islamic genie out of Ataturk’s bottle, as one researcher put it.[99]

Islamic subversive and terrorist activity in Turkey began in the 1960s. As early as 1967 and 1973, the leaders of Hizb al-Tahrir (Islamic Liberation Party) were imprisoned for attempting “to bring the Islamic State Constitution to Turkey.”[100] Islamic Jihad appeared as a real terrorist threat in the 1980s, after a series of assassinations of Jordanian, Saudi, and Iraqi diplomats. In October 1991, Islamic Jihad took responsibility for killing an American sergeant and wounding an Egyptian diplomat to protest the Middle East peace conference in Madrid.[101] For many years it was assumed that this group was a Lebanese Shi’ite terrorist organization until it was discovered that a Turkish branch existed, engaging in assassinations of secular intellectuals.

As Anat Lapidot correctly notes, defining the Islamic movement is a complex task. Citing Sabri Sayari, she distinguishes between traditionalists and radicals, the latter a minority inspired by the Iranian revolution.[102] Ismet Imset points to the confusion about these different groups among the general public, researchers, and government officials in Turkey. A report by the Turkish National Intelligence Organization (MIT) and the Security General Directorate of the Police in October 1991 mentioned no fewer than ten Islamic organizations active in Turkey: the Turkish Islamic Liberation Army (IKO), the Turkish Islamic Liberation Front (TIK-C), Fighters of the Islamic Revolution (IDAM), the Turkish Islamic Liberation Union (TIKB), the World Shari’a Liberation Army (DSKO), the Universal Brotherhood Front-Shari’a Revenge Squad (EKC-SIM), the Islamic Liberation Party Front (IKP-C), Turkish Fighters of the Universal Islamic War of Liberation (EIK-TM), the Turkish Islamic Fighters Army (IMO), and the Turkish Shari’a Revenge Commandos (TSIK).[103]

This chapter uses the term Islamic movement to describe all currents in Turkish Islam, while Islamic Movement refers to one of the main radical groups.

Imset distinguishes between western and southeast Turkey. In the west, the Islamic Movement (Islami Hareket), also called “Islamic Resistance” (Islami Direnis), represents the ideological influence of the original (Iranian) Hizballah.[104] Both Movement and Resistance were only temporary code names, at least until 1990. In southeast Turkey, the movement spread first under the name of Hizballah, and was then referred to as the Hizbal-contra to address its anti-PKK activity. According to Imset, Hizballah and Islamic Movement are in fact one, representing an umbrella organization of groups acting on behalf of what he calls “The International Islamic Movement.”[105]

At the end of the 1970s, under the influence of the coalition between leftwing organizations and Khomeini’s followers in Iran, an alliance of the left, especially Maoists, with radical Islamic elements was established in Turkey that attacked the nationalist right. The conflict peaked in February 1979 when a young Muslim leader was killed by nationalists (known as “Idealists”) in the yard of the Fatih mosque in Istanbul.

The Turkish Islamic Movement, like all other radical organizations, received a serious blow during the September 1980 military coup. But, as the regime encouraged the general Islamic trend as a solution to political polarization, and as both Marxists and nationalists lost their influence, Islamic activists were afforded ample space to strengthen their position. The “Hizballah Muslims” appeared for the first time publicly in 1984 and, like the original Hizballah, proclaimed support for the Iranian revolution and the defense not of nations or sects, but of “Allah’s way.”

According to Imset, Kalim Siddiqui, a Pakistani active at the Muslim Institute in London, had a key role in unifying Turkey’s radical Islamic Movement. Thus, the first Hizballahi appeared in Turkey as the “followers of Siddiki” (sic).[106] A pro-Hizballah magazine published in November 1987 “The guidelines of the Islamic Movement,” which included acceptance of the Islamic state as the center of religious belief, the leadership of Muslim scholars, the spread of the mentality of martyrdom and the leadership of the Islamic revolution (in Iran).[107]

A significant development occurred in the middle of the 1980s with the conversion of some members of the right-wing Nationalist Movement (MHP) to Islam. The death of one of their leaders in prison in 1984 and the tortures suffered by many others convinced a group of extreme nationalist activists “to turn to Allah” and condemn the “darkness of nationalism.”[108] These militants were already professionals in the field of terrorism and street fighting and represented significant operational support for the Islamic Movement.

In southeast Turkey, Islamic radicalism emerged in poor towns and villages with large Kurdish populations (Dyarbakir, Silvan, Cizre, Kiziltepe and others), especially among the young and unemployed. They followed the teachings of local Muslim scholars or shaykhs and often organized themselves around extremist Islamic publications such as Tevhid, Yeryuzu and Objektif. Their activity became more visible at the beginning of the 1990s, influenced more and more by Khomeini's teachings, and they were identified by the local public as Hizballah, although they considered themselves part of the Islamic Movement.

There are few sources on the Turkish Islamic organizations, although the groups' publications and manifestos are distributed quite freely even when they threaten future terrorist attacks. All the material is in Turkish and has neither been collected nor translated. The only other source consists of interviews given by anonymous leaders and activists to Turkish journalists.

In one such interview, published in February 1993, a militant declared, "We are fighters of the Islamic Liberation Movement, the sword against Satan, blasphemy, Zionism and Imperialism. We have begun taking action only recently in Turkey and our move is based on pain, suffering and patience. We do not pursue a tribal case; our objective is to establish a state for the Muslims." Asked whether he belonged to Hizballah, the militant replied that the press had given that name to the organization and that they would adopt it only when the movement was worthy of it. Meanwhile it had not reached "that level of perfection."[109]

In speaking about the special relationship of the Movement with Iran, the same militant seemed careful not to confirm "the lies of the Turkish state" about such links. Iran is seen as an example and a guide but the instructions are "from the Quran" and not from Iran, "the land of Dar al-Islam where blasphemy has been crushed." The Movement needs no instructions from any country because the Quran is the program and shows the strategies and the tactics to be adopted.[110]

It seems that the Sunni origin of the radical Turkish Islamic groups did not prevent their close cooperation with the Iranian Shi’ite regime. The material published so far in the Turkish sources does not permit an evaluation of the exact nature of these groups’ ideology: declarations such as those cited above are general and not binding. Yet, it is known that various Sunni extremist organizations have viewed the Iranian revolution and its leader Khomeini as a catalyst and a model for their own revolutionary endeavor. This is the case of the Palestinian Islamic Jihad (PIJ) and its leader Fathi al-Shqaqi[111] or the Algerian Groupe Islamique Arme (GIA),[112] which also received direct Iranian logistic and financial support, leading the Algerian government to break diplomatic relations with Iran.

For its part, the Iranian regime, in spite of its increasing nationalism since its war with Iraq, has been keen to convince Sunni movements that it has continued to stick to Khomeini’s Islamic universalistic ideology. Ayatollah Ali Khamene’i, Iran’s spiritual leader, declared that his country wanted the unity of all Muslim brothers, Sunni and Shi’ite.[113]

A 1997 report prepared by the Turkish security authorities for the National Security Council (NSC) outlined the objectives of the radical religious movements and stressed that their strategy consists of three stages.[114] The first stage is the message (teblig), and calls for an effort by the radicals to persuade the people to adopt the Islamic religion, establish an Islamic state and administration, live in accordance with Islamic rules, and struggle to safeguard the Islamic way of life. The second stage is the community (cemaat) and calls for the restructuring of communities in accordance with the requirements of Islam. The third stage is the struggle (jihad) and calls for the armed struggle to safeguard the Islamic way of life.

Special mention should be made of a puzzling organization called “The Great Eastern Islamic Fighters Front” (IBDA-C), active since the middle of the 1970s but more extremist and aggressive since the beginning of the 1990s. Although it is an Islamic movement struggling for the constitution of an Islamic state, it uses leftist slogans in its publications and accepts ex-Marxists in its ranks. It is also extremely anti-Semitic and anti-Christian in its propaganda and terrorist activity. It is interesting to note that IBDA-C's publications do not show any particular pro-Iranian tendency.

A chronological analysis of Islamic terrorist activity shows that 1990 was probably the starting point for the offensive against the Turkish secular establishment: a professor, journalist, political scientist, and writer were assassinated by Islamic Jihad and the Islamic Operation (or Action), the first time this name was used.[115] Muammar Aksoy, a liberal political scientist, was also killed in 1990, marking the first time the name Islamic Movement appeared.[116]

In 1991, Islamic radicals entered a period of reassessment that ended after the opening of the Madrid peace talks between Arab countries and Israel. In October, an American soldier was killed and an Egyptian diplomat was wounded by Islamic Jihad.[117] The following year represented the turning point in radical Islamic terrorist activity, as the targets of attacks included exiled Iranian opposition members as well as Jews and Israelis.[118]

But the terrorist threat attracted acute national attention when Ugur Mumcu, one of Turkey's top investigative reporters, was killed on January 24, 1993 by a car bomb similar to one used in the assassinations of an American computer specialist in October 1991 and an Israeli diplomat in March 1992. Both the Islamic Liberation Organization and IBDA-C took responsibility for the murder.[119]

Several days later an attempt was made on the life of a well-known Turkish businessman and community leader of Jewish origin, Jak Kamhi, by a group of four terrorists who used automatic weapons and even a rocket launcher. He escaped uninjured. The same month, the tortured body of exiled Iranian dissident Abbas Gholizadeh, a former officer and the Shah's bodyguard, kidnapped several weeks before, was discovered by the police.

This series of terrorist events provoked a sharp reaction among the Turkish public: huge street demonstrations in favor of the secular regime, a strong press campaign, and swift action by security authorities against the perpetrators and their sponsors followed. For the first time, the Islamic Movement and Iran were directly implicated in acts of terror against the state. The arrests and interrogations of many Turkish members of these organizations unveiled the story behind the killings of Turkish secular intellectuals and anti-Khomeini Iranian exiles in the years 1990 to 1992.[120]

But the arrest and trial of dozens of Islamic terrorists did not dissuade more extremists from continuing to attack secular Turkish intellectuals. In July 1993, they set fire to a hotel hosting a cultural festival, killing thirty-seven people.[121]

The authorities' fight against the radicals continued in 1994, when 659 members of Hizballah were caught, some of them responsible for murders of exiled Iranian opposition activists. The same year, IBDA-C was responsible for ninety terrorist incidents, including five bombings in various cities.[122] A prominent cinema critic and writer, Onat Kutlar, was killed in December by a bomb attack carried out by IBDA-C aimed "at spoiling the colonialist Noel [Christmas] celebrations."[123]

One of the most controversial terrorist activities of Hizballah in southeast Turkey has been the liquidation of dozens of pro-PKK activists, journalists, intellectuals, and politicians beginning in the fall of 1991 and lasting through 1993. It has been widely assumed that this was the work of the splinter group "Hizbal-contra," because of the immunity it enjoyed from security authorities owing to its anti-PKK nature.[124]

It must be stressed that its members were mostly of Kurdish origin. The Hizballah regards the PKK as Islam's enemy and has accused it of "trying to create an atheist community, supporting the communist system, trying to divide the people through chauvinist activities and directing pressure on the Muslim people."[125] A Hizballah militant in the southeast described the goal of his organization as the establishment of an "Islamic Kurdish state in Turkey."[126]

In March 1993, the PKK signed a “cooperation protocol” with the Hizballah Kurdish Revolutionary Party aimed at ending the conflict and finding “methods for a joint struggle against the Turkish state.” The agreement was signed after Hizballah recognized that it was exploited by “the colonialists” and that the clashes in no way benefited the cause of Islam.[127]

A turning point in the Turkish authorities’ attitude toward the Islamic terrorist threat occurred in March 1996, with the arrest of one of the leaders of Islamic Action, Irfan Cagarici, and his confessions about the role his organization had played since the early 1990s in the assassinations of secular politicians and intellectuals, with the direct support and supervision of Iranian intelli- gence.[128] Relations between Turkey and Iran reached a new low as a result. But then, in June 1996, after 73 years of secular Kemalist regimes, the RP formed an Islamic government with Erbakan as prime minister.[129]

Turgut Ozal became in 1983 the first prime minister of a civilian government after the 1980 coup. His “Turkish-Islamist Synthesis,” a means of countering revolutionary sentiment, included a relaxation of Kemalist and secularist policies and a public embrace of Islam as an essential component of Turkish identity. During the long period of his rule as prime minister and then president of Turkey, Muslim associations, foundations, publications, and television and radio stations flourished. Islamists also built strongholds in the Ministry of Education.[130]

The important role played by Islamic radical publications in recruiting militants and designating targets cannot be underestimated. Two Istanbul-based publications, Akademi and Objektif, and the monthlies Yeryuzu and Tehvid have been accused of backing Hizballah.[131] IBDA-C sent death threats to the head of the Jewish community in Ankara before a bomb was placed in his car, and published a list of Jewish targets in the extreme religious periodical Akinci Yolu.[132] IBDA-C’s weekly, Taraf, took responsibility for the bomb attack on film critic Onat Kutlar in December 1994 and sent “a warning not to play with fire” to TV journalist Ali Kirca, whom it accused of being “anti-Islam.”[133]

In this atmosphere, pro-Islamic politicians received important appointments in the sensitive field of security, such as the Ministry of Interior. Under Interior Minister Abdulkadir Aksu, who served at the end of the 1980s, Turkey's security apparatus—especially the intelligence and personnel departments—was penetrated by pro-Islamic elements and, according to Ismet Imset, the ministry during this period was generally inclined toward "Saudi and even Iranian Islamism." Aksu was replaced at the end of 1991 and the police were purged of fundamentalist officers.[134] According to one source, 700 of the 1,600 key ministry executives, provincial governors, and other functionaries at the time were believed to be RP supporters. Yet, even in April 1994, Interior Ministry officials permitted the staging of unauthorized mass Islamist demonstrations in Ankara and Istanbul.[135] Ironically, these fundamentalist officers and functionaries were reassigned to posts in the southeast, where they supported or ignored the attacks of Hizballah against the PKK.

The RP leadership's attitude regarding violence and terror on the Islamic movement's radical fringes is at the least ambiguous, if not clearly supportive. Erbakan condemned the March 1993 assassination of the journalist Mumcu and declared it incompatible with the values of true Islam, but at the same time, important members of his party accused Israel of killing him.[136] In November 1993, Erbakan said at his party's parliamentary meeting that only "Islamic fraternity" could combat the PKK, but he did not mention the terrorism practiced by some Islamic groups.[137] Some researchers even considered Hizballah the RP's armed protector.[138]

Despite all the evidence, as late as the end of 1995, leading Islamic circles denied the existence of fundamentalist terrorist organizations. Deputy RP leader Abdullah Gul declared that no terror movement is compatible with Islam and that the accusation is "being circulated intentionally" in order to influence national elections. According to another leader, most of the crimes in Turkey blamed on the Islamic movement were in fact "international operations" and "plots of the West."[139]

Erbakan's real policy toward Islamic terrorist groups can be judged by the fact that he hosted, as prime minister, representatives of the Palestinian Hamas, Egypt's Muslim Brotherhood, and Algeria's FIS. Erbakan was not even impressed by Egyptian President Husni Mubarak's protest against including the Muslim Brotherhood, sparking a diplomatic incident with Egypt. Over the years, Erbakan maintained a strange silence about the complicity of neighboring Muslim countries in anti-Turkish terrorism.[140]

Iran's support for and incitement of Islamic terrorism in Turkey in the early 1990s can be understood as part of its drive to export the Islamic revolution to a key Muslim country, a symbol of secularism and a strategic adversary. Tehran's aggressive policy was probably encouraged by Islam's growing influence in Turkish society. Iran especially encouraged Ozal's policy in the 1980s of embracing Islam and expanding Turkey's relations with its Muslim neighbors.[141]

Good relations did not, however, prevent deep Iranian involvement in Islamic terrorism inside Turkey's borders, which at times was proven in court or leaked by security authorities to the media. Iran was involved in the 1990 murder of three intellectuals, and the murders of Mumcu, an Iranian dissident, and a Jewish businessman, all in 1993. Turkish Islamic terrorists, who were recruited through numerous Iranian cultural centers in Turkey, received military training in Iran in "pursuit, counter-pursuit, weapons and bombs."[142]

As noted previously, an abrupt change occurred in the Turkish authorities' attitude after Mumcu's killing when rampant terrorism and growing international criticism of Iran prodded Ankara to finally acknowledge that the Turkish Hizballah existed.[143] For the first time, a Turkish minister declared that members of radical Islamic organizations trained in Iranian security installations, traveled with Iranian real and forged documents, and attacked Turkish citizens and Iranian opposition militants with Iranian-supplied arms.[144] Turkey's approach toward Iran, however, was very cautious.[145] The minister absolved the Iranian state of these actions, but concluded that "the perpetrators had connections in Iran."[146]

Iran's foreign minister issued a subtle denial excluding the possibility that any anti-Turkish activity conducted on Iran's territory could escape the state's control. While denying that Iran was behind anti-Turkey movements, he accused Turkey of supporting terrorist groups opposed to the Tehran regime and suggested discussing any “mutual allegations” through a common security committee.[147]

Iran has never presented evidence of any Turkish sponsorship of terrorist organizations in Iran, though Turkey has sheltered more than a million Iranians, many of them political refugees from Khomeini’s regime. The main conflict in subsequent years surrounded not Iran’s support for Islamists but rather, its support of the PKK. Iran offered a safe haven to PKK fighters, who in 1994 intensified their terrorist campaign both inside and outside Turkey’s borders.[148]

Iranian support for radical Islamic terrorism in Turkey was likely dampened by the vigilant campaign waged by Turkey’s security forces against the Islamic groups and the consequent decline in their operations in 1994 and 1995. Radical Islamist organizations staged 86 acts of violence in 1995, compared with 464 attacks in 1994. Further, Ilim, one of Hizballah’s two splinter groups (the other was Menzil), ceased most of its armed activity and many Islamic Movement militants were arrested.[149]

Turkey’s fundamentalist Islamic movement has developed in a political and social environment very different from that of similar groups in other Middle Eastern countries. As Sami Zubaida notes, Turkey’s Islamist ideology is also nationalist and challenges Kemalism’s European leanings. At the same time, the Islamic movement’s leading political force—the RP and its various predecessors and successors—is fully integrated into the Turkish pluralist system, which may account for the marginality of the violent Islamic groups.[150]

The RP’s ambiguous and tortuous policy over the issue of Islamic terrorism in Turkey and Iranian involvement in it during the 1990—1996 period casts doubt about its genuine acceptance of Turkey’s democratic values and secular regime. What probably most influenced the RP’s moderate and cautious policies over the years has been the army’s staunch secular orientation and the country’s secular nationalist core. These factors also influenced the strategy of the more violent Islamic terrorist groups. They never, for example, attacked military or security personnel, although many of their members were killed during the security forces' anti-terrorist campaigns. In contrast with Egypt or Algeria, the Turkish groups have also refrained from attacking top secular politicians, though some low-level Kurdish politicians have been targeted.[151] Moreover, Turkish Islamic groups have not attacked Western targets or acted abroad, like other Islamic groups or the PKK, though they have some infrastructure in Europe.[152]

Instead, the groups limited their operations to secular intellectuals and media professionals who were important in shaping public opinion against the Islamic movement. Indeed, until Mumcu's murder, operations against these targets did not seem to provoke a strong reaction against terrorist groups and their political mentors. Islamic groups attacked Jewish personalities, the Jewish community, and also Israeli diplomats, but in this they were not different from RP, which expressed anti-Semitic and anti-Israel views.[153] Indeed, because they shared a similar ideology, if not method, it can be hypothesized that RP leaders tried to cover up the radicals' violent practices.

The tolerance shown by some in the security establishment—especially those in the Ministry of Interior and the police who came to senior positions due to their Islamic views or connections—helped terrorist groups in their formative period. Top military leaders were clearly worried by this trend and it seems that an attempt by one police agency to spy on the National Security Council fostered its decision to bring down the Erbakan government.[154] The lack of any major act of Islamic terrorism during Erbakan's premiership and until the decision of the Constitutional Court to outlaw his party, raises some questions about the strategy of these groups and the real goals of their leaders and sponsors.

Turkey's growing military and strategic cooperation with Israel, which became public in 1996 and 1997, did not generate any particularly violent activity against the government or Israeli targets, despite the RP's clear opposition and Iran's anxiety. However, the Turkish military gave no respite to the new Islamic prime minister. On August 3, 1996, the Supreme Military Council (SMC) declared that "reactionism"—that is, Islamic fundamentalism—was becoming an important threat to Turkey.[155] This meeting could be seen as the watershed leading to the Turkish army's decision to unequivocally end the Turkish-Islamic Synthesis era and eradicate both political and violent Islamist forces.

Following this first direct warning, President Suleyman Demirel sent several warning letters to the government, without result. And twice in early 1997, the NSC demanded that the government stop "illegal activities" and defend the secular regime.

The army's twenty urgent demands included "enforcement of neglected constitutional requirements on dress codes and on banning of Sufi brotherhoods; reversal of worrisome social and political trends, such as the growth of religious schools and infiltration of Islamists into the bureaucracy; special restrictions implicitly aimed at Refah, such as limits on cash transactions by Islamist groups and acceptance of party responsibility for the 'unconstitutional,' i.e., antisecular, behavior of its members; and careful monitoring of Iranian efforts to 'destabilize' Turkey."[156]

Erbakan avoided implementing the NSC's decisions and persisted in anticipating the possibility of "defense industrial cooperation" with Iran. After the February 1997 Jerusalem Day incident in Ankara's Sincan district, when inflammatory remarks by Iran's ambassador to Turkey and the city's RP mayor triggered a show of force by the Turkish military resulting in the ambassador's recall, Erbakan was finished. On June 18, 1997, under army pressure, Erbakan resigned; on January 16, 1998 the Constitutional Court outlawed the Refah Party and barred Erbakan from political activity for five years. The following month, a new party, the Virtue Party (FP), replaced the RP, gathering in its ranks some 130 parliamentarians from the old movement.

The Turkish army's views on the threat of Islamic extremism were unequivocal. Consider the following remarks given by the General Staff's chief of intelligence in June 1997:

<quote>

Following the transition to a multiparty system and as a result of concessions made to the detriment of Ataturkist principles and reforms, the reactionary sector stepped up its work to organize nationally under the umbrella of democracy... [resulting in a] situation [that] has turned individual fundamentalist activities into a mass movement [and] has created a climate that encourages and rewards those who raise a green banner instead of the sacred flag of the Turkish Republic.

</quote>

Even the appearance of separatist movements (that is, the Kurdish problem) was attributed to “the authority vacuum,” and to “[t]hose who do not wish to recognize the Turkish national identity and ... have undertaken activities behind the guise of the more international religious identity... as a first step toward their ultimate goal of destroying the unity and harmony of the Turkish Republic.”[157]

The speech detailed how, particularly since the Erbakan government, Islamic groups were able to build a huge political,[158] social,[159] economic,[160] and propaganda[161] infrastructure. It equated the threat from the “reactionary sector” with that of the Kurdistan Workers’ Party (PKK) in Turkey’s east and southeast, drew a link between the two anti-regime movements, and accused Iran of systematically providing every type of material and moral support to violent Turkish Islamic groups such as Hizballah, Selam, and the Islamic Movement.

In late July 1997, violence erupted in the first major Islamic demonstration since Erbakan’s forced resignation a month earlier. At least thirteen people were wounded and scores arrested in clashes in Ankara between police and thousands of Islamists protesting a government plan to severely curtail religious education in secondary schools.[162]

The impact of the secular military and civil establishment’s firm policy could be felt after the April 1999 parliamentary elections. The Virtue Party took only 15 percent of the vote, suffering a bitter defeat, although its candidates were re-elected as mayors of the country’s two largest cities, Istanbul and

Ankara. The real winners of these elections were Prime Minister Bulent Ecevit and his Democratic Left Party (DLP) and the Nationalist Action Party (MHP), which took about 18 percent of the vote, astonishing even its own leaders.[163] “Virtue’s decline will pull Turkey away from the appearance of a country where radical Islam is on the rise,” commented Ertugrul Ozkok, editor of the Hurriyet newspaper.[164] The Constitutional Court opened a closure case against the Virtue Party after the April 18, 1999 elections on charges that the party was carrying out antisecular activities and was the successor of the RP.[165]

It is difficult to draw an accurate picture of the terrorist activity of Islamist groups in Turkey since 1997. Most of the data published by the Turkish press relates to IBDA-C terrorism in big cities such as Istanbul and Ankara. Hizballah is active mainly in eastern and southeastern Anatolia and the national press rarely reports its attacks.[166] The group’s actions surface when members of Hizballah are detained in police operations and generally are not detailed. There is also a difference between the targets attacked by the two main organizations: while IBDA-C targeted secular journalists and intellectuals, symbolic sites of the secular regime, Christian (Greek) shrines, and even brothels, Hizballah focused on killing people in the southeastern provinces (including militants suspected of being informers), extorting money, and engaging in organizational activities in primary and high schools, universities, mosques, and shrines.[167]

After a lull in IBDA-C’s activity in 1997 and 1998, the organization staged a series of attacks beginning in October 1999 that could be regarded as a campaign to emphasize its renewed strength.[168] The most important and striking attack was the assassination on October 21, 1999 of Ahmet Taner Kislali, a former minister, academic, and respected newspaper columnist. Earlier, in June 1999, the General Directorate of Security affirmed that it had received a tip-off that IBDA-C was preparing to assassinate Premier Bulent Ecevit.[169]

One of the reasons for the autumn terrorist campaign could be the April 1999 trial of Salih Izzet Erdis (alias Salih Mirzabeyoglu), considered to be the leader of IBDA-C, and three of his deputies. During the trial, dozens of IBDA-C sympathizers protested violently in front of the court and more than thirty were arrested. As a result, Turkish security authorities intensified their counterterrorist measures and arrested many active members of the organization, although they did not find the connection with Kislali's assassination. On November 15, 1999, twenty IBDA- C members were caught with weapons and bomb-making materials, planning to execute sensational acts of terrorism in Istanbul. Suspected targets included several well-known personalities such as Professor Yasar Nuri Ozturk, dean of the theology school at Istanbul University, and writer and columnist Fatih Altayli.[170] The group was also preparing to stage bomb attacks on November 6, to protest the anniversary of the founding of the Institution of Higher Education (YOK). Hasan Ozdemir, the director general of the Istanbul police, stressed that Erdis, IBDA-C's imprisoned leader, declared 1999 "The Year of Conquest."[171] According to Turkish officials, twenty separate operations were staged against IBDA-C in 1998 and 1999, netting 166 suspects and accounting for thirty-five acts of terror.

Security authorities have also waged a relentless campaign against the military and civil infrastructure of all the branches of Hizballah, considered to be the most powerful and dangerous of all the violent Islamist organizations. These extensive counterterrorist operations paralleled the well-publicized war against PKK guerrilla forces in southeastern Turkey and northern Iraq, but received no attention from the foreign media.

On April 22, 1998, Interior Minister Murat Basesgioglu announced the first wave of intensive operations against Hizballah, particularly in the eastern and southeastern Anatolian provinces. By the end of the month, 130 of the 1,000 wanted militants were captured in Diyarbakir alone. Dozens of other militants were arrested in May in Batman, Mersin, and Mus.

The second significant counterterrorist wave came in March 1999, when 400 Hizballah members were captured in the southeastern Diyarbakir, Mardin, and Batman provinces. Several dozen more Hizballah militants were captured that June.[172] Parallel to tracking IBDA-C terrorists in October and November 1999, operations against Hizballah continued with the arrests of nearly 100 militants in Diyarbakir, including a number of senior figures. In November, the government announced that Hizballah's infrastructure in eastern Turkey had been completely cracked.[173]

In January 1999, Kemal Donmez, chairman of the Struggle Against Terrorism Department, declared that a total of 3,793 people had been captured in ten years of operations against illegal fundamentalist organizations like Hizballah, IBDA-C, the Islamist Movement, and the Islamic Communities Union.[174] The arrest of many Hizballah militants helped solve 800 crimes, 400 of which were murders.

Despite the successes of the Turkish security forces, at least 20,000 supporters of violent Islamic groups strived to establish a “Kurdish-Islam” state in the southeastern Anatolian region. Operations in 1999 revealed that the organizational skills and overall strength of Hizballah were much greater than previously assumed.

In March 1999, allegations against Erbakan for the first time accused the former Islamist prime minister of being directly connected to terrorist organizations.

State Prosecutor Nuh Mete Yuksel accused Erbakan of participating in December 25, 1993 meetings in Tehran with the Greek 17 November organization, Fatah, the Lebanese Hizballah, the Japanese Red Army, the Abu-Nidal Group, Turkish Hizballah, and RP members under the chairmanship of Iran’s spiritual leader, Ali Khamene’i. The accusation was based on the testimony of Altan Karamanoglu, Turkey’s former ambassador to Baku. Participants in that meeting decided to establish a joint command, provisionally headquartered in Iran but slated to move to Turkey when a theocratic regime would be set up there.[175]

According to an indictment prepared by Yuksel, the RP’s former Deputy Chairman Ahmet Tekdal and former Deputies Sevki Yilmaz, Hasan Huseyin Ceylan, and Ibrahim Halil Celik face death sentences on charges that they tried to undermine the current constitutional state system and replace it with a state based on religious principles. The 75-page indictment states that the National View, the Islamists’ main ideological body, aimed to replace the current democratic system with an Islam-based one.[176]

The Virtue Party and the RP were also accused of having links to radical Islamic organizations abroad, such as the Islamic Salvation Front (FIS) of Algeria and the Muslim Brotherhood of Syria. The indictment also charged the National View with having contacts with IBDA-C. Most importantly, representatives of the National View were reportedly connected to the PKK. The indictment accused Erbakan of promising to legitimize the “status of bandits” during his tenure as prime minister.

The same prosecutor launched a probe into remarks against secularism broadcast on a private television channel by the well-known and respected Islamic preacher Fethullah Gulen. Gulen had warned a group of his followers that, “If they come out early, the world will squash their heads. They would make Muslims once again relive incidents such as those that occurred in Algeria, Syria and Egypt.” In the recording, Gulen also underlined the importance of expanding his group within the civil and justice administrations. “In these entities will be our guarantee for the future,” he said. Prosecutors apparently believe that Gulen was warning his followers that if they rose up before they were fully prepared, they would face defeat. They therefore sought capital punishment for Gulen on suspicion of plotting religious unrest in Turkey.[177]

Finally, in July 1999, Uzbek dissidents convicted of playing a role in a February 1999 assassination attempt against Uzbek President Islam Karimov claimed that Erbakan had helped them financially.[178]

One of the possible consequences of the PKK’s decline as a fighting organization after the new peace strategy devised by its imprisoned leader Abdullah Ocalan could be a strengthening of radical Islamist groups, mainly Hizballah.

Relations between the PKK and some of the Islamic radical groups at the beginning of the 1990s were marked by ideological conflict and rivalry over the same Kurdish constituency in southeastern Turkey. At times this conflict permitted Turkish authorities to use the more extremist elements of the Islamic Kurdish Hizballah in their fight against the nationalist PKK. In 1993, however, the two sides, acknowledging the danger of the internecine strife, agreed to a modus- vivendi and common struggle against the Kemalist regime. Since then, the PKK and most of the Islamist radicals have cooperated in the local operational arena.[179]

Hasan Yalcin, acting leader of the Labor Party, has claimed that a cooperation agreement, including the perpetrating of some attacks, was signed between the People's Liberation Army of Kurdistan, the PKK's military wing, and the fundamentalist Rahmet Group. He affirmed that a PKK-IBDA-C protocol about common terrorist training existed. Within this framework, the PKK trained some IBDA-C militants in Greece in acts of sabotage. According to Yalcin, the agreement between the PKK and Hizballah was also still in force.

According to the Istanbul Hurriyet, Hizballah has avoided armed clashes with the PKK since 1995 and rarely taken punitive measures against it because it considers PKK militants as a "ready military force." The Hizballah views PKK property as "free of charge," inheritable if Ocalan is executed and his organization dismembered.[180]

Emin Gurses of Sakarya University thinks that the PKK is in a process of disintegration and that the new threat will be Hizbul-PKK. Umit Ozdag of Gazi University believes that it will be very difficult for the PKK to survive without Ocalan's leadership, which was critical to raising money in Europe. Hizballah, according to Ozdag, is building up seriously, although it does not yet have the practical experience of the PKK.[181]

While Iran welcomed Erbakan's pro-Islamic policy, the warming in relations did not interfere with the overall strategy of furthering the Islamization of Turkey, as the 1997 Sincan incident revealed. In an interview with the Istanbul Turkiye, the Iranian ambassador said that at Sincan he spoke only about facts concerning Israel and that beyond that he did not even hint about Turkey: "I did not mention Hizballah or anything like that. I simply produced historic examples to show that Israel is a fundamentalist state. I did not even mention Yasir Arafat." He added, candidly, that the year before he had presented a far tougher speech at Jerusalem Day, but then the press did not even devote a line to it. "Had the RP not been in government this year, the press would again not have mentioned it. It is inconceivable to use a neighboring country to get rid of the RP, and that without justification," complained the ambassador.[182]

The expanding military cooperation between Turkey and Israel, which Erbakan could not erase, caused great concern in Iranian governmental circles and was considered a new American-Zionist plot to isolate and encircle Iran.[183] Tehran considers its conflict with Turkey not merely as a strategic and political competition between two regional rivals, but mostly as an ideological battle between its radical Islamic worldview and Turkey's "adamant [will] to translate into practice the western concept of secularism."[184]

After the PKK's expulsion from Syria in October 1998 and Ocalan's February 1999 capture in Kenya, Iran was accused of actively supporting the Kurdish organization's attacks against Turkey. Turkish intelligence established that Osman Ocalan, Abdullah's brother, who aspired to be the new leader of the PKK, was under government protection in Iran and occasionally met Iranian officials for talks. It was reported that Iran was preparing Osman Ocalan and his men for bloody terrorist attacks against Turkey and providing them with logistic and technical aid in pursuit of the same anti-Turkey policy that Syria employed.[185]

According to the Turkish press, Tehran wanted to control not only the PKK but also Turkish Hizballah, which was organized in the same region. During his interrogation, PKK's leader Abdullah Ocalan admitted that Iran mediated between the PKK and Hizballah.[186]

In July 1999, Turkish authorities reported again that Abdulaziz Tunc, the first Hizballah 'confessor' and an assistant to its escaped leader, Huseyin Velioglu, affirmed that Iran was a supporter. Tunc and other Hizballah members were trained in Iran in 1988 on how to use hand grenades, automatic weapons, and rockets.[187]

Also in July 1999, Tehran complained that Turkey had bombed an Iranian town at the mountainous junction of the Iranian, Iraqi, and Turkish borders—an area used by PKK guerrillas—killing five people and wounding ten. Iran retaliated by capturing two Turkish soldiers accused of straying into Iranian territory while pursuing the PKK; rather than return the soldiers immediately, Iran initially announced that they would be put on trial. These incidents fueled the tension between the two countries.[188]

The military incidents were accompanied by harsh criticism of the Iranian regime by Turkish prime minister Bulent Ecevit, who labeled student protests in Iran's cities a "natural" reaction against an "outdated regime of oppression." Ecevit also accused Iran of replacing Syria as the biggest base for PKK rebels.

The tension dissipated after the return of the two soldier-prisoners and a series of Turkish-Iranian security meetings focusing on Tehran's alleged growing support of anti-Turkish organizations. Korkmaz Haktanir, undersecretary of the Turkish Foreign Ministry, visited Iran on October 17 and 18 and asked Iranian leaders to act vigilantly against terrorists using their country for transit purposes. Positive security mechanisms between Turkey and Iran were also set up.[189]

The Turkish daily Milliyet analyzed Iran's policy in this context: "Democratic and modern Turkey that nonetheless respects and is committed to its religion constitutes a model for the Iranians, and the Tehran regime is uneasy about that." Tehran was also aware of its military weakness. Iran's frail economy and the most recent student protests had demonstrated that many dissatisfied people opposed the regime. Moreover, Iran was worried by the possible attitude of its important Azeri Turk minority. All these factors indicated that Iran was unlikely to risk a hot war with Turkey. But, the Turkish newspaper speculated that even after the end of the prisoners' crisis, Iran would not pursue friendship with Turkey so long as it did not have a democratic and strong regime, and that the stormy relationship between the two countries would continue.[190]

The Iranian view, according to the Tehran daily Resalat, was not optimistic either. The Turkish bombing of Iranian territory “has put the Iranian nation in psychological conditions of war and rancor toward the government and the military ruling over Turkey.” The newspaper accused Ecevit of directing Turkish anger against Iran, because it regarded Islam in Turkey as an extension of Iran’s Islamism. Moreover, the Turkish military aggression against Iran had to be seen not only “in terms of that country’s national interests and objectives ... but also as the direct result of Turkey’s membership of NATO ... and its special ties with America and the Zionist regime.” It stressed the fact that the recent incidents coincided with President Demirel’s visit “to the occupied Palestine.” Turkey was presented therefore as a linking platform between military activity against Iran and “the centers controlling those activities in the West and the Zionist regime.” Thus, even if the crisis were to end, “enmity and hatred would still continue to remain in the minds of the Iranian nation.”[191]

According to Alan Makovsky, part of Turkey’s post-Gulf War self-confidence and activism is its new relationship with Israel. Turkey and Israel are both Western- oriented and pro-United States, and deeply concerned about terrorism and Islamic fundamentalism. The only democracies in the Middle East, Turkey and Israel are also the two most economically dynamic and militarily powerful states in the region.[192] Therefore, it is quite natural for them to have finally announced in 1996 a strategic agreement including common military training, defense-industrial cooperation, collaboration in gathering intelligence on Syria, Iran, and Iraq, and free trade. Indeed, bilateral trade, virtually nonexistent in 1990 and roughly $450 million in 1998, was expected to reach more than $1 billion in 2000.[193]

Ironically, the relationship came to light during Erbakan’s premiership. Although the RP and Erbakan were staunch opponents of the Turkish-Israeli alliance, they were forced by the military “to swallow the frog” and accept it against their will. Erbakan’s signing of the agreement himself signaled to his followers, and opponents, the weakness of the Islamist movement and the limits of its political weight.

This event indicated the final step of the secular Turkish establishment, under the pressure of the unanimous military command, to resolutely leave behind the failed Turkish-Islamic Synthesis strategy, subdue the growing Islamist movement, and neutralize its political, social, and violent strongholds. The alliance also allowed for the military defeat of the PKK, seen more and more as an objective ally of the Islamists, by forcing Syria to expel its leader and other militants and stop any support for the Kurdish separatist movement.

On October 26, 1999, Cevik Bir, former deputy chief of the Turkish General Staff, remarked in an address at The Washington Institute for Near East Policy that “Turkey became a ‘front country’ in the region when new threats emerged after the Cold War ... The initiation of Turkish-Israeli relations should be seen in this light. Contrary to the beliefs of some, neither the United States nor any other third party initiated Turkish-Israeli cooperation or the 1996 military training and cooperation agreement. These were the initiatives of the Turkish leadership.”[194] General Bir affirmed that this military agreement paved the way for a resolution of the Autumn 1998 Turkish-Syrian crisis and, in his opinion, Syria’s more responsive attitude toward Turkey since then proves that the Turkish-Israeli agreement works.[195]

The Islamic fundamentalist movement in Turkey shares many common features with movements in many Muslim countries but it understands the dangers of a direct clash with the nationalist Kemalist ideology and a military sworn to defend it. The politicization of Islam by the new intellectual and economic elite and military—who believed they could transform it into a pillar of the regime— has been skillfully exploited by the Islamic movement in its bid to achieve power and install an Islamic regime.

This is also true regarding the more radical, violent Islamic offshoots. Their expansion and relative freedom of action was tolerated until they became a real threat to internal political stability. The RP’s parallel growth, its electoral success, and its leadership’s indulgence of the Islamists’ terror no doubt encouraged further violence.

It is noteworthy that following the RP's biggest electoral success in December 1995 and until the resignation of Erbakan's government in June 1997, Islamic groups perpetrated no serious terrorist acts, with the exception of low- level attacks by the IBDA-C, the most independent of the groups. Erbakan's policy of boosting relations with Iran and Libya possibly gave the radical groups the impression—or hope—that the RP government would indeed follow a more extremist Islamic policy.

Erbakan's resignation under army pressure, the succeeding government's steps to curtail the Islamic influence on the education system, the outlawing of the RP, and the recent move to ban its successor, the FP, have changed the rules of the game. The secular establishment, feeling the double pressure of the powerful military and of anxious Turkish civilians who favor the Kemalist ideology and regime, has definitely shown that the Turkish-Islamic Synthesis does not present a solution to Turkey's intricate problems.

Turkey has been able to resolutely challenge and foil growing domestic Islamic radicals due to a number of developments: its new self-confidence and strategic status that emerged as a result of the Gulf War; the fall of the Soviet empire; the liberation of the Turkic peoples of Central Asia; the weakening of Iran's regime; and the strategic agreement with Israel.

Until 1996, Iran paid a very low price for its support of Islamic terrorist activity in Turkey. The countries' bilateral relations were especially smooth during Erbakan's term of office. But Iran is entangled in internal strife between moderates, led by President Muhammad Khatami, and the old revolutionary strategy sustained by the spiritual leader, Khamene'i, whose supporters remain in key political and security posts.[196] The radicals seem to have the upper hand regarding relations with Turkey and have continued the strategy of subversion through the enfeebled PKK and the remnants of the violent Islamist movement.

According to Alan Makovsky, Turkey's relations with Iran are similar to its relations with Syria before Ocalan's expulsion. Turkey does not want a confrontation with Iran. "Given Turkey's more assertive regional policies of recent times, Ankara likely will continue to press Tehran—over time perhaps with threats or even limited use of force—if the Iranians do not alter their behavior and rein in the PKK," according to Makovsky.[197] However, Turkey might not hesitate to threaten Iran if its national security interests are compromised. In 1998, for example, Turkey threatened to use force unless Syria dismantled PKK bases on its territory and expelled Ocalan. Syria bowed to Turkish pressure. Asked whether the row with Iran could reach the same intensity, president Suleyman Demirel said, "No, no, I don't think so; at least not for the time being."[198]

 Radical Islamic Organizations in Turkey

<quote>

National Security Council (NSC) report on radical groupings

</quote>

In a twenty-page report on "reactionism" the NSC lists the radical Islamic groups as follows:

The organizations with religious motives: Hizbullah, IBDA-C [Islamic Great Eastern Raiders Front], Islami Hareket [Islamic Movement], and Vasat [al-Wasat].

The radical religious groups such as Yeryuzu, Tevhid, and Yildiz have their roots outside the country and gather around a bookshop, publication, or individual.

Indicating that the organizations with religious motives and the radical religious groups do not enjoy broad support, the report says these groups regard the Turkish Republic as the antithesis of Islam and consider it against their religious beliefs to form any legal organization sanctioned by the existing political system.

The radical religious groups in Turkey differ among themselves. These groups were further divided as being centered in Iran, Egypt, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, and Sudan and in various countries simultaneously.

The report lists the prominent groups of the “reactionary” movement thus: Malatyalilar (or Safak), Hizbullahi Vahdet, Hizbullahi Davet, Yildiz, Vahdet, Tevhid (or Selam), Tefkir (or Cumasizlar), Akabe, Yeryuzu, Tevhid-i Cekirdek (or Kimliksizler), Yonelis (or Hak Soz), Ekin, Buruc (or Tohum), Mucadele, Fecr, Vehhabi, Ceysullah, Mazlum-Der.[199]

<quote>

Prime Minister’s Monitoring Council [PMMC] Report

</quote>

According to a report by the PMMC, there are in Turkey 4,500 “reactionary” foundations whose activities are inconsistent with the purpose declared at the time of their establishment. The report says that only 15 percent of these foundations are audited and that most of them are controlled by the Nurist (Divine Light) religious order. The other leading operators of foundations are the National Youth Foundation, the Nakshibendis, the Kadiris, and Hizballah. [200]

<quote>

The Istanbul Police Report on Illegal Organizations

</quote>

The Directorate of Police in Istanbul has drawn up a report on the activities of the radical and reactionary organizations in the city.

The report states that the radical right-wing and reactionary groups have thirteen organizations under different names in Istanbul. Hizballah and the IBDA- C (Great Eastern Islamic Fighters Front) are the leading groups among the armed organizations. The report also says that the supporters of Hizballah operate as five different groups and notes that the Islamic Youth Organization organizes their unarmed popular activities.[201]

<quote>

Organizations and Areas of Activity

</quote>

IBDA-C: The organization is an extension of the THKP-C (Turkish People's Liberation Party Front) of the Islamic community. Its members work during the day and meet to carry out their activities at night. They return to their homes and families afterward. Consequently, officials find it difficult to control them. The organization does not seem to have any particular hierarchy. It is organized in Istanbul's Umraniye and Gaziosmanpasa districts and has nearly 300 militants and sympathizers. Its vakif (foundation) is the Islamic Studies and Arts Research Foundation (Islami Ilimler ve Sanatlar Arastirma Vakfi) in Sirinevler. Its founders are Yasar Sadoglu, Mehmet Salih Sadoglu, Sitki Dogan, Fikri Ozer, and Selma Sadoglu.

ICCB (Union of Islamic Associations and Societies): The organization is trying to get organized on the Western and Anatolian sides of the city. It uses one of its small mosques as a meeting center. It attracts new members with its propaganda activities run through publications and videotapes mailed from Germany. It has nearly sixty sympathizers in the city.

Ceysullah [God's Army]: The organization was established in 1987 by members of a group in the Umraniye and Uskudar Districts calling themselves Selefis. It has nearly 100 sympathizers. Some fifteen members of the group from various provinces, mainly Istanbul, Sakarya, and Izmir, have been sent to train at a camp in Pakistan. Its vakif is the Scientific Research Foundation (Ilim Arastirma Vakfi). Its founders are Ali Isik, Muharrem Iler, Sabri Salman, Mehmet Nur Gulluoglu, Mehmet Uyanikoglu, Mehmet Sukru Bakir.

Islamic Movement: The organization was established in Batman in 1986. High- ranking militants in the group agreed to arm their organization. Its militants were trained by the secret service in Iran, the SAVAMA. Significant blows were dealt to the organization in 1995 and 1996. Its members are trying to reorganize.

Hizbullah Tevhid Selam Gurubu [Unity and Salutation Group]: Some of the high- ranking members of the organization are from the former grassroots of left-wing factions. It has established close links with religious groups in Istanbul. Its members have rallied around the daily Selam, known for its articles from Iran. Its vakif is the Peace, Science and Service Foundation (Selam, Ilim ve Hizmet Vakfi) in Fatih. Its founders are A. Kemal Tuna, Mustafa Celik, Kenan Yabanigil, M. Burhan Genc, Isa Uzun, Ahmet Yurdakul, Suleyman Akboga, and M. Baki Seyda.

Hizballah Vasat [Moderate or Center] Group: The organization was established with the help of Sahabe, a periodical in Gaziantep. It later carried out activities in Pendik and Kaynarca and in Istanbul's Umraniye, Sultanbeyli, Bagcilar, and Gaziosmanpasa districts. Its members train at temporary camps in Kocaeli and Yalova. The organization has mosques in Kaynarca and Umraniye and a legal radio network known as Ozel (Special) FM. Its vakif is the Islamic Unification Foundation (Tevhid Vakfi) in Uskudar. Its founder is Mehmet Cakar.

Hizbullah Menzil (Course or House) Group: The organization is trying to legalize its activities. It is known to have nearly fifty militants and sympathizers. Its vakif is the Perseverance Social and Cultural Service Foundation (Sebat Sosyal ve Kulturel Hizmet Vakfi) in Fatih. Its founders are Mehmet Haydari, Ismail Oruc, and Mustafa Celik.

Hizbullah Vahdet (Unity) Group: The organization is trying to recruit new members through the Vahdet Foundation and its branches in Istanbul and the Abdulkadir Geylani Foundation in Diyarbakir. It has 150 members in Istanbul. Its vakif is the Invitation Educational, Cultural, and Fraternity Foundation (Davet Egitim, Kultur ve Kardeslik Vakfi) in Fatih. Its founders are Faris Karak, Ahmet varol, Adem Kiziltepe, Bulent Kaya, and Recep Celik.

Musluman Genclik (Yildiz) (Islamic Youth-Yildiz): The organization was created by a group headed by Tahir Gul at the Yildiz Technical University in Istanbul to struggle against the decision to ban students with head scarves from attending the university. Its vakif is the Human Education, Cultural and Solidarity Foundation (Insan Egitim, Kultur ve Yardimlasma Vakfi) in Fatih. Its founders are Husnu Turan, Yunus Torpil, Serif Enis, Cemal Tellioglu, and Kadir Tingiroglu.

Sirinevler Ulu Cami Egitim ve Hizmet Vakfi (Sirinevler Ulu Cami Education and Service Foundation) in Fatih. Its founders are Ibrahim Firat, Ozcan Kocaman, Binali Pala, Vehdettin Tasdemir, Mehmet Acikgoz, Idris Mutlu, and Elbeyli Celik. Its leader is Serif Eris.

Musluman Genclik (Maltyalilar) (Islamic Youth-Malatya): The organization was established by a group from eastern Turkey. Its high-ranking militants are from Malatya. It supports the Islamic Republic of Iran and has 100 supporters in Istanbul. Its vakif is the Islamic Thought and Solidarity Foundation [Islami Dusunce ve Dayanisma Vakfi]. Its founders are A. Riza Gokce, Taner Bayraktar, Abdurrahman Suayip, and Cetin Mitat.

Vahdet Egitim Yardimlasma Vakfi (Unity Education and Solidarity Foundation) in Ankara. Its founders are Recep Ozkan, Ahmet Altintepe, and Fatih Yildirim.

Asri Saadet (In the lifetime of Prophet Muhammad) Ilim, Hizmet ve Kultur Vakfi (Asri Saadet Service and Cultural Foundation) in Sultanciftligi. Its founder is Recep Aydin.

[91] See Sami Zubaida, “Turkish Islam and National Identity,” Middle East Report (April-June 1996), p. 11.

[92] See Ertugrul Kurkucu, “The Crisis of the Turkish State,” Middle East Report (April-June 1996), pp. 2–7.

[93] See Binnaz Toprak, “Religion as State Ideology in a Secular Setting: The Turk- ish-Islamic Synthesis” in Malcolm Wagstaff (ed.), Aspects of Religion in Secular Turkey, (Durham: University of Durham, Center for Middle Eastern and Islamic Studies, Occasional Paper Series No. 40, 1990), p.10.

[94] Ibid.

[95] Ibid.

[96] See Anat Lapidot, “Islamic Activism in Turkey since the 1980 Military Takeover” in Terrorism and Political Violence, Vol. 3, (1997), (special issue on “Religious Radicalism in the Greater Middle East” edited by Bruce Maddy-Weitzman and Efraim Inbar), p. 64.

[97] Kurkucu, “The Crisis of the Turkish State,” p. 65.

[98] For an evaluation of Turkey’s strategic interests and policy in the region, see Kemal Kirisci’s article “Post Cold-War Turkish Security and the Middle East,” Middle East Review of International Affairs (MERIA) Journal, Vol. 1, No. 2, (June 1997).

[99] See Ben Lombard, “Turkey—Return of the Reluctant Generals?” Political Science Quarterly 112 (Summer 1997), <[[http://epn.org/psq/lombardi.html][http://epn.org/psq/lombardi.html]]>.

[100] Hizb al-Tahrir, founded in Jordan in 1953, is dedicated to the creation of a Khilafah (unified Islamic state) and is banned throughout the Middle East due to its attempts to foment Islamic revolution. It began activity in Turkey in 1962. See Cumhuriyet, October 30, 1991. In the 1980s this organization had only limited propaganda activity in Turkey.

[101] U.S. Department of State, Patterns of Global Terrorism: 1991, p. 14.

[102] Lapidot, “Islamic Activism in Turkey,” p. 65.

[103] Cited by Cumhuriyet, October 30, 1991.

[104] Hezbollah is the spelling used by TDN and other Turkish sources.

[105] For this reason the names of the organizations mentioned in this article are those used by the various sources and do not always concord with the real group hiding behind the name.

[106] Kalim Siddiqui was the founder of the Muslim Parliament and the Muslim Institute in London, which have close links with Iran and many of the world’s violent Islamist groups. He died in 1996. See also The Antisemitism World Report, (London: Institute of Jewish Affairs, 1995), pp. 241—242.

[107] According to the Turkish journalist Tunkay Ozkan, the Islamic Movement was established in Batman in 1987 as one of the branches of the Islamic terror organization called Hizballahiler, active in the southeast, and moved its headquarters to Istanbul in 1990. See Cumhuriyet, June 23, 1993.

[108] It is interesting to note the similarity of this conversion to radical Islam as a consequence of harsh conditions in prison with the radicalization of Islamic militants in the prisons of Nasserist Egypt and Baathist Syria in the middle 1960s. See Emmanuel Sivan, Radical Islam: Medieval Theology and Modern Politics (Tel-Aviv: Am Oved Publishers, 1986, in Hebrew), p. 37.

[109] See Cumhuriyet, February 16, 1993.

[110] Ibid.

[111] See Meir Hatina, “Iran and the Palestinian Islamic Movement,” Orient, Vol. 38, No. 1 (Marz 1997), pp. 108–110.

[112] See Gilles Millet, in Liberation, October 9, 1995, and James Philips, “The Rising Threat of Revolutionary Islam in Algeria,” Backgrounder—The Heritage Foundation, 9 (November 1995), p. 6.

[113] See Haggay Ram, “Exporting Iran’s Islamic Revolution: Steering a Path between Pan-Islam and Nationalism,” in Terrorism and Political Violence, Vol. 3 (1997), special issue on “Religious Radicalism in the Greater Middle East” edited by Bruce Maddy- Weitzman and Efraim Inbar, pp. 12–16.

[114] Milliyet, February 27, 1997.

[115] Professor Bahriye Ucok, writer Turan Dursan and journalist Cetin Emec (editor of the daily newspaper Hurriyet) were assassinated because they served “the idolatrous regime” and in order “to bring about the resurrection.” See Hurriyet, October 10, 1993, and Cumhuriyet, February 6 and June 23, 1993.

[116] See Imset, TDN, May 14, 1993.

[117] It is interesting to note that most of the anti-American and anti-Western terrorist activity during the Gulf War was perpetrated by the extreme left-wing Turkish organization Dev-Sol and not by Islamic groups, although they were also fiercely opposed to the allied intervention (with Turkish participation) in Iraq. See also U.S. Department of State, Patterns of Global Terrorism: 1991, p. 14.

[118] A security officer at the Israeli embassy in Ankara was killed by a bomb in his car (March 7, 1992); grenades were thrown at the Neve Shalom synagogue in Istanbul (March 1, 1992); bombs were placed in the cars of two Iranian opposition militants (June 1992); the same month a member of the Iranian Mujahedin-e Halq was kidnapped and assassinated.

[119] See Anatolia Radio (in English), January 24, 1993.

[120] See for instance TDN, January 29, 1993, and reports of Ankara Turkiye Radyolari Network (FBIS-WEU-93-023 4.2.1993).

[121] On July 2, 1993, during the traditional Pir Sultan Abdal Culture festival in the southeast city of Sivan, fundamentalists set fire to the Madimak Hotel, where all the guests had been staying.

[122] TDN, January 19, 1995.

[123] See Inter Press Service, January 11, 1995.

[124] See Imset, TDN, February 8, 1993 and May 14, 1993 and Cumhuriyet, February 4, 1993.

[125] See Hurriyet, February 10, 1993.

[126] See Cumhuriyet, February 16, 1993.

[127] See TDN, March 12, 1993 and May 15, 1993.

[128] Irfan Cagarici, the arrested leader of Islamic Action, was also behind the attack on the Jewish businessman Jak Kamhi in January 1993. See Jane’s Intelligence Review, August 1996, p. 374.

[129] See Sabri Sayari, “Turkey’s Islamist Challenge,” Middle East Quarterly, September 1996, pp. 35—37. The RP obtained 21.3 percent of the vote and 158 seats out of the 550-member National Assembly and became the largest party in Parliament.

[130] See Zubaida, “Turkish Islam and National Identity,” pp. 11—12. See also Feroz Ahmad, The Making of Modern Turkey (London: Routledge, 1993), pp. 219—222.

[131] TDN, February 26, 1993.

[132] The Project for the Study of Anti-Semitism, Anti-Semitism Worldwide: 1995/96 (Tel-Aviv University, 1996), p. 202.

[133] See Inter Press Service, January 11, 1995.

[134] Imset, TDN, May 14 and 16, 1993.

[135] See Zubaida, “Turkish Islam and National Identity,” p. 12.

[136] The vice-president of the RP declared on February 9, 1993 in the Turkish Parliament that a team of six Israeli Mossad agents assassinated Mumcu and that the West was interested in inciting public opinion to believe that Iran was responsible. This accusation was apparently based on a secret report of pro-Islamic elements in the police. See Middle East International, February 19, 1993.

[137] See Kanal 6 Television, November 24, 1993.

[138] See Nur Bilge Criss, “The Nature of PKK Terrorism in Turkey,” Studies in Conflict and Terrorism, Vol. 18, (1995), p. 21.

[139] The pro-Islamic daily Turkiye, December 3, 1995, published a series of such declarations, such as that of Muhsin Yazicioglu (leader of the Grand Unity Party-BBP) or that of Professor Mahir Kaynak, ex-intelligence officer.

[140] See Alan Makovsky, “Turkey: Erbakan at Six Months,” Policywatch, No. 230 (December 27, 1996), p. 3.

[141] This interesting analysis of Iran’s ‘three-phase’ relations with Turkey appeared in the Tehran Salam, December 19, 1996, on the occasion of Rafsanjani’s visit to Turkey.

[142] Cumhuriyet, June 23, 1993.

[143] See Imset, TDN, May 14, 1993.

[144] Cumhuriyet and other newspapers, February 5—6, 1993.

[145] Unfortunately, there is no room in this chapter for a detailed evaluation of the economic, strategic and political reasons behind the cautious approach of the various Turkish governments in their relations with Iran.

[146] See TDN, January 29, 1993.

[147] See Gungor Mengi’s column in reaction to Velayati’s interview on February 15, 1993 in Sabah, February 16, 1993.

[148] See U.S. Department of State, Patterns of Global Terrorism: 1994, pp. 11—12, 25, and U.S. Department of State, Patterns of Global Terrorism: 1995, pp. 12, 25. See also Criss, “The Nature of PKK Terrorism in Turkey,” p. 31.

[149] See TDN, January 8, 1996.

[150] For a discussion of RP’s characteristics as an Islamic movement see Zubaida, “Turkish Islam and National Identity,” pp. 10—11, and Sayari, “Turkey’s Islamist Challenge,” p. 37.

[151] See Elie Podeh, “Egypt’s Struggle against the Militant Islamic Groups” in Terrorism and Political Violence, Vol. 3 (1997), special issue on “Religious Radicalism in the Greater Middle East,” edited by Bruce Maddy-Weitzman and Efraim Inbar, p. 48.

[152] IBDA-C’s monthly, Taraf, gives some addresses of its representatives in Europe. In Germany there are several extremist Islamic Turkish organizations. The most active is “The Islamic Communities Union” led by Cemalettin Kaplan. See “Islamischer Extremismus und seine Auswirkungen auf die Bundesrepublik Deutschland,” Bonn, Bundesamtfar Verfassungschutz (November 1994).

[153] According to Erbakan, Western “imperialist” institutions and “Zionist Wall Street bankers” seek mainly to exploit Turkey and the Islamic countries, and Washington is the tool of “Zionist forces.” RP’s politicians and daily newspapers have blamed the Jews, Zionism and Israel for every domestic and foreign problem of Turkey. See Sayari, “Turkey’s Islamist Challenge,” p. 41, and The Antisemitism World Report (1995), p. 228.

[154] See the interview with Admiral Guven Erkaya in Milliyet, August 14, 1997.

[155] For a full account of the events from the point of view of the military see the extraordinary interview with Admiral Guven Erkaya by Milliyet columnist Yavuz Donat, Milliyet, August 14, 1997.

[156] Cited from Alan Makovsky, Policywatch, No. 239, March 12, 1997, p. 1.

[157] Sabah, June 12, 1997. [FBIS-WEU-97-114]. The speech was cited fully by the newspaper.

[158] Political Islam has accumulated considerable power with its 2,500 associations, 500 foundations, more than 1,000 corporations, 1,200 student dormitories and more than 800 private schools and classrooms.

[159] It has been determined that there are 1,685,000 continuing students registered in Quranic courses and that their numbers double every five years. It is forecasted that this figure will rise to 7 million by 2005. According to a study based on 1995 figures, 492,809 students attend 561 imam-preacher lyceums in Turkey, and 53,553 students graduate from these schools each year. Meanwhile, the demand for imams is only 2,288 per year. The remaining 51,345 graduates are deliberately trained in schools of law and in the political sciences and in police academies. The purpose of that is to build an Islamist state structure, within the context of political Islam, by occupying government positions over the short and medium terms.

[160] The donors of financial assistance to Islamist organizations include Islamist individuals whose shares of the national income are among the highest in the country. The status of these individuals, who are publicly known as the “100 political Islamist bosses,” is as follows: six are worth more than 100 trillion Turkish lira; five are worth between 20 and 50 trillion Turkish lira; fifteen are worth between 10 and 20 trillion Turkish lira; thirteen are worth between 1 and 10 trillion Turkish lira; the rest are worth less than 1 trillion Turkish lira.

[161] The propaganda activities are conducted through nineteen newspapers, 110 magazines, fifty-one radio stations, and twenty television stations.

[162] See James M. Dorsey, “Turkey’s Military Continues Crackdown on Islam in Public Life,” Washington Report on Middle East Affairs, October-November 1997, p. 36 <[[http://www.washington-report.org/backissues/1097/9710036.html] [http://www.washington-report.org/backissues/1097/9710036.html]]>.

[163] In the 1995 election it did not manage to pass the 10 percent threshold.

[164] See CNN, Ankara, April 19, 1999.

[165] For a detailed analysis of the political Islamist movement see Nilufer Narli, ‘The Rise of the Islamist Movement in Turkey,” MERIA Journal, Vol. 3, No. 3, (September 1999).

[166] By the end of 1996 the term Hizballah came to be used instead of the previous Hezbollah.

[167] See the statement of Cemil Serhadli, the governor of Diyarbakir, in Ankara Anatolia, October 20, 1999.

[168] October 7—A homemade bomb exploded a Greek lyceum in Istanbul; October 17—A bomb exploded in front of a bookstore in Istanbul selling the publications of the Religious Affairs Foundation; October 21—Ahmet Taner Kislali, a former minister, academic and newspaper columnist, was killed outside his home in Ankara by a homemade pipe bomb placed on top of his car; October 29—A time bomb exploded on the campus of the University of Marmara in the Goztepe district of Istanbul, causing minor damage; November 18—Unidentified assailants damaged pictures of Kemal Ataturk and planted a pipe bomb in the Istanbul headquarters of the Ataturk Association.

[169] See Ankara Anatolia, June 4, 1999.

[170] See Ankara Anatolia, November 15, 1999.

[171] See Ankara Anatolia, November 1, 1999.

[172] In June 1999, thirty militants, including four policemen, of the “Vasat Group” of Hizballah were captured in an operation carried out in Malatya; ten members of Hizballah were captured in the Batman province; eight militants of Hizballah were captured in Kovancilar county of eastern Elazig province.

[173] In Erzurum, a total of fourteen persons were detained on grounds that they aided the Menzil group. In operations conducted in Agri, the security forces caught twenty-eight Hizballah militants, including the five members of the “Province Council.” Security officials reported that the Hizballah members—who began organizing in the region in the early 1990s—from time to time also undertake activities in Turkey’s other provinces.

[174] See Ankara Anatolia, January 1, 1999.

[175] See Istanbul Hurriyet, March 16, 1999.

[176] See TDN, March 6, 1999.

[177] See TDN, June 21, 1999.

[178] See TDN, July 5, 1999.

[179] For a detailed analysis of PKK's strategy and Turkey's policy see this author's articles: Ely Karmon, "The Showdown Between the PKK and Turkey: Syria's Setback," November 20, 1998, <[[http://www.ict.org.il][http://www.ict.org.il]]> and "The Arrest of Abdullah Ocalan: The last stage in the Turkey-PKK showdown?" February 17, 1999, <[[http://www.ict.org.il/articles/articledet.cfm?articleid=72][http://www.ict.org.il/ articles/articledet.cfm?articleid=72]]>.

[180] See Hurriyet, March 5, 1999.

[181] See Zaman, June 5, 1999.

[182] See Turkiye, February 8, 1997. The relations between Turkey and Iran improved again after the mutual appointment of ambassadors in March 1998.

[183] See Tehran Times, January 13, 1998.

[184] Ibid.

[185] As of spring 1999, three Iranian officers were training some 200 PKK militants in a camp set up by the PKK in the Piransehir district in Iran. In another camp named Jerme, seventy PKK terrorists were being trained. It has been found out that Iran was planning to have all these militants infiltrate Turkey to stage terrorist attacks. It has also been ascertained that the districts of Maku and Dambak in Iran served as the PKK's military depots and that personnel and materiel were sent from there to the PKK groups active in Turkey. PKK leaders Osman Ocalan, Nizamettin Tas, and Mustafa Karasu were in Iran. See Hurriyet, May 17, 1999.

[186] See Hurriyet, May 29, 1999.

[187] See Milliyet, July 5, 1999.

[188] For a detailed analysis of these events, see Alan Makovsky, 'Turkish-Iranian Tension: a New Regional Flashpoint?" Policywatch, Number 404 (August 9, 1999).

[189] See Ankara Anatolia, October 27, 1999.

[190] See Milliyet, August 7, 1999.

[191] Tehran Resalat, July 20, 1999.

[192] See Alan Makovsky, "Israeli-Turkish Cooperation: Full Steam Ahead," Policywatch, Number 292 (January 6, 1998).

[193] Ibid.

[194] The French commentator Alain Gresh also asserts that “Contrary to what people think in the Arab world, in particular in Damascus, the impetus of the alliance does not come from Israel, but from the Turkish generals.” See Alain Gresh, “Grandes Manoeuvres Regionales Autour De L’alliance Israelo-Turque,” Le Monde Diplomatique, Decembre 1997.

[195] See General Cevik Bir, “Reflections on Turkish-Israeli Relations and Turkish Security,” Policywatch, Number 422 (November 5, 1999).

[196] The conflict between the two camps and strategies regarding the future foreign policy of Iran has found an echo even in Iranian academic circles, which are well aware of the discrepancy between the regime’s ideology and the constraints of international and internal realities. See, for instance, the publication of the revealing roundtable discussion between Dr. Ebrahim Mottaqi, assistant professor of political science at the University of Tehran, Dr. Dehshiri, member of the faculty of Allameh Tabataba’i University, and Dr. Javat Eta’at, the head of the Research Division of the Center of Islamic Revolution Documents, in Tehran Salam of August 11, 1997. It is interesting to note that in this professional, theoretical discussion on Iranian foreign policy, Turkey is one of the very few countries mentioned by name, and in this context Dr. Eta’at proposes a policy of confronting it and putting it in a reactive position by seeking a “reverse alliance” with one of its neighbors.

[197] See Makovsky, Policywatch, No. 404.

[198] See Tehran Times, July 27, 1999.

[199] See Istanbul Sabah, 26 June 1998.

[200] See Istanbul Hurriyet, 11 July 1998.

[201] See Istanbul Milliyet, 12 and 13 August 1998.

 5. Islamism and the State in North Africa

Bruce Maddy-Weitzman and Meir Litvak

Earlier versions of this article appeared in Religious Radicalism in the Greater Middle East, Bruce Maddy-Weitzman and Efraim Inbar (eds.), (London: Frank Cass, 1997); Terrorism and Political Violence, Volume 8, No. 2 (Summer 1996) pp. 171—188; and Middle East Review of International Affairs (MERIA), Journal, No. 3. (Spring 1997).

The confrontation in Algeria between the military regime and the Islamic opposition caused a near meltdown of the Algerian state during the last decade. Algeria was the metaphorical gharb (West), a place were “all terrors are pos- sible.”[202] Many pundits were quick to predict an Iranian-style outcome, with corresponding effects on Algeria’s neighbors. However, their rush to judgment betrayed a lack of understanding of both the Maghrib region and the highly varied realities within each Maghrib state. What is required is a proper understanding of the Islamic challenge in Algeria in relation to that which occurred in Morocco and Tunisia.

The ideological roots of modern-day Islamic fundamentalism are not solely recent: the ideas of the salafiyya current of Islamic reform and purification were present in preprotectorate Morocco among both the ‘ulama and various sultans,[203] and became widespread in the Maghrib in the era between the two world wars. One can argue that more than in the Mashriq (the Arab East), Islam was one of the core values for Algerian, Moroccan, and Tunisian nationalist movements that opposed European domination. In Algeria, the crystallization of a modern national identity between the two world wars was considerably shaped by the Islamic reformist movement led by Shaykh ‘Abd al-Hamid Bin Badis. The movement promoted both the purification of Islamic practices from “polytheism” (maraboutic practices) and creation of an educational network that would stress that Islam and the Arabic language, and not French culture, are at the core of modern Algerian identity.[204]

Similarly, Salafi activity in Morocco played an important role in shaping the nationalist movement, personified in the 1920s by ‘Allal al-Fasi, the religio- nationalist leader of the Istiqlal party.[205] Likewise in Tunisia, Islam “as a component of Tunisian identity and a legitimizing value ... suffused the first generation nationalist movement [in the decades prior to World War I] and ... persisted even into the age of Bourguibist secularism.”[206]

In contrast to the general Salafi current, political Islam in North Africa was not a ‘pan’ movement. Nor, again in contrast to the Mashriq, was pan-Arabism a competing ideology. Thus, the legitimacy of the state in North Africa has never been in doubt: “The state appears more as an appropriately adjusted transfer of technology than as an alien institution.”[207]

State power grew exponentially during the post-independence generation, intruding decisively into every sphere of society. However, in the words of the Tunisian scholar Abd al-Baki Hermassi, by the 1980s, policies once seen favorably as constituting the “etatization” of society increasingly began to look like the privatization of the state as small numbers of individuals accumulated great wealth from their privileged positions. This occurred at a time of austerity imposed by international financial institutions.[208] Also, the resources available for development were sharply cut by the post-oil boom economic contraction. The effect was felt across the Arab world among both petroleum-based economies, including Algeria, and “labor-exporters” such as Egypt, Jordan, and Tunisia. What resulted was the obvious inability of Arab regimes, maghribi and mashriqi alike, to deliver the social, economic, political, and psychological goods to their expanding, increasingly youthful, urbanized, and literate populations. This failure caused a profound sense of crisis (azma) among wide sectors of their populations and endless debate among intellectuals over what should be done (spawning a cottage industry, “azmatology,” in the words of Muhammad Guessous, a Moroccan sociologist).[209]

The Maghrib’s proximity to Europe rendered its youthful population (two-thirds under 30 years of age) especially vulnerable to psychological dislocation, especially since North Africa had already been widely penetrated by the gharb (primarily France) during the prior 150 years. The proliferation of satellite dishes and powerful television transmitters brought images of Europe’s material glitter into people’s living rooms, raising expectations and prompting demands that had no chance of being fulfilled, thus opening the way to profound disillusionment. In Mernissi’s words, “[W]hat strikes me as a sociologist [when visiting a Muslim country] is the strong feeling of bitterness in the people—the intellectuals, the young, peasants. I see bitterness over blocked ambition, over frustrated desires for consumption—of clothes, commodities, and gadgets, but also of cultural products like books and quality films and performances which give meaning to life and reconcile the individual with his environment and his country..... In our country [Morocco] what is unbearable, especially when you listen to the young men and women of the poor class, is the awful waste of talent. ‘Ana daya‘’ (‘My life is a mess’) is a leitmotif that one hears constantly.”[210]

The crisis, which took root during the 1970s and gathered strength during the 1980s, spawned a new kind of dissent, articulated most forcefully by Islamist movements. They spoke not only on issues or strategies of development, but on matters concerned with justice and cultural identity. [211] Given the dual legacy of popular-maraboutic Islamic practice and the Maghrib’s penetration by the modern gharb, it is not surprising that Maghribi Salafists-fundamentalists often found themselves alienated from their own societies and thus sought guidance and inspiration from outside the Maghrib: e.g., the Egyptian-based Muslim Brotherhood, Iran’s Islamic Revolution, and Sudan’s Hasan al-Turabi. This interaction marked a departure from premodern historical patterns.

 Morocco

Despite the strongly similar development patterns of their Islamist movements, the specific sociopolitical and historical circumstances of the three Maghrib states varied widely. This produced a disparate state-society/regime-opposition dynamic which, in each case, produced a very different political outcome. Consider Morocco: apart from Saudi Arabia, no other Arab regime has so thoroughly draped itself in Islam's mantle. King Hassan II, who reigned and ruled from 1961 until his death in July 1999, was constitutionally the amir al-mu'minin ("Commander of the Faithful") deputized by virtue of his descent from the Prophet Muhammad to lead the Moroccan Islamic umma in all matters, temporal and spiritual.[212] His own erudition in religious matters, displayed in dialogues with religious scholars on Moroccan television, reinforced this dual role. His son and heir, King Muhammad VI, has inherited this constitutionally grounded spiritual-temporal standing.

One can argue against the oft-made claim that the monarchy is the central religious institution of Moroccan life and that Hassan's longevity rested less on blind obedience and belief in his special sacredness (baraka) than on his astutely wielding the levers of power at his disposal, including repression.[213] As Hassan himself told his biographer, "One doesn't maintain order by wielding crois- sants."[214] At the same time, it seems reasonable to conclude that the Moroccan regime has been a relatively successful "modernizing monarchy" because it situated itself firmly within Moroccan political and sociocultural traditions. This enabled it to avoid some of the harsher social, political, and psychological dislocations of revolutionary Arab regimes and Pahlavi Iran.[215]

One of these traditions is the institution of the monarchy itself: the ruling Alawite dynasty is almost 350 years old. At the same time, as I. W. Zartman argues, the monarchy under Hassan has evolved through interaction with society.[216] Part of this involved Hassan's modification of religious traditions to reinforce his legitimacy.[217] More prosaic factors promoting relative political stability include a liberal economy and multiparty politics. Hassan described his political strategy as "homeopathic democracy," a process of controlled, well-managed change that maintains social peace while promoting economic development and the general welfare. His ultimate declared goal was a "bipolarized democracy," in which two parliamentary blocs would alternate in power, with the monarch serving as the ultimate arbiter and source of authority.

Hassan’s strategy slowly but successfully bore fruit. Efforts to entice the historical opposition parties into power-sharing following the 1993 parliamentary elections foundered on their unwillingness to serve alongside the all-powerful Interior Minister Driss Basri, as well as on their own internal divisions. Four years later, the pieces fell into place, following further constitutional reform. The November parliamentary elections produced a balance of forces in the Chamber of Deputies, with a slight advantage to the Union Socialiste des Forces Populaires (USFP). In early 1998, Hassan charged its leader, the historical opposition figure Abd al-Rahmane Youssoufi, with forming the long-sought-after alternance government. The new government, consisting of seven parties and six nonparty officials, including Basri, took office in March, amid great expectations for change.

Inevitably, the promise of reform did not immediately live up to its advanced billing. Modernizing administrative procedures and the judicial, commercial, and educational spheres took time, and the results, if at all meaningful, would not be quickly apparent.[218] Nonetheless, the atmosphere did improve, particularly in the area of human rights. It was perhaps fortuitous that just as the last vestiges of optimism for Youssoufi’s government were fading away in the summer of 1999, King Hassan died and was replaced by Muhammad. The new king surprised observers by moving quickly to put his own stamp on affairs of state, with a more open, populist style, further gestures in the human rights arena, and, most dramatically, the sacking of Interior Minister Basri. While continuing his father’s legacy, Muhammad gave unmistakable signs of desiring to accelerate the pace of change.

No less significant than the evolution of Moroccan political life has been the growth in recent years of authentic ‘civil society’ elements, notwithstanding considerable odds.[219] Labor unions have become increasingly combative; human rights groups have bucked considerable pressure to make their voices heard; women’s organizations gathered one million signatures in 1992—1993 on a petition to change the mudawanna, Morocco’s personal status law, which discriminates against women in many areas.[220] Of related interest has been a significant lowering of the population growth rate from 3 percent per annum in the early 1970s to under 2 percent in 1998, and a corresponding halving of the average family size.[221]

The downside of Hassan's controlled-change strategy was that his reliance on existing economic and political elites carried a danger of stagnation, a lack of attention to social and economic distress, and displeasure among the educated classes. The slow pace of change undoubtedly bred cynicism among the latter and did little to make the urban poor feel empowered. Hassan's International Monetary Fund-directed policies of structural readjustment, involving debt rescheduling, subsidy cuts, liberalizing capital movements, and initial privatizing of state firms, won considerable praise from the Paris Club governments and international and commercial lending agencies. The budget deficit, which in the early 1980s reached 12 percent of the gross domestic product, was cut to less than 2 percent in a decade, foreign investment rose fourfold between 1988 and 1992, and annual growth rates were impressive. King Muhammad remained committed to his father's economic reform package. So too was Prime Minister Youssoufi, who resisted pressures from within his own party and from coalition partners to significantly increase Morocco's already crushing debt burden (one- third of the GDP) in order to expand social services.

On the microeconomic level, however, the picture was far from rosy. Gaps between rich and poor, in a society where the average per capita income is just over $1,000, further widened; urban unemployment remained high (officially 16 percent, unofficially far higher), and two years of severe drought in 1992—1993, followed by the "drought of the century" in the winter of 1994—1995, exacerbated the plight of rural areas and reinforced longstanding trends toward migration to urban areas. Subsequent winters again demonstrated Morocco's overdependence on climatic vagaries: bountiful rains produced a record 11 percent growth rate in 1996; the failure of late winter rains in 1997 produced a negative growth rate for the year.

Like many Middle East governments, Hassan initially gave budding Islamist movements some freedom of action in order to balance opposition from the radical left. The assassination of USFP leader Omar Benjelloun in 1975 by radical Islamists, apparently with the connivance of the authorities, may have been the most extreme manifestation of regime-Islamist cooperation. [222] Thereafter, while permitting nonpolitical activities, Hassan adopted a strategy of manipulation and co-optation and severely restricted the ability of Islamists to operate politically. It was only in the late 1990s, as part of the process of controlled political liberalization, that Hassan permitted, and indeed sought, Islamist activity within the formal political system. The regime's efforts to control Islamism were made easier by the fact that Moroccan Islamists are not homogeneous. One researcher counted no less than twenty-three politicized religious associations in the early 1980s. However, these are generally grouped into three trends. By summer 1996, three weekly newspapers representing the three main trends had a combined circulation of 40,000.[223]

One of these trends has been explicitly reformist but not overtly political, concentrating on matters of individual piety and righteousness, criticizing corruption, and affecting certain styles of traditional Islamic clothing, wedding celebrations, and rhetoric. As such, it has been the least restricted. The leading figure of this Sunni trend, before his death in the late 1980s, was an elderly mosque preacher in Tangier named Fqih al-Zamzami. Venerated by peddlers, laborers, and shopkeepers, cassettes of his sermons are sold in most cities. His three sons have tried to follow in his path. The Zamzami Sunni trend appears to have become intermingled with the Tabligh, an Islamic proselytizing movement originating in the Indian subcontinent.[224]

At the other extreme was a small group, al-Shabiba al-Islamiyya (Islamic Youth), drawn mostly from student and high school movements, which advocated the regime's violent overthrow. Its leader, 'Abd al-Karim al-Muti', is in exile somewhere in Europe. Some of the Shabiba, led by 'Abdallah Benkirane, broke with Muti' in 1981 and chose a nonconfrontational, reformist posture which accepted the inviolability of the monarchy and sought to work for the peaceful pursuit of an Islamic society. Benkirane operated under the banner of Harakat al- Islah wal-Tajdid (Movement for Reform and Renewal). By the 1990s, Benkirane was seeking to become overtly involved in the political process.[225] In 1996, his movement joined forces with another group, Rabitat al-Mustaqbal al-Islami (League of the Islamic Future), with the new group being called Harakat al-Tawhid wal- Islah (Movement for Unification and Reform). The regime's approach to Benkirane was twofold. On the one hand, it encouraged his group's activities, as a tamed, regime-legitimizing alternative to more radical groups. On the other, it was unwilling to have an explicitly Islamic party running for public office. The solution was to incorporate Benkirane's movement into an existing, albeit moribund, party, the Mouvment Populaire Democratique et Constitutionnel (MPDC), headed by the venerable 'Abd al-Karim Khatib. The MPDC put up 140 candidates in the November 1997 parliamentary elections (out of a possible 325 seats). Nine won seats, four from Casablanca alone; a tenth seat was subsequently obtained (also from a Casablanca district) when the ostensible USFP winner resigned after discovering that his victory was fraudulent. In the spring of 1999, with his party now renamed the Party de la Justice et du Development (PJD), Benkirane himself was victorious in a special election to fill a vacant parliamentary seat from Sale. Rumors were widespread that he had been assisted by the authorities.[226] What was clear was that both the government and moderate Islamists had a common interest in having an Islamist voice participate in the public discourse.

The best-known Moroccan Islamist figure is 'Abd al-Salam Yasin, a former Education Ministry school inspector and Sufi-like figure who leads the banned al- 'Adl wal-Ihsan (Justice and Charity) movement. According to the leading analyst of Moroccan Islamism, Mohamed Tozy, the Justice and Charity movement would not exist if it weren't for Yasin, whose mystical and doctrinal authority is absolute.[227] Yasin's followers are more educated and more radical than Zamzami's. Yasin openly challenged Hassan's legitimacy—and that of any monarch in Islam—back in 1974. He later admitted to having prepared his burial shroud for the occasion.[228] Instead, King Hassan felt confident enough not to have him executed and thereafter merely kept him under various forms of detention, including a spell in a psychiatric hospital, for much of the time thereafter. During the Gulf War, 30,000 of Yasin's followers gathered under their own banner as part of a massive anti-war march, providing the only public indication of their strength. In December 1994, the government briefly eased Yasin's house arrest but swiftly reimposed it when Yasin declined to refrain from political sermons.

The authorities' effort to coax Yasin into working within the system indicates their recognition of the Islamists' potential strength and the need to defuse it by co-optation and dialogue, while not eschewing more traditional containment strategies. The Youssoufi government's tone regarding Yasin was more accommodating than its predecessor, with Human Rights Minister Mohammed Aujjar characterizing Yasin as a "grand 'alim and a nationalist.”[229] Given the new king’s and Youssoufi government’s determination to ‘turn the page’ and work toward increased democratization and the rule of law, Yasin’s release was only a matter of time. The declaration by one Justice and Charity official that the movement had distanced itself from politics for good, and would instead concentrate on propagating Yasin’s nonviolent, purifying teachings[230] was probably an attempt to make it easier for the authorities to release Yasin. They eventually did so in May 2000, notwithstanding the stir he caused in the beginning of the year by dispatching a 19-page memorandum to King Muhammad asking him to return to the Moroccan people $40 allegedly stolen by Muhammad’s late father, King Hassan.

Although the main Islamist currents in Morocco were nonviolent, an incident in the summer of 1994 provided evidence that Morocco was not entirely immune to radical, violent Islamic currents of the kind manifesting themselves in Algeria and Egypt. On August 24, two Spanish tourists were shot to death in the lobby of a hotel in Marrakesh, the first, and so far only, violent attack against foreigners. The government immediately blamed Algerian intelligence services for supporting the perpetrators, precipitating renewed Algerian-Moroccan tensions and the closing of their border. Two weeks later, four alleged perpetrators were arrested. They turned out to be a group of young French-Moroccan and French-Algerian fundamentalists, possibly connected to the remnants of Muti‘’s al-Shabiba al-Islamiyya, who in the late 1980s organized themselves into a group to advance the cause of Islamic revolution. Their activities included receiving weapons training in Peshawar, Pakistan, near the Afghan frontier, smuggling weapons to Algerian Islamists via Morocco, and a number of robberies in France to support themselves and the cause.[231] Their alleged head, Tariq Fellah, a Moroccan, was arrested in Germany in December 1994 (another person, ‘Abd al- Ilah Ziyad, also a member of al-Shabiba, subsequently claimed he had organized the hotel attack during his trial in France). In January 1995, the group of four plus fourteen others were tried in Fez for the shooting plus other violent acts carried out during 1994. Three of the eighteen were sentenced to death (the sentences have not been carried out); the others to sentences ranging from six months to life imprisonment. Official Algerian involvement was never confirmed, and the affair pointed more to the common danger posed by Islamist radicals to both the Moroccan and Algerian regimes.

At the same time, the swift arrest and trial of the group confirmed anew that the Moroccan Islamists' ability to pose a serious challenge to the regime is extremely limited. Nonetheless, their activities, particularly on university campuses where Islamists control nearly all student unions and periodically clash violently with leftist groups, were publicly acknowledged by at least one government minister as constituting a worrisome development.[232] In November 1998, state security officers and campus guards attacked Islamist students at the Casablanca science college on the grounds of ensuring public order. Justice and Charity spokesman Fathallah Arslan declared that incorrect charges of Islamist student violence were part of an effort to frighten the public by falsely tarring Moroccan Islamists with the brush of Algerian Islamist violence. The roots of the latter, he declared, stemmed from the actions of the Algerian authorities.[233]

As Morocco entered the uncharted political and societal waters of the twenty-first century under the rule of a young new king, with the bounds of the permissible in political and social spheres being increasingly tested and contested, Islamist discourse and Islamist groups were clearly permanent features of the Moroccan landscape. In the summers of 1999 and 2000, Islamists demonstrated their mobilizing capacities by transforming public beaches into "camps" for religious, educational, cultural, and charitable activities.

Even more dramatic was a march in Casablanca in March 2001 of about 200,000 persons "in defense of the Moroccan family," protesting a government- sponsored plan to promote the integration of women into development schemes, including making far-reaching changes in the mudawanna, such as abolishing polygamy, equalizing the right of divorce and improving child custody rights for mothers, and raising the official minimum marriage age to eighteen. Islamist spokespersons, including Shaykh Yasin's daughter Nadia Yasin, took pains to clarify that the mudawanna was "not a sacred text" and that the humiliating situation of Moroccan women, including high rates of illiteracy, poverty, and prostitution, needed to be ameliorated. They framed their opposition to the plan in terms of protecting Moroccan society's "authentic identity" against the corrosive and odious anti-Islamic schemes of international organizations promoting Western-style globalization, imperialism and, for good measure, Zionism.[234]

The massive turnout for the march dwarfed that of a concurrent pro-plan demonstration in Rabat, and led the government to shelve the plan for the time being. Although Morocco's stability, controlled political evolution, and steadily increasing links with the global market seemed assured for the time being, the lines in Morocco's quickening "culture wars" seemed to be increasingly drawn.

 Tunisia

Tunisia's Islamists have enjoyed a higher international profile than their Moroccan counterparts but suffer even greater repression. As in other cases in the Middle East, the Tunisian Islamists' protests can be seen partly as a response to socioeconomic dislocations stemming from the complex processes of modernization and development. Also contributing is Tunisia's clogged political system. However, the most important factor has been the 'psychosocial alienation' that has resulted from the predominant Western liberal model of modernity.[235]

This model has been the objective of President Habib Bourguiba since Algeria's independence in 1956.[236] Notwithstanding Bourguiba's efforts to legitimize his policies in Islamic modernist terms, his initiatives brought more secularization than in any other Arab country. An example is the Personal Status Code, which guarantees equality between men and women in matters of divorce and forbids polygamy. A second example is the relatively large number of women in managerial and executive positions. President Zayn 'Abidin Ben 'Ali, who assumed power in November 1987, softened some of Bourguiba's strident secularism and put more emphasis on Tunisia's Arab-Islamic heritage. The regime permitted Islamists to run in elections as independents in 1989. Officially, they captured about 14 percent of the vote and came close to winning a majority in several urban areas. Some have claimed that the real percentage attained by Islamist candidates was 30—32 percent.[237] The regime quickly took notice and cracked down harshly on Islamists, banning the newly formed Nahda (Renaissance) Party and taking advantage of violent acts by some Islamists to imprison thousands of activists. Stern reprimands from international human rights organizations did not deter the regime.

For now, Ben ‘Ali rules Tunisia with a firm hand and, unlike in Morocco, guided political pluralism is only in its infancy: all but nineteen of the 163 seats in Tunisia’s parliament, elected in 1999, are held by the ruling Rassemblement Constitutionnel Democratique. This is an improvement from the early 1990s, when the parliament contained no opposition deputies, but marks no change since the 1994 elections. Economically, the Tunisians have followed a course similar to Morocco’s, instituting structural reforms and obtaining good results. Tunisia’s small population, reinforced by the lowest rate of population growth in the Arab world, its educated middle class, high rate of literacy, relatively high percentage of women in the work force, and European orientation make the state a less fertile ground for Islamists than other countries in the region. Nonetheless, the groundswell of support for Islamist movements during the 1970s and 1980s indicates that Tunisia is not immune from regionwide currents.

Like their counterparts elsewhere in North Africa and the Sunni world in general, Tunisia’s Islamists have been influenced by Egypt’s Muslim Brotherhood and the teachings of Sayyid Qutb and Pakistan’s Mawlana Mawdudi.[238] Nonetheless, there was considerable talk during the 1980s within Islamist circles of developing a specifically “Tunisian Islam.”[239] Part of the rationale was the rejection of the predominant Islamist view that legitimacy is solely divine, in favor of the idea of popular will as the source of legitimacy.[240] The Islamic notion of shura (consultation), declared Rashid Ghannushi, the movement’s leading figure, legitimizes multiparty politics, alternation in power, and the protection of human rights.[241] In November 1995, Ghannushi and a group of non-Islamist exiled opposition members, including former Prime Minister Muhammad Mzali, published a joint communique appealing for democracy in Tunisia via the election of a parliament representing diverse views and political parties.[242] The problem, Ghannushi stressed, was the repressive Ben ‘Ali regime and most Arab governments, for that matter, which rejected all notions of civil society (al-mujtama‘ al-madani). Ghannushi’s avowed goal to promote a mod- ernist-Islamic synthesis in opposition to the Tunisian regime’s “superficial modernity” makes him one of the more interesting and original of contemporary Islamist thinkers.[243]

To be sure, his views are not entirely congruent with Western liberal values. As he said in one interview, state-building must begin with recognition of the umma's Arab and Islamic identity. Without first agreeing on this central pillar, the "cultural context" of state-society relations, there can be no stable, legitimate authority.[244] Once the identity question is resolved, he continued, democracy can be practiced. He did not address the place in society of those without an Arab- Islamic identity. Ghannushi, in exile in London, frequently speaks of the need to open a dialogue (hiwar) with the West, rejecting the "clash of civilizations" notion put forth by both Samuel Huntington and numerous Islamists. At the same time and in contrast to other Tunisian Islamists, his rhetoric has become increasingly radical in recent years.[245] His condemnations of the allegedly perfidious Western domination of the New World Order, praise for Sudan's regime as a state founded on Islamic concepts, and efforts to promote the cause of Algeria's FIS have weakened his credibility and appeal to Western governments. In a wide-ranging conversation with the New York Times, he repeatedly placed primary blame for excesses committed by Islamic regimes on Western "rejectionist attitudes" and justified the murder of Arab and Muslim intellectuals who had embraced secularism, referring to several as "the devil's advocate[s] ... Pharaoh's witches. The educated who put their brains and their talent in the service of an oppressive regime have made their own decisions. They must bear the responsibility for their choice."[246]

Ghannushi has also repeatedly emphasized that Western hostility to Islam is due to the activities of Zionism, which, in order to retain aid and support, is striving to convince the West that following the collapse of communism and the failure of Arab nationalism, Islam is the new evil force in the world.[247] Speaking in closed sessions at radical Islamic conferences, his rhetoric was even more fiery:

<quote>

"Zionism does not only target Arabs and Muslims. It targets goodness ...the entirety of values that have crystallized in humanity. Every evil in the world, the Zionists are behind it. This is no exaggeration. There are so many evils in the world, and behind which are the Children of Israel."[248]

</quote>

Speaking in May 1995 at the Royal Institute of International Affairs, Ghannushi expressed the hope that the Algerian crisis would soon be resolved in the Islamists' favor. This would be followed by a "swift end" to the deadlock in Tunisia, "either as a result of an initiative by the regime itself, which we would prefer, or due to a massive popular pressure, which is more likely to happen. However, should Algeria continue to bleed slowly, the political situation in Tunisia will move in the same direction, but slowly too."[249] It seems that Ghannushi may have been overly optimistic. His continued denunciations of the Tunisian regime throughout the remainder of the decade seemed to have no effect. The government, Ben 'Ali claimed, had "taken the wind out of the fundamentalists' sails" through wide-ranging economic and social reforms and the country's tradition of toleration and moderation. Left unmentioned were the regime's effective modes of repression. The immediate future for the Islamists in Tunisia does not appear to be a promising one.

 Algeria

As for Algeria, nowhere has the azma been more acutely felt. The socioeconomic dimension is obviously crucial in explaining Algeria's slide into chaos. A generation of misguided, mismanaged "state capitalist" policies, the worldwide slump in the hydrocarbon sector beginning in the mid-1980s, rampant corruption, rapid population growth, and high unemployment all fueled the breakdown of the ruling FLN (Front de Liberation Nationale) regime and the Islamists' rise. Taken alone, however, the socioeconomic explanation for the rise of Islamism in Algeria is insufficient. Cultural aspects must be addressed as well.

Islam has always constituted the central component of collective identity in Algeria, dating back to the pre-colonial period, when Algeria was not a unified political unit. Under French rule, Islam served as a major divide between the colonial government and its subjects. The latters' refusal to abandon Islamic personal status laws enabled the French to avoid awarding them the legal rights of French citizenship and served as a barrier to the adoption of French culture. Furthermore, since Algeria was never fully Arabized, Islam unified Arabic- and Berber-speakers against the French, providing the religio-national content to the struggle for independence and serving as the kernel of Algerian nationalism.[250]

During the post-independence period, the ruling FLN elite sought to nationalize and manipulate Islam in the regime's service. Measures taken included the enactment of a personal status code in 1984 adhering closely to Islamic precepts, banning alcohol in some cities, making Friday the day of rest, promoting religious education in schools, and implementing an Arabization program in schools and public institutions. In order to advance Arabization, the regime imported schoolteachers from Egypt, many of them sympathizers of the Muslim Brotherhood, who used their position to disseminate Islamist ideology. At the same time, the FLN regime, under Houari Boummedienne and then Chedli Benjedid, sought to wed Islam to the governing socialist revolutionary ideology and block any independent Islamic political activity, whether urban-reformist or rural-popular. It is thus not surprising that Algeria has not produced Islamist theoreticians comparable to Khomeini, Turabi, or Ghannoushi.[251]

Notwithstanding the regime's efforts to monopolize and manipulate Islam, signs of an Islamic revival outside authorized state structures were widespread during the 1970s and 1980s. The Islamist movement developed along two parallel paths: a public one, of educational and social activities in order to disseminate the Islamic ideology and way of life; and a violent one, led by Mustafa Bouyali, an ex-FLN fighter in the war of independence who attempted to promote an armed insurrection in the countryside between 1984 and 1987. The regime responded by placing hundreds of activists in detention. Bouyali and most of his men were killed in 1987, but the survivors would play important roles in the fighting during the 1990s.[252]

The 1988 food riots and subsequent political liberalization initiated by Benjedid prompted the Islamist organizations to unite under the banner of the Front Islamique du Salut (Islamic Salvation Front), better known as FIS. Unlike previous groupings, the FIS, led by Dr. 'Abbasi Madani, sought to seize power through the electoral process. It demonstrated remarkable mobilizing capabilities, gaining major victories in the 1990 municipal elections and the first round of the 1991 parliamentary elections. It owed its success to an effective use of its network of about 8,000 mosques throughout Algeria, an appropriating of the Islamic aspect of the FLN's governing vision,[253] and an explicit claim to be the new bearers of the FLN's torch and the authentic inheritor of its legacy. The FIS- FLN connection was further strengthened by the fact that Shaykh Madani, first among equals in the FIS leadership, was an early member of the FLN, and was even imprisoned for his activities for most of the 1954—1962 period. Also like the FLN, the FIS maintained a sort of collective leadership. But what was most important was that the FIS constituted a political body that gave primacy to political action over religious activities. The two more moderate, "gradualist" Islamist parties, Hamas, led by Mahfoud Nahnah, and al-Nahdah, headed by Shaykh 'Abdallah Djaballah, were completely overwhelmed by the FIS and won only minimal support in the 1990 and 1991 elections.[254]

Its two most prominent figures prior to their imprisonment in June 1991, Madani and 'Ali Belhadj, epitomize FIS's two faces. Madani, by almost forty years the older of the two holds a doctorate from the Institute of Education at the University of London. He has been unswerving in insisting on establishing an Islamic state governed by the Shari'a and on the need to reinstate allegedly Islamic norms, such as the separation of men and women in the workplace. Nonetheless, his tone prior to imprisonment was relatively benign and his commitment to political pluralism, while ultimately tactical, at least left room for a dialogue with other political forces in Algeria. He told an interviewer that pluralism was absolutely necessary for a just society, promising to make "Algeria a Hyde Park, not only for free expression but also for choice and behavior."[255]

While Madani was talking about Hyde Park, Belhadj, a young preacher based in a mosque in the overcrowded Bab al-Oued quarter of Algiers, was exerting a powerful appeal on the masses of deprived, frustrated youth. His militant message was unadorned: combat the "French" (meaning the secular forces in Algeria), transform Algeria into an Islamic state immediately, by elections, if possible, and by force if the authorities reject the peaceful transfer of power, and exact retribution on all those who have committed crimes against the people.[256]

Concurrently, the crystallization of the FIS out of a wide array of small groups, which coalesced following a cataclysmic political event, foreshadowed great diversity and lack of cohesion within the movement. In addition, the FIS leadership underestimated the army's refusal to relinquish its power as the real force in Algerian politics and its determination to fight for its privileges. Nevertheless, the Islamists were able to survive a brutal crackdown by the Algerian military authorities after January 1992 and to inflict heavy punishment of their own.

Apparently, they were able to attract activists from a variety of social backgrounds ranging from academics and ex-army officers to radical militants who had already served prison terms in the 1980s and the so-called "Afghans," Algerian veterans of the Afghanistan war against the Soviet-backed regime in Kabul. In particular, they attracted a continuous stream of desperate young men from the sprawling slums of Algeria's cities who had no hope of improving their dire economic conditions.[257]

The armed struggle against the regime has been waged by two loosely organized bodies. The larger was the l'Armee Islamique du Salut (AIS), known until May 1994 as the Mouvement Islamique Armee (MIA), which functioned as the FIS's armed wing. The other, smaller coalition of armed Islamist networks was the Group Islamique Armee (GIA).

The FIS strategy aimed at forcing the regime to accept an arrangement that would relegalize its activities and enable it to resume its bid for power through political means. For that purpose, it employed armed struggle as a means of leveraging the government and sought an alliance with non-Islamist opposition forces that would isolate the regime, expose it as illegitimate, and force it to compromise. These efforts bore fruit in the January 1995 "national contract" signed by representatives of eight opposition parties, meeting in Rome. The contract, whose main outlines were proposed by Madani and Belhadj, called for the "progressive return of civil peace," based on the relegalization of the FIS and freeing of jailed FIS activists in return for a gradual end to violence and its rejection as a means to attain power, negotiations for establishing a transitional government to prepare for multiparty elections, and the formation of an independent commission to investigate abuses of human rights.[258]

The regime, however, managed to split the Rome alliance by co-opting some its signatories and launched a series of constitutional measures during the 1995—1997 period designed to endow Algeria with political institutions that provided badly needed legitimacy while keeping real power in the army's hands. The semi-free presidential elections in November 1995, in which Gen. Liamine Zeroual won with a 61 percent majority, were followed by constitutional amendments approved in a referendum in November 1996 as well as by parliamentary and municipal elections on June 5 and October 23, 1997, respectively. Each time, the government party, the Rassemblement National Democratique (RND), secured a comfortable majority, often by rigging the electoral process.[259]

The FIS was forced into a reactive mode. Its organizational structures were almost paralyzed, having been outlawed by the army, while the physical separation between the detained leaders, Madani and Belhadj, the military commanders operating in the mountains, the shaykhs (political leaders in Algiers), whose operations were partially curtailed by the army, and the Executive Committee abroad, headed by Rabah Kabir, hampered its political activity.[260]

In the military sphere, the AIS attacked only army and other security forces units. It refrained from targeting the state's hydrocarbon facilities, possibly to demonstrate its national responsibility, thereby preserving a crucial source of revenues for the regime. Initially, FIS field commanders argued that the "best organization is no organization," but in view of the growing challenge by the GIA, the FIS National Shura (consultative) Council appointed Madani Merzaq, an Afghanistan veteran and former prayer leader, as the AIS "national emir" (commander) in March 1995. The appointment was not accepted easily, causing some defections among field commanders, but Merzaq was eventually able to consolidate his position as a major player in determining FIS's political line as well.[261]

The GIA, by contrast, adopted the purist approach, based on the teaching of Sayyid Qutb, which regards all of society as "apostate" unless it accepts the GIA's own strict interpretation of Islam, and consequently, rejected any suggestion of dialogue with the regime. Moreover, the GIA did not fight only the army, but targeted all representatives of Western culture such as intellectuals, athletes, scientists, and musicians and particularly "immodestly" dressed or Western- educated women. It viewed all those serving or collaborating with the "apostate" regime, including those using government facilities such as schools and buses, as deserving of death. Consequently, the GIA was responsible for some of the more shocking acts of murder and terror during the civil war, including burning villagers alive, hacking people with saws and axes, disemboweling women, and setting off car bombs in crowded city streets. In addition, GIA units abducted and raped hundreds of young women under the guise of "temporary marriages" (zawaj mut'a). A Shi'ite custom abhorred by Sunni Islam, it was adopted by Algerian Islamists who had fought in Afghanistan. GIA terror and its impact on the country's social and cultural life prompted one foreign journalist to observe that the GIA's "war against intellectuals" had begun to resemble a "Khmer Rougestyle slaughter of the elite."[262]

The army, too, employed brutal methods, including arbitrary and secret detention, torture, area bombing of suspected Islamist strongholds, and extrajudicial executions. It also set up loyalist militias comprising up to about 200,000 fighters. Some of these militias showed the same degree of ferocity demonstrated by the GIA, while others used their weapons to settle old tribal or clan feuds over land and water rights, or for Mafia-like extortion practices.[263]

Unlike the FIS, the GIA maintained its decentralized structure, which also exposed it to greater infiltration by the regime's intelligence services and resulted in the killings of several of its leaders. Moreover, it was divided between units adhering to the Jaza'ira (Algerianists, those subscribing to a typical Algerian model of Islam) and Salafi trends of the Algerian Islamist movement, as well as by personal rivalries, which occasionally ended in fighting and the elimination of rivals. Two national GIA amirs, Jamal Zeituni and 'Antar Zoubri, were deposed in July and December 1996, respectively, with Zeituni killed by government forces shortly after his deposition. In addition, various units associated with the Jaza'ira trend seceded from the movement, some rejoining the AIS while others tried to establish a middle course.[264]

The initial rivalry between the FIS and GIA escalated into actual fighting. The FIS constantly condemned the massacres carried out by GIA units as contrary to Islam and tarnishing its image. It accused the army of turning a blind eye, or even of manipulating the GIA, in order to turn people away from Islam. The GIA, for its part, regarded as a form of paganism attempts by the FIS to reach political accommodation with the regime and its apparent acceptance of democracy.[265]

By late 1997 it became evident that the military had gained the upper hand strategically, even though the Islamists could continue fighting and at times inflict heavy casualties. The FIS realized its weakness in the military and political arenas. Even more so, it sensed that the GIA actions were turning the people against the Islamists as a whole. Consequently, AIS commander Merzaq, after holding secret talks with the military, accepted the army's conditions for renewing a dialogue and declared a unilateral truce starting on October 1, 1997. Several GIA units gradually joined the truce, while others kept fighting. Occasionally, the AIS cooperated with the army in fighting the latter.[266] Opponents of the truce, located mainly outside Algeria, set up the FIS Coordination Council as an organized opposition within the movement.[267]

The unilateral truce deprived the FIS of almost any leverage on the government. FIS spokesmen conceded that the resort to violence after the 1992 coup had "benefited only the government" and exacted a heavy price from their movement. The Islamist movement realized, they added, that it was "essential" to manage the political arena peacefully and have "recourse to compromise." They advocated, therefore, a "Chilean-style solution," whereby a general amnesty would be decreed, following which the army would return to its barracks, refrain from politics, and allow a genuine electoral contest to take place. While seeking to allay fears of its ideology among secularists, the FIS insisted that it advocated a "Muslim democracy," which would not be "imbued with Western values" but which would apply the principles "common to all democracies."

They acknowledged, however, that while many unjust oppressive measures against women should be removed, women could not be legally equal to men.[268]

The army’s tactical victory exacerbated factional infighting culminating in the forced resignation of President Zeroual on September 11, 1998. The new president, ‘Abd al-‘Aziz Bouteflika, who served as foreign minister under Boumedienne, was elected on April 15, 1999 with the army’s backing and the withdrawal of the six opposition candidates.[269]

Although his authority was clearly subject to the army’s approval, Bouteflika launched a policy of national reconciliation. It culminated in a clemency law, approved by an overwhelming majority in a referendum on September 16, 1999. He ruled out, however, the relegalization of the FIS, even under a new name. Several hundred GIA fighters responded to the amnesty, which enabled them to lay down their arms peacefully. The FIS, which felt cheated by the regime’s continued refusal to relegalize it, could do little but threaten to withdraw from the truce, but it remained unclear how much credibility these threats had.[270]

By early 2001, the Algerian ruling elites were again secure in power, thanks to their ruthless determination to fight and to crucial mistakes by the Islamists. Despite internal divisions, the elites had remained largely unified in the struggle. The continuous flow of revenues from the hydrocarbon sector enabled the regime to sustain itself. Financial and political support by European countries, particularly France, and the United States proved important as well. Even more importantly, the atrocities committed by the GIA pushed important social sectors (e.g. workers, government employees, and peasants) to cooperate with the regime, however unpopular it was, because they feared the Islamists even more. Concurrently, the FIS failed to build a broad anti-government coalition, as Khomeini had done in the Iranian revolution, because its secular partners did not trust its declared adherence to political pluralism. GIA units, for their part, remained fragmented but were still able to carry out periodic attacks against government and civilian targets. However, these did not pose a strategic threat to the regime. While the regime has won the short-term military struggle, the Islamist alternative seems unlikely to vanish as long as the country’s economic crisis remains unresolved and the political system unable to incorporate broad sectors of society.

The victory of the Algerian pouvoir over its Islamist challengers put to rest the notion of the inevitability of an Islamist triumph in North Africa. Even during the most difficult years of the Algerian civil war, however, it was clear that the diversity within the Maghrib, and the successful coping strategies of the Moroccan and Tunisian regimes toward their own Islamist movements, meant that Algeria's neighbors were far from being mere dominos waiting to fall into line behind a triumphant Algerian-driven Islamist order. Moreover, Algeria has always been sui generis in the Arab world. It had the least distinct historical identity in precolonial times of any of the Maghrib's geopolitical units. It experienced the most thorough colonization, the most brutal, violent independence struggle, the application of the Soviet/Eastern European model of development and political organization, and now, the most comprehensive collapse (Lebanon excepted). Other Arab regimes never imitated Algeria's model of development nor did Algeria ever really project power beyond its borders, apart from the vacuum in the western Sahara. Thus, if historical patterns are any guide, whatever the course of events in Algeria, its influence on its neighbors can be expected to be limited.

In any case, the real challenge facing Arab regimes in the Maghrib will continue to come from within, as they seek to reconcile their political cultures and domestic exigencies with the requirements of an increasingly globalized international system. The degree of mutual aid and succor among the Islamists (more of an Islamic "global village" than an "internationale"), [271] while not negligible, does not represent an irresistible force. As the experience of the Maghrib states during the last two decades shows, modern states, singly and in alliances, possess considerable capacities of their own.

[202] The gharb, writes Moroccan sociologist Fatima Mernissi, is "the place of darkness and the incomprehensible, always frightening. Gharb is the territory of the strange, the foreign … the place where the sun sets and where darkness awaits. It is in the West that the night snaps up the sun and swallows it; then all terrors are possible. It is there that gharaba (strangeness) has taken up its abode.” As she also points out, in Arab-Islamic spatial terms, the land of the setting sun, the Far West, is al-maghrib al-aqsa, with not dissimilar connotations. Fatima Mernissi, Islam and Democracy: Fear of the Modern World (Reading, Mass.: Addison-Wesley, 1992) pp. 13—14.

[203] Mohamed El Mansour, “Salafis and Modernists in the Moroccan Nationalist Movement,” in John Ruedy (ed.), Islamism and Secularism in North Africa (New York: St. Martin’s Press, 1996), pp. 61—62.

[204] Jamil M. Abun-Nasr, A History of the Maghrib in the Islamic Period (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1987), pp. 334—335.

[205] Ibid, pp. 38—91; Jamil M. Abun-Nasr, “The Salafiyya Movement in Morocco: the Religious Bases of the Moroccan Nationalist Movement,” in Albert Hourani (ed.), St. Antony’s Papers, Middle Eastern Affairs, No. 3. (London, 1963); Mansour, “Salafis and Modernists,” pp. 59—69.

[206] Michael Hudson, Arab Politics: The Search for Legitimacy (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1977), p. 379.

[207] Remy Leveau, “Reflections on the State in the Maghreb,” in George Joffe (ed.), North Africa: Nation, State and Region (London: Routledge, 1993), p. 247.

[208] Abdelbaki Hermassi, “State and Democratization in the Maghreb,” in Ellis Goldberg, Resat Kasalen, and Joel Migdal (eds.), Rules and Rights in the Middle East (Seattle, University of Washington Press, 1993), pp. 106—107.

[209] Kevin Dwyer, Arab Voices (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1991), p. 15; Ali El-Kenz, Algerian Reflections on Arab Crises (Austin: University of Texas Press, 1991).

[210] Mernissi, Islam and Democracy, p. 56.

[211] Hermassi, “State and Democratization,” pp. 111—112.

[212] Remy Leveau points out the irony that the term amir al-mu’minin did not appear in the initial text of the 1962 constitution. Ironically, “it was the representatives of the [political] parties who reintroduced divine right among the instruments of power.” (“Islam et controle politique au Maroc,” cited in Francois Burgat and William Dowell, The Islamic Movement in North Africa (Austin: University of Texas Press, 1993), p. 167, n. 3.

[213] Henry Munson, Religion and Power in Morocco (New Haven and London: Yale University Press, 1993), makes a cogent argument to this effect, taking issue with Clifford Geertz’s classic Islam Observed: Religious Development in Morocco and Indonesia (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1968).

[214] Hassan II (Avec Eric Laurent), Hassan II: Le Memoire d’un Roi. Entretiens (Paris: Plons, 1993), p. 103.

[215] Along the lines laid down by John Entelis, Culture and Counterculture in Moroccan Politics (Boulder: Westview Press, 1989). The term “modernizing monarchy” is taken from Hudson’s Arab Politics (note 6) pp. 25—27, 165—229.

[216] I. William Zartman, “King Hassan’s New Morocco,” in I. W. Zartman (ed.), The Political Economy of Morocco (New York: Praeger, 1987), pp. 1—33.

[217] Elaine Combs-Schilling, Sacred Performances: Islam, Sexuality and Sacrifice (New York: Columbia University Press, 1989).

[218] Bruce Maddy-Weitzman, “Morocco,” in: B. Maddy-Weitzman (ed.), Middle East Contemporary Survey (MECS), Vol. XXII, 1998 (Boulder: Westview Press, 2001), pp. 454–463.

[219] Azzedine Layachi, State, Society and Democracy in Morocco: The Limits of Associative Life (Washington: Center for Contemporary Arab Studies, 1998); B. Maddy- Weitzman, “God, King, Country and ... Civil Society? The Evolution of the Moroccan Polity in the 1990s,” paper delivered at the annual conference of the Middle East Studies Association, Chicago, December 1998.

[220] M. Al-Ahnaf, “Maroc. Le Code du statute personnel,” Monde Arab Maghreb- Machrek, No. 145 (July-September 1994), pp. 11–12.

[221] For an analysis of these trends, see B. Maddy-Weitzman, “Population Growth and Family Planning in Morocco,” Asian and African Studies, Vol. 26, No. 1 (March 1992), pp. 63–80.

[222] Interview with Mohamed Tozy, Jeune Afrique, February 9–15, 1999; Emad Eldin Shahin, Political Ascent: Contemporary Islamic Movements in North Africa (Boulder: Westview Press, 1998), pp. 186–187.

[223] Mohammed Tozy, “Champ et contre champ politico-religieux au Maroc,” cited by Burgat and Dowell, The Islamic Movement in North Africa, p. 170; al-Majalla, June 23–29, 1996.

[224] Munson, Religion and Power in Morocco, pp. 153–158; Tozy interview in Jeune Afrique, February 9–15, 1999; Shahin, Political Ascent, pp. 179–181.

[225] Shahin, Political Ascent pp. 188–192; Shahin, “Under the Shadow of the Imam,” Middle East Insight, Vol.11, No. 2 (January-February 1995), pp. 42–43.

[226] Marco Hebdo Internatonal, May 7–13, 1999.

[227] Tozy interview in Jeune Afrique, February 9–15, 1999.

[228] Burgat and Dowell, The Islamic Movement in North Africa, pp. 166–167.

[229] Interview in the Casablanca daily al-Bayane, quoted by Marco Hebdo Internatonal, December 12—18, 1998.

[230] Al-Sharq al-Awsat, January 9, 1999.

[231] For the details of their activities, see Jeune Afrique, January 12—18, 1995.

[232] See the statement by Driss Khalil, the minister of higher education, that certain Moroccan universities were “confronting a wave of Islamic fundamentalism.” Agence France Press, April 24, 1995.

[233] Al-Quds al-‘Arabi, April 22, 1998 (WNC-Daily Report).

[234] Al-‘Alam (Rabat), 14 March 2000.

[235] Susan Waltz, “Islamist Appeal in Tunisia,” Middle East Journal, Vol. 40, No. 4 (Autumn 1986), pp. 651—670.

[236] Nikkie Keddie makes the important point that Bourguiba’s policies, e.g., the adoption of the Personal Status Code in 1956, were not simply blind imitations of Western policies (unlike those of Ataturk in Turkey), but contained features from the Shari‘a. Keddie, “The Islamist Movement in Tunisia,” The Maghreb Review, Vol. 11, No. 1 (1986), p. 26.

[237] Burgat and Dowell, The Islamic Movement in North Africa, p. 234.

[238] For the essence of their thinking and activities, see Yvonne Y. Haddad, “Sayyid Qutb: Ideologue of Islamic Revival,” and Charles J. Adams, “Mawdudi and the Islamic State,” in John L. Esposito (ed.), Voices of Resurgent Islam (New York: Oxford University Press, 1983), pp. 67—98, 99—133; and Emmanuel Sivan, Radical Islam (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1985), pp. 21–49.

[239] See statement by Ahmad Enneifer, one of the Tunisian “progressive Islamists” who separated from Ghannushi, in Burgat and Dowell, The Islamic Movement in North Africa, pp. 217–218.

[240] Norma Salem, “Tunisia,” in Shireen T. Hunter (ed.), The Politics of Islamic Revivalism (Bloomington: Indiana University Press), p. 164.

[241] Nicolas Beau, Rached Channouchi: “Penseur et Tribun,” interview, Le Cahiers De L’Orient, no. 27, (1992), pp. 45–52; The Observer, January 19, 1992, quoted in Emad Eldin Shahin, “Tunisia’s Renaissance Party,” Middle East Insight, Vol. 11, No. 2 (January- February 1995), p. 41.

[242] Marie Miran, “Tunisia,” in Bruce Maddy-Weitzman (ed.) MECS, Vol. XIX, 1995 (Boulder: Westview Press, 1997), pp. 630–631.

[243] For a detailed study of Ghannushi’s thinking on key issues, see Khaled Elgindy, “The Rhetoric of Rashid Ghannushi,” Arab Studies Journal, Vol. 3, No. 1 (Spring 1995), pp. 101–119.

[244] Al-Shira‘, October 24, 1994.

[245] Michael Collins Dunn, “The Al-Nahda Movement in Tunisia: From Renaissance to Revolution,” in Ruedy, (ed.), Islamism and Secularism in North Africa, pp. 149–165.

[246] New York Times, January 9, 1994.

[247] Al-Shira‘, October 24, 1994—MSANEWS, July 8, 1995; text of speech at the Royal Institute of International Affairs, Chatham House, London, May 9, 1995— MSANEWS, May 23, 1995.

[248] MSANEWS, May 23, 1995.

[249] Daniel Zisenwine, “Tunisia,” in Bruce Maddy-Weitzman (ed.), MECS, Vol. XXI, 1997 (Boulder: Westview Press, 1999), p. 701.

[250] John Entelis, Comparative Politics of North Africa (Syracuse: Syracuse University Press, 1980), p. 105; Severine Labat, Les Islamistes Algeriens: entre les urnes et le maquis (Paris: Seul, 1995), pp. 23, 59—60; Mohammed Tozy, “Les tendances de l’islamisme en Algerie,” Confluences Mediterranee, No. 12 (Automne 1994), pp. 51—54.

[251] Boutheina Cheriet, “Islamism and Feminism: Algeria’s ‘Rites of Passage’ to Democracy,” in John P. Entelis and Phillip C. Naylor (eds.), State and Society in Algeria (Boulder: Westview Press, 1992), pp. 171—215; Mohammed Tozy, “Islam and the State,” in I. William Zartman and William Mark Habeeb (eds.), Polity and Society in Contemporary North Africa (Boulder: Westview Press, 1993), pp. 108—109, 199—200.

[252] Rabia Bekkar, “Taking Up Space in Tlemcen: The Islamist Opposition in Urban Algeria,” Middle East Report, Vol. 22, No. 6 (November/December 1992), pp. 11—15.

[253] Hugh Roberts, “A Trial of Strength: Algerian Islamism,” in James P. Piscatori (ed.), Islamic Fundamentalisms and the Gulf Crisis (Chicago: American Academy of Arts and Sciences, 1991), p. 144.

[254] Remy Leveau, Le sabre et le turban (Paris: Francois Burin, 1993), pp. 194—197; Hugh Roberts, “From Radical Mission to Equivocal Ambition: The Expansion and Manipulation of Algerian Islamism, 1979—1992,” in Martin E. Marty and R. Scott Appleby (eds.), Accounting for Fundamentalisms: The Dynamic Character of Movements (The Fundamentalism Project, Vol. 4), (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1994), pp. 428–489.

[255] Al-Watan, June 22—FBIS-NES, Daily Report (DR), June 27, 1990.

[256] Roberts argues forcefully that Madani’s and Belhadj’s voices complemented rather than contradicted each other. For the richest, and at times most provocative analysis of regime-Islamist dynamics in Algeria up until the 1992 military coup, see Roberts, “From Radical Mission to Equivocal Ambition,” pp. 428–489.

[257] Gideon Gera, “Algeria,” in B. Maddy-Weitzman (ed.), MECS, Vol. XVIII, 1994 (Boulder: Westview Press, 1996), p. 237; Meir Litvak, “Algeria,” in B. Maddy-Weitzman (ed.), MECS, Vol. XIX, 1995 (Boulder: Westview Press, 1997), pp. 225–226.

[258] Litvak, MECS, 1995, pp. 213–215.

[259] Ibid, pp. 216–217, 219–222; Litvak, “Algeria,” in MECS, Vol. XX, 1996 (Boulder: Westview Press, 1998), pp. 232–234; and “Algeria,” MECS, in B. Maddy-Weitzman (ed.), Vol. XXI, 1997 (Boulder: Westview Press, 1998), pp. 266–269.

[260] Litvak, MECS, 1996, p. 238; and MECS, 1997, pp. 274–275.

[261] Litvak, MECS, 1995, p. 226; and MECS, 1997, pp. 273–274.

[262] The Independent, February 1, 1995; Litvak, MECS 1995, p. 223; Litvak, MECS 1997, pp. 279–280; al-Hayat, January 12, April 14; al-Sharq al-Awsat, March 6; al-Wasat, June 1, 1998.

[263] Mideast Mirror, March 6, 1998; al-Majalla, March 15–21, 1998.

[264] Litvak, MECS, 1996, pp. 237–238; Litvak, MECS, 1997, p. 283.

[265] Litvak, MECS, 1995, pp. 227–228; Litvak, MECS, 1996, pp. 236–237; al- Hayat, January 12, 1998.

[266] Litvak, MECS, 1997, pp. 273–274.

[267] Litvak, MECS, 1997, p. 275; al-Hayat, January 9; al-Wasat, May 11; Middle East International, June 19, 1998.

[268] Le Nouvel Observateur, January 15—21, 1998.

[269] Al-Watan, April 17, 1999 (WNC-DR).

[270] Mideast Mirror, June 8 and July 28, 1999, and January 7, 2000.

[271] We owe this distinction to Martin Kramer.

 6. Hizballah: Between Armed Struggle and Domestic Politics

Eyal Zisser

On May 24, 2000, Israeli forces completed their withdrawal from south Lebanon, ending what Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak called Israel’s involvement in “the Lebanese tragedy.”[272] The military’s definition of this pullout as “an achievement and even an extraordinary success”[273] would be judged by whether the future brought peace along the border or a continued battle with Hizballah. In Lebanon, Hizballah activists led celebrations at what they considered a huge victory for the organization. After all, this struggle had been a major reason for the group’s establishment in 1983 and one of the main factors making it a leading force within the Shi’ite community in Lebanon.

One cannot easily downplay this achievement by Hizballah, since throughout the 1990s it had remained almost the sole group in any Arab state committed to implementing an armed struggle against Israel. It would be argued that Hizballah achieved what no other Arab country or army had been able to do: oust Israel from Arab territory without the Arab side committing to any concession.[274]

As an Islamist movement seeking influence and power within Lebanon in order to transform Lebanese society, however, Hizballah found that its victory brought serious problems and posed serious decisions about its future. After all, it was the long, successful struggle against Israel that maintained the group, bolstered its standing within the Shi’ite community, and made it strong in Lebanon’s public opinion and political system. The same factor gave it foreign support, especially from Iran and Syria. After the Israeli withdrawal, the organization lost some of its luster in the face of day-to-day challenges from Lebanese life and the harsh choices of Lebanese domestic politics.

In its favor, Hizballah was deeply rooted in the Shi’ite and Lebanese experience and had been preparing for a decade to make this transition. It strengthened its political wing, information apparatus, and widespread system of educational, health and social services. Clearly, Hizballah will survive. The question is how its new status will affect its goals and tactics, the nature of its Islamist campaign to transform the country, and the internal affairs of Lebanon itself. One critical question is to what extent Hizballah will undergo a process of “normalization,” becoming more of a political party than an armed militia and a reformist rather than a revolutionary movement. If this happens, Hizballah would be cut down to its “natural size” as one more Shi’ite communal party and interest group, making deals with rivals in the Lebanese political mosaic, vying for prestige, power, and patronage.

The organization is quite aware of this danger and is trying to meet it. One potential solution would be to accept this framework and preserve a quiet south Lebanon along the border with Israel. Another would be to renew its armed struggle, precisely to revive the past days of glory. In any event, what is clear is that an important and decisive chapter in the organization's history has ended; but its story is far from over.

Hizballah stormed onto the Lebanese scene in late 1983 with a series of attacks on Western and Israeli targets in the country that brought hundreds of casualties, leading the United States and France to end their involvement in Lebanon, and Israel to complete a quick withdrawal of its direct presence.[275] The military struggle against the West, and especially against Israel, has been since the early 1980s one of the organization's main activities. This was an expression of the influence of two major events in Middle East history that set the group on its path. One was Iran's Islamic revolution, a direct source of inspiration and role model for the organization. By the early 1980s Hizballah had already bound itself to Tehran and since then has received Iran's economic and political support. The second event was the Israeli invasion of Lebanon in June 1982, which led the Shi'ite community onto the path of a violent struggle against the Israeli presence in south Lebanon. This struggle became an important focal point for the organization, one from which it drew legitimacy and support at home and abroad.

Despite all this, the organization's emergence came purely from the Lebanese context, as a result of domestic processes in Lebanon and within the Shi'ite community. The most prominent of these factors were: the Shi'ite community's increasing demographic weight in Lebanon's population (from 19 percent in 1950 to more than 40 percent at the end of the 1990s); increased migration of community members from rural regions in the Biqua'a and south to slums on the outskirts of cities; and, as a result, a stronger religious identification of Shi'ites that turned Shi'ite clerics into the community's leaders, replacing the traditional leadership based on the notable Shi'ite families.[276]

These processes eventually turned the Shi'ite community from a weak, passive, and to some extent marginal community in the Lebanese arena into an active, powerful community struggling for a central role. This effort was first led by Musa al-Sadr, a cleric born in Iran who arrived in Lebanon in 1959 and became the community's most prominent leader. In 1975, with the outbreak of civil war, al-Sadr founded the Amal movement as a military force to strengthen the community's bargaining power. In the wake of al-Sadr's disappearance during a visit to Libya in 1978, he was replaced as Amal leader by Nabih Barri, a lawyer by training and not a cleric.[277]

Even before his disappearance, there emerged those who opposed Musa al-Sadr, believing that the Shi'ites should adopt a more radical worldview. These people refused to accept Amal's moderate line, as inspired by Musa al-Sadr, to improve the Shi'ites' status based on accepting Lebanon's existing political system. With al-Sadr gone and in the shadow of Iran's Islamic revolution and Israel's invasion of Lebanon, these people established Hizballah, whose activities began in 1983.[278]

Hizballah's platform, published in February 1985, left no room for doubt regarding its long-term objectives. These focused on the establishment of an Islamic republic in Lebanon, based on the Iranian model, as a stage in establishing a united Islamic state all over the Islamic world. At the same time, there was an obvious attempt by the organization to don a cloak of pragmatism and moderation, mainly in the Lebanese domestic context.[279] This reflected its realization that it was operating within the limitations of Lebanese realities that made it difficult for Hizballah to implement its ideological concepts. Lebanese society is a mosaic of religious and ethnic communities, none of which has the ability to impose itself on its rivals. In addition, the Shi'ite community was an insignificant minority on the eastern shores of the Mediterranean, outnumbered by a sometimes hostile Sunni majority. Finally, it seemed for a long time that it was Amal and not Hizballah that enjoyed support from the majority in the Shi'ite community.

Hizballah reached the pinnacle of its power within the Lebanese Shi'ite community in the late 1980s, when it gained both political and military control over most of West Beirut and large areas of south Lebanon. However, it was at this high point that Hizballah found itself faced with challenges threatening its continued activities and even its very existence. First and foremost among these problems was the Ta'if Agreement signed in October 1989, ending the Lebanese civil war—during which Hizballah had flourished—and marking the start of a process of rehabilitating the state institutions and disarming most of the militias. Hizballah was also forced to give up weapons, although it was permitted to continue carrying arms in south Lebanon in the struggle against Israel. Moreover, the Ta'if Agreement laid the foundation for establishing a new Maronite- Sunni order in Lebanon, with Syrian backing and support, relegating the larger Shi'ite community to the sidelines. Another challenge facing the organization was the Middle East peace process that began in 1991 and threatened to bring an end to the organization's struggle against Israel, thus seriously weakening one of its sources of legitimacy and power.[280]

In the face of these realities, Hizballah reinvented itself as a pragmatic organization, ostensibly ready to abandon commitment to its ideological concepts or at least to postpone their implementation until far into the future. At first, the organization expressed opposition to the Ta'if Agreement and was apparently responsible for the assassination of Lebanon's President Rene Mu'awad, in November 1989, a way to prevent the agreement's implementation.[281] However, it quite quickly came to terms with the "Tai'f Republic" and began taking steps toward becoming integrated into the latter's institutions.

Hizballah participated in the 1992 parliamentary elections and its "Loyalty to the Resistance" slate won eight seats. It also participated in the parliamentary elections of 1996 and 2000, and in the 1998 municipal elections.[282] Throughout these years, Hizballah engaged in contacts designed to bring it into the government coalition. As the organization's Secretary General Na'im al-Qasim explained: "Our decision to participate in the parliamentary elections in 1992 meant that it was possible to participate in the government ... [d]epending only on what government it is to be, and so far as we are concerned it has nothing to do with any matter of principle."[283]

In all of this, it was possible to observe a clear process of Lebanonization that the organization had undergone, as part of which it had in fact accepted the existence of the Lebanese state and had begun to work toward integration into its institutions. Already in the organization's platform for the 1992 parliamentary elections, it stated that Hizballah would work toward preserving “One Lebanon,” though adding that “preserving one Lebanon and its affiliation with its Muslim and Arab environment, makes it incumbent on all of us to adhere to the resistance to the Zionist occupation and the liberation of the occupied lands.”[284]

In April 1997, as part of its effort to establish dialogue and even cooperation with all parties and political forces active in Lebanon—including the Maronites—Hizballah’s Secretary-General Hasan Nasrallah declared that: “Hizballah is a movement whose members are Lebanese, its leadership is Lebanese, the decision is Lebanese and it is made by a Lebanese leadership. The movement is fighting on Lebanese soil for the cause of liberating Lebanese territory and for the honor and freedom of the Lebanese people and the nation in general Hizballah is an Islamic-Lebanese movement.”[285]

In addition to its moves in the political arena, the organization expanded its activity within the Shi’ite community. With Iran’s generous assistance, it established a network of educational and cultural institutions, and also health and social welfare services. The latter included an Islamic health authority that operated pharmacies, clinics and even hospitals where thousands of people were treated every day. The organization also established a construction company that not only built houses, mosques and schools, but also paved roads and even supplied water to Shi’ite villages. Particularly prominent in all of this was its contribution to the reconstruction of thousands of houses damaged in the battles with Israel in south Lebanon.[286] In addition, Hizballah maintained a Martyrs’ (shuhada) Fund, which provided assistance to thousands of families of dead, injured and imprisoned Shi’ites.[287] However, it should be borne in mind that as the rehabilitation of the state institutions in Lebanon progressed, they began pushing aside and limiting the organization’s activities, and it was forced to concentrate on matters of education, health, and social welfare.

Of course, all this provided the basis for transforming Hizballah from a radical militia movement to a social-political organization which had at first tried to present itself as an alternative to the Lebanese state but gradually came to terms with the state’s existence and slowly became part of the political order.

In view of the progress made in the Arab-Israeli peace process, particularly in the years 1992 to 1996, the organization’s leaders began hinting that they might be ready to accept an Israeli-Lebanese peace agreement and to end the armed struggle against Israel. Hizballah apparently wanted to adopt the approach of the Islamist organizations in Egypt and Jordan regarding the peace process. They had come to the realization that they were unable to prevent a peace agreement between Israel and the Arab regimes in their countries, but also hoped and believed they could prevent the normalization of relations between the Arab world and Israel.[288]

Nevertheless, the impasse in the peace process, especially on the Syrian and Lebanese tracks during the latter half of the 1990s, allowed the organization to refrain from reaching a decision on the question of its future character and path and to continue to enjoy the best of both worlds. On the one hand, it worked toward integration into the Lebanese political system, becoming a legitimate part of the Lebanese political mosaic. On the other hand, it carried on the struggle against Israel, thus preserving its image and standing as a radical armed movement. There can be no doubt that the organization increased its circle of supporters thanks to its political activities, as well as its social welfare activities. But this was insignificant compared to the prestige and support gained within the Shi’ite community and Lebanese public opinion, as well as from Syria and Iran, because of its armed struggle against Israel. This struggle differentiated it from its rivals in the Shi’ite or Lebanese arena, made it unique, and added to its renowned glory.

In view of all this, the organization’s determination to ensure Israel’s continued presence in south Lebanon as much as possible is understandable. Ostensibly, one might have expected Hizballah to encourage the voices that began to be heard in Israel beginning in the mid-1990s calling for Israeli’s unilateral withdrawal from south Lebanon. All it had to do was to hint that it was ready to end its armed struggle against Israel if this happened, thus pushing Israeli policy and public debate toward a quick withdrawal. However, exactly the opposite occurred. After all, Israel’s continued presence in south Lebanon allowed the organization to maintain a struggle against it that ensured the organization’s relative advantage over all other Lebanese forces, especially its Shi’ite rivals.

Thus the organization spoke in vague terms every time it was called upon the discuss the question of its future in the event that Israel unilaterally withdrew from south Lebanon. Although the organization's spokesmen repeatedly claimed that its activities were focused on driving Israel out of Lebanon, they also repeated their commitment to the liberation of all Palestine, thus implying the possibility of continued armed struggle against Israel even if the latter withdrew its forces to the international border with Lebanon.[289]

Thus Hizballah gained the image of defending the Shi'ites of south Lebanon.[290] In the weeks before and after the Israeli withdrawal, the organization became a symbol and object of admiration throughout the Arab and Muslim world. Even the Lebanese government, which had viewed the organization as an element undermining its sovereignty, recognized it as representing Lebanese patriotism and thus worthy of support. A clear expression of international recognition was the meeting between UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan and Hasan Nasrallah during the former's administration because of the central role the UN had played and would play in Israel's withdrawal from south Lebanon.[291]

Thus, the withdrawal from south Lebanon allowed the organization to hold victory celebrations and take up the positions Israel had evacuated. Hizballah's activists became lords over the region, while the Lebanese government was wary of deploying its forces and enforcing its sovereignty there. The organization even began organizing visits of Lebanese as well as Arab tourists to areas in south Lebanon from which Israel had withdrawn, during which the big thrill for tourists was organized stone-throwing at the Fatma Gate toward Israeli soldiers across the border. Nevertheless, the organization was careful to preserve order and calm along the border, and even prevented acts of vengeance against South Lebanese Army (SLA) soldiers who surrendered to it. These soldiers were turned over to the Lebanese authorities for trial.[292]

However, this alleged victory over Israel may be revealed as a false one and may mark the beginning of Hizballah's decline in standing and prestige. After all, having no battle with Israel may in the future cost the organization some of its dynamism, uniqueness, and foreign support. It was the struggle against Israel that had effectively prevented the organization from sinking into the Lebanese political quagmire and becoming just one of many political parties operating in Lebanon.

An example of the serious problem already facing Hizballah was provided several weeks after the withdrawal from south Lebanon by the death of two Hizballah fighters in the village of Markaba in south Lebanon during a battle against the rival group Amal for control over the area Israel had left. The leaders of both groups were quick to calm things down and to present the incident as a local affair. Yet such clashes could occur many times in the future, and the struggle for influence will remain intense.[293]

Amal is indeed emerging as a serious rival of Hizballah in the battle for control of the Shi'ite street. Amal has a certain advantage over Hizballah in that it is a more deeply entrenched organization headed by a pragmatic, moderate leadership. Amal's approach reflects recognition of the Lebanese reality, and its readiness to use that framework for promoting Shi'ite interests can make it a more effective lobbying group. Many Shi'ites do indeed prefer Amal and view Hizballah as too radical. Amal's largely secular leadership also appeals more to many individuals.

The power balance and Amal's advantages over Hizballah may be seen in the parliamentary elections of the 1990s, and in the 1998 municipal elections in which Amal's candidates gained control over many Shi'ite strongholds in south Lebanon and the Biqua'a. Among these were the city of Tyre, the largest Shi'ite concentration in the south, and Baalbek, the largest and most important town in the Lebanese Biqa'a. Until then both had been considered Hizballah strongholds.[294]

However, the struggle against Amal is only one of the series of challenges facing Hizballah. In July 1997, Shaykh Subhi al-Tufayli, former Hizballah secretary-general who left the organization when he lost a bid to lead it, announced the founding of a new organization called the "Revolution of the Hungry." Tufayli had hoped through this movement to lead a campaign of civil disobedience for the purpose of advancing the Shi’ite community, which he claimed had been neglected by the governing institutions as well as by the leaderships of both Amal and Hizballah.[295]

The new movement’s founding was a kind of coming full circle for Hizballah, and also for Amal. After all, both were founded as protest movements by sectors of the Shi’ite community dissatisfied with the high-handedness and ineffectiveness of the current leaders, viewing them as part of an indifferent establishment. Hizballah’s own creation expressed the criticisms of many Shi’ite clerics regarding Amal’s moderate position and readiness to integrate into the existing Lebanese order. In addition, the founding of Hizballah was also an expression of frustration by many in the Shi’ite community who had not gained influence or leadership in Amal institutions. Thus, Hizballah was not just a militant group but also a fascinating coalition of forces within the Shi’ite community working toward advancing their interests under the guise of a comprehensive effort to improve the status of the Shi’ite community.[296] Yet now Hizballah had also become institutionalized and the object of criticism by those who felt left out by its composition.

As Musa al-Sadr had done before him, Muhammad Husayn Fadlallah, the spiritual leader of Hizballah, held these elements together, assisted by the antiIsrael struggle as a political and ideological glue.[297] However, it is clear that among these political and social forces that have joined together in Hizballah, there are fissures and differences of opinion on political and personal grounds which have long been pushed aside because of the priority granted to the struggle against Israel but in time might break out onto the surface.

One problem, which also affects Hizballah’s relationship to Iran, is Fadlallah’s pretensions to the role of Shi’ite’s supreme spiritual leader (Marj’a Taqlid), a position that became vacant with the death of Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini in 1989. In this ambition, Fadlallah found himself in confrontation with Iran’s spiritual leader Ayatollah ‘Ali Khamene’i. Thus far, the organization has indeed avoided involvement in this confrontation but at the price of distancing itself somewhat from Fadlallah.[298] The question of religious leadership over the Shi’ites remains unresolved and could cast a threatening shadow over Iranian-Hizballah relations and even over the organization's internal cohesion.

However, Hizballah's main problem is rooted, as with Amal, in the fact that the group has become a part of the Lebanese political establishment. This is illustrated by its willingness, even eagerness, to join the Lebanese government. It is therefore no wonder that now Hizballah is being accused of no longer reflecting the misery and distress of the Shi'ite community in Lebanon, a claim on which Tyfayli wants to build. There is no doubt that the emergence of Tyfayli caused Hizballah considerable embarrassment. Indications of the organization's difficulty in directly facing up to Tufayli can be seen in its readiness to support the Lebanese government's moves against Tufayli and his movement.

The Lebanese government issued a warrant for Tufayli's arrest and took steps to prevent his supporters' activities. However, this was not enough to prevent Tufayli from continuing his efforts, although he maintained a low profile and for a time even went underground.[299] Moreover, in July 2000 he appeared at the graveside of the late Syrian President Hafiz al-Assad in Qurdaha on the Syrian shore for a condolence call and prayers for the soul of the departed. This showed Tufayli's aspirations to continue an active role in the Lebanese scene but also, more important, the fact that he enjoys the support and backing of Syria, which apparently wishes to use him as a card against the Lebanese regime and Hizballah.[300]

Hizballah, of course, remains a well-established, deep-rooted organization with broad support from the Shi'ite community, not to mention backing from Syria and Iran. Yet if Hizballah provides neither its constituents the passion of anti-Israel struggle nor its patrons a useful card in regional conflicts, how might this base be eroded?

Israel's withdrawal brought to the fore other issues on the Lebanese agenda. For some, especially the hard-core Maronites, the new focus is on Syrian presence in Lebanon, and voices have already been heard calling for the departure of Syrian forces from Lebanon.[301]

Others, especially members of the Shi’ite community, have an entirely different agenda and set of priorities. They are well aware that the new Lebanese order arising from the Syrian-backed Ta’if Agreement has left Lebanon a country under a Maronite-Sunni hegemony. The balance of power between these two communities, which have ruled Lebanon together since the founding of that state in 1943, has become more equal. Nevertheless, the Shi’ite community, which is now the largest community in Lebanon, has remained discriminated against in everything that has to do with apportioning of financial and regime resources.

Therefore, it may be assumed that the Shi’ites will make their voices heard demanding a fair share of the Lebanese national pie. Experience teaches that these demands could develop, sooner or later, into a violent confrontation, especially since they represent not just hunger for political power and resources, but also real economic distress in the urban slums, Biaq’a and the south. It may be assumed that in such a situation in the future, Hizballah will play a substantial, albeit not exclusive, role in the Shi’ite community’s struggle. Yet with Syria opposing its ambitions, Iran reluctant to become too entangled in internal Lebanese politics, and other groups fighting Hizballah (instead of cheering it on against Israel), this would be a far more difficult period for the organization.

Of course, it cannot be assumed that the group’s struggle against Israel is over, especially since such a strategy has certain attractions. Yet if Hizballah were to be responsible for renewing a cross-border war with Israel (on behalf of the unpopular Palestinians) and for bringing Israeli attacks on the south (bringing new flights of refugees and a halt to or even reversal of reconstruction), an antiIsrael battle would be far less popular than it was in the past.

The death of Hafiz al-Assad undoubtedly upset the apple cart from Syria’s point of view. The Syrians had a clear interest in encouraging Hizballah to continue its struggle against Israel along the Israeli-Lebanese international border. After all, in Syria’s view, shedding Israeli blood in south Lebanon gave Syria the only powerful bargaining chip it had in pressuring Israel to accept Damascus's conditions for an Israeli-Syrian peace agreement. Hafiz al-Assad had raised this kind of use of violence to gain his political objectives to a fine art. He did not eschew brinkmanship, being prepared to deal with possible escalation and flare-up.

With Assad's passing, though, and given his son and successor Bashar's clear interest in firmly establishing his status at home, Syria's interest or temptation in risking a border war that could escalate into a direct Syrian-Israel confrontation has diminished. Israeli spokesmen have on more than one occasion warned that any escalation along the border will force Israel to strike with unprecedented force again Syrian targets in Lebanon, with all that would entail.[302]

As for Iran, its distance from the Israeli-Arab arena of confrontation spurred it on to ignite fires there. After all, it was Iran's regime that reaped the fruits of Hizballah's achievements—which comprised the Islamic revolution's only foreign success—without paying any price at all for them. Thus, Iran has a basic interest in fanning the flames along the border, though this might be limited by that country's own internal struggle.

Nevertheless, the final decision was, and remains, in Hizballah's hands. The organization is aware of the great profits it could gain with the renewal of the struggle against Israel, but it also knows what harm might be done to its image and status inside Lebanon if its actions create a conflagration that could spread all over Lebanon. In such an event, it could lose a great deal of its legitimacy both inside Lebanon and in the international arena, as well as the support of the Shi'ite community, which might come to see it more as provocateur than as protector.

The organization has preferred to remain vague and to spread contradictory messages regarding its future path. For example, at funeral services for members of the organization killed in the clashes with Amal in Markaba in July 2000, Hizballah's Deputy Secretary General Na'im al-Qasim declared, "There are those who tell us how nice things are at present, is peace not sweet and is reaching an understanding with Israel not logical and desirable? On the other hand, there are those who now wish to turn into revolutionaries although they were not like that in the past, and they ask why we are not shooting at Israeli soldiers standing opposite us ... We answer all of these people that we believe in Jihad and resistance and we will not deviate from this belief, but we will choose our own tactics and will not be dragged along by provocation. We conduct ourselves with wisdom, intelligence and Jihad, in a manner that incorporates all of this. Therefore we will not show our hand."[303] On another occasion, Na'im added: "This stage [in the struggle against Israel] has not finished, in view of the fact that the Palestinian [track of the peace negotiations] is in trouble, the Syrian track is stuck and the other elements of the Arab-Israeli conflict have also remained unchanged."[304]

The organization's Secretary-General Hasan Nasrallah explained in an interview that: "Hizballah is based on opposition to the Zionist project in our region. Hizballah adheres to this idea ... The expulsion of Israel from the region and the liberation of Palestine and Jerusalem form the Hizballah's principal belief, and as such they are more sacred than a set goal ... However, the question before us is our order of priorities in the next stage. There is no doubt that Hizballah enjoys a certain status in the Arab world. We want to preserve this and harness this status in favor of the awakening of the entire nation, to reinforce the condition of hostility towards our Israeli enemy to ensure that Israel was and has remained our enemy. Towards this end, we will invest efforts in formulating our opposition to normalization, and in order to perpetuate the isolation and siege of Israel, at the level of the people and after that at the cultural and economic level."[305]

However, the organization did take care to retain a pretext to continue its struggle against Israel, at the time and place it chooses. This pretext focuses on the claim that Israel's withdrawal is not complete, since it has retained some Lebanese territory. Reference is mainly to the Shab'a Farms, which Lebanon claims form part of its lands. Israel claims, however, and the UN agrees, that they are part of the Golan Heights, in other words part of Syria, and therefore Israel does not have to withdraw from them in the framework of UN Resolution 425. Hizballah can hardly count on Syria to agree that this land should be given to Lebanon.

The issue of the Lebanese prisoners, ‘Abd al-Karim ‘Ubayd and Mustafa Dirani, being held by Israel as leverage to obtain the release of a captured Israeli airman has remained an open issue for the organization. Moreover, Hizballah’s military wing continues to operate and is deployed like any army along the border with Israel. It has established observation points and armed patrols along the border.

A major regional crisis as a result of the collapse of the Israeli-Palestinian negotiations or the lack of any progress in the Syrian-Israeli track may encourage Iran and Syria, Hizballah’s main allies, to pressure it to resume military struggle against Israel. The organization may choose as an alternative option the resumption of terror activity against Israeli and Jewish targets outside Israel, or use Palestinians living in Lebanon. Indeed, according to Israeli intelligence sources, Hizballah has been training Palestinians, mainly members of the Islamic Jihad under Ramadan Shalah, for this purpose. Some of these individuals already took part in the beginning of 2000 in some Hizballah attacks against Israeli targets in south Lebanon.[306]

Indeed, on October 7, 2000, a few days after the eruption of the Palestinian intifada, Hizballah abducted three Israeli soldiers in the Shaba‘a Farms region. A few days later, Hasan Nasrallah announced that his men had kidnapped another Israeli senior reserve officer, promising to continue the struggle against Israel along the border.[307] In the months that followed, Hizballah continued its attacks in the Shaba‘a region. For some time, Israel refrained from any retaliation but, on the night of April 16, 2001, the Israeli air force attacked a Syrian radar position in Mt. Lebanon, signaling the beginning of a new policy in Lebanon. The attack was a response to an attack by Hizballah on an Israeli position in the Shaba‘a Farms three days earlier.[308] Although Hizballah continued its attack against Israeli targets in the Shaba‘a Farms, it was clear that the new Israeli policy increased Hizballah’s dilemma as to what should be its future course. The increasing criticism in Lebanon against the attacks on Israel, as endangering Lebanon’s political stability and economic growth, led to an apologetic response from Hizballah, for example, a declaration by Muhammad Ra‘d, Nasrallah’s deputy, in summer 2001, according to which the Hizballah would take into consideration the tourist season in Lebanon before making any military moves against Israel.[309]

Thus, while Israel had not been able to stop all attacks by its withdrawal, it had created a political situation that at least constrained Hizballah and forced it to confine most attacks to one small part of the border area.

To conclude, the Israeli withdrawal from south Lebanon should be considered a big achievement for Hizballah. At the same time this achievement presents the organization with a difficult dilemma: whether to end its military struggle against Israel and become an ordinary Lebanese political party or to continue the struggle against Israel with all its consequences. Within this choice is embedded an equally hard, though less obvious, problem, forcing Hizballah to transform itself from a revolutionary to a reformist group in trying to make Lebanon an Islamic state.

Choosing armed struggle abroad and revolution at home would isolate Hizballah and reduce its base of support. But selecting an end to foreign struggle and reformism at home takes away Hizballah's past political advantages and opens it to splits and complaints that it has failed or become an establishment group. Thus, the possible "normalization" of Hizballah may become Israel's revenge on the organization that first helped force it to remain on the south Lebanon battlefield and then helped force it to withdraw from that area.

[272] Ha'aretz, May 25, 2000.

[273] Ha'aretz, July 28, 2000.

[274] See Hizballah's Secretary-General Hasan Nasrallah's interview with al-Jazira TV, May 27, 2000; see also: <http://www.moqawama.org][http://www.moqawama.org]]> (Hizballah's official Web site).

[275] For historical background on the Hizballah see Eyal Zisser, “Hizballah in Leba- non—At the Crossroads,” in Bruce Maddy-Weitzman and Efraim Inbar (eds.), Religious Radicalism in the Greater Middle East (London: Frank Cass, 1997), pp. 90—110; Waddah Sharrara, Dawlat Hizballah, Lubnan Mujtama‘a Islamiyya (Hizballah’s State, Lebanon—an Islamic Society) (Beirut: Dar al-Nahar li-Nashr, 1996); Hala Jaber, Hezbollah, Born with a Vengeance (New York: Columbia University Press, 1997); Shimon Shapira, Hizbullah bein Iran ve Levanon (Hizbullah between Iran and Lebanon) (Tel Aviv: Am Oved, 2000).

[276] For more see Foud Ajami, The Vanished Imam—Musa Sadr and the Shia of Lebanon (Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1986), pp. 16—23.

[277] Ibid., pp. 125–140; see also Richard Augustus Norton, Amal and the Shi‘a: Struggle for the Soul of Lebanon (Austin: University of Texas Press, 1987).

[278] See Shapira, pp. 77—133.

[279] Hizballah, Nass al-Risala al-Maftuha alati Wajahatha Hizballah ila al-Mustad‘afin fi Lubnan (Hizballah’s Open Letter to the Oppressed in Lebanon) (Beirut: n.p., February 1985).

[280] Zisser, pp. 99—107; see also William Harris, Faces of Lebanon (Princeton: Markus Weiner Publishers, 1996), pp. 237—326.

[281] William B. Harris, “Lebanon,” in Ami Ayalon (ed.), MECS (Middle East Contemporary Survey), Vol. 13 (1989), (Boulder: Westview Press, 1991). p. 524.

[282] Harris, “Lebanon,” in Ami Ayalon (ed.), MECS, Vol. 16 (1992), pp. 598—608; see also Harris, MECS, Vol. 20 (1996), pp. 490—495, and Vol. 22 (1998), pp. 414—416; Nizar Hamzeh, “Lebanon’s Hizballah: From Islamic Revolution to Parliamentary Accommodation,” Third World Quarterly, Vol. 14, No. 2 (1993), pp. 321—337.

[283] Radio Nur, November 3, 1997.

[284] Radio Nur, August 5, 1992.

[285] See an interview with Hasan Nasrallah, al-Sharq al-Awsat, March 16, 1997; Da’irat al-‘Alaqat al-‘Amma wal-I‘lam fi Mu’assasat Jihad al-Bina’, Sit Sanawat min al- Jihad wal-Bina’ (Six years of Jihad and of Construction) (Beirut: n.p., 1994).

[286] Hala Jaber, Hezbollah, Born with a Vengeance, pp. 145—168; Shapira, pp. 140—149.

[287] See Eli Hurvitz, Ha-Dereg Ha-Tsva’i shel Ha-Hizballah, Diyukan Hevrati (The Military Wing of Hizballah: A Social Profile) (MA Thesis, Tel Aviv University, September 1998), pp. 134–171.

[288] See Shapira, pp. 205–213; Zisser, pp. 101–108; Richard Augustus Norton, “Walking Between Raindrops: Hizballah in Lebanon,” Mediterranean Politics, Vol. 3, No. 1 (1994), pp. 81–102; Al-Muqawama al-Islamiyya, Safahat ‘Izz, ‘Ard wa Tawthiq li‘Amaliyyat al-Muqawama al-Islamiyya Khilal ‘Amm 1994, 1995, 1996, 1997 (Pages of Glory, The Islamic Resistance Operations during the Years 1994, 1995, 1996, 1997) (Beirut: n.p., 1994, 1995, 1996, 1997).

[289] See Nasrallah’s interview with Der Spiegel, October 30, 1997; see also Mahmud Suwayd, al-Islam waFilastin, Hiwar Shamil ma‘a al-Sayyid Muhammad Husayn Fadlallah (Islam and the Question of Palestine, a Dialogue with Muhammad Husayn_Fadlallah) (Beirut: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1998).

[290] See Ha’aretz, March 27, May 22 & 23, 2000.

[291] Reuters, June 22 & 23, 2000.

[292] See al-Nahar, July 20; Ha’aretz, July 28 & 30, 2000.

[293] R. Beirut, July 16 & 17, 2000.

[294] Harris, MECS, Vol. 22 (1998), pp. 415–416.

[295] Harris, MECS, Vol. 21 (1997), p. 411.

[296] See Waddah Sharrara, Dawlat Hizballah, Lubnan Mujtama‘a Islamiyya (Hizballah’s State, Lebanon—an Islamic Society) (Beirut: Dar al-Nahar li-Nashr, 1996); Hala Jaber, Hezbollah, Born with a Vengeance (New York: Columbia University Press, 1997), pp. 774; Shapira, pp. 134–171.

[297] For more on Fadlallah see Martin Kramer, Fadlallah, haMatspen shel Hizballah (Fadlallah: The Compass of Hizbullah (The Moshe Dayan Center for Middle Eastern and African Studies, Tel Aviv University, 1998).

[298] See Shapira, pp. 192–199.

[299] Harris, MECS, Vol. 21 (1997), p. 411.

[300] Al-Nahar, July 20, 2000.

[301] See for example articles by al-Nahar’s editor, Ghassan Tuwayni, al-Nahar, June 5 & 8, July 10, 2000.

[302] See declarations by Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak and Israel Defense Force Chief of Staff Sha’ul Mofaz, Ha’aretz, May 25, 2000.

[303] Radio Nur, July 23, 2000.

[304] Al-Mustaqbal, July 22, 2000.

[305] See interviews with Nasrallah, al-Jazira TV, May 27, 2000; al-Safir, June 25, 2000; see also al-Nahar, July 20, 2000.

[306] Ha’aretz, February 25, 2000; May 26, 2000.

[307] Ma‘ariv, October 10, 2000, November 19, 2000.

[308] Ha’aretz, April 17, 2001, al-Hayat, April 18, 2001.

[309] Al-Hayat, August 6, 2001.

 7. Balancing State and Society: The Islamic Movement in Kuwait

Shafeeq N. Ghabra

The events surrounding the 1990—1991 Iraqi attempt to destroy the state of Kuwait created a societal vacuum. Everything Kuwaitis had believed during the preceding decades regarding the positive nature of traditional Arab nationalism suffered a blow. This crisis in belief created the conditions for a further Westernization of Kuwaiti society.

Conservative Islamic forces that sought to politicize Islam and impose strict Islamic practices and behavior on society and state felt the need to counter these moral and behavioral changes, while also taking advantage of the resulting ideological vacuum. In order to accomplish this task these forces relied on the strength and zeal of their historical experience and, in particular, the credibility they had gained in confronting the Iraqi occupation. They also exploited the sense of alienation among some sectors of Kuwaiti society.

This study will analyze the conditions that led to the Islamic revival in Kuwait, as well as the forces and ideas behind it. It will attempt to explain how a welfare society such as Kuwait's, with a per capita income of $14,772, can support a strong Islamic movement.[310] Also discussed are the regional shifts and influences that can play a role in the rise and fall of national political and cultural currents. Shedding light on Islamic groups in Kuwait should further the understanding of the dynamics affecting Islamic movements in the Arab world as a whole.

Contrary to popular thought, societal groups in Kuwait do hold state power in check. Formal and informal groups based on different affiliations (class, urban/ rural, tribal, Islamic) bring to the government's attention their particular inter- ests.[311] Kuwait has more than 60 voluntary associations representing political trends, religious, civic, and professional groups. The state plays each of these groups off against the others, informally shifting its alliances.

As the owner of the means of production (oil) and the country's main employer (92 percent of the work force), the state provides the ruling Sabah family with the power to influence and sometimes control political events.[312] The state elite in Kuwait assigns a constant flow of values and rules to the different players in society, while permitting a relatively wide margin of freedom of expression to individuals and the press, which allows for serious debate on political issues. State policies and the authoritative distribution of values were responsible, during the 1970s and 1980s (outside the normal parliamentary institutions), for the Islamic forces' access to state resources, privileges, and rights.[313]

The Kuwaiti model of politics can be seen as an experiment in flexible pluralistic corporatism, where the state legitimizes certain groups at the expense of others.[314] The complicated interaction between the state's ruling family, formal groups, and society with all of its informal underpinning, is a dynamic mix of fluid corporatism and restricted pluralism.[315] This multiplicity of interests makes older, more authoritarian methods of control outmoded. Attempts to use authoritarianism in such an environment would only complicate the political process and engender ongoing crisis.

Throughout the Middle East, the Arab defeat in the June 1967 war opened the door for the dormant Islamic forces that Nasserism and Arab nationalism had shut out in the early 1950s.[316] As a result, when states faced internal opposition from pan-Arab nationalist and leftist opposition forces, some in power felt that they could depend on the newly aroused Islamic forces to counter them. The Lebanese civil war starting in 1975 and the role of both Palestinian and leftist Lebanese forces in it were quite alarming to the Kuwaiti government, because of relations between the Lebanese left and some Palestinian groups on the one hand and the Kuwaiti opposition on the other. The existence in Kuwait of a large Palestinian community added to this fear.

In response, the government dissolved Parliament in 1976 and reached out to those who were not critical of its decision. This marked the beginning of an informal, undocumented government alliance with the then-passive, nonradical, and nonpolitical Islamic forces in Kuwait. The government rewarded the Islamic Social Reform Society (Al-Islah al-Ijtima‘i), which had not condemned the dissolution of Parliament, by appointing its chairman, Yusef al-Hajji, to the position of minister of awqaf (religious endowments).[317]

The success of Iran’s Islamic revolution also spawned waves of religious revival. While the Sunni Muslims of the Social Reform Society were deeply suspicious of Shi’ite Iran’s intentions, they nonetheless found the Iranian model to be proof of the adaptability of Islam to the modern era.[318] It inspired them to become more vocal and aggressive in their attempts to Islamicize society and gain a share of power. Their ability to infiltrate the government bureaucracy increased, and they strengthened old ties with the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt.

As in most Middle Eastern countries, in Kuwait prior to the mid-1970s few women wore the Islamic hijab (which permits only the hands and face to show). Many people prayed, but the elderly were the most religious. Restrictions on the mixing of the sexes were not rigidly observed, and regulations inhibiting women’s participation in sports and many kinds of work were slowly loosening. In the 1970s, female students joined their male counterparts in classes at Kuwait University, opening the way for a coed university. Activities were jointly planned, regardless of sex.

In most Middle Eastern societies during the 1950s and 1960s, the majority of Muslims expressed their commitment to Islam through cultural and spiritual manifestations rather than in political forums. Belief in Islam underpinned the moral rectitude of the community, where followers were asked to remember God by doing good and caring for others.

After 1979 in Kuwait, Islamic forces seemed increasingly bold, as secular nationalist forces lost many of their traditional bases of power such as the teachers and students associations. In most nongovernmental organizations, every election after 1979 was characterized by an attempt on the part of Islamic forces to gain control.[319]

On the economic level, the movement was able to build a network in every mosque and neighborhood, and major institutions founded in the mid-1970s complemented their power. For instance, Bayt al-Tamwil (Finance House) became the second biggest bank in Kuwait. The movement built and solidified its base in the 1980s. Kuwaiti Islamists became key players in the financial support given to Islamic movements in Afghanistan, Egypt, Algeria, and Sudan.

Since 1980, Islamic forces have consisted of three main groups: the mainstream Muslim Brotherhood, whose base is in the Social Reform Society; the more marginal Ancestral (Salaf) Islamic group, which has its base in the Heritage group (al-Turath);[320] and the Cultural Social Society (Jam‘iyyat al-Thaqafah al-Ijtima‘iyah), which is under the influence of the forces inspired by the Iranian revolution and represents the interests of segments of the Shi’ite community (20 to 30 percent of the citizenry.)[321]

The strength of the Islamic movement, as expressed primarily in the Social Reform Society, was clearly demonstrated during the 1981 parliamentary elections, the first after the dissolution of Parliament in 1976.[322] In the elections, the secular pan-Arabist forces were defeated by the Islamists, who became the only organized political group in Parliament. Although a minority, they were influential, shrewdly focusing on strengthening their alliance with the state.[323]

The Kuwaiti government felt that co-opting the Islamic current in the bureaucracy would soften its appeal, while at the same time boosting government legitimacy. Such a boost was sorely needed following the second dissolution of Parliament in 1986, which prompted both secularist and Islamic forces to confront the government on a host of issues, most of them dealing with government accountability.

By 1981, Islamist influence had spread to the teachers association and from there to the Ministry of Education. This laid the groundwork for the imposition of a more conservative school curriculum. Books in Arabic began citing parables from the Quran rather than from modern sources. The secular and ‘open’ poetry of the 1970s was increasingly replaced by that of a religious and conservative nature. First-grade Arabic primers were revised to include examples of children praying and eating, drinking, and thanking God for what they had. No examples were given of people working, producing, drawing, singing, dancing and so on.[324]

National day, on which boys and girls from all grades performed national songs and dances for parents, educators, officials and the media, was challenged on religious grounds. In 1986, it took a threat of resignation by the minister of education, Hassan al-Ibrahim, to prevent the cancellation of the government- approved ceremony. The celebration has since been abolished (though it was revived informally by teenagers after the Gulf War.) [325]

The Islamic movement’s influence during the 1980s was also felt in the Ministry of Information. Television programs became more conservative and censorship increased.[326] The ministry censored all kinds of books, including those critical of the Islamic current. Conversely, books and tapes with narrow interpretations of Islam flooded the market.

Islamic groups including the mainstream Muslim Brotherhood controlling the Social Reform Association, the minority Salafi organization, and Jam‘iyyat al-Thaqafah representing the Shi’ite community, have demonstrated exceptional organizational skills over the years. It seems natural that Islamic forces would target influential associational and professional groups and use them to further their cause. The amount of funding, equipment, and staffing available to the Islamic groups was much greater than what had previously been available to any political group in the Middle East.[327] These groups are responsible, by and large, for the introduction of more formal and organized politics in Kuwait and the region as a whole. The Islamic movement made the best use possible of the diffuse nature of informal groups based on such institutions as tribe and diwaniyya (traditional meeting place for men) in Kuwaiti society. As stated above, in the 1980s, the Islamic movement became the only organized mass-based political force in the country.

In addition to the state's leniency regarding interest groups furthering Islamic doctrines, cultural factors played an important role in the spread of the Islamists' doctrines. Mosques, organized prayer, and the various teachings of Islam helped make the population more accepting of narrowly-based political Islam. The overall conservative attitude of society toward women, dress codes, and religion exemplified the overlap between social conservatism and political Islam. By preaching the leading role of the elders over the young, of men over women, and the right of men to have more than one wife, the Islamic message attracted conservative and less-educated people, particularly among the Bedouin.

In the mid-1980s, the Islamic movement in Kuwait ceased to be an expression of disillusionment by the urban elite, and the marriage between Bedouin conservative values and the movement matured. Society's change from traditional to modern, and from rural (desert) to urban, isolated the Bedouin and made them more open to messages that would help them define the world, simplify its meaning, and find (sometimes superficial) solutions to its problems. The majority of the relatively deprived Bedouin tribes have moved from the sidelines to the forefront in demanding societal recognition and equality, the basis for which is found in Islam.[328] Several influential populist Islamists have risen from among their ranks. A similar trend of outspokenness can be seen in urban families of lesser influence seeking equal footing with the more cosmopolitan and traditionally powerful families.

This process of "desertization," as the Bahraini thinker Muhammad Ansari labels it, is among the most destructive processes in the Middle East.[329] It undermines modern life by bringing into urban society the ultraconservative values of the desert and mixing them with Islamist populism. The process destroys the hope of a nation-state whose urban centers can assimilate and acculturate newcomers. It puts the national civil framework at risk, and prevents it from maturing. Desertization of the city and the state entails populism and an increased urban-Bedouin divide. Religious fervor, in addition to creating a divisiveness based on values, also builds a sectarian (Shi'ite-Sunni or Bedouin-urban) division on the most limited and narrowly defined issues: prayer, time of prayer, style of dress, and so on.[330] Short of authoritarian repression, in order to counter populism and Islamist radicalism the state has no choice but to undergo a process of democratization, societal neutrality, and egalitarianism. In the new milieu, repression will work only on a temporary basis.

In Kuwait, the attitudes of the Islamists toward modernity are of a dual nature. Somewhat ironically, the overwhelming majority of Islamists among Kuwait University students are in the colleges of science; their conservatism is somehow wedded to the fruits of modern technology. But just as the colleges of science provide a technical view, the social sciences provide a global view. The educational system at Kuwait University and in the rest of the country, as well as the region, has failed to provide a convincing set of ideas packaged in an indigenous social-science framework capable of assimilating students into more modern and forward-looking ways of thinking in both religion and secularism. The science and technical schools teach skills and techniques, not values or concepts for comprehending these changes.

The college of Shari’a at Kuwait University, like those in many other Arab universities, is a school of traditional religious indoctrination. This school also produces Islamist activists since most of the professors tend to be either fundamentalist or orthodox. Then comes the question of what type of employment will a “College of Shari’a” graduate get.

But in the world of Islam, flexibility is part of the process. In choosing between the doctrine and its historical application, practical considerations have always influenced its interpretation. This approach has developed a concept of allowing for a choice between the lesser of two evils, even if the decision taken would violate Islamic law. For instance, if forbidding alcohol would make more people consume it—profiting criminals—or encourage them to use drugs instead, such a law would be counterproductive.[331] This means that countries like the United Arab Emirates, Syria, or Egypt that allow the consumption of alcohol are not introducing an anti-Islamic practice. Interpretation can allow for much flexibility in Islam. However, this flexibility is not always observed. In the last two decades such flexibility has been lost to the conservative interpretation.

Further, the Islamic current carries with it a message of respect for the self and for Arab and Islamic history. It provides orientations for individuals, providing moral guidelines to the young in a society experiencing rapid change. However, the moment is also ripe for excess. Like any movement seeking power and influence and believing in the sole accuracy of its interpretations, it seeks full obedience by society to its version of truth.

Kuwait's relative wealth has had quite an impact on Islamic politics. Wealth by and large has defused the radical nature of the movement, and its moderating effect has helped Kuwait avoid the Algerian, Sudanese, and Egyptian experiences. In Kuwait, because of a combination of factors related to government policy on the one hand and relative wealth on the other, Islamists and liberals talk, debate, and vote against each other. But wealth also means that the Islamists have independent bases of power, which give them the ability to support other Islamists and also embark on larger social programs.

After its liberation in 1991, Kuwaiti society went through a searching selfevaluation. Many young Kuwaitis looked to the United States as a model for creating a new way of life. Their contact with the U.S. military, and its role in the liberation, had created among them a respect and fondness for Americans. Exiled Kuwaitis who had lived for almost a year in more open Western environments began to appreciate the need for change in their own society and values.

On the other hand, social conservatism also spread among equally large sectors. For example, Kuwaitis who had lived in Saudi Arabia during the invasion were impressed by the religiosity of the Saudis. Many religiously conservative Kuwaitis felt that the invasion and occupation were punishment from God for the Kuwaitis' lavish lifestyle. Only through Islam could the situation be rectified. During this period, Islamists needed to build on the confidence gained in confronting the Iraqi occupation and at the same time counter movements toward opening up society. The opportunity was at hand because the secular forces were weak and fragmented, and the government was less capable of dealing with new societal demands. The government's own legitimacy was at stake.

Three Islamist political groups appeared in this period. The Islamic Constitutional Movement (ICM) has its roots in the Muslim Brotherhood of Kuwait and in the Social Reform, an influential Islamic associational group that had been gaining strength since the 1970s. The Islamic Popular Alliance (IPA), better known as al-Salaf (Ancestral), has roots in the Society for the Rebirth of Islamic Tradition. This group, which has been attracting followers since the 1980s, is more literal than the Constitutional Movement in its interpretation of Islam. The Islamic National Alliance (INA) has roots in al-Jam'iyyah al- Thaqafiyyah, a group attractive to segments of Kuwait's Shi'ite population that was dissolved in 1989 after bombings in Saudi Arabia were linked to some of its members.

In addition, after Kuwait's liberation in 1991 a nongovernmental association was attempted by Islamists linked to the Social Reform Society in order to practice what can "direct the public to do good and refrain from evil," similar to what is done in Saudi Arabia. According to its general secretary, Fahid Abd al-Rahman al-Shwayyib, the group's goal was to enlist 1,000 men and establish a religious police with "a branch in every neighborhood to patrol and watch citizens, in order to spread the teachings of Islam."[332] The government responded by discrediting the practice, stating that "the police will not allow any group to harm any citizen or resident in Kuwait in any form, verbal or physical."[333]

Several incidents of violence involving radical Islamists took place in Kuwait City toward the end of 1991 and prior to the October 1992 elections. At the time, some extremists were caught holding large quantities of weapons and explosives. There were shooting incidents involving the Romanian circus, which was visiting Kuwait, due to the costumes worn by women performers, and explosions occurred in several video stores.[334] This wave of violence came to a halt as Parliament played its part in initiating appropriate legislation and state security sought weapons caches and made arrests.

In this context Abdallah al-Mutawa, director of the Social Reform Association, saw the need for an immediate application of Shari’a, including severing thieves’ hands, outlawing interest rates, segregating the sexes, and enforcing the dress code for women. Al-Mutawa also announced the need to change the wording of the Kuwaiti constitution from “The State’s religion is Islam, and the Islamic Shari’a is a source of legislation” to “Islamic Shari’a is the only and main source of legislation.”[335] Likewise, Shayikh Jasim Muhalhal al-Yasin, secretary of the Constitutional Movement, called for the application of the Shari’a immediately.[336]

Because the constitution, written in 1962, made Islam the state religion and Shari’a a source (though not the only one) of legislation, Kuwait did not ban awqaf (Islamic foundations), nor did it follow anti-Islamic policies, as did many socialist and revolutionary Middle Eastern states. It interpreted its rules on the basis of reason and necessity rather than on a particular interpretation of the Shari’a. The application of the Shari’a in a literal sense is, therefore, a controversial and oft-debated issue in Kuwait.

The Shari’a is applied in laws governing personal matters such as marriage, divorce, inheritance, and waqf, but other laws strike a balance between the Shari’a and social and international practices. For example, alcohol is prohibited by law, but punishment is not administered according to the Shari’a. Those who trade in alcohol receive imprisonment, while a person consuming it in public can be fined and may at a maximum be imprisoned for a certain period. There is no punishment for consuming alcohol in the privacy of one’s own home in Kuwait.[337] Furthermore, the state tends to turn a blind eye on this matter.

It is precisely such flexibility in Kuwaiti laws that Islamists want to change. Islamic groups have increasingly distributed cassettes in commercial centers and in front of mosques that preach the need to practice the Shari’a, in particular its more conservative orthodox interpretation. Since 1991, most of the Islamists’ leading representatives have begun writing actively in the daily newspapers.

The emir of Kuwait, sensing the changing current, reacted immediately by establishing a higher consultative committee to work toward completing the enforcement of Islamic law. Established in December 1991, the committee was an attempt to institutionally co-opt the Islamists, many of whom were opposed to its formation. It had a long-term mandate but no enforcement capabilities; it has yet to issue a recommendation.

Despite the invigoration of the Islamist movement, relations between secular groups, intellectuals, and Islamists in Kuwait continued to be fairly positive. The main issue—the return to parliamentary life—dominated political discourse in the country throughout 1991 until the October elections in 1992. The Islamic groups continued, for political reasons, to be conciliatory toward non- Islamic groups.

The 1992 elections created a new atmosphere in Kuwait. The parliamentarians from Islamist groups believed that the vote could be interpreted as a mandate for the Islamicization of the country’s laws and regulations. This led the assembly during its first year to introduce an array of measures, which ultimately failed, that can be characterized as contradictory to anything expected from a democratic institution.

At the time, the Parliament consisted of the religious right, the center, and the traditional left. The fourteen or so members of the religious right led the hesitant center—consisting of another fourteen or more members, who feared losing their local and tribal constituency—on most religious and conservative issues. The secular-oriented liberal group of former Arab nationalists, the Democratic Forum (al-Manbar al-Dimuqrati), which was formed after liberation, and several other independent and liberal factions appeared fragmented.[338] Elected six years after the suspension of the previous Parliament—a period that included the Iraqi invasion—the members wasted a good deal of time on issues that should have been settled or dismissed quickly.

The suggestion by five Islamic parliamentarians to establish an “Authority to Direct the Public to Do Good and Refrain from Evil” is an example of the dominant trend.[339]

<quote>

The authority’s main role would be to fight foreign behavior that infringes on Kuwaiti traditions and contradicts Islam This is done by planning and supervising public behavior In order to achieve its goals, the authority will hear complaints from citizens regarding any phenomena contradicting public decency It will also open offices in every area and district It will call … Ministries such as Education and Information and Interior to inform them of non-Islamic behavior. The authority will study monthly reports that the Ministry of the Interior will commit itself to providing regarding cases of morality, regardless of whether it was transferred to court or was kept and pardoned … The authority will give lectures, distribute pamphlets, and print books.[340]

</quote>

Khalid al-‘Adwah, a leading Islamist in parliament, called for making “Kuwait the state of belief and Quran.”[341] Another leading Islamist from the Islamic Constitutional Movement said this was the only way to solve moral degeneration in Kuwait.[342] Another parliamentarian, Mufaraj Nahar al-Mutayri, explained that “police station files are full of moral crimes..... We are a country that went through a difficult crisis, and God put at our disposal all the countries of the world to defend us; our land has been liberated by those among us who contributed to the poor in the rest of the world.”[343]

By extrapolation, it is time to thank God—not politics or politicians or even the Western coalition—by practicing Islam and returning to its doctrines.[344] The nongovernmental associations controlled by the Islamists released a statement calling for the application of the authority project.[345]

The suggestion to establish an authority to publicly enforce Islamic law initiated a major and divisive debate. In general, the Islamist deputies’ assertions that government laws were non-Islamic—based, of course, on their narrow interpretation of Islam—led to the collapse of the alliance between the Islamists and liberals as opposition forces, an alliance forged during the years after Parliament was banned in 1986. During this debate, in some cases the differences between the branches of the opposition were greater than the differences between the opposition as a whole and the government. In the end, the minority of secular and liberal deputies realized to what ends the Islamic groups would use the coalition.[346] Columnists in major newspapers blasted the proposed Authority and succeeded in defeating it.[347]

Another divisive issue that captured the country's attention for several months was the niqab. The issue started with a November 1991 incident in which the dean of the faculty of medicine at Kuwait University attempted to prohibit medical students in laboratories, for reasons of safety, from wearing the niqab, which covers the entire body, including the face and hands. This matter, involving four students, was given priority by the Islamists later elected to Parliament. Month after month this issue took the Assembly's time. Parliamentary committees, such as those on education and legislation, were consumed with following the matter up. The Islamist parliamentarians tried to issue legislation nullifying the dean's decision prohibiting the niqab; university professors protested parliament's interference. Jamal al-Kindari, secretary of the educational committee, advised the university "not to challenge the Parliament."[348]

Furthermore, Islamic parliamentarians initially approved the segregation by gender of the coeducational Kuwait University, whose president was a woman. In December 1994, a vote for segregation failed to garner a majority by one vote. The government had lobbied heavily against the measure, as had liberal deputies and Minister of Higher Education Ahmad al-Rube'i, creating something of an alliance between liberals and the government. This alliance once again prevailed in February 1995, when the Islamists failed to push through a vote of no confidence against al-Rube'i.

Also in 1994, 35 members of Parliament signed and delivered a petition to the emir regarding the Shari'a and the changing of the second article of the constitution to make Shari'a "the main source of legislation" (instead of a main source).[349] In fact, all elected members of Parliament signed the petition, with the exception of six liberals, who were accused by Islamists of laxness in their faith. Despite this apparent support, such a measure would not pass easily, because it would require the agreement of two-thirds of Parliament (including the cabinet ministers) and the approval of the emir. Although the MPs signed the petition, no bill actually proposing the change was ever bought to the floor of Parliament.

However, the segregation law of Kuwait University did pass in 1996, and society, not only intellectuals, went through intense debates on the matter. Finally a compromise formula favorable to the Islamists was found that allowed Kuwait University to be coed for five years. The compromise also included noninterference in coed private schools. The passage of the law was a setback to liberal forces. Two days after the law was passed the university announced it could not apply the law for practical budgetary reasons, since Kuwait University had been coed for more than 20 years. However, five years have passed with the Islamic groups and representatives in Parliament continuously bringing up the issue making the work of the Minister of Education, Dr. Musaid Al-Haroun, quite difficult. Every year Parliament froze the university's budget and asked about steps towards segregation. The university segregated the cafeterias and some classes, hoping Parliament would forget the issue, but in the end, parliament had its way and the University had to segregate its classes in 2002.

Thus, some sectors of society considered certain activities to be heretical, while others viewed them as personal freedoms, and saw the Islamists' proposed laws as undemocratic and out of touch with the age. Journalists and opinion makers, and large elements of public opinion, attacked the suggested legislation, themselves putting pressure on parliamentarians to vote against these bills.

Thus while the Islamic movement won over many people, especially to greater religious observance, its more narrowly based interpretations of Islam— on issues of dress, modernity, East-West relations, personal freedom, and the need to control society and state behavior—alienated many who might have been sympathetic to a more moderate approach. Some saw the Islamists' claim that "Islam is the solution" for Kuwait today as a repeat of simplistic, ultimately unsuccessful, ideologies such as "Arab unity" or "the liberation of Palestine," heralded as the solution in earlier decades.

The Parliament elected in October 1996 was in some ways similar to the Parliament elected in 1992, though half the members were new. The main substantive difference was the presence of more members—21 percent—who tended toward cooperation with the government on at least some issues. But the hardcore support for the Islamic movement, including among some independents, continued to be high (14 percent). Now, however, more of them came from the Salaf movement and fewer from the Islamic Constitutional Movement. Other groups included eleven secular members critical of or opposed to the govern- ment[350] and four Shi'ite members who sometimes voted with the Islamists. Such a divided Parliament would have difficulty building consensus, yet the Islamists were able to get more than half the vote on any serious Islamic issue, such as gender segregation in Kuwait University or the application of the Shari'a.[351]

The new Parliament again sought the application of the Shari'a by suggesting a change in Article 2 of the constitution, though the opposition to this proposal rose from four members to nine.[352] Many others who voted for the suggestion did so out of concern for their image, knowing the emir would veto the legislation. A new issue was a parliamentary challenge to mixed-gender fashion shows, though the government paid little attention to the request. This added to the anger and mistrust between Islamic members of Parliament and the government.[353]

After the October 1996 election, the divisive atmosphere between liberals and Islamists increased, especially in the face of an Islamist-led campaign against several university professors and writers. For example, 'Alya Shu'ayb, a professor of philosophy at Kuwait University, was accused of spreading degenerate ideas when she stated in an interview with a Kuwaiti magazine that lesbianism was widespread at the university.[354] The reaction was intense, and the university rector had to form an investigating committee. The committee recommended expelling her from the university, but the university and the Ministry of Education did not act on the recommendation.

Likewise, Ahmad al-Baghdadi, the chairman of the political science department, and Sulaiman al-Badir, a former minister of education, were accused of insulting the Prophet Muhammad. Each had said in an interview with a Kuwaiti newspaper that in the early period of Islam the prophet "failed" in Mecca, which forced his move to Medina.[355] The word "failed" became an issue; several Islamists took it to Parliament and called for punishment and resignation. Some threatened Baghdadi's life, and others sued him in civil court, while yet others wanted to dissolve his marriage (as happened in a similar case in Egypt) by declaring he was not a valid Muslim. As a result of a lawsuit brought by Islamists, al-Baghdadi was sentenced to one month in prison in October 1999. Conservative Islamists hailed the decision; liberals were disappointed. The emir pardoned Baghdadi from all charges after he had served half the sentence.

The writer Layla al-'Uthman became subject to a court order in January 1997 because of short stories she had written 10 years before describing love relationships. The stories had long been on bookshelves when they came to the attention of the Islamists. Four Islamists pursued the author in the courts. Again there was a flare-up in the press, as liberal writers accused the Islamists of an organized campaign against freedom of thought. The association of artists held meetings, while journalists and nongovernmental organizations in the Arab world criticized the charges. This case, like similar ones, was buried in the court system and no decision is anticipated.[356]

The cases of dispute between the government and Islamists continued. The government may have considered on more than one occasion dissolving Parliament and calling new elections. The final decision, however, was to hope that time and politics would defuse the situation. A major confrontation took place in March 1998 when the National Assembly scheduled a vote of no confidence after the minister of information, Shaykh Sa'ud Nasser al-Sabah, allowed more than 160 banned books in Kuwait's Arab book fair in November 1998. Islamist deputies cross-examined the minister for nearly seven hours in a session that drew more than 2,000 spectators. The crisis ended when the government resigned one day prior to the vote, scheduled for March 17. When the new government was formed, Shaykh Sa'ud was appointed minister of oil. That ended the crisis but demonstrated how powerful Parliament and the Islamist bloc had become.

The Paladin Howitzer crisis was another dispute showing Parliament's renewed attention to accountability. Information reached Parliament that the Kuwaiti government had decided in May 1998 to purchase the U.S. Paladin artillery system but that the U.S. army was planning to purchase its successor, the Crusader. Press rumors of irregularities in the procurement process motivated members of Parliament to block the whole deal at the end of 1998. A confrontation took place with the Ministry of Defense and in March 1999 the government gave in, informing the National Assembly that it was freezing the procurement process.

While all these confrontations were taking place, the Islamists were also gaining strength by allying themselves with populace nationalist parliamentarians, a group led by the Assembly's speaker, Ahmad al-Sa'adoun. The skillful al- Sa'adoun used his oratorical abilities to build coalitions that led the 1985—1986 Parliament and the democratic movement in 1989. He was reelected speaker in the 1992 and 1996 Assemblies. The loose alliance between the Islamic opposition and populace nationalists continued from one session to another. Populace nationalists sometimes voted Islamist on conservative bills in order to gain Islamist support on other issues.

In certain ways, the lack of public political debate after 1986 contributed to the Islamic groups' growing strength and popularity. During the long period between parliamentary elections (1985–1992), people turned to rigid interpretations of Islam as a protection against change, modern life, social inequality, state differentiation between groups, etc. They sought Islam at a time of defeat, lack of democracy, and failure and hardship in their personal lives.

In each Islamic grouping, trends are being pulled by the past and pushed toward the future. Public debate and long-term experience with the democratic process can be expected to create conditions for a more reasoned, forward-looking view of Islam among the population. This process can help in the transformation of Islam, allowing it to become more active, participatory, and modern. Yet such a process has no future if the limited press freedoms and nondemocratic institutions prevalent in the region do not change.

A small, moderate trend already exists in the Islamic movement. While it is a minority, it may, as a result of the losses of the Islamic mainstream, play a larger role at another stage. Khalid al-Madhkur, the chairman of the government-appointed committee to study the application of the Shari'a, is, for example, a leading scholar among those who have a moderate and practical understanding of Islam.

Former Member of Parliament (ICM) Dr. Isma'il al-Shatti, a former editor of al-Mujtama', the weekly magazine of the Muslim Brotherhood, and one of the most soft-spoken Islamic leaders, has called for a transition in stages toward the application of the Shari'a. He has criticized attempts to apply it in other countries as failures. Time is important, according to al-Shatti:

We did not solve the problem of the relation between Shari'a and music and theater, among other things. How can we create Islamic information? ... It is wrong to start the application of the Shari'a with al-hudud [restrictions]. The origin in people is honor and goodness, not delinquency ... We must first provide good, honest lives for people and then ask them about restrictions and applications of rules in other matters.

He goes on to note, "The Quran came in stages." To further make his point, al- Shatti cites the Sudanese experiment with the Shari'a as a failure. There, leaders started with the sword, cutting off the hands of those who stole, whipping those who committed adultery. They did not start with economic recovery or education and development.[357]

However, al-Shatti is indebted to the Islamic Constitutional Movement for his place in Parliament (1992—1996). The ideologues of the movement do not trust their politicians and constantly supervise their statements. It appears that the ideological leaders are also those most exposed to public debate and politics and experienced in dealing with problems that will be affected more by rational thought and secular approaches. In the long run, this will also have an effect on Islamist groups, shaping them toward rational, modern and democratic Islamic thinking.

Public debate equally helps in bringing to light those Islamic ideas most susceptible to modernity and change. There is a whole range of modern interpretations of Islam being expressed in books and articles. These interpretations link democracy with Islam and consider women's and individual rights to be compatible with Islamic beliefs and practices. The writings of Muhammad Shahrur, Muhammad Arkun, Hussain Ahmad Amin, Nasr Abu Zayd and al-Sadiq al- Nayhum are already stirring intense debate. Shahrur's Al-Kitab wal Quran (the Book and the Quran) was at one time banned in Kuwait, but today it can be found in bookstores.[358]

The friction between government and Parliament—which was also partly a conflict between government and the Islamist movement—came to a turning point in April 1999. The crisis began when a new edition of the Quran published by the Ministry of Religious Affairs was found to contain mistakes. The Islamists wanted an investigation and wanted to question government officials. When the government was on the verge of resigning in May, the emir dissolved Parliament and the government called for early elections in accordance with the constitution.

Then almost immediately the emir, in a rare interference in the political process, announced his wish to see a governmental decree that would give women the right to vote and be elected to Parliament. This announcement fell like a bombshell, and all of society reacted. The liberals and many women supported it; radical nationalists were taken by surprise. Although they supported the concept, which appealed to their urban, upper class, and semiliberal taste, they did not want to set a precedent of laws being made by decree.

But the Sunni Islamists reacted very negatively. Al-Mutawa, director of the Social Reform Association, warned the government, criticized the emir, and threatened to lead a demonstration at his palace. Preachers in at least 80 mosques also condemned the decree. The government responded by showing strength. It prevented the same 80 preachers from preaching on Friday, since preachers at Friday prayers must be licensed by the Ministry of Religious Affairs. The preachers demonstrated in protest.

The government, enforcing this law for the first time in years, announced that all Islamic money collection and associations must follow legal procedures, which include full accounting and reporting of income and expenditures. There was much speculation that unlicensed groups were misusing contributions, and that money may have been sent to illegal groups in Egypt and elsewhere. The Islamic associations had opened many chapters in Kuwaiti neighborhoods without permission, and the government now enforced registration requirements.

Even the National Union of Kuwaiti Students, dominated since 1977 by the Islamists, came under scrutiny. The government also said it was considering appointing its own boards to run cooperative supermarkets in Kuwaiti neighborhoods, since these cooperatives had become politicized and dominated by Islamists. Finally, the government hinted it would downgrade several official commissions run by Islamists, such as the “Committee for the Preparation for the Application of the Shari’a in Kuwait,” headed by a leading cleric.

These government actions made the Islamists reduce their protests of the decree. The government had won the first round over women’s rights, and the emir received widespread support from the population and the international community for his decision.

But the government carried the confrontation further, in an unusual show of zeal and decisiveness. While the election campaign was under way, the government established an interministerial committee chaired by the deputy prime minister and Foreign Minister Shaykh Sabah al-Ahmad al-Sabah. This committee produced 60 decrees, all approved by the Cabinet, chaired by Crown Prince and Prime Minister Shaykh Sa‘ad al-Abdallah. The decrees included permission for foreign investments without a Kuwaiti guarantor; non-Kuwaiti participation in the stock market, private universities to be opened in Kuwait, privatizing the statist economy; and a law on the Bidun (stateless residents) that will make many of them citizens and settle their status. This was a major reform program promising to liberalize Kuwait’s society and economy. While the decrees are considered effective laws, and took effect immediately, they had still to be either confirmed or vetoed by a parliamentary vote.

To a large extent, the election of July 3, 1999 became a referendum on the 60 decrees and, in essence, the country’s future direction. The elections produced a bloc of 20 out of 50 Parliament members who were liberal and independent. The Islamist delegation shrank from 14 to 10 seats, while Shi’ite and tribal representation grew slightly.

The new situation gave the liberals a chance to set the agenda for the new Parliament, as the Islamists had done in the 1992 and 1996 sessions. This liberal, independent group was not united on all issues. Among them was a group of radical independents who saw relations with the government through the prism of confrontation and parliamentary power. However, the fact that the new speaker of the Assembly, Jassem al-Khorafi, was an independent moderate, gave an advantage to the centrists in the group.

In general, the liberal independents sought compromises with the government in order to institute the reform program. A second bloc, in which radical representatives joined with hard-core Islamists, continued to focus on the illegality of legislation by government decree and the need to block it. The main issue centered on a constitutional phrase that said decrees in the absence of Parliament must deal with urgent issues. Islamists in Parliament argued that the women’s decree and most of the others were not urgent. These members of Parliament feared that the government might abuse its power in the future when Parliament is not in session. A number of members who belonged to neither bloc held the balance of power.

A good case study is the vote on the emiri decree enfranchising women. This decree became a law when it was instituted in May 1999. But it had also to be voted upon to make it permanent. The liberal bloc in support of women’s rights had postponed the vote for fear that the Islamists and the radical independents would muster enough opposition to defeat it. The tactic of postponement was supported by the government, which had hoped to either schedule a vote when it felt it had a majority, or just keep delaying a vote until February 2000 when women would have registered to vote. But Parliament forced a vote, and the decree was rejected in November, 32 to 30, with two abstentions. The result was a clear setback to women’s suffrage. But the defeat was a triumph for parliamentary power, and set a precedent for the separation and limitations of executive and legislative authority. Ten or fifteen years ago, an emiri decree would have passed easily in Parliament. Today, every decree is scrutinized, and no law is law until voted upon and approved by Parliament. Parliamentarians are using all their powers without any hesitation.

Those who support women’s suffrage are drawing lessons from the setback. The issue of women’s suffrage has been raised by the emir and will not disappear: it will continue to be on the table during the months and years to come. The vote in Parliament expressed the ambivalence of Kuwaiti society: 32 to 30 reflects how evenly the country is divided. It is clear today that women’s activists ought to take the emiri decree as a starting point in order to open a wide debate and appeal to all forces, including conservative ones. The evolution of women’s role in society speaks for itself. Today 35 percent of the Kuwaiti work force is composed of women and 67 percent of Kuwait University students are female. Establishing an organization dedicated to women’s suffrage could be key to a process leading to women’s enfranchisement.

Conclusion:

The rise of the Islamists has been a reaction to both internal and global trends.[359] The overall environment and the global reality of more open thinking, market economies, and democratization will continue to generate tensions with the Islamist trend. While global trends and liberalization at home can undermine radical Islam, mainstream Islamist forces will survive these pressures as they use these powerful institutions to stay ahead of the current.

Therefore Kuwait’s journey into the global reality will not be an easy one. Kuwait could still fall hostage to a nonconclusive conflict with Islamists on every issue. Sometimes the conservatives will get their way; other times the liberals will get their way. The country could become more divided, with the government caught in the middle, one faction using the Islamists to further its agenda and another using the liberals. The history of the last decade testifies to how negative and frozen in time and space things can be.

But on the other hand, government resilience since the emiri decrees and the July 1999 election tells us that the country is experiencing pressures to reform in economics as well as politics and that Kuwait’s membership in the WTO, the challenges of the new millennium, and the need to depend on an enfranchised population are serious factors in the process. This does not mean that change will be linear. In fact, to hold the peace among Kuwait’s components, compromises must be made at every junction.

As the wind blows in the direction of reform, and as the world reacts in the wake of the radical Islamic terrorism that brought havoc to New York and Washington, D.C., on September 11, 2001, the survival of the Islamic movement will be a function of its ability to adapt. Reform, social change, and government policy may succeed in helping to transform Islamist radicalism into Islamist reformism and interest group politics. The constant challenges to the movement, from society and state, and from intellectuals and the modern world, can in the long run weaken its appeal in favor of a more ‘compassionate’ Islamic interpretation of both personal and political behavior. But if differences are not mediated, if reforms are not addressed, and if the economy is mismanaged, the division and radicalization can increase. This era is therefore central in deciding on the future path of the country, its relation to “Islam” and the world.

[310] State of Kuwait, Ministry of Planning, Central Statistical Office, Statistical Review, Issue 17, 1994.

[311] See Jill Crystal, Kuwait: The Transformation of an Oil State (Boulder: Westview Press, 1992), pp. 65–89.

[312] In 1998, out of a work force of 215,500 people, 202,500 worked in the government sector and 13,000 in the private sector. Statistical Review, 1999, 22nd edition.

[313] Khaldun al-Naqib, Al-Mujatama' wal Dawlah fi al-Khalij wal Jazirah al-'Arabiyya: Min Manzur Mukhtalif (State and Society in the Gulf and Arabian Peninsula: A Different Perspective) (Beirut: Center of Arab Unity Studies, 1989), p. 152.

[314] See Andrew Cox and Noel O'Sullivan (eds.), The Corporate State: Corporatism and the State Tradition in Western Europe (Hants, England: Edward Elgar Publishing, 1988).

[315] On these concepts, See Robert Bianchi, Interest Groups and Political Development in Turkey (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1984).

[316] Shafeeq Ghabra, "Voluntary Associations in Kuwait: Foundations of a New Society?" Middle East Journal, Vol. 45, No. 2 (Spring, 1991), pp. 199—215.

[317] Ibid., p. 206.

[318] No author, Jam'iyyat al-Islah al-Ijtima'i: 25 'Aman Min al Ta'sis (The Social Reform Society: 25 Years Since Its Establishment) (Kuwait: The Social Reform Society, 1988), pp. 11–39.

[319] See Ghabra, "'Voluntary Associations in Kuwait" pp. 199–215.

[320] Ibid., pp. 206–211.

[321] See James Bill, "Resurgent Islam in the Persian Gulf," Foreign Affairs, Vol. 63, No. 1 (Fall 1984), p. 120.

[322] Sawt al-Khalij, March 5, 1981, p. 12.

[323] See interview with Abdullah al-Mutawwa, chairman of the Social Reform Society and one of the founders of the Muslim Brotherhood in Kuwait, al-Mujtama' Weekly Magazine (Kuwait), December 15, 1981.

[324] Based on a review of the school curriculum and on several interviews with teachers and members of the Kuwait Ministry of Education, spring 1994.

[325] Discussion with Hasan al-Ibrahim, former Kuwaiti minister of education, spring 1994.

[326] Comparisons between television programs in the 1980s and today reveal many differences. Today, although such pressures remain, they can be challenged.

[327] On the previous dearth of organizational skills in Arab mass politics, see James Bill and Robert Springborg, Politics in the Middle East, 3rd ed. (New York: Harper Collins Publishers, 1990), p. 89.

[328] Shafeeq Ghabra, Al-Kuwayt: Dirasah fi Aliyyat al-Dawlah al-Qutriyyah wal Sultah wal Mujtama' (Kuwait: A Study of The Dynamics of State, Authority, and Society) (Cairo: Dar Ibn Khaldun for Developmental Studies and Dar al-Amin lil-Nashr, 1995), pp. 5360.

[329] Muhammad Jabir al-Ansari, Takwin al-‘Arab al-Siyasi wa Maghzah al-Dawlah al-Qutriyya (Arab Political Formation and the Meaning of the State) (Beirut: Center of Arab Unity Studies, 1994).

[330] See al-Qabas, March 6, 1993, for the story of a Shi’ite child denied the right to pray in school.

[331] Muhammad Sa‘id al-‘Ishmawi, al-Islam al-Siyyasi (Political Islam), 3rd ed. (Cairo: Sina lil Nashr, 1992), p. 59.

[332] Al-Qabas, August 31, 1991.

[333] Ibid.

[334] Majalat al-Majalah (London), August 14, 1993.

[335] Al-Anba‘, December 21, 1991.

[336] Al-Mujtama‘, June 7, 1992.

[337] Najib al-Waqayyan, a lawyer, quoted in al-Anba‘, December 22, 1991.

[338] On the 1992 elections, see Shafeeq Ghabra, “Democratization in a Middle Eastern State: Kuwait, 1993,” Middle East Policy, Vol. 3, No. 1 (1994), pp. 102–119.

[339] Arab Times, October 27, 1993, p. 1.

[340] From the original draft of the proposed law as published in al-Anba‘, March 1, 1993.

[341] Al-Qabas, March 14, 1993.

[342] Al-Mujtama‘, March 23, 1993.

[343] Al-Siyasah, March 14, 1993.

[344] See the column of Abdul Rahman al-Najjar, al-Anba‘, March 12, 1993.

[345] Al-Watan, March 18, 1993.

[346] “Salah al-Hashim” (“The honeymoon is over”), al-Qabas, March 18, 1993.

[347] Al-Qabas, March 4, 1993; al-Tali‘ah, March 10, 1993; Sami Abud al Latif al- Nisif, al-Qabas, April 7, 1993, p. 11; Abdul Rahman al-Najar, al-Anba‘, March 12, 1993; al-Siyasah, March 20, 1993.

[348] Al-Watan, December 6, 1992, p. 1.

[349] Arab Times, August 31, 1993; “MPs Seek Constitutional Change to Islamic Law,” Arab Times, August 27, 1993, p. 1.

[350] (Surprises in the Elections ...), al-Qabas, October 8, 1996, p. 1.

[351] “The Islamists control half the seats in Parliament,” al-Watan al-‘Arabi (weekly), October l8, 1996, p. 18.

[352] “37 Udwan Yas’un Lil-taghyir al-Dusturi” (37 Members Seek Constitutional Change), al-Siyyasah, January 23, 1997, p. 5.

[353] Al-Qabas, December 25, 1996, p. 1; December 29, 1996, p. 7.

[354] Interview with Alya Shu’ayb in al-Hadath (monthly), November 1996, pp. 22–24.

[355] Interview with Ahmad Baghdadi, al-Shulah (student monthly), July 1996; interview with Sulaiman al-Badir, al-Anba‘ (daily), December 10, 1996.

[356] Al-Siyyasah, January 2, 1997, p. 1.

[357] Al-Anba‘, December 21, 1991.

[358] Muhammad Shahrur, Al-Kitab wal Quran (The Book and the Quran), 3rd ed. (Beirut: Sharikat al-Matbu‘at lil Tawzi‘ Wal Nashr, 1993).

[359] Shafeeq Ghabra, “Kuwait and the Dynamics of Socio-economic Change” Middle East Journal, Vol. 51, No. 3 (Summer, 1997), pp. 361–372.

 8. The Rise of the Islamist Movement in Turkey

Nilufer Narli

Beginning in the 1950s and peaking in the 1980s, a number of developments greatly advanced Turkey’s modernization. These same events also transformed Turkish politics. The result was a confrontation between provincial/traditional and urban/modern cultures, new social classes, and the fragmentation of the conservative electorate from the 1970s onward.[360] This same situation provided the environment for the growth of Islamist parties in Turkey pilfering votes from their center-right competitors.[361]

Islamist political movements vary greatly among different states in their doctrines and strategies.[362] Turkey’s groups have their own distinctive history. In Turkey, the Islamist movement emerged soon after the founding of the secular republic in 1923.[363] It was led by tarikat (religious order) shaykhs and professional men of religion who lost their status and economic power when secular reforms abolished religious institutions.[364] Trying to stage revolts against the secular state in the 1920s and 1930s, the movement failed to gain wide support and was crushed by the authorities.[365] In general, though, Islamist groups stayed underground during the era of one-party rule between 1923 and 1946.

With the transition to a multiparty system in 1946, Islamist groups formed covert and overt alliances with the ruling center-right Democratic Party (1950 — 1960).[366] After the Democratic Party won the 1950 elections, it softened its secularist policies. With the provision of civil liberties in the 1961 constitution, Islamist groups began to operate legally, though their activities were still technically banned.[367] Until Necmettin Erbakan established the National Order Party (NOP) in January 1970, Islamists had either formed conservative factions in a center-right party or had remained underground. With the NOP, however, for the first time Islamists had an autonomous party organization through which they could campaign for their agenda. Since the NOP's founding, the same Islamist party has endured, albeit under different names: NOP (1970—1971), National Salvation Party (NSP) (1972—1981), Welfare Party (1983—1998), and Virtue Party (1997–2001).

The NOP largely represented Anatolian cities controlled by religiously conservative Sunnis, and the small traders and artisans (esnaf) of the hinterland.[368] These groups had long waited to benefit from the state's modernization policies but had rarely done so, partly due to their own resistance to modernization in the name of religion and tradition. For example, girls were not often sent to school. In addition to the frustrated periphery, the NOP also represented religiously conservative people who were informal members of outlawed religious orders. These people formed silent, but powerful, pressure groups with a large network.

The NOP was shut down by the Constitutional Court on May 20, 1971— due to military pressure—on the grounds that it violated the principles of la- icism laid down in the constitution (the preamble and articles 2, 19, and 57) and in the Law of Political Parties (Law No. 648, articles 92, 93, and 94).[369] As a result, the National Salvation Party (NSP) was founded in October 1972 to succeed the NOP. With support from provincial merchants, the esnaf, and the covert network of two leading, informally organized religious groups, the Nakshibandis and Nurcus, the NSP achieved a surprising electoral success in the 1973 general elections, obtaining 11.8 percent of the total vote, mainly in central and eastern Anatolia.

After its solid showing in the 1973 general elections, the NSP became a coalition partner in successive governments. First, it formed a government with the staunchly secularist Republican People's Party (CHP) led by Bulent Ecevit. Soon after, it managed to place its members in the bureaucracy, particularly the ministries that it controlled. Moreover, it succeeded in passing a bill that made theological high schools (imam-hatip) equal to secondary schools and enabled these schools' often pro-Islamist students to attend universities. A large number of girls also enrolled in these schools. Many graduates have gone on to political power as Islamists in the 1980s and 1990s (as in the case of the mayor of Istanbul, Recep Tayip Erdogan) and have formed a powerful pressure group.

Ecevit's coalition government collapsed following Turkey's July 1974 military operation in Cyprus to protect the Turkish-Cypriot community. The NSP then became a coalition partner in a new "National Front" government on March 31, 1975, formed under the premiership of Suleyman Demirel's centerright Justice Party (JP). This coalition also included the ultranationalist National Action Party (NAP) led by Alpaslan Turkes.

In the June 1977 general elections, the NSP suffered a setback, winning only 8.6 percent of the vote, but was included in the second National Front government formed by Demirel after the elections. In July 1977 Demirel resigned, but he returned to power in August at the head of an almost identical coalition including the NSP, NAP, and JP. However, Demirel was forced to resign again following defections from the JP in December. Ecevit formed a coalition government in January 1978, promising to deal with the economic problems and political violence that were increasing as a result of conflict between left and right as well as between Sunnis and Alevis. But the JP's victory in the by-elections of October 1979 deprived Ecevit of his working majority, and he resigned. In November 1979, Demirel formed an all-JP minority government with the backing of the NAP and NSP. In short, the NSP had quickly grown to become a regular member of government coalitions.

In the late 1970s, successive governments failed to solve the country's serious economic and political problems as antagonism between the radical left and radical right escalated into violent clashes bordering on civil war. The armed forces, led by General Kenan Evren, seized power in a bloodless coup on September 12, 1980 and restructured the political system with a new military- drafted constitution in 1982. The leading parties, including the JP, NAP, and NSP, were banned from political activity.

On July 19, 1983 the Welfare Party (RP) was formed under the leadership of Ali Turkmen, in place of the banned Erbakan, replacing the NSP. Erbakan was eventually reinstated into Turkish politics and became the Welfare Party's leader. In the first general elections entered under Erbakan's leadership, in November 1987, the RP received 7.2 percent of the total vote. In the 1989 local elections it polled 9.8 percent, showing signs of increased support in Istanbul and capturing municipalities in several districts. In the October 1991 general elections, the RP formed an electoral alliance with Turkes' ultra-nationalist party and together obtained 16.7 percent of the total vote. During this time the Islamist movement drew support from larger segments of the population, the majority of which had migrated from rural to urban centers.

One of the Islamist movement's important strategies was to develop an educated counter-elite as a base of support, especially by strengthening the Islamic stream in the educational system. During the post-1980 coup period, governments perceived Islamic education in the schools as a panacea against extremist ideologies.[370]

As Islamist supporters moved from provincial towns and villages to urban centers, they were more likely to gain access to formal education and opportunities for upward social mobility. Islamist groups responded to the needs and aspirations of the newly urban who might be university students, professionals, shopkeepers, merchants, or workers. The groups offered food to the needy, scholarships and hostels to university students, a network for young graduates looking for jobs, and credit to shopkeepers, industrialists, and merchants.[371] Selfhelp projects conducted by women were particularly important to this endeavor. Financial assistance came from a newly formed Islamist business elite.

In the late 1980s, a new urban middle class and business elite emerged whose members often came from provincial towns. Their parents were often selfemployed small traders and shopkeepers, merchants, and agrarian capitalists. Some of them came from state-employed families. Many provincial youths from this background moved to big cities where they had access to higher education. After graduation, many joined the urban middle class through employment in the modern economic sector, which expanded in the 1980s as a result of reforms that replaced the statist economic model with a liberal approach.

The liberal and export-oriented economic development model adopted by then Prime Minister Turgut Ozal gave birth to a new business elite, also with a provincial background. This new model provided opportunities not only for the established business elite, but also for the small and medium businessmen in Anatolian towns. Some of them have developed their businesses there. Others moved to Istanbul, seeking opportunities for expansion in this newly invigorated commercial center.

Having their origins in Anatolian towns, the new business elite desired to assert its provincial identity and preserve its values and traditions. Consequently, its members—dubbed “Anatolian Lions” (“Anadolu Aslanlari”)—differentiate themselves from the more urban, Westernized business elite represented by TUSIAD (The Turkish Businessmen’s and Industrialists’ Association, founded in 1971), whose members are the chief executives of Turkey’s 300 biggest corporations. In contrast, the Anatolian Lions follow the leadership of the pro-Islamist MUSIAD (the Association of Independent Industrialists and Businessmen) and now challenge the established business elite.

MUSIAD was founded on May 5, 1990 in Istanbul by a number of young pro-Islamic businessmen: Erol Yarar,[372] who was the president until May 1999, Ali Bayramolu, who replaced Yarar, Natik Akyol, and Abdurrahman Esmerer. The first letter of its acronym is commonly perceived as standing for Muslim rather than for mustakil (independent). The founders of MUSIAD aimed to create an “Islamic economic system” as an alternative to the existing “capitalist system” in Turkey.

This goal, though, remained only a slogan. The group’s membership reached 400 in 1991, 1,700 by 1993, and 3,000 in 1998.[373] In that year, its members’ companies’ annual revenue reached $2.79 billion. Members are active in most sectors of the economy, particularly in manufacturing, textiles, chemical and metallurgical products, automotive parts, building materials, iron and steel, and food products. There are also several powerful Islamist finance houses, some of which have been hit by the February 2001 economic crisis. In 1998 MUSIAD aimed to increase its membership to 5000 and the number of its branch offices from 28 to 40 by the year 2000.[374] However, this goal was not reached. In September 2001 its membership was 2300 and the number of branch offices was 27, showing an actual decrease in membership due to the anti-Islamist policies adopted after the February 28, 1997 National Security Council meeting.

The Islamist movement is an outlet to express political dissatisfaction with the existing order on the part of the geographical periphery and specific social groups with grievances or different interests. At least five types of relationships are represented here: center-periphery conflict,[375] class cleavages, regional cleavages, Islamist- secularist conflict, and sectarian antagonism (that is, Sunnis vs. Alevis).

The country’s central government and main institutions are led by military officers, senior bureaucrats, notables, and industrialists. Those living in, or belonging to groups based in peripheral areas have traditionally been distanced from power.

Thus, we see a progression in which specific socioeconomic and peripheral regional groups have backed a succession of parties in order to voice their grievances. During the 1950s, the Democratic Party, in opposing the centralist elite represented by the Republican People’s Party, represented the periphery, including peasants and the provincial bourgeoisie as well as Islamists and religiously conservative people dissatisfied with secular policies.

In the 1960s and 1970s, its successor, the Justice Party, was also sensitive to Islamic demands in the electorate, while representing newly emerged bourgeois elements—agrarian capitalists, big capital, the provincial bourgeoisie—as well as peasants and petty traders. Thus, it was different from the center-right political parties that represented big capital and the urban middle class in Western Europe.

While peasants and petty traders had voted for the Justice Party until the mid-1970s, by the 1973 general elections the Anatolian esnaf and some segments of the religiously conservative provincial lower and middle classes switched to the National Salvation Party. Clashes between the left and right in the 1970s, however, became the central feature of political life in that era and led to military intervention in 1980. The Justice Party and other parties were outlawed.

In the post-coup period, the Motherland Party came forth to represent the center-right. Rather than representing only bourgeois classes, it had to represent a diversified electorate. It included a conservative faction representing the religiously conservative provincial bourgeoisie and new urban classes, and a liberal faction representing an urban managerial class expanding as a result of Ozal's liberal economic model. In this coalition, the Motherland Party represented Islamists and moderate ultranationalists on the one hand, and adherents of liberal democratic values on the other.

The Motherland Party was able to keep such an ideologically diversified constituency together until the late 1980s when the True Path party, which had a strong hold on some rural sectors, challenged its base. In addition, Motherland was subverted by the Islamist and ultranationalist parties. Consequently, the Motherland membership was fragmented. The culmination of this political change came in the 1999 election with a reduced Motherland and True Path vote, and enhanced support for the pro-Islamist Virtue Party, ultranationalist MHP (Nationalist Action Party), and a small but growing pro-Kurdish HADEP (People's Democracy Party). Emerging victorious from the fragmented political scene was the Democratic Left Party (DSP), combining nationalist rhetoric with liberal democratic values.

The migration of many people to cities—in search of upward social mobil- ity—since the 1950s has often meant merely transforming rural poverty into urban poverty. In the cities, immigrants suffer from substandard housing conditions and a lack of infrastructure. They constitute a new periphery whose members are often economically disadvantaged, culturally disintegrated, and politically isolated. Their social rage has fostered extreme political tendencies since the beginning of the 1970s. In the 1970s the revolutionary left articulated its political discontent and anti-regime sentiments. In the 1980s and 1990s, the Islamist movement took on this role.

Conflict caused by regional economic imbalances in the 1990s and the sectarian antagonism between the Sunnis and Alevis[376] have further complicated the political tension. Corruption allegations have aggravated social rage and mobilized people to turn to radical parties and groups challenging the system. The result has been political polarization and radicalization and a progressive decline in backing for the center-right and center-left parties since the late 1980s.[377]

The socioeconomic background, political aims, and interests of those supporting the Islamist movement are diverse.[378] Its supporters include the large university student population, especially upwardly mobile youths who must compete with the established urban middle and upper-middle classes; members of the unskilled young urban subproletariat, whose numbers have increased with migration and a higher level of unemployment;[379] and some of the state-employed petit bourgeoisie, proletarianized by falling real wages and high inflation, particularly since the early 1990s. In addition, there are bourgeoisie factions including some from the relatively privileged new middle and upper classes: rich merchants, businessmen, and industrialists of humble esnaf origins, as well as several rural agrarian capitalists.

In Anatolia, among the religiously conservative Sunni Turks who have perceived modernization as an attack on their family values and tradition, there are also sectors of ultranationalists who have embraced Islamist attitudes and a sizeable number of religiously conservative Sunni Kurds[380] who assume that an Islamic order could possibly bring solutions to the conflict in their region, which has cost more than 35,000 lives since the early 1980s.[381]

As a result of these different developments, which furnished a base for Islamist politics, the Welfare Party scored a success in the March 1994 local elections. The RP won 28 mayorships including six major metropolitan centers, and leadership of 327 local governments. Nationwide, the RP received 19 percent of the vote. In the 1995 general elections, it obtained 21.4 percent.

The RP joined in July 1996 with Tansu Ciller's True Path Party to form a coalition government which lasted one year. Legislative disputes between the two partners were intensified by a crisis created by Welfare Party mayors and deputies, whose anti-secular rhetoric and activities agitated secular public opinion. Erbakan's relationship with Muammar Qadhafi also made some suggest the Turkish prime minister might owe ultimate allegiance to Libya's dictator, who headed a secretive organization called the Islamic People's Command, to which Erbakan also belonged.[382]

These developments exacerbated tensions between the military and the Welfare Party, which had been building due to a number of factors, including: disagreement over the expulsion of Islamist officers from the army in December 1996; the Welfare Party's attempt to sign a defense cooperation agreement with Iran; Welfare's call for lifting the ban on head-covering for female university students and civil servants; the dispute over building a mosque at Istanbul's Taksim Square; the Iranian-inspired Jerusalem Night (January 31, 1997) in the Welfare-controlled Sincan district of Ankara, where anti-regime slogans were shouted; and Erbakan's reluctance to endorse the National Security Council's February 28, 1997 meeting that called for curbing Islamist activities.[383]

The Welfare Party's anti-democratic position on several issues also disappointed secular public opinion. For example, Erbakan and Justice Minister Sevket Kazan made critical and insulting comments about people who took part in the "One Minute of Darkness for Enlightenment" civil protest in February 1997.[384] Welfare's support for constitutional changes made some worry that it was trying to dilute the secular state. Women worried about the reduction of their rights.[385] The party's allegiance to democracy was also called into question. Islamist dailies including Akit and Yeni Safak were also severely critical of the January-February 1997 protest. Finally, there were many allegations that the Welfare Party had connections with militant Islamist groups.[386]

As a result, tension between the military and the Welfare Party, as well as antagonism between the Islamists and secular public opinion, escalated. This provided a legitimate framework to bring the Welfare Party to court in May 1997. Consequently, the Constitutional Court outlawed the Welfare Party in January 1998, banning Erbakan from politics, on the grounds that the party violated the principles of secularism and the law of the political parties. Moreover, on June 28, 1998, Erbakan was charged with defaming the Constitutional Court by saying that the Court's ruling had no historic value and would eventually rebound against those who had made it.[387] By dissolving the party, the ruling left more than 100 seats vacant in Parliament and orphaned local administrations.

A new party, the Virtue Party (FP), was founded by thirty-three former RP deputies under the leadership of Recai Kutan on December 17, 1997. At the time it had 144 seats in Parliament, which it obtained as a result of the switchover of former RP deputies. The party's conservative wing, controlled by Erbakan, elected the parliamentary group leaders before the reformist wing, led by then Istanbul Mayor Recep Tayip Erdogan, could pull itself together. But the struggle for power between the party's young reformists and those loyal to Erbakan was not over. It eventually resulted in the resignation of four of the reformists (Cemil Cicek, Ali Coskun, Abduallah Gul, and Abdulkadir Aksu) on July 26, 1999. Their resignation was interpreted as the start of a new party given the fact that since the April 1999 elections, the Constitutional Court had been deliberating about closing down the Virtue Party on charges that it was carrying out antisecular activities and was the successor to the RP. However, the parliamentarians denied any plan to form a new party.

Prior to the 1999 local and general elections, the Virtue Party set up organizations in all districts of the country and began recruiting new members and renewing its membership profile.[388] The party has also tried to soften its antiwomen, anti-democracy image. It recruited a number of highly educated, uppermiddle class modern women such as Nazli Ilicak and Professor Doctor Oya Akgonenc. Women from lower social classes carried the party to power, and were able to participate in public life as result. But, despite their contribution, they were not represented at the higher ranks. The Virtue Party appointed Ilicak, Akgonenc, and Gulten Celik to its Central Decisionmaking Board. Only Celik wears a head-covering.

Both Turkey's leaders and the party's own supporters ask how the FP differs from the RP. The Virtue Party has signaled that it takes some new approaches. For example, the FP declared support for Turkey's European Union membership, a step the RP opposed for three decades. Virtue's appointment of two women who do not wear head-coverings to its Central Decisionmaking Board stands in clear contrast to the Welfare Party's demand that its supporters observe an Islamic dress code. Indeed, the FP has downplayed the head-covering issue altogether. Third, instead of mentioning the old party's "Islamic mission," Virtue's rhetoric emphasizes democracy, human rights, and personal liberty.[389] The FP presents the head scarf ban as a human rights violation and a suppression of personal liberties, rather than as a matter of religion.[390]

Another change in the Virtue Party's rhetoric is its highlighting of the theme of millet (nation), as opposed to the RP's strong organic link between millet and devlet (state). The implication in the Virtue Party's stance is that the state should be in the service of the people rather than—as in the RP's view—a holy entity that stands far above the people.[391] The FP pledges to create a democratic and humanitarian state that meets the millet's needs. This issue has become a dominant topic in Milli Gazette, a religious newspaper, since January 1998. Moreover, the FP co-opted the Western concept of human rights and democratic norms, and leftist criticism of income inequality in its rhetoric.[392]

Another interesting development is the FP's position on the "Kurdish issue." The RP had not been hesitant to talk about the Kurds' identity and cultural rights without seeming to go further in backing bigger demands. The FP's chairman, Recai Kutan, spoke in favor of "cultural rights," announcing in August 1998: "It would be necessary to recognize some of the rights of Turkey's Kurdish identity. The right to educate and publish in the Kurdish language would have to be considered after discussions and a normalization period.”[393]

However, the FP became more cautious after the capture of outlawed PKK leader Abdullah Ocalan in February 1999.

The FP has tried to change its image in a number of ways. For example, rather than holding social gatherings segregated by gender, as it did in the past, it now organizes dinner parties where men and women mix freely. (Nazli Ilicak and Recai Kutan sang together at a dinner party in 1998.) While such an endeavor alienates religiously conservative supporters, party leaders understand the necessity of improving the party’s image and making concessions.

Islamism in Turkey has grown as a response to social, economic, and political discontent, the causes of which include foreign influences, urbanization, modernization, and secularization. The Islamist movement’s upsurge, the growth of ultranationalism, and Kurdish ethno-nationalism have eroded the center in Turkey. The center-right parties have declined because they did not meet their constituency’s needs or expectations and also failed to absorb the compromising spirit of democratic liberalism.

In the context of modern Turkish political history, the Welfare and Virtue parties must be understood not only in terms of their specific Islamist ideology but also as representative of specific social sectors reacting to circumstances. Equally, and partly as a result of this fact, the erosion of the center-right and increased support for the Islamist and ultra-nationalist parties have not yet created the danger of regime instability.[394] The nationalist secular majority in Turkey,[395] supporters of the DSP and other parties, act as a counterweight to the Islamist and ultranationalist groups both in public life and in Parliament.

While anti-Islamist forces counterbalance Islamist politics, the Islamists are divided over the strategies to be adopted in response to certain developments, including the military’s initiative to curb Islamist activities by formulating an eleven-point plan in February 1997, and the failure of the Islamist state in Iran reflected in the election of a moderate president, Mohammed Khatami, and the overwhelming victory of moderates in the 2000 parliamentary elections in Iran. The eleven-point plan played a major role in compelling the Turkish Islamists to alter their program, while the developments in Iran had a minor effect in motivating them to reconsider their theory and political action plan.

It is possible to foresee three major trends in the future evolution of the Islamist movement in Turkey by analyzing the current inclinations.[396] First, some of the radical groups that formerly resorted to political violence, such as Hizballah's Ilim faction, the IBDA-C (Islami Buyuk Dogu Akincilari-Cephesi —Islamic Great Eastern Raiders' Front), and the Muslim Youth, will choose to stay outside the system and continue to pursue their radical political agenda without considering reconciliation with the system. Other radicals who did not formerly adopt armed struggle as a strategy will ally with the second set of Islamists, consisting of nonmilitant groups and political parties that have worked within the system to gain a share in political power.[397] While many in the second group continue to employ constitutional political means to obtain political power, some have begun to withdraw from the political arena in response to the state's intolerance of political Islam since the 1997 February National Security Council meeting. Instead they discover new areas of Islam that will insure the survival of their Islamic program. One of their options will be to target the individual and nurture his religiosity and piety by means of Islamic education and cultural activities with an aim of creating a highly religious society that could be politicized at the right time.[398] Their new rhetoric emphasizes that Islam is a religion, not a political ideology. For many of them, even some of those who were inspired by the Iranian revolution and its ideology, Tehran is not a guide for the future. On the contrary, they criticize Tehran on grounds that it uses Islam as a political instrument to build and sustain a nation state. They believe that the Iranian Islamic system has failed but not the Islamist cause and that theory of the latter is valid in all spaces and in all times. The third group chooses to pursue political Islam and work within the existing system by revising its Islamic rhetoric and party program and co-opting the Western concepts of human rights and universal democratic norms. This group has become less averse to Western modernity and norms after admitting that its resistance is futile.

Despite taking different paths and employing diverse plans of action ranging from political undertakings to cultural projects, the different groups still share the same goal: to rebuild the individual and society and revise the nation's thought and politics based on Islam.

The Islamist movement is not likely to lose popular support because Islam has spread to the cultural and political mainstream, and social discontent, which has been one of the key factors sustaining its growth, is not likely to decrease. On the contrary, economic problems, which generally fuel popular disappointment, continue to hit salary and wage earners due to a fall in real wages. Should the government trim agricultural subsidies in an effort to bring Turkey's economy in line with European Union norms, the agricultural sector might also voice its dissatisfaction.[399] Such a situation could lead to a large-scale migration from rural areas to urban areas in a very few years, and in turn, is more likely to increase the number of the unemployed urban poor. This new wave of rural-urban migration would complicate the problem of social dislocation that resulted from migration from rural areas in the Black Sea region and troubled southeastern and eastern provinces from the mid-1980s until the late 1990s. The Islamists or other groups whose members have an antithetical attitude towards the existing system would exploit the likely expansion of the discontented ally, comprising the newly urbanized and economically disadvantaged social classes referred to above.

As a result of the party's own electoral shortcomings and the government's pressure against it—capped by the Virtue Party's closure by the Constitutional Court on June 22, 2001—the Islamists split into two separate parties. Erbakan's supporters created the Saadet Party (The Party of Blissfulness) on July 20, 2001. But on August 11, 2001, Tayyip Erdogan, the former mayor of Istanbul, formed the Akparti (Adalet ve Kalkinma Partisi, The Justice and Development Party). Erdogan had been convicted of making a seditious statement after a speech which suggested that Turks had to choose between God and Ataturk. He was temporarily banned from politics.

This development resulted essentially from two factors. On the one hand, there had been intensive external pressure for the Islamists to turn toward a more moderate ideology and strategy. The February 28, 1997 National Security Council meeting had sent a serious warning that the state and armed forces would move against Islamist forces deemed too radical in seeking to change the basis of the Turkish state. The fall of Erbakan’s government had sent a strong warning signal to the Islamists, reinforced by the banning of Virtue four years later.

On the other hand, there were also genuine conflicts within the party over its doctrine and goals. There was a clear generational aspect of this struggle, with some relatively younger leaders rebelling against Erbakan’s heavy-handed control. To some extent, too, the battle was one for personal power among several contenders and factions.

Each side would argue that it has the proper formula for winning the voter’s support. Erdogan represents a more modernization-oriented democratic approach which, it could be contended, is more likely to be acceptable to the power structure and to Islamists who want to be in tune with the Turkish mainstream. Yet Erbakan’s supporters can claim that by watering down traditional stances, the moderates will lose the backing of the old base of social conservatives and religious devotees.

Only time will tell whether either approach can produce a party that can survive both the voter’s scrutiny and the state’s response. After many decades, Islamist politics have not yet found their place in Turkey’s society and political structure.

[360] For the voting behavior of the Turkish electorate, see Ersin Kalaycioglu, “The Turkish Political System in Transition in the 1980s,” Current Turkish Thought, Vol. 56. (Fall 1985), pp. 2—38; Ersin Kalaycioglu, “Elections and Party Preferences in Turkey: Changes and Continuities in the 1990s,” Comparative Political Studies, Vol. 27, No. 3 (1994), pp. 402—424; Ergun Ozbudun and Frank Tachau, “Social Change and Electoral Behaviour in Turkey: Toward a Critical Realignment,” International Journal of Middle East Studies, Vol. 6 (1975), pp. 460—480; Ergun Ozbudun, “Turkey,” in J. M. Landau, E. Ozbudun and F. Tachau (eds.), Electoral Politics in the Middle East: Issues, Votes and Elites (London: Croom Helm, 1980), pp. 107—143.

[361] Turkish modernization began in the nineteenth century with the Tanzimat reforms. The Young Ottomans' ideas of constitutionalism, parliamentary government and secular education and the ideas of the Young Turks on a modern nation state provided the intellectual framework of the Turkish modernization.

[362] For the definition of the Islamist and the differences between the radical and moderate Islamists, see Nilufer Narli, "Moderate Against Radical Islamicism in Turkey," Zeitschrift Fur Turkeistudien, Vol. 1, No. 96 (Zentrum Fur Turkeistudien. Essen University, 1996), pp. 35–59.

[363] The history of the Islamist movements goes back to nineteenth century Ottoman rule. The author focuses here on Islamist movements in the Turkish republic.

[364] Tarikats were banned in 1925. They then went underground and were organized as secret brotherhood groups. In the 1980s they discovered new strategies to organize themselves as legal entities. They have established foundations under various names, which enable them to operate legally and have avenues of fund raising.

[365] For example, Kozanli Ibrahim and his friends revolted to demand Arabic Ezan on February 1, 1933 in Bursa; Shaykh Halit' declared himself as Mahdi in December 1935 and a series of bloody insurgencies led by his son Shaykh Kudus ensued; and Kayserili Ahmet Kalayci proclaimed a new religious order in Iskilip and consequently incited the public in 1936. See Cetin Ozek, Devlet ve Din (State and Religion) (Istanbul: Ada Yayinlari, 1986), p. 498.

[366] Particularly, the Nurcus adopted the strategy of forming an alliance with a center right political party. They approached Adnan Menderes, the chief of the Democratic Party. Seeing his responsiveness to their overtures, they called him “Musluman Menderes” and supported him in the 1950 general elections. They expected Menderes to restore Islam and even include Said-i Nursi’s Risalei Nur articles in the school curriculum. See Cetin Ozek, State and Religion, p. 544.

[367] For further details on the strategies of the Islamist groups, see Narli, “Moderate Against Radical Islamicism in Turkey,” pp. 35–59.

[368] The support of the provincial merchants and the esnaf (small shopkeepers, artisans), and the covert network of the two leading informally organized religious groups, the Nakshibandis and Nurcus, played a role in the surprising electoral success of the National Salvation Party in the 1973 general elections. It obtained 11.8 percent of the total vote while collecting over 15 percent of the vote in twenty provinces of central and eastern Anatolia but not in the urban centers. For a profile of Islamists who voted for the National Salvation Party in the 1973 elections, see Ergun Ozbudun, “Islam and Politics in Modern Turkey: The Case of the National Salvation Party,” in Barbara Freyer Stowasser (ed.), The Islamic Impulse (Washington, Center for Contemporary Arab Studies, Georgetown University, 1987), pp. 142–156; and Binnaz Toprak, Islam and Political Development in Turkey (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1981). Similarly, in Iran the bazaari class was an ally of the Islamic Revolution. See Nikki Keddie, “Iranian Revolutions in Comparative Perspective” in Edmund Burke and Ira M. Lapidus (eds.), Islam, Politics and Social Movements (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1988), pp. 293–313.

[369] Bihterin Dinckol, 1982 Anayasasi Cercevesinde ve Anayasa Kararlarinda Laiklik (Laicism in the Constitutional Context and in the 1982 Constitution) (Istanbul: Kazanci Hukuk Yayinlari, 1992), p. 179.

[370] For the Islamist student movement and associations, see Elizabeth Ozdalga, “Civil Society and its Enemies: Reflections on a Debate in the Light of Recent Developments within the Islamic Movement in Turkey” in Elizabeth Ozdalga and Suna Persson (eds.), Civil Society, Democracy and the Muslim World (London: Curzon, 1997), pp. 73–84.

[371] For the mobility of the perpherial groups to urban centers and their gaining access to secular education, see Yilmaz Esmer and Muge Gocek, “Boundaries of Religious Fundamentalism in Turkey,” survey conducted in Istanbul and Konya in 1994; paper presented at Bogazici University, May 1995. For the Welfare Party’s mobilization of this newly urbanized social group by providing it moral and material support, and in turn, obtaining its electoral support in the 1994 local and 1995 general elections, see Sencer Ayata, “Patronage, Party and State: The Politicisation of Islam in Turkey,” Middle East Journal, Vol. 50, No.1, (1996). pp. 40—58.

[372] On May 25, 1998 the State Security Court (DGM) prosecutor demanded the closure of MUSIAD for violating the laws governing societies and associations. The court also charged MUSIAD Chairman Erol Yarar, a 36-year-old U.S.-educated businessman, with “inciting hatred amongst the people” in a speech he made on October 4, 1997 criticizing a law that brought restrictions on religious education. See Turkish Probe, May 31, 1998, p. 18. According to the Turkish penal code, article 312–2, inciting hatred by making reference to class, race, religion, sect, or regional differences is a crime punishable by a jail sentence of one to three years. It is worth mentioning that the Virtue Party introduced a bill asking for the abolition of Article 312—2. In his speech, Yarar called for a “liberation struggle,” and that constituted a crime according to the prosecutor. Yarar also likened to “dogs” the proponents of the law, which extended compulsory education from five to eight years. He also described the new education law as the work of “nonbelievers” by saying, “uninterrupted education is certainly unreligious education” (“kesintisiz egitim kesin dinsiz egitim”). Yarar’s hearing was held on June 29, 1998 in the State Security Court in Ankara. The prosecutor asked for a one- to three-year prison term. At the hearing on July 29, Yarar denied his opposition to eight-year compulsory education. Turkish Probe, May 31, 1998, p. 12. However, MUSIAD was highly critical of the new arrangements in the education system and the closure of the middle section of the imam- hatip schools in its March 31, 1998 press bulletin. MUSIAD Basin Bulteni, March 31, 1998, Istanbul; see <[[http://www.musiad.com][http://www.musiad.com]]>. In May 1999 the court convicted Yarar, and he resigned.

[373] MUSIAD Bulteni, May-June 1998, No. 29, p. 37. For the membership profile and activities of MUSIAD, see “MUSIAD in the U.S.” Special Supplement of the Turkish Daily News, May 21, 1997. For further information, see Nilufer Narli, “The Tension between the Center and Peripheral Economy and the Rise of a Counter Business Elite in Turkey,” Islam en Turquie. Les Annales de L’Autre Islam, No. 6 (Paris: INALCO, 1999), pp. 50–72.

[374] It has branch offices in Ankara, Konya, Izmir, Kocaeli, Kayseri, Bursa, Balikesir, Gaziantep, Denizli, Kahramanmarai, Adana, Karadeniz Eregli, Samsun, Corum, Malatya, Sanliurfa, Cankiri, Bandirma, Diyarbakir, Bartin, Gebze, Elazig, Icel, Inegol, Adapazari, Eskisehir, and Antalya.

[375] For the center-periphery conflict and its significance in the rise of the Islamist movement, see Serif Mardin, “Center-Periphery Conflict: A Key to Turkish Politics,” Dedalus, Vol. 102, No. 1, (1973) pp. 169–190.

[376] For example, the Sivas incident on July 2, 1993, when 37 Alevis were burned as a result of an alleged arson attack by Islamists agitated by a speech delivered by Aziz Nesin. According to press reports, Nesin, speaking at an Alevi cultural festival, proclaimed the reign of the 1,000-year-old Quran over. See Turkish Daily News, July 5, 1993. (Nesin had previously angered the Islamists by publishing excerpts from British author Salman Rushdie’s The Satanic Verses.)

[377] Nilufer Narli and Sinan Dirlik, “Turkiye’nin Siyasi Haritasi” (“The Political Map of Turkey”), Yeni Turkiye Dergisi, Vol. 2, No. 9 (May-June 1996), pp. 125—151.

[378] The profile of the Islamists is based on an empirical study by the author: Nilufer Narli, The Islamist Movement, University Students and Politics in Turkey (unpublished report presented to the Ford Foundation, 1996).

[379] It has been observed that the young urban subproletariat is vulnerable to the radical Islamist movement in Middle Eastern countries as well. See Saad Eddin Ibrahim, “Crises, Elites, and Democratization in the Arab World,” Middle East Journal, Vol. 47, No. 2 (Spring 1993), pp. 293–305. The growing youth population, its lack of access to education and professional opportunities and its potential to turn to extremist movements in the Middle East have been a concern to the students of Middle East politics. See Gad. G. Gilbar, Population Dilemmas in the Middle East (London: Frank Cass, 1997); and Alan Richards, “Economic Imperatives and Political Systems,” Middle East Journal, Vol. 47, No. 2 (1993), pp. 217–227.

[380] Most Kurds are orthodox Sunni Muslims who belong to the Shaafi School, whereas the majority of Turks subscribe to Hanefi doctrine as classified by Islamic law. Kurds have traditionally been religious and involved in the various tarikats that have flourished in eastern Turkey. Tarikat leaders and shaykhs have always had a great influence on the Turkish Kurds owing to their feudal tradition. Shaykhs have been able to dictate decisions of great importance in people’s lives. Along with being a key element in social life, Islamic elements have a political function too. Religious elements can be instrumental in political action. There are cases confirming this hypothesis. The first two decades of the republic witnessed several Kurdish rebellions (for example, the Shaykh Said Revolt in 1925, Agri, Zile and finally Dersim in 1937) led by religious shaykhs and tribal leaders. Islamic as well as ethnic sentiments triggered these revolts.

[381] For information on Turkey’s separatist Kurdish party, the PKK (Kurdistan Workers’ Party), led by Abdullah Ocalan (recently captured, tried, and sentenced to death), see Ismet Imset, The PKK: A Report on Separatist Violence in Turkey 1979—1992. (Istanbul: Turkish Daily News Publications, 1992); and Henri J. Barkey and Grahan Fuller, Turkey’s Kurdish Question, Carnegie Commission on Preventing Deadly Conflict, Carnegie Corporation of New York (New York: Rowman and Littfield Publishers, 1998).

[382] For details, see “As If Troubles at Home Were Not Enough ... ,” (no author indicated), Briefing, April 2, 1997, No. 8 (Ankara).

[383] MGK (National Security Council) is a constitutional body. Article 118 of the 1982 constitution establishes the MGK as a body evenly divided between five civilians (the president, prime minister, and ministers of defense, internal affairs, and foreign affairs) and five military officials (the chief of the general staff, the commanders of the army navy, and air force, and the general commander of the gendarmerie). The recommendations of the MGK are given priority during legislative procedure. Article 118 states: “the Council of Ministers shall give priority consideration to the decisions of the National Security Council concerning the measure that it deems necessary for the preservation of the existence and independence of the State, the integrity and indivisibility of the country, and the peace and security of society.”

[384] The “One Minute of Darkness for Enlightenment” civil protest was a response to the public perception of corruption and injustice in Turkey. In 1997 it began with a call for citizens to turn their lights off at 9:00 pm every night. The scope of the protest got larger as thousands of people took to the streets carrying candles, putting them out at exactly 9:00 pm, and holding meetings to discuss ways of attaining their goal, an “enlightened” Turkey. It was largely supported by the center-left parties, but was criticized by the Welfare Party, the ultranationalist party, and the True Path Party.

[385] For example, the Welfare Party opposed a bill passed by the Parliament on January 14, 1998, to protect women and children against domestic violence. For the law (No. 4320), see Resmi Gazete, (Official Gazette), January 17, 1998, No. 23233.

[386] For example, there is an accusation that the former RP minister Uevket Kazan and RP deputy Sevki Yilmaz organized sending 150 Turkish students to Islamic countries, 30 of them to Egypt to receive “Shari’a commando” training. Yeni Yuzyil reported that a number of students connected with the now defunct RP had made confessions about being sent to Cairo’s Al-Azhar University with false papers. These young people recount that in Egypt they stayed in houses belonging to the National View Organization and that they received armed training at Hizballah camps in Lebanon. They stress that their aim was an armed struggle to set up an Islamic state in Turkey. See Yeni Yuzyil, March 1, 1998, p. 10. An article in the daily Cumhuriyet (March 1, 1998) cited an “RP-linked foundation” as the focal point in the investigation extending from Al Azhar to Hizballah.” Cumhuriyet (March 4, 1998) also reported that Istanbul State Security Court prosecutor Nuh Mete Yuksel indicated that investigators were looking into possible links with Turkish Hizballah and the European National View Organization (AMGT), which was considered to be a subsidiary of the now defunct Welfare Party (RP). Cumhuriyet also reported that the police were seeking three more AMGT officials. AMGT has many hostels and associations in Turkey and in Western Europe, as well as in the Middle East. For the unconstitutional activities of the militants groups, see Ely Karmon, “Islamic Terrorist Activities in Turkey in the 1990s,” Terrorism and Political Violence, Vol. 10, No. 4 (Winter 1998), pp. 101–121.

[387] Erbakan made this statement on January 18, 1998, soon after the closure of his party by the Constitutional Court. See Turkish Daily News, June 30, 1998.

[388] For more on the organization of the FP, see M. Recai Kutan’s press conference, Turkiye’nin Oncelikleri ve Temel Goruslerimiz (“Priorities of Turkey and Fundamentals of the Party”), (Bilkent, Ankara: Semih Offset, December 17, 1998).

[389] University rectors agreed in 1998 to enforce a secular dress code that bans the wearing of head scarves in all universities. In January 1998 a government decree banned religious clothing, including the head scarf, for teachers, officials and students in all schools and universities. Universities and schools refused to register female students unless they submitted ID photographs showing an uncovered head and neck.

[390] Virtue Party Chairman Recai Kutan said, “The headscarf ban was not a matter of religious belief but rather a human rights issue.” Quoted in Turkish Daily News, September 11, 1998.

[391] This analysis is based on an examination of the leading deputies’ speeches and the articles in Milli Gazete, an organ of the Welfare Party/Virtue Party.

[392] Observers have noted that many Islamist groups have adopted the Western concept of human rights as a new strategy to draw larger support and to criticise the state. See Bruce Maddy-Weitzman and Efraim Inbar (eds.), Religious Radicalism in the Greater Middle East, (London: Frank Cass, 1996).

[393] Quoted in Turkish Daily News, August 13, 1998.

[394] Roy Macridis, Modern Political Systems: Europe (New Jersey: Prentice Hall International, 1987).

[395] A recent survey conducted by Binnaz Toprak and Ali Carkoglu shows that even religiously conservative people tend to support the separation of the state and Islam and are not for an Islamic state. See Toprak and Carkoglu, Turkiye’de Siyasi Islam (Political Islam in Turkey), a survey report submitted to the TESEV Foundation, Istanbul, May 1999.

[396] The analysis of future trends in the Islamist movement and of changes in the theory and action plans of the Islamists is based on in-depth interviews with Islamist intellectuals and reading discussions from the mid-1990s on in Hikmet ve Bilgi quarterly and Yasin Aktay’s book Turk Dininin Sosyolojik Imkani (Sociological Feasibility of Turkish Islam) (Istanbul: Iletisim, 2000).

[397] Islamists in many Middle Eastern countries have abandoned the old strategy of toppling the state and moved in the direction of following legitimate political avenues. Ibrahim A. Karawan, The Islamist Impasse (Adelphi Paper no. 314, London: The International Institute for Strategic Studies, 1997).

[398] While the Toprak and Carkoglu study shows that some religious people support separation of state and religion, religious people have a higher tendency to support political Islam and political parties representing Islamist causes, like the RP/FP. Toprak and Carkoglu, Turkiye'de Siyasi Islam.

[399] The agriculture sector accounts for 14 percent of GDP and employs about half (43 percent) of the labor force. This sector, which is largely excluded from the customs union, continues to be subject to extensive and costly government intervention. Support for the sector has increased in recent years. According to OECD estimates, total transfers almost doubled in the period 1994 to 1997, reaching the equivalent of 7.5 percent of GDP. Support price interventions and the fertilizer subsidy continue to be serious drains on the budget. This is why the government has chosen to restrict and gradually eliminate agricultural subsidies.

 9. Fethullah Gulen and His Liberal 'Turkish Islam' Movement

Bulent Aras and Omer Caha

The community that has developed under the influence of Fethullah Gulen, a prominent religious leader in Turkey, simultaneously has Islamic, nationalist, liberal, and modern characteristics. Its ability to reconcile traditional Islamic values with modern life and science has won a large, receptive audience. The group has even brought together divergent ideas and people, including the poor and the rich, the educated and the illiterate, Turks and Kurds, and Muslims and non-Muslims. Gulen’s movement could be a model for the future of Islamic political and social activism.

In comparison to so-called ‘fundamentalist’ Islamic groups, Gulen’s movement’s views on Islam are surprisingly liberal and tolerant of non-Islamic lifestyles. However, this approach may be the result of the long-term, specific experience of the Anatolian people and the unique historical dynamics of Turkish sociocultural life. For example, the movement is influenced by the concept of ‘Turkish Islam’ formulated by some nationalist thinkers, and also the Nurcu or Nur (Light) movement that developed around the writings of Said Nursi.

The main premise of ‘Turkish Islam’ is moderation. Since people of Turkish origin first accepted Islam, they perceived and practiced it under the influence of Sufi ideas. Sufi-oriented Islamic movements kept a certain distance from the politics of their times in contrast to other Islamic movements. For example, the Shi’ites or Haricis defined themselves according to an imagined other (those who do not support the truth) and became associated with specific political stances over the proper nature of the state and who should hold power. Sufi tradition, however, has described itself as being based on the philosophy that all creatures should be loved as God’s physical reflection and objects of the Creator’s own love. There is no place for enemies or ‘others’ in this system.

Islam in Turkish political history, during the reigns of both the Seljuks and the Ottomans, remained under the state’s guidance but as a private matter. The dominant belief was that a truly religious sultan would govern the state according to the principles of justice, equality, and piety. This approach of keeping religion apart from worldly affairs led to a collective memory that regarded Islam as a flexible and tolerant belief system. Thus, it was assumed that religious institutions should adopt flexible attitudes toward the changing situations of their times. In the Ottoman era, there was never a full-fledged theocratic system.

While the principles of Shari’a (Islamic law) were applied in the private sphere, public life was regulated according to customary law formulated under the authority of the state.[400] This aspect of the Ottoman political system made religion’s role less rigid. Moreover, the empire accepted that it would be a multireligious state, in which Christian and Jewish subjects would continue to be governed by their own laws.

While Western domination of the Islamic world during the nineteenth century led some Muslims to reject Western ideas, the Ottomans adopted many Western innovations. For example, they opened Western-style schools (including women’s schools), promulgated major programs for reform and human rights (the Tanzimat Fermani in 1839 and Islahat Fermani in 1856), developed a constitution, and opened a parliament in 1876. Said Nursi became one of the most insistent supporters of the parliamentary system at that time and later of the republican regime in Turkey.

In addition to this history of a Turco-Islamic heritage, another influence on Gulen’s movement was the Nur movement (also known as the Risale-i Nur movement). The movement was organized around Said Nursi (1877—1961), a prominent religious authority, and his writings, the Risale-i Nur (Letters of Light). It spread throughout Turkey after 1950, despite the state’s efforts, and had special success among the young and those educated in Turkey’s secular education system mainly because Nursi argued that there was no contradiction between religion and science.[401] The Risale-i Nur is well thought of by religious moderates because of its emphasis on the links between Islam and reason, science, and modernity. It also rejects the idea that a clash between the ‘East’ and ‘West’ is either necessary or desirable and advocates the use of reason in issues related to Islamic belief.

Born in Erzurum in eastern Turkey in 1938, Gulen learned Arabic and religion from his father.[402] In 1953 he began his career as a government preacher (the only legal position a preacher can hold in Turkey), and in 1958 he took a teaching position at a mosque in Edirne. Four years later, he transferred to Izmir, where his movement began and came to be known by some as the “Izmir Community.” During the era of military rule starting in 1971, he was arrested for clandestine religious activities (organizing summer camps to disseminate Islamic ideas) and spent seven months in prison. In the early 1980s, the police initiated a case against him, but he was not arrested due to the ruling military junta’s relative tolerance of Islam. During the premiership of Turgut Ozal, Gulen gained official protection. He is now retired and living in both Izmir and Istanbul in modest homes given to him by followers, while continuing to write extensively.[403]

Throughout his career, Gulen, addressed by his followers as “respected teacher” (hocaefendi), has traveled the width and breadth of Turkey. He has also lectured abroad on such subjects as the Quran and contemporary science, the Islamic perception of Darwin, and social justice in Islam.

Gulen has knowledge of both traditional Islamic sources and Western philosophy, and is especially interested in Immanuel Kant.[404] He is an effective speaker in person and on television. His books have become bestsellers in Turkey. As Nuriye Akman, a senior Turkish columnist, concedes:

<quote>

He is like that “old-style gentleman” we read about in old books and see in old films. He says “estagfurullah” [I beg the pardon of God] in every other sentence. He speaks in delicate and polite phrases. He is extremely modest ... He speaks in an even tone knowing what he will say and uses correct grammar and an Ottoman vocabulary.[405]

</quote>

Gulen does not favor the state’s applying Islamic law, the Shari’a. He points out that most Islamic regulations concern people’s private lives and that only a small portion of them concern the state and government. These latter provisions need not be enforced because religion is a private matter, and its requirements should not be imposed on anyone.[406] He looks at Islamic regulations bearing directly on the government—such as those related to taxation and warfare—in the context of contemporary realities.

Concluding that the democratic form of government is the best choice, Gulen is very critical of the regimes in Iran and Saudi Arabia. He accepts Said Nursi's argument that the idea of republicanism is very much in accord with the idea of "consultation" discussed in Islamic sources. Moreover, he fears that an authoritarian regime would impose strict control on differing ideas. At the same time, though, Gulen views the state's role as important in "protecting stability."

Gulen's goals are simultaneously to Islamicize the Turkish nationalist ideology and to Turkify Islam. He hopes to re-establish the link between religion and state that existed in the Ottoman era, when leaders were expected to live their private lives based on Islamic regulations. Such an approach, he argues, would strengthen the state, and thus protect society by widening the state's base of legitimacy and enhancing its ability to mobilize the population.

Gulen holds that the Anatolian people's interpretations and experiences of Islam are different from those of others, especially the Arabs. He writes of an "Anatolian Islam" based on tolerance and excluding harsh restrictions or fanaticism and frequently emphasizes that there should be freedom of worship and thought in Turkey. He proposes two keys to provide peace in society—tolerance and dialogue. "We can build confidence and peace in this country if we treat each other with tolerance."[407] In his view, "no one should condemn another for being a member of a religion or scold him for being an atheist."[408]

His ideas about tolerance and dialogue are not restricted to Muslims but also extend to Christians and Jews. Gulen met twice with Patriarch Bartholomeos, head of the Greek Orthodox Fener Patriarchate in Istanbul, and has also met several times with Christian and Jewish religious leaders to promote interreligious dialogue. In February 1998, for example, he visited the pope in Rome and received a visiting chief rabbi from Israel. The meeting between the pope and Gulen was not received positively by some circles in Turkey. Some argued that this meeting created the impression that Gulen wanted to become the leader of Islam in the world. Others argued that the meeting was a plot to portray him and his community as embracing all sections of society and as enjoying a status higher than the state.

On the question of women’s rights, Gulen has progressive views. He believes that the veiling of women is a detail in Islam, and that “no one should suppress the progress of women through the clothes they wear.” Gulen also states that “no one should be subject to criticism for his or her clothing or thoughts.”[409] Furthermore, he says, “Women can become administrators,” contradicting the views of most Islamic intellectuals. Despite these views, modern professional women in Turkey still find his ideas far from acceptable.

Gulen favors education that leads to integration into the modern world. According to Mehmet Ozkaragoz, a U.S.-educated devotee, “A basic principle of Islam is seeking knowledge. We recognize the West as the best source of technology at the moment although, of course, we would prefer the Muslim world to be the leader.”[410] Moreover, Gulen wishes to merge Islam into the international economic and political systems, and supports Turkey’s bid for membership in the European Union.

Here, too, Gulen is influenced by Said Nursi. While Nursi believed that some actions of nonbelievers harmed humanity’s future, he advocated cooperation among believers of all religions as a countermeasure. Gulen goes a step further and extends his tolerance toward secularists and nonbelievers in Turkey. He sees this approach as a way to revive the multiculturalism of the Ottoman Empire, secure Turkey’s stability, and prevent conflicts such as those between Sunnis and Alevis.

Gulen has had considerable success advancing his aim to create a Muslim community that opposes politicized Islam. No one knows the actual size of Gulen’s large group of sympathizers (known as Fethullahcilar or “the followers of Fethullah,” a name Gulen strongly opposes) but guesses range between 200,000 and 4 million people influenced by his ideas.[411] This community draws much of its support from young urban men, with a special appeal to doctors, academics, and other professionals. It has grown in part by establishing student dormitories, summer camps, high schools, universities, educational and cultural centers, and publications. Although Gulen is its sole leader, a number of his longtime devotees run the community.[412]

Gulen has considerable political weight on the right of the political spectrum, which explains why party leaders are eager to maintain close contacts with him. Since 1994, he has met with a president, a prime minister, the leaders of many parties, and important businessmen. He regularly gives interviews to the country's leading media outlets. In 1997, Turkey's President Suleyman Demirel accepted an award from one of Gulen's organizations and praised the movement's educational activities. Gulen also met with Bulent Ecevit, the longtime leader of Turkey's left and the current prime minister, after which Ecevit reported that their meeting involved a "conversation that focused entirely on religion and philosophy. The meeting had no political dimensions. I found Gulen to be a sincere and candid person. Our meeting was useful."[413] This exchange was remarkable in that it showed Gulen's ideas could also find a receptive audience on the left.

To promote their views, Gulen's followers have set up a wide range of organizations. The Turkish Teachers' Foundation, for example, publishes a monthly journal, Sizinti (Disclosures), and two academic journals, Yeni Umit (New Hope) and The Fountain (published in English). It also organizes national and international symposiums, panel discussions, and conferences. Another foundation, the Journalists' and Writers' Foundation, brings secularist and Islamist intellectuals together in what are called Abant meetings, putting forward the view that no individual or group has a monopoly on interpreting Islam and that secularism does not mean being anti-religious.[414] The foundation has organized conferences and has invited prominent intellectuals to talk on various issues such as on dialogue among civilizations.

An American expert on Islam, Dale F. Eickelman, calls Gulen "Turkey's answer to media-savvy American evangelist Billy Graham ... In televised chat shows, interviews and occasional sermons, Gulen speaks about Islam and science, democracy, modernity, religious and ideological tolerance, the importance of education, and current events."[415] The Gulen community also has its own media, including the daily newspaper Zaman, the television channel Samanyolu, and the radio station Burc. In addition, it distributes video- and audiotapes. Those involved in its campaigns include prominent intellectuals from Turkey’s prestigious universities.

The Gulen community owns and runs about 100 schools in Turkey. These institutions use the same curriculum as state schools and are under tight state control, but they also emphasize conservative values such as good manners and respect for elders. The schools are funded by the community and instructors are graduates of some of the best Turkish universities. Once the schools began functioning, they became the focus of further fund-raising efforts and are regarded as providing a high-quality education.

In keeping with his Turkish orientation, Gulen encourages paying attention to the Turkish-speaking republics of the former Soviet Union, where he has gained many loyal followers. In October 1996, Gulen’s followers financed a noninterest-bearing bank, Asya Finans, backed by sixteen partners and $125 million in capital, which aims to raise funds for investments in the Turkic republics. In this way, Gulen hopes to draw the attention of Turkish businessmen to these new countries, and in doing so, solidify links to them.

Followers of Gulen have also founded more than 200 schools around the world from Tanzania to China, but mostly in the Turkic republics. The schools in the Turkic republics support a philosophy based on Turkish nationalism rather than on Islam. As one reporter has stated, “From the Balkans to China, he wants to see elites formed with Turkey as their model.”[416] In Gulen’s view, Turkey’s virtues include its Ottoman heritage, secularism, market economy, and democracy. These schools also admit non-Muslim students, and because of their high quality, and perhaps the use of English as the primary language of instruction, they attract children of the elite and of government officials in various countries. The community supports a secular state model in both Azerbaijan and Central Asia.[417] The Turkish analyst Sahin Alpay noted that graduates of these schools go on to hold important positions in all walks of life in these newly independent states.[418]

Arguing that Gulen’s group fosters the idea of an Islamic umma or a community of Muslims in this region would probably be wrong. The authoritarian leaders of the new republics are highly intolerant of Islamic activities and Gulen's group is very careful not to provoke these rulers. Small groups are organized to hear a follower of Nursi read and interpret his books. Ideas are also spread through personal relationships. As has been observed by Elisabeth Ozdalga: "The main objective [of the education provided in these schools] is to give the students a good education, without prompting any specific ideological orientation. One basic idea of Gulen's followers is that ethical values are not transmitted openly through persuasion and lessons but through providing good examples in daily conduct."[419] Actually, this way of conveying messages in a subtle manner is no different from the early Islamicization of this region at the hands of Ahmed Yesevi and Bahaeddin Naksibendi. Some analysts describe the community's efforts in this region as Islam blended with Turkish nationalism.[420] However, the Gulen community has also opened schools in non-Muslim areas. More accurately, the community is trying to create the idea of Turkey as a role model and leading power in this region.[421]

This does not mean that Gulen's community has advanced without setbacks or even that it enjoys support from the Turkish state. For example, prosecutors investigated statements made by Gulen on a June 18, 1999 television broad- cast.[422] Prime Minister Ecevit, who said he saw the program, urged that the government look into the matter rather than having a debate in the media about it. He also made a supportive statement about the movement's educational system: "These schools spread Turkish culture and information about Turkey to the world. They are under the continuous supervision of our state."[423]

What was the problem? Gulen had made some vague statements that were somewhat critical of the Turkish establishment. He apologized publicly, but some secularists remained suspicious that he was seeking to gain political power over state institutions, including the army.[424] About a week after the broadcast, President Suleyman Demirel sent a warning to Gulen by saying: "I think that a man of religion should not have political targets. Being a man of religion is a hard task, but being a respected man of religion is only possible by being in compliance with the rules of our religion; that is, it is possible by giving good advice to humanity rather than by being involved in worldly affairs."[425]

Clearly, Gulen and his community could again face such allegations in the future. Some segments of the Turkish bureaucracy will continue to hinder the activities of Gulen's community. For example, YOK, the Higher Education Council, has decided not to recognize universities opened overseas by foundations and corporations that support the Gulen community. According to this decision, students will not be allowed to transfer from universities abroad run by the Gulen community to Turkish universities. Moreover, YOK will not grant any "equivalency degrees" for degrees conferred by such universities.[426]

Public concern about the Gulen community was raised again after allegations were made shortly after the videotape controversy that the community was behind tension that arose between Uzbekistan and Turkey. This led to the closure of some of the schools run by the community in Uzbekistan. However, Ecevit urged calm: "The Uzbek president has several unjust concerns about Turkey Turkey does not intervene in the domestic affairs of other countries.

I attribute great importance to relations with Uzbekistan. We cannot allow these relations to be damaged by unnecessary touchiness."[427]

The Turkish military has staged three coups—in 1960, 1971, and 1980—to restore stability and order in the country. But in June 1997, rather than stage a fourth coup, the army maneuvered the Refah (Welfare) Party, Turkey's largest vote-getter in the 1995 parliamentary elections, out of office. It did so on the grounds that Islamic radicalism was poised to cause a civil uprising which it would be legally obliged to resist, "by force if necessary."[428]

Gulen takes particular care not to antagonize the army. In fact, he tries hard to persuade the military leadership that his activities do not challenge the status quo and should not be regarded as reactionary (a code word for Islamist). For example, he says that, if need be, he would turn over his community's schools to the state.[429] When asked about the threat of reactionaryism being on the agenda of the army-dominated National Security Council (MGK), he replied: "The MGK is a constitutional institution. It is a part of the state. I have never believed that a threat of reactionaryism exists in Turkey. Turkey needs enlightenment. Reactionaryism means going backward. In an enlightened era which has experienced democracy and secularism, it is impossible for the Turkish people to go back."[430]

While the Turkish army appears to accept Gulen and his followers as a domestic movement, not inspired by any foreign influence such as Iran or Saudi Arabia, the suspicion still exists that he may seek to subvert the military from within by sending his followers to the military academies. If this is true, it means that the community will have a difficult relationship with the military leadership. This may already be the case since it is known that the West Working Group in the office of the chief of the General Staff, has prepared a file dealing with the activities of Gulen's followers focusing on their educational institutions abroad. Members of the military have also visited most of these schools in Asia. Furthermore, the military leadership has shown no desire to be seen with Gulen, unlike secular politicians and intellectuals. Ismail Hakk Karaday, the army's chief of staff, did not even reply to an invitation to an iftar (a breaking of the Ramadan fast) dinner.

A split in the government over Gulen and his community has potentially significant political consequences, for Gulen has found civilian support even while the military has looked askance at his activities. In a dramatic move, as reports circulated that the military leadership planned to discuss Gulen's activities at a National Security Council meeting, both Suleyman Demirel and Bulent Ecevit endorsed him.[431] Despite the fact that Gulen himself has expressed respect for the military, the military is generally opposed to him. Since conservative circles in Turkey hold the military above all other state institutions and never criticize it, if the military were to oppose Gulen strongly, he would lose his civilian support.

Islamist intellectuals who supported the Refah Party and now support the Fazilet (Virtue) Party (formed by Refah supporters when Refah was closed), generally stay clear of Gulen's movement, limiting their remarks to the nature of the curriculum at the community's schools or to assessing Gulen's intentions. Relations with Refah supporters are tense given that Refah supporters widely believe that the secular establishment uses Gulen's community to obstruct their path. Necmettin Erbakan, Refah's longtime chairman, even accused Gulen of accepting government support to threaten Refah.[432]

In turn, Gulen frequently criticized Refah Party policies and activities. Keeping his distance from the Refah Party contrasted sharply with Gulen's efforts to carry out a dialogue with the secularist parties. Gulen did acknowledge Refah's impressive organization and growth in membership but noted that if other parties had worked as hard, Refah would not have received 21 percent of the vote in the December 1995 elections. He also concluded that the vote for Refah was larger than its actual base of support when he said that "Our friends in Refah may be annoyed, but I think that Refah's electoral share is still around 15 percent—maybe not even that. The great majority of those who vote for Refah are people who are dissatisfied because there is no strong government that inspires confidence in Turkey."[433]

Gulen held the Refah Party itself responsible for the crisis in Turkish politics that pitted it against the secularist military. He has also deemed Refah's removal from office in June 1997 not unfair. "Hopefully, and God willing, no one will come out and try to drag the nation into a vicious circle [like the one in the 1970s] from which we extricated ourselves with much difficulty."[434] Indeed, he sees Turkey as having barely missed entering a deep conflict along the lines of Algeria.

Since 1996, prosecutors have argued that statements such as those of Istanbul's former Mayor Recep Tayyip Erdogan, read from a poem, that "the minarets are our bayonets, the domes our helmets, and the mosques our barracks,"[435] which led to his criminal prosecution in May 1998, prove the party's anti-secular intentions. Thus, they sought to shut down Refah as a threat to Turkey's constitutionally enshrined secular system. They got their way in January 1998, when the chief judge of the Constitutional Court, Ahmet Necdet Sezer, announced Refah's closure on the basis that it had engaged in "actions against the principles of the secular republic."[436]

Gulen rejected comments like those of Erdogan, holding that they "are not binding on believers who respect God in Turkey."[437] He supported the closure of Refah, given his emphasis on the preservation of order, but said it would be more sensible, for tactical reasons, not to close Refah. Instead, he urged continuing the lawsuit against the party until the next round of elections:

<quote>

“If a trial is on when the election campaign gets under way, public trust in Refah would be shaken. It would be viewed as a party that will be closed. People would not vote for it. Its votes would move, more democratically, largely to the parties that are most closely aligned with the Refah Party. That would achieve the desired objective.”[438]

</quote>

Gulen predicted the Islamists would not gain from having suffered the closure of Refah, and he rejects the idea that Turkey’s new Islamist party, the Fazilet Party, would emerge with more strength among voters. Interestingly, during the media campaign against Gulen in June 1999, the leader of the Fazilet party, Recai Kutan, and some other prominent figures in the party defended Gulen publicly and tried to counter arguments against him. The Islamist media also adopted the same attitude and supported Gulen and his movement when serious questions about him were raised.

Gulen’s June 1999 emergence upon the political scene triggered much controversy among secularist intellectuals, a considerable number of whom have suspected him of using different tactics to reach the same goal as the Islamists. They worry that behind his benign facade, Gulen hides ambitions to turn the country into an Iranian-style Islamic state. The insecurity and intolerance of some secularists cause them to accuse Gulen’s community of being the enemy of the Turkish republic. They also worry that secularist parties have offered Gulen support in exchange for a promise on his part not to endorse the Refah Party.

Rusen Cakir, author of a book on the rise of Islam in Turkey, finds that “the [secularist] parties are promoting him as an alternative to Welfare. They’re using their enemy’s weapon against their enemy.”[439] Another expert on Islamists, Iskender Savasir, made similar remarks, saying that “I cannot say that Fethullah Hoca is not collaborating with the state."[440] A "radical socialist" weekly, whose sometimes sensationalist and unreliable allegations have been used by the Turkish military, claims that the Gulen group "acquired financial support from the state, particularly from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs" and points to Tansu Ciller's having transferred "large sums from her ministry's secret budget" to his schools, seeing this as "one of the reasons for the close relations he has with her."[441]

On the other hand, Gulen has obtained the support of a number of well-known liberal intellectuals, such as the journalists Mehmet Altan, Ali Bayramoglu, Mehmet Barlas, Etyen Mahcupyan, Mehmet Ali Birand, and Cengiz Candar, who argue that the solution to Turkey's problems depends on reaching a consensus. Thus, they like the 'soft' face of Islam he presents. Birand, for example, recently argued that Gulen has original ideas and that all segments of Turkish society, implying the military, should pay attention to his vision. Gulen's critical stance toward the Refah Party also won him the support of some nationalistconservative intellectuals like Altemur Kilic. As a symbol of this support, Gulen's Turkish Journalists and Writers Foundation hosted an iftar dinner in February 1996, at which about a thousand distinguished politicians, businessmen, artists, and intellectuals turned up.

A discussion of the significance of Gulen's movement requires considering both the organizational structure of the movement itself, the movement's place in Turkey's political and economic system, and its influence beyond Turkey.

First, the organizational structure of the movement is seen as hierarchical and somewhat undemocratic, which is somewhat unexpected given the community's liberal attitudes and tolerance of differences. Gulen is the sole leader of the movement and the hierarchical order extends from the top to the bottom through an increasing number of abiler (elder brothers). The ranking is very strict, and each rank's abi (elder brother) obtains only a certain amount of knowledge of the activities occurring or under discussion while agreeing to refrain from asking questions or seeking more knowledge about the higher ranks. An abi or someone under his supervision may, however, talk to other abis informally and also talk to those assigned to overseeing the activities. Although this sort of structure may be helpful if the members of the community were to face persecution by the government, it does raise serious problems for the development of democracy within the group and creates the likelihood that many followers are left out of the decision-making process. Of course, those entering into this structure do so of their own free will.

As for the movement's standing in Turkish society, it does occupy a special place given the new cultural space created after the liberalization attempts of the 1980s in Turkey. Its tolerant Islamic discourse that seeks consensus aims to integrate its followers into the existing political system. The Gulen movement does not encourage bringing down the government or even challenging the status quo. In fact, because the Gulen movement is highly sensitive about being involved in any controversy, it avoids taking up controversial issues or even entering into public debates. This cautious stance constitutes a self-imposed restriction, and it may prompt more radical Islamic movements to do likewise.

Further, as already noted, Gulen's movement seeks integration with the modern world by reconciling modern and traditional values. This attempt to create a synthesis of ideas resembles the efforts of the last nationalist thinkers of the Ottoman Empire. For example, Ziya Gokalp emphasized the necessity of creating a synthesis based on combining elements taken from Turkish culture (hars) and from Western science and technology. Gulen and his devotees go a step further, accepting Western civilization as a suitable foundation for material life while considering Islamic civilization suitable for spiritual life. It should be noted, though, that given the movement's conservative character, it does appeal to those who find that the Turkish political system is overemphasizing secularism and modernization.

Another way of viewing the movement's place in Turkish society is to consider Gulen's community one among many other civil society organizations, despite its hierarchical structure, given that the community has achieved autonomy from state power and has been able to play a significant role in society— the main characteristics of civil society organizations. The movement does mobilize a large segment of society, a segment not tied to the state.

The movement must be seen in contrast to a sector that has long been tied closely to the state. A strategy began as early as the 1920s aimed at creating a native bourgeoisie. The result was a social group that received special incentives and protectionist measures. Some enormously wealthy industrialists emerged with strong links to part of the state bureaucracy. Given the state's willingness to give these wealthy industrialists control over the Turkish economy, competition has been prevented from developing and the political will of the people has been rendered ineffective and even meaningless with respect to influencing economic policy.

In the 1990s, however, policies oriented towards greater liberalization and a shift to export-oriented industrialization have led to the emergence of new, dynamic, export-oriented, small and medium-sized businesses, many based in traditionally conservative Anatolian cities. This segment of society has been mobilized by Gulen's movement. The newly emerging export-oriented economic class is likely to challenge the existing economic structure and pressure the state bureaucracy to end the unequal treatment. It might also be said that the economic activities linked to Gulen's movement as well as the educational activities of Gulen's community have become part of an alternative economy.

This aspect of Gulen's movement, with its focus on disciplined work and efforts motivated by national-religious values, makes comparing it to the Protestant movement of the sixteenth century fitting. As Weber argued in his classic book The Protestant Ethics of Capitalism, religious-spiritual values can motivate people to work hard and accumulate wealth. In Turkey's case, given the current insistence upon a strict secular model of government, citizens may be choosing to worship "safely" by working hard to achieve economic modernization and development, or they may view the "self-discipline" Islam encourages as being attained when they work hard. In fact, Gulen uses the term hizmet or service, stating that there is no end to the service that can be carried out to build a peaceful society. At the same time he argues that a person's energy to serve comes from belief and that serving one's society is the most important way to gain God's favor and a place in paradise. This resembles what Weber called “in- worldly asceticism,” which was significant in the development of capitalism.

As for the significance of Gulen’s movement beyond Turkey, its best potential is in the Turkic countries in the Caucasus and Central Asia, where Gulen’s emphasis on Turkish Islam will probably weaken the appeal of the message coming out of Iran. In the larger Muslim world, Gulen’s movement does pose a potential challenge to Islamism, for its ideas may find receptive audiences among those with access to the outside world—those generally the most prone to Islamism. This said, Gulen’s ideas have a much better chance than his organization, for authoritarian states and a general intolerance for new interpretations of Islam could impede it.

The unique character of Gulen’s movement lies in its attempt to revitalize traditional values as part of modernizing efforts such as the Turkish state’s official modernization program. Thus far, it has had some success as it attempts to harmonize and integrate the historically diverse lands of Turkey and reconcile hundreds of years of tradition with the demands of modernity, not easy tasks. In brief, Gulen seeks to construct a Turkish-style Islam, remember the Ottoman past, Islamicize Turkish nationalism, re-create a legitimate link between the state and religion, emphasize democracy and tolerance, and encourage links with the Turkic republics.

Gulen’s movement seems to have no aspiration to evolve into a political party or seek political power. On the contrary, Gulen continues a long Sufi tradition of seeking to address the spiritual needs of people, to educate the masses, and to provide some stability in times of turmoil. Like many previous Sufi figures (including the towering thirteenth-century figure Jalal al-Din Rumi), he is wrongly suspected of seeking political power. However, any change from this apolitical stance would very much harm the reputation of his community.

Ultimately, the future of the Gulen group will be determined by its ability to evolve into an open-minded, flexible, and democratic community and improve its relations with the Turkish military leadership and secular elites. If these endeavors are successful, then the group could have a major impact on both the Turkish state and Turkish society and on the changes that take place in Turkey in the coming decades. As for Gulen himself, in a new Turkey he would become an even more important religious figure.

[400] See Niyazi Berkes, The Development of Secularism in Turkey (London: Routledge, 1998).

[401] For further information, see Serif Mardin, Religion and Social Change in Modern Turkey: The Case of Bediuzzaman Said Nursi (Albany: State University of New York Press, 1989).

[402] Erzurum's location near the border between Turkey and Iran, and the large number of immigrants from the Caucasus there, are said to render its Islam state-oriented and nationalistic.

[403] Some of Gulen's writings are available in English: The Infinite Light, The Lights of the Way, Questions, Towards the Lost Paradise, and Truth through Colors [no reference information for these publications]. In addition, the second half of the 1990s witnessed numerous (speculative, popular, and scholarly) studies of Gulen's life and his community. For example, see Oral Calislar, Fethullah Gulen'den Cemalettin Kaplan'a (From Fethullah Gulen to Cemalettin Kaplan) (Istanbul: Pencere Yayinevi, 1998); Eyup Can, Fethullah Gulen Hocaefendi ile Ufuk Turu (A Tour of New Horizons with Fethullah Gulen) (Istanbul: AD Yayinevi, 1995); Nevval Sevindi, Fethullah Gulen ile New York Sohbetleri (Conversations with Fethullah Gulen in New York) (Istanbul: Sabah Yayinevi, 1997); Mehmet Ali Soydan, Fethullah Gulen Olayi (The Case of Fethullah Gulen) (Istanbul: Birey Yayinevi, 1999); Osman Ozsoy, Fethullah Gulen_Hocaefendi ileMulakat (An Interview with Fethullah Gulen) (Istanbul: Alfa Yayinevi, 1998); (n.a.) Medya Aynasinda Fethullah Gulen (Fethullah Gulen as Portrayed by the Media) (Istanbul: Gazeteciler ve Yazarlar Vakflar Yayinlari, 1999).

[404] For example, see M. Fethullah Gulen, Varligin Metafizik Boyutu (The Metaphysical Dimension of Existence) (Istanbul: Feza Yayinevi, 1998).

[405] Nuriye Akman, “Hocaefendi ile Roportaj” (“Interview with Hocaefendi”) Nokta, February 5—11, 1995, pp. 16—18.

[406] Fethullah Gulen, Fasildan Fasila 1 (Izmir: Nil Yayinevi, 1995), p. 223.

[407] Alistair Bell, “Turkish Islamic Leader Defies Radical Label,” Reuters, August 7, 1995.

[408] The Turkish Daily News, February 18, 1995.

[409] Ibid.

[410] Bell, “Turkish Islamic Leader.”

[411] “Hocaefendi Cemaati,” Tempo, February 7, 1997, pp. 46—50.

[412] See the series in Milliyet, August 10—13, 1997.

[413] Ibid.

[414] The Turkish Daily News, July 21, 1998, and Milliyet, July 21, 1998.

[415] Dale F. Eickelman, “Inside the Islamic Reformation,” Wilson Quarterly 22, No. 1 (Winter 1998), pp. 84–85.

[416] Wendy Kristianasen, “New Faces of Islam,” Le Monde Diplomatique (English edition), July 1997, pp. 11–12.

[417] Hurriyet, November 3, 1996.

[418] Milliyet, November 4, 1996.

[419] Elisabeth Ozdalga, “Entrepreneurs with a Mission: Turkish Islamists Building Schools along the Silk Road,” (Paper delivered at the Annual Conference of the North American Middle East Studies Association, Washington, D.C., November 19—22, 1999).

[420] For example, see M. Hakan Yavuz, “Societal Search for a New Contract: Fethullah Gulen, Virtue Party and the Kurds,” SAIS Review, Vol. 19, No. 1 (Winter/Spring 1999), pp. 114–143.

[421] During a series of interviews with students of the community’s high schools in Azerbaijan and Turkmenistan (who were brought to Turkey for a vacation) in August 1999, the students expressed their gratitude and appreciation for their teachers’ attempts to educate them. Their perception of Turkey consisted of the projected image of their teachers—that is, they attributed to all Turkish people the good conduct of their teachers.

[422] Anatolia, June 19, 1999.

[423] Anatolia, June 22, 1999.

[424] TV News Bulletin, June 24, 1999.

[425] Anatolia, June, 24 1999.

[426] Hurriyet, June 27, 1999.

[427] Anatolia, June 21, 1999.

[428] The Hindu, February 19, 1998.

[429] Milliyet, December 30, 1997.

[430] Ibid.

[431] Nicole Pope, “Generals Get Their Way,” Middle East International, No. 571 (March 27, 1998), p. 14.

[432] The Turkish Daily News, February 18, 1995.

[433] Milliyet, August 31, 1997.

[434] Ibid.

[435] Milliyet, December 27, 1997.

[436] The New York Times, January 17, 1998, and The Washington Post, January 17, 1998.

[437] Milliyet, December 30, 1997.

[438] Milliyet, August 31, 1997.

[439] Bell, “Turkish Islamic Leader.”

[440] Nadire Mater, “Rise of Secular Priest Seen as a Threat by Islamicists,” Inter Press Service, February 22, 1995.

[441] Aydinlik, March 23, 1997.

 10. Islam and Democracy

Ali R. Abootalebi

The study of the role of Islam in politics, society, and the economy since the early 1970s, and particularly after the Iranian revolution, has produced a wide range of academic and policy debates and conversations. The relationship between Islam, civil society, and democracy especially has been of interest to Islamic activists, Islamic clerics (the ‘ulama), intellectuals, and state policymakers. At the heart of the question is whether Islam is compatible with democracy, and, if so, what then accounts for the authoritarianism and absence of democracy in most, if not all, Muslim countries.

Scholars of various persuasions have offered different cultural, economic, social, and political explanations.[442] Historically, the Orientalists’ view emphasized Islam’s cultural essentialism, proposing that Islam was responsible for the sociopolitical ills of Middle Eastern societies, including the absence of democracy. That is, Islam is the independent variable that can explain the major characteristics of Muslim societies, including the lower level of socioeconomic and political development. Such culturally grounded explanations have been seriously discredited by the neo-Orientalists' arguments that the structural underpinnings of societies can better account for socioeconomic and political inadequacies in the Middle East and elsewhere in the developing world.[443]

Islamic doctrines and beliefs pose no serious opposition to democracy, understood as a political system where the political and civil rights of the individual are guaranteed and practiced through institutional and legal arrangements. The Islamic doctrine holds the state partly responsible for the welfare of society, but ultimately it is through individual participation and the development of civil society that democracy can emerge. And to this end, Islam does recognize the sovereign rights of the individual to promote his or her own self-interest as well as contribute to the welfare of society as a whole.

To understand the relationship between Islam and democracy, one cannot overlook the distinctions among the message of Islam, the diversity of the Islamic movements in ideological composition and tactics, and the power struggle over ideological and political interests among traditionalist 'ulama and Islamists in various Islamic communities. It would be a gross mistake to generalize about the behavior of Muslims and their leaderships across the Islamic world. It would also be a mistake to categorize Muslims as "fundamentalists," "Islamists," or other such types without considering the ideological overlaps among members of such groupings.[444] Indeed, the very nature of Islamic law and its application for the creation of an 'Islamic society' has necessitated different interpretations of law and Islamic leadership from the very beginning. It is therefore quite feasible for an Islamic cleric to simultaneously have conflicting 'conservative' and 'progressive' views on the extent of the individual's rights and duties, as opposed to the state's, in social, economic, and political affairs.

Islamic movements have been diverse in their approaches to propagating the message of Islam. The Islamic movements in Tunisia, Algeria, Egypt, the Sudan, Saudi Arabia, Iran, Afghanistan, Pakistan, and elsewhere in the Muslim world have had different experiences in their dealings with the state.

But the diversity of Islamic movements in ideological tone, political posturing, and success or failure in challenging the state can largely be explained by differences in preexisting social, economic, and political contexts. Islamic leaders now realize the success of their movements as alternatives to the politics and ideology of the state is conditioned by their ability to deliver material gains to their followers, in addition to the promise of a more spiritually fulfilling life. The appeal by Muslim leaders to the public for political support without actual material benefits cannot succeed in the long run. Thus, the Islamic movements' preoccupation with public welfare programs in Egypt, Jordan, Lebanon, and elsewhere in the Muslim world. Similarly, no 'Islamic' state can, in light of persistent socioeconomic problems, hope to survive indefinitely through ideological rhetoric and the application of coercive policies.

The debate between traditionalist 'ulama and reformist clerical and nonclerical 'civilian' intellectuals on the proper role of Islam in state-society relations has made the Islamic movements of the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries potent alternatives to the secular and predominantly authoritarian state. The nineteenthcentury wave of Islamic movements, for example, was preoccupied with anticolonialism and the search for reviving Islam in modern times. A century later and in light of socioeconomic, political, and global challenges facing Muslim societies, Islamic movements are reinventing Islam in fundamental ways.

The debate on the proper role of Islam emphasizes either the direct political role of Islamic clerics in running state affairs, thus bridging the political and religious divide, or the presence of Islam as a sociocultural variable in promoting socioeconomic justice, the rule of law, and political toleration, without direct participation by clerics in the temporal realm of politics, which can corrupt all those involved, religious or not. Either solution has immediate and long-term consequences for the development of civil society and democracy in Muslim countries. But ultimately the success or failure of Islamic movements, whether in charge of the state or in opposition, is largely contingent upon their ability to establish themselves as well organized and institutionalized movements, with clear sociopolitical and economic agendas for dealing with the ills of their respective societies.

In light of the above, this chapter will argue that prospects for democracy in Muslim countries (and in non-Muslim countries, for that matter) are contingent upon the extent of the distribution of socioeconomic resources and political power within society and between the state and society. Islamic movements must be understood not merely on the basis of their declared religious convictions, but also on their interest articulation and participation in the broader struggle between state and society over socioeconomic resources and political power. Islam is no more or less antithetical to democracy than Christianity or Judaism, and the behavior of Islamic movements and their leadership in different Muslim countries must be understood within the larger context of a struggle for power by various groups, including religious groups. Islamic movements, whether ruling the state as in Sudan, Iran, and Afghanistan, or in opposition, as in most Muslim countries, have offered different visions of an ‘Islamic solution’ to the ills of their respective societies. But, as with their secular counterparts, the ultimate goal for these movements has been gaining popular support and control of the state to implement their ‘Islamic’ agendas. Despite the ideological underpinnings of Islam, the behavior of Islamic movements’ leaderships has not fundamentally differed from other political movements in many non-Islamic developing countries.

The wide range of Islamic movements—in social make-up, structure, and program—has left many observers baffled. Since the Iranian revolution there has been a sharpened distinction between two approaches which might be called “fundamentalism” and “Islamism.”

Islamism can embrace both progressive ‘ulama and those urban intellectuals who believe Islamic tenets are compatible with such modern values as freedom and democracy. The Islamist view stands in sharp contrast to that held by the fundamentalist, traditionalist ‘ulama who have had an historical monopoly over the right to interpret Islam and its tenets.[445]

There has been much confusion, especially over the term fundamentalist, which implies a return to the past in recapturing the roots of Islamic religion. There is also an implication here that other readings of Islam are illegitimate, since they supposedly neglect traditionally accepted concepts in favor of innovations that are often imports from non-Islamic societies.

Robin Wright shows one side of this approach in pointing out that fundamentalist movements also incorporate a great deal of modernity and innovation. Thus, she denies that most Islamic movements today are:

<quote>

‘fundamentalist’: The various Islamic movements are often called ‘fundamentalist’ in the West, but most are in fact not fundamentalist in their agendas. Fundamentalism generally urges passive adherence to literal reading of scriptures and does not advocate change of the social order, instead focusing on reforming the lives of the individual and family. Most of today’s Islamic movements resemble Catholic Liberation theologians who urge active use of original religious doctrine to better the temporal and political lives in a modern world. Islamist or Islamism more accurately describes their forward-looking, interpretive and often even innovative attempts to reconstruct the social order.[446]

</quote>

Ibrahim Yazdi, who claims that all truly Islamic movements are “fundamentalist,” conveys the opposite standpoint. As Yazdi puts it, there are:

<quote>

... two major trends in Islamic movements. One, we call the traditionalist. (The term ‘fundamentalism’ does not reflect the true facts. All of us are fundamentalists according to the definition in Western culture, that whoever believes the Bible is the word of God is a fundamentalist.) There are the tradition-oriented Muslim intelligentsia, the so-called ‘ulama. Then there are the reformist or modernist Muslim intellectuals.[447]

</quote>

Both Islamic fundamentalism and traditionalism are used here interchangeably as referring to opposition to Islamic reformists, or ‘Islamists,’ who are less rigid in their views of Islamic law (Shari’a) and of non-Islamic cultures. In any case, the classification of Muslim movements into traditionalist/fundamentalist and Islam- ist/reformist can be confusing, since Islamic doctrine itself allows for different interpretations and therefore different opinions on Shari’a and its principles. It is quite possible for a traditionalist religious leader (‘alim) to share similar Islamic values with a reformer on the overall position of Islam in society, the economy, and politics. The late Ayatollah Taleqani, who played an important role in Iran’s revolution, for example, had an activist vision of Islam and an Islamic state much closer to Islamist views than to those of Ayatollah Khomeini. The current ideological and political gulf between the ‘moderates’ led by President Muhammad Khatami, and ‘conservatives’ headed by Ayatollah Ali Khamene’i and other conservatives in the Iranian parliament (Majlis), has been widening. The two camps recognize that the Iranian regime’s survival hinges upon their unity, but despite the symbiotic relations that exist between them, differences in ideological interpretations of Islam and its tenets have put them on a collision course.

Indeed, the differences are over more than just moderate or conservative interpretations of Islam, but over a question of practical Islam versus stagnant Islam. Muslim societies will forge ahead with reforms needed for both material gains as well as spiritual uplifting, inspired by Islamic values, with or without the ‘ulama. In other words, the future role in Islam of the ‘ulama, or at least the more rigid ‘ulama, as sole interpreters of the Shari’a and legitimate heirs to the legacy of the Prophet of Islam himself is being challenged.[448]

Thus, it should be stressed that fundamental disagreements remain even among traditionalists over divine versus popular sovereignty. Some, like Abul A’la Mawdudi, founder of the Jamaat-i Islami in India, have argued that if democracy is conceived as a limited form of popular sovereignty, restricted and directed by God’s law, there is no incompatibility with Islam, but Mawdudi concluded that Islam is the very antithesis of secular Western democracy based solely on the sovereignty of the people.[449]

On the other hand, Sayyid Qutb, a leading traditionalist theoretician of the Muslim Brotherhood executed by the Egyptian government in 1966, objected to the idea of popular sovereignty altogether. Qutb believed that “the Islamic state must be based on the Quranic principle of consultation or shura [consultation, on the interpretation of Shari’a], and that the Islamic law or Shari’a is so complete a legal and moral system that no further legislation is possible or necessary.”[450]

Yet the rapidly unfolding events of the 1980s and 1990s have helped popularize the message and broaden support for moderate Islamists, compared to the revolutionary fundamentalists who flourished following Iran’s revolution. The more radical forces have been somewhat discredited by criticism of the Iranian model, their use of violence, and their failure to seize power. The current trend is for Muslim political leaders who favor participation in the electoral process as the way of taking control of the state, and intellectual reformists, who have been engaging in a lively debate on Islam and modernity (e.g., the outlook of Islam on democracy, equality, and human, minority, and women’s rights). The ‘ulama have historically preoccupied themselves with literal interpretation of the Quran and development of Islamic Law that relies basically on the Quran and Sunna (“path” or “tradition,” referring to the traditions about the conduct of the Prophet).[451] In this undertaking, a great deal of analysis has been written on the contributions by such Muslim thinkers as al-Shafi’i (767—820), Ibn Hanbal (780—855), al-Ghazzali (1058—1111), Ibn-Taymiyya (1263—1328), and others. These thinkers paid less attention in their writings to the political dimension of Shari’a than to its theological aspects. Vital questions, such as the right of the individual versus the community (umma), the right to rule and the source of political legitimacy, and the right or duty to rebel against unjust government, have been left underdeveloped. Thus, the scholars have not examined the duties and functions of an Islamic government in detail. As a result, no concrete political philosophy based on Shari’a has ever developed, and Islamic political thought has remained purely specula- tive.[452] Some have even gone so far as to argue that Shari’a never developed as a system of law in the sense it is understood nowadays, and thus invoking Shari’a to enforce autocratic rule by clerics is not legitimate.[453] As Fazlur Rahman has noted, “Islamic law... is not strictly speaking law, since much of it embodies moral and quasi-moral precepts not enforceable in any court. Further, Islamic law, though a certain part of it came to be enforced almost uniformly throughout the Muslim world (and it is primarily this that bestowed homogeneity upon the entire Muslim world), is on closer examination a body of legal opinion or, as Santillana put it, ‘an endless discussion on the duties of a Muslim’ rather than a neatly formulated code or codes.”[454]

In short, while a detailed theological discussion of the relationship between Islam and democracy is outside the scope of this study,[455] Islamists argue that shura can be interpreted as a democratic principle since it demands open debate among both the ‘ulama and the community at large on issues that concern the public. But traditionalists’ unilinear and rigid view of society and politics has also come increasingly under question among Muslims. Fundamentalist militant groups like the Egyptian al-Gama’, Algeria’s Islamic Salvation Front (FIS), or the Palestinian Hamas have neither been able to expand their bases of support beyond a certain point nor been able to gain power. Their views on Islam and politics are too rigid and outmoded for modern problems, and are even, some would say, un-Islamic. The Taliban movement in Afghanistan in the 1990s under the religious guidance of some ‘ulama imposed such restrictive ‘Islamic’ laws in provinces under their military control, they made both conservative and radical ‘ulama in Iran look like liberal reformists. And Islamic militants in Egypt, Algeria, and elsewhere may be praised as martyrs by some clerics but are denounced as terrorists by others.

Not only are traditionalists everywhere under scrutiny in terms of what they say and do, but the foundation of their power as the only legitimate interpreters of the Shari’a has been shaken. The Arab fundamentalists have even been accused of a false representation of Muslim history, the presentation of a biased and incoherent account of Islamic thought, to further their position and inter- est.[456] And of course, their historically close association with the state further weakens the credibility of some fundamentalists.

The political and economic turmoil in the Middle East has sharpened people’s image and expectations of Muslim groups and their leadership. Increasingly, the capacity to deliver tangible economic goods and basic political rights has become more important than the politics of ideology and rhetoric, Islamic or not. The Islamic governments of Iran and Sudan, for example, remain somewhat isolated in the international community and face tremendous domestic problems that have led to popular discontent and even uprisings. Saudi Arabia, a self-proclaimed Islamic state, faces increasing economic problems, and while the monarchy claims legitimacy through fundamentalist Wahhabi Islam, it denies the population fundamental political and civil rights that are respected in Islam.

The latest phase of the Islamic movement that began in the 1980s varies distinctly from the Islamic experience in Iran in 1979, in Lebanon after 1982, and among a host of small groups in Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Syria, and elsewhere during the late 1970s and early 1980s.[457] The most conspicuous difference is the tactics of the new Islamists. If extremism characterized the first phase of the fundamentalist movement, the new Islamic movements attempt to work within the state system rather than outside it. Islamists, in other words, have not failed to recognize that pluralism and interdependence are the catchwords of the present day.[458]

Historically, Islam as a religion remained on the periphery of state politics, overshadowed by authoritarian states that propagated secular ideologies and values. Furthermore, the overall structure of the post-World War II international political economy helped consolidate state power over most Muslim societies. The rent collected from oil and gas exports, and external support in the form of military, economic, and financial aid, for example, helped Middle Eastern states monopolize domestic power during the Cold War. The Arab-Israeli conflict also bolstered the Arab states' political hegemony by legitimizing their authoritarianism and providing an excuse for inadequacies in socioeconomic performance.[459]

It is clear to all Muslims that in the Quran and Shari'a, Allah is the ultimate sovereign and everything on Earth and in heaven is under His command. Yet, there is nothing in either source to deny Muslims freedom of action to improve their individual and communal lives; nor does Shari'a promote subservience to the state as a proof of proper Muslim behavior. On the contrary, individuals are regarded as responsible for the salvation and well-being of themselves, their families, and their communities.[460] Thus, blind obedience to a self-proclaimed Islamic state can be as anti-Islamic as open defiance of such a state. If a government rules in the name of Allah, then it must respect the fact that Allah regards individuals—and not the state—as responsible for their actions, for it is they who will be punished or rewarded accordingly on Judgment Day.[461] On this basis, the Islamists dismiss the idea that further legislation beyond Shari'a is impossible, as confusing the boundary between the overall sovereignty of Allah and the particulars of popular sovereignty.

The debate among Islamists and among some progressive traditionalists—be it in Iran, the Sudan, Egypt, Algeria, or elsewhere—is over the old question: how to reconcile the tenets of Islam with the modern notions of democracy, liberty, justice, and gender equality. In terms of democracy, the traditional meaning of the concept of shura is outdated, according to Islamists. After years of debate, according to Yazdi, "Many [Islamists] have come to the conclusion that general elections and a parliament properly serve that concept of consultation."[462] It is the extent of popular sovereignty and not its existence that is debated. Because of economic, technological, and environmental changes, further development of Shari'a seems inevitable to the Islamists. The development of Shari'a, they argue, need not be looked upon as a move away from Islamic principles, but, on the contrary, as a necessary stepping stone toward reaching an ideal Islamic society— a materially and spiritually developed utopia. An indispensable element in building such a society is freedom of thought and expression, including freedom from government control and suppression. In short, accepting the sovereignty of Allah does not necessarily contradict popular sovereignty.

Thus, Islamic traditionalists' reevaluation of their historical position on socioeconomic and political values is necessary to bring them more in line with the ongoing social and economic transformations in Muslim societies. Indeed, religious personalities such as Ayatollah Taleqani cautioned Iranians on relations between Islam and politics and on the position of the 'ulama in society and polity. As Hasan Turabi puts it, Islam exists in society "as a matter of norms and laws. It is an integrated and total way of life. Therefore government must be limited, because Islamic government would be omnipotent. Government has no business interfering in one's religion or religious prac- tices."[463] So, when it comes to dress codes in Muslim countries, for instance, society would definitely exercise a measure of censure and encouragement for one form of dress over another. But no organization, such as the Saudi amr bil- maarouf wal-nahi an al-munkar (the injunction “to command the good and forbid evil”), has legal authority to stop women or harass them. Segregation of women is definitely not a part of Islam. This is just conventional, historical Islam. It was totally unknown in the model of Islam or the text of Islam and is unjustified. [464] As for the relation of civil society to the state, according to Turabi, “In general civil society should be left alone, but if a societal function fails, government should step in. Once society picks up the function, then it [the state] should withdraw once more to its limit of security, organizing those aspects of society which must be legally organized.”[465]

The founder of the Nurcu movement in Turkey, Said Nursi (1876–1960), argued that democracy and Islam are not contradictory and indeed democracy and freedom are necessary conditions for the existence of a just society. The individual, he argued, “needs freedom to realize the power of God and, through this realization, the individual will be free from man-made oppression and per- secution.”[466] Nursi further stressed the significance of popular sovereignty and asked for the rule of law in society. The Nurcu (or as it is known in Turkey, Nur) movement “seeks to move Islam from an oral-based tradition to a print-based medium and to raise religious consciousness through education and reason, ... [updating] Islamic vocabulary in terms of the global discourses of science, democracy, and human rights.”[467] The Nur movement today has the support of an estimated two to six million followers.

So, as one scholar of Islam has put it, “[A] major issue in democratization in Muslim societies is whether or not scholars and leaders have successfully made the transition from listing ‘democratic doctrines of Islam’ to creating coherent theories and structures of Islamic democracy that are not simply reformulations of Western perceptions in some Muslim idioms.”[468] But the absence of a constructive dialogue between the traditionalist ‘ulama and the reformist Islamists has widened the gap between the two. The debate on creating legal codes dealing with political, human, and minority rights, civil liberties, gender equality, and the overall relationship of state to society is thus lacking.

One recent premise about state-society relations in the Middle East is that states there are weak and societies strong—the opposite of what was long argued. The Iranian revolution, the rise of Islamist movements in the 1980s, and declining oil prices are cited as proof for this viewpoint. This is taken as grounds for optimism and has led to an increasing interest in state-society relations and in prospects for the emergence of civil society in the region.[469] Thus, “today most scholars confidently affirm that the bases of civil society—both intermediate powers and autonomous social groups—exist in the Middle East.”[470] Even traditional social formations based on blood and marriage, or tribal ties (as in the Gulf monarchies and Yemen), or bonyads—the semi-independent trusts (as in Iran)—are thought to be a part of civil society in the Middle East.[471] The mere presence of such groups, it is argued, deters the power of the state and leads to increased prospects for democratization.

But this position rests on shaky ground. Even the appearance of political parties and formal groups and associations in the Middle East does not by itself necessarily mean a fundamental move toward democracy by state or society. The augmentation of political parties in the region may be more a sign of the state’s adjusting to pressure from Islamic groups and their allies than a genuine political opening on either side. Political parties in the Middle East remain mainly ineffective and play a mostly ceremonial role that serves to legitimate the state and its policies, without change in the composition of the ruling elites. For example, in all national elections in the Middle East since 1980, only in Iran (1989, 1997, 2001), Turkey (1991, 1995) and Israel (1992, 1996, 1999) did a change in the government actually occur. In all other cases, the ruling parties maintained their control over the state.[472] Even in Iran, where the ruling religious elite has affirmed the sovereignty of the people, the new elite has been reluctant to share power with its political opposition.

Although the formalities of a democratic state are in place (for example, elections and debates), the people remain politically and economically without much functional power. What civil society there was in Iran is fading, although intellectual and associational life continues to resist the state, which has come to dominate most aspects of life there.

Moreover, embryonic associations, although they exist in Muslim countries, are poorly organized and remain dependent on patrons within the state. As Carrie Rosefsky Wickham puts it in discussing Egypt: “The emergence of independent sites of social and political expressions within an authoritarian setting is not the same as the emergence of civil society, at least not in its liberal conception.”[473] The emergence of state-controlled quasipluralism in countries such as Egypt and Jordan should not be seen as a shift from one-party rule to pluralism (ta’addudiya) involving numerous political parties and associations.[474]

The real basis of state power in Middle Eastern countries is largely informal and not institutional, for personal, family, and group ties help sustain the executive power of the ruling elites. The pattern of patrimonial leadership is not confined to the Middle East, of course, as many developing countries display the same phenomenon.[475]

The extent of ruling elites’ autocratic power varies among the developing countries. Kuwait and the Persian Gulf shaykhdoms, along with Saudi Arabia and Oman, are perhaps the primary examples of highly traditional autocratic rule. On the other hand, South Korea, Taiwan, Malaysia, Turkey, Tunisia, and Brazil are examples that testify, to various degrees, to the changing balance of state-society relations in favor of society, as institutionalization of independent power relationships is gradually undermining informal and arbitrary state power associations.

The dominant position of the state in the Middle East has meant the dominance of politics by powerful families, elites, and military and bureaucratic officers. The slow emergence of independent groups and associations has been significant. For example, organized labor by itself, or through an alliance with the middle class, can be an effective force capable of checking the power of the state and promoting democracy, although most analysts ignore the role of organized labor in the civil society debate. But in any case, labor unions, a primary agent of civil society, in the Middle East remain either nonexistent or are repressed by the state.

Rachid al-Ghannouchi, the founder of the Tunisian Islamic movement al-Nahda, believes:

<quote>

Once the Islamists are given a chance to comprehend the values of Western modernity, such as democracy and human rights, they will search within Islam for a place for these values where they implant them, nurse them, and cherish them just as the Westerners did before, when they implanted such values in a much less fertile soil.[476]

</quote>

That is to say, Islam need not go through a process of secularization as did the West, but must face one of the foremost challenges it has encountered yet: “to outline a regime that is Islamic but also representative and accountable.”[477] Ghannouchi advocates “an Islamic system that features majority rule, free elections, a free press, protection of minorities, equality of all secular and religious parties, and full women’s rights in everything from polling booths, dress codes, and divorce courts to the top job at the presidential palace. Islam’s role is to provide the system with moral values.”[478]

Others, like the Iranian Islamic reformist Abdul Karim Soroush, have argued that there is no contradiction between Islam and the freedoms inherent in democracy. “Islam and democracy are not only compatible, their association is inevitable. In a Muslim society, one without the other is not perfect.”[479] Soroush believes that the will and beliefs of the majority must shape the ideal Islamic state, and that Islam itself is evolving as a religion, which leaves it open to reinterpretation: sacred texts do not change, but interpretation of them is always in flux because the age and the changing conditions in which believers live influence understanding. Furthermore, everyone is entitled to his or her own understanding. No one group of people, including the clergy, has the exclusive right to interpret or reinterpret tenets of the faith. Some understanding may be more learned than others, but no version is automatically more authoritative than another.[480]

Abdul Karim Soroush differs from Rachid al-Ghannouchi on how to free Muslims from their present dilemma. For Ghannouchi, the principle question is how to free the community from backwardness, while for Soroush, “the basic reality and objective is the person, the individual believer, making him a true reformer.” He is interested in showing Muslims how to dwell with the complexity of traditions that for long prevented them from the free implementation of reason and science for the good of the individual. At any rate, “taken together, Soroush and Ghannouchi illustrate the broad alternatives offered by the situation in which Muslim societies now find themselves as they face the inescapable challenges of secularization in the modern world.”[481]

Islam does not have a final authoritative spokesperson for all Muslims, and the Islamic world today is:

<quote>

in a state of disarray and confrontation between extremist religious movements that see themselves as the ‘defenders of Islam’ and authoritarian political regimes that claim to be ‘defenders of modernity.’ Yet, neither Islam nor modernity can be imposed on the people. This dichotomy warns of terrible consequences if the voices of reason and moderation—on both sides—are not allowed to prevail. Democracy offers a practical solution, and, possibly, the only way out of this dangerous situation.[482]

</quote>

The prospect for the emergence of civil society depends on the characteristics of the people who form that society. The better educated, and the healthier, wealthier, and more organized the people, and the more broadly resources are spread, the stronger the society will be in protecting itself from domination by the state. Moreover, these resources allow for the formation of institutions that act as the focus of activity where differences in opinions and policies can be debated and resolved without resort to violence. Thus, institutionalization is essential for political stability—for the systematic and orderly channeling of the demands of contesting elites for political leadership. To be democratic, political parties, whether religious or not, must function within an independent institutionalized organizational network where final decisions are made and executed without constant interference from various layers of their country’s state bureaucracies.

Associations and formal institutions that have played a critical role in Western political systems, however, have been considerably fewer in less developed coun- tries.[483] Chances for a crisis from their nonparticipation increase where the opposition lacks an institutional basis for exerting pressure for participation (for example, religious opposition to the shah prior to the Iranian revolution) or where the state and its participants fail to adapt to changing social and economic forces (for example, Lebanon prior to 1975). On the other hand, institutionalized opposition, whether religious or not, can be successfully incorporated into the political process (for example, Jewish religious opposition parties in Israel and to some degree Islamic opposition in Jordan, Turkey, Pakistan, and Egypt).

In fact, Samuel P. Huntington’s pessimistic view of the incompatibility of Islam and democratic norms is undermined by his own argument for the destabilizing effects of modernization itself and for the stabilizing effects of institutionalization. He points to the revival of Islamic fundamentalism and the poverty of many Islamic states as the fundamental reasons for his pessimism.[484] Yet the revival of Islam and the rise of fundamentalism in Iran and elsewhere in the Middle East has not been an anti-democratic movement aiming at the destruction of democratic values. Given the wide range of responses by Muslims to the West and to one another, the appeal in Muslim countries to unconventional forms of political conduct, including mass uprisings and rioting, is not due to any inherent intolerance of Islam toward democracy and the peaceful settlement of disputes. Islam in its various denominations has always been a source of both social protest against, and social support for, given regimes. The hostility toward the West by some—though not all—Islamic religious groups is aimed not at democratic values but at Western domination and interference in the domestic affairs of these countries.

There seems to be no immediate resolution to the debate among traditionalists, Islamists, and intellectual reformers on Islam and democracy. However, the attempt to develop the political doctrine of Islam by Islamists, intellectual reformists, and some traditionalists need not necessarily be viewed by other traditionalists as an attempt to entirely undermine the legitimacy of the religious establishment in Muslim countries.[485] Traditional religious leaders in the Muslim world, whether in power (Iran, Saudi Arabia, and the Sudan) or in opposition, must face the fact that, in light of complex socioeconomic and political problems facing Muslim societies in the twenty-first century, their position as legitimate religious/political leaders is bound to erode. The greatest threat to the traditional ‘ulama comes from either their own meager performance as heads of state (for example, in Iran and the Sudan) or their failure in political opposition to formulate and propose comprehensive agendas for resolving socioeconomic and political problems (as in Egypt, Jordan and Kuwait), or from their sectarian fighting, which has resulted in violence and acts of terrorism. Further rifts among traditionalist ‘ulama can be expected, as in Iran, as religious leadership in Muslim states finds itself under pressure to deal with modern problems. The progressive ‘ulama will benefit from an open dialogue with the Islamists in streamlining the tenets of Islam to take into account modern values without abandoning the fundamentals of Islam itself.

As Laith Kubba notes, “The experience of Iran and the Sudan has shown that fundamentalism-in-power cannot solve every problem, and actually complicates the challenge of implementing Islamic values in public life.”[486]

The potential for religious debate and political dialogue between traditionalists and Islamists, including the reformists, can be promising. The Islamists’ pragmatic view of Islam and the traditionalists’ recent popularity can be mutually beneficial in their common struggle for political sovereignty and development. This, however, can occur only when the religious establishment itself favors a fundamental socioeconomic and political restructuring of the status quo.

While it is not easy to predict the behavior of Islamist groups in their quest for power, it is possible to enhance cooperation between Islamists and secular groups in their common struggle against the state and in their future plans for their country. Thus, the question is whether the secular state can pursue a policy of political inclusiveness and allow Islamists to take part in the political process, given widespread concerns over the long-term fate of individual rights and liberties should the Islamists take control of the state. Some scholars have argued that where the popular will dictates it, Islamists must have the opportunity to rule, even if the future of such rights are not guaranteed. Some have advocated a slow and partial political inclusion of the Islamists. But, as Jerrold Green has argued, some sort of a “national pact must be devised as the best way to secure the democratization process, although devising a means to enforce the pact remain[s] unresolved.”[487]

Muslim countries, like other developing countries though in varying degrees, suffer from acute socio-economic and political problems (e.g., strong and dominant states; weak associational opposition to the state, and an overall distribution of socio-economic resources and power that need to be addressed). Inauguration of democratic elections in Muslim countries without addressing the fundamental problem of uneven distribution of socio-economic and political resources in these countries will not succeed. The religious debate on Islam and democracy must then deal with not only the question of justice and freedom, but also with developing mechanisms necessary to remedy the structural problem of mal-distribution of resources.

An “Islamic” democracy will not embrace all the secular values adopted in the West. However, the initial steps taken toward such an end will need to include a process of institutionalization in Islam. The incorporation of an institutionalized Islam in the process of development will help the cause of democracy should Islamists successfully challenge the hegemony of the traditionalists in both the religious and political arenas. To play the democratic game, religious leaders will have to better organize themselves, to propose alternative plans for socio-economic and political issues facing the country. This in turn can help them maintain legitimacy and popular support, facilitating their struggle for political power. Organization is the key to the success of any group seeking to achieve its goals.

[442] For example, see John L. Esposito and John O. Voll, Islam and Democracy (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1996); Rex Brynen, Bahgat Korany, and Paul Noble (eds.), Political Liberalization and Democratization in the Arab World: Theoretical Perspectives, Vol. 1 (Boulder: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 1995); John L. Esposito (ed.), Political Islam: Revolution, Radicalism, or Reform? (Boulder: Lynne Rienner, 1997).

[443] For a brief overview of Orientalist and neo-Orientalist views, see Yahya Sadowski, “The New Orientalism and the Democracy Debate,” Middle East Report, Vol. 23, No. 4 (July-August 1993), pp. 14—21. See also Ali R. Abootalebi, “Democratization in Developing Countries: 1980—1989,” Journal of Developing Areas, Vol. 29, No. 4 (July 1995), pp. 507–530.

[444] The often contradictory ideological and political posturing by both “moderate” and “conservative” religious leaders in post-Khatami Iran stands as a clear example. The conservative and moderate religious ‘ulama, as well as secular and religious democrats, continue to hold inconsistent views on issues with important religious and national implications. For example, even Ayatollah Khamene’i and conservatives in Parliament have not seriously resisted the increasing role of women in politics, society and the economy, despite their orthodox views of women.

[445] The difference between traditionalism/fundamentalism and Islamism is in their views of Islam’s relation to the state, society, and the economy. Admittedly, the classification of religious leaders into these two broad categories may not suit everyone, but for the general purpose of this study this classification should be sufficient. Others have made a similar distinction between fundamentalists and Islamists. See Robin Wright, “Islam, Democracy and the West,” Foreign Affairs, Vol. 71, No. 3 (Summer 1992), pp. 131—145.

[446] Robin Wright, “Islam, Democracy, and the West,” p. 144.

[447] Dr. Yazdi, a university professor and political activist who served as deputy prime minister and foreign minister under the Ayatollah Khomeini, is now Secretary General in the opposition political party the Liberation Movement of Iran. The status of the Liberation Movement of Iran as opposition party must be viewed with caution, since officially no political parties exist in the Islamic Republic of Iran. See interview conducted by Geoffrey Kemp, “A Seminar with Ibrahim Yazdi,” Middle East Policy, Vol. 3, No. 4 (April 1995), pp. 15—28; quote from p. 16. On December 7, 1998, however, a new party was established by the supporters of President Khatami, called the “Islamic Iran Participation Front.” The Islamic Revolution Tribunal officially banned the Liberation Movement of Iran party on the eve of the Iranian New Year in March 2001 as part of its ongoing crackdown on religious-nationalist leaders that began in summer 2000.

[448] For reformists’ views on the role of Shi’ite ‘ulama in Islam and Shari’a, see a collection of articles and speeches by leading Iranian reformists, including, among others, Abd al-Karim Soroush, Mohsen Kadviar, and Hasan Yusefi Eshkevari, organized by the Islamic Engineers Association and delivered in a seminar in Tehran, in: Islamic Engineers Association, Din va Hukumat (Religion and Governance), (Tehran: Rasa, 1378 [2000]).

[449] Quoted in John L. Esposito and James P. Piscatori, “Democratization and Islam,” Middle EastJournal, Vol. 45, No. 3 (Summer 1991), pp. 427—440. See also Abul A’la Mawdudi, “A Political Theory of Islam,” in John Donohue and John Esposito (eds.), Islam in Transition: Muslim Perspectives (New York: Oxford University Press, 1982), pp. 253—254.

[450] Quoted in Esposito and Piscatori, “Democratization and Islam,” p. 436. For more on Qutb’s views on Islam, see John L. Esposito (ed.), Voices of Resurgent Islam (New York: Oxford University Press, 1983).

[451] Both Sunni and Shi’ite ‘ulama accept the authority of Sunna, although there are some differences in interpretation and the significance of the Prophet’s Sunna. The Shi’ite ‘ulama also rely on the traditions of the Imams, “the rightful heirs of the Prophet,” the last of whom, the Mahdi, remains hidden until his return to rule the Earth.

[452] On this and related issues, see Sami Zubaida, Islam: The People and the State: Political Ideas and Movements in the Middle East (London: I. B. Tauris, 1993).

[453] For a discussion of Islam, Muslims, secularization, and democracy, see Abdou Filali-Ansary, “The Challenge of Secularization,” Journal of Democracy, Vol. 7, No. 2 (1996), pp. 76–80.

[454] Fazlur Rahman, Islam and Modernity: Transformation of an Intellectual Tradition (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1982), p. 32. Cited in Filali-Ansary, “The Challenge of Secularization,” p. 23.

[455] For a recent discussion of various Islamic concepts with implications for democracy (for example, tawhid, shura, khilafa, etc.), see John L. Esposito and John O. Voll, Islam and Democracy (New York: Oxford University Press, 1996).

[456] As’ad Abukhalil, “The Incoherence of Islamic Fundamentalism,” Middle East Journal, Vol. 48, No. 4 (Autumn 1994), pp. 677–694.

[457] Robin Wright, “Islam, Democracy and the West,” p. 131. Wright believes that this second phase of the Islamist movement is marked by a different constituency as well.

[458] Wright, “Islam, Democracy, and the West,” p. 132.

[459] See Simon Bromley, Rethinking Middle East Politics (Austin: University of Texas Press, 1994).

[460] The Quran (N. J. Dawood, trans., New York: Penguin, 1993), Surah (chapter) 10, Aya (verse) 108.

[461] The Quran (Dawood, trans.), Surah 38, Aya 26.

[462] Geoffrey Kemp interview with Ibrahim Yazdi, “A Seminar with Ibrahim Yazdi,” p. 18. Yazdi claims his interpretation of shura is correct, based on years of debate among Muslim scholars such as Rashid Reza, Maulana Maududi, Ali Shariati, Ayatollah Naini, Mehdi Bazargan, Ayatollah Taligani, and Ayatollah Mutahhari.

[463] Quoted in Louis J. Cantori and Arthur Lowrie, “Islam, Democracy, the State, and the West,” Middle East Policy, Vol. 1, No. 3 (1992), pp. 49–61.

[464] Cantori and Lowrie, “Islam, Democracy, the State, and the West,” p. 58.

[465] Cantori and Lowrie, “Islam, Democracy, the State, and the West,” p. 54.

[466] M. Hakan Yavuz, “Search for a New Social Contract in Turkey: Fethullah Gulen, the Virtue Party and the Kurds,” SAIS Review, Vol. 19, No. 1 (1999), p. 120. On Nursi’s ideas on democracy, See Said Nursi, Risale-I Kulliyat I-II (Istanbul: Yeni Asya Yayinlari, 1996).

[467] M. Hakan Yavuz, “Search for a New Social Contract in Turkey, “ p. 120.

[468] Esposito and Voll, Islam and Democracy, p. 31.

[469] See for example the article by Emmanuel Sivan for the Social Science Research Council project on Civil Society in the Middle East, entitled “The Islamic Resurgence: Civil Society Strikes Back,” Journal of Contemporary History, Vol. 25, (1990), pp. 353— 364. See also Michael C. Hudson, “After the Gulf War: Prospects for Democratization in the Arab World,” Middle East Journal, Vol. 45, No. 3 (Summer 1991), pp. 407—426; Esposito and Piscatori, “Democratization and Islam,” pp. 427^40.

[470] Yahya Sadowski, “The New Orientalism and the Democracy Debate,” Middle East Report, Vol. 23, No. 4 (July-August 1993), pp. 14—21; quote from p. 17.

[471] Richard Augustus Norton and Farhard Kazemi (eds.), Civil Society in the Middle East, Vol. 2, (New York: Brill, 1996), p. 8.

[472] National elections have been held since 1980 in Algeria, Bahrain, Egypt, Iran, Iraq, Israel, Jordan, Kuwait, Lebanon, Libya, Morocco, Oman, Saudi Arabia, the Sudan, Syria, Tunisia, Turkey, and Yemen, as well as in the Palestinian territories. For a discussion of elections and electoral laws in the Arab world, see Marsha Pripstein Posusney, “Behind the Ballot Box: Electoral Engineering in the Arab World,” Middle East Report, Vol. 28, No. 4 (Winter 1998), pp. 12–16.

[473] See Carrie Rosefsky Wickham’s analysis of the case of Egypt, “Beyond Democratization: Political Change in the Arab World,” PS: Political Science and Politics, Vol. 17, No. 3 (September 1994), p. 507.

[474] Michael Hudson, “After the Gulf War,” pp. 427–440.

[475] On ‘patriarchalism’ and ‘patrimonialism,’ see Max Weber, The Theory of Social and Economic Organization (New York: Oxford University Press, 1947); and Reinhard Bendix, Max Weber: An Intellectual Portrait (Garden City: Doubleday, 1962), pp. 330360. For patterns of patrimonialism in the Middle East, see James Bill and Robert Springborg, Politics in the Middle East, 4th ed. (New York: Longman, 2000).

[476] From a lecture by Shaykh Rachid al-Ghannouchi, Chatham House, London, May 9, 1995, in Robin Wright, “Two Visions of Reformism,” Journal ofDemocracy, Vol. 7, No. 2 (April 1996), p. 74.

[477] Mohamed Elhachmi Hamdi, “The Limits of the Western Model,” Journal of Democracy, Vol. 7, No. 2 (April 1996), p. 85.

[478] Robin Wright, “Two Visions of Reformism,” p. 73.

[479] Soroush expressed his views in one of several interviews in Tehran and Washington, D.C., in 1994 and 1995, quoted by Robin Wright “Two Visions,” p. 68. For more on Soroush’s views, see Din va Hukumat (Religion and Governance), 1378 (2000).

[480] Wright, “Two Visions,” p. 70.

[481] Abdou Filali-Ansary, “The Challenge of Secularization,” p. 78.

[482] Ali Mazrui et al., “Preamble,” of Muslim Democrat, Vol. 1, No. 1 (Burtonsville, MD: Center for the Study of Islam and Democracy, May 1999), p. 4.

[483] On the role of groups and associations in the Middle East, see Bill and Springborg, Politics in the Middle East, p. 88.

[484] Samuel Huntington, “Will More Countries Become Democratic?” Political Science Quarterly, Vol. 99 (Summer 1994), pp. 193–218.

[485] The writings of Hasan Turabi, Mehdi Bazargan, Ali Yazdi, and Abd al-Karim Soroush, as well as the late Ayatollah Taleqani, are some examples. Mehdi Bazargan, for example, in response to Samuel Huntington's assertion of "the clash of civilizations," commented, before his death, on the positive relationship between Islam and individual rights, peaceful coexistence with non-Muslims, economic development, freedom of action, and democracy. See Mehdi Bazargan, "Is Islam a Global Threat?" (Aya Islam yek khatar-i Jahani Ast?), Rahavard, No. 36 (Tir 1373 [1994]), pp. 48—57.

[486] Laith Kubba, "Recognizing Pluralism," Journal of Democracy, Vol. 7, No. 2 (April 1996), p. 88.

[487] Jerrold Green, Civil Society and the Prospects for Political Reform in the Middle East (New York University Press, 1994), p. 13. The conference was sponsored by the Civil Society in the Middle East Project, convened at the Aspen Institute Wye Conference, Queenstown, Md., Sept. 30—Oct. 1, 1994. Green was among the minority who advocated inclusion without reservation if commanded by popular will, but others such as Graham Fuller and Richard Norton have mixed feelings and more reservations about the inclusion of Islamists in the process of democratization.

 11. Mediating Middle East Conflicts: An Alternative Approach

George E. Irani

Many Middle Eastern scholars and practitioners trained in the United States have returned to their countries of origin, ready to impart what they learned about Western conflict resolution techniques. But, in Lebanon, Jordan, Egypt, and other countries in the region, the reaching and practice of conflict resolution is still a novel phenomenon. Conflict resolution is viewed by many in the Middle East as a false Western panacea that is insensitive to indigenous problems, needs, and political processes. Others see it as a U.S.-concocted scheme intended primarily to facilitate and hasten the processes of peace and normalization between Israel and its Arab neighbors.[488]

In assessing the applicability of Western-based conflict resolution models to non-Western societies, professionals have only begun to realize the importance of acknowledging native ways of thinking and feeling, as well as local rituals for managing and reducing conflicts. As a region with a long history of conflict and Western intervention and mediation, the Middle East makes an interesting case study for students of conflict resolution. Western-style peace-making in the region has been rather superficial. Diplomatic agreements have not “trickled down” to the grassroots precisely because Western mediation models have not taken into account the deep cultural, social, and religious roots that underlie the way Arabs behave when it comes to conflict reduction and reconciliation.

This chapter will discuss Arab-Islamic modes of conflict reduction as an alternative to Western techniques in the Middle East, with a focus on Lebanon.[489] In contrast to U.S.-style mediation, local rites of reconciliation take into consideration the socioeconomic, cultural, and anthropological background in which conflicts erupt and are managed in the Middle East. They also factor in religious beliefs and traditions, and distinguish among different causes and types of conflicts such as family, community, and state conflicts, in mediating disputes.

The first section of this chapter looks at Western and non-Western approaches to conflict resolution and points to important cultural differences in approaching conflict management, including the role of the individual in society, attitudes towards conflict, styles of communication, expectations of mediators, understandings concerning victimization and forgiveness, and the usefulness of governmental (and/or non-governmental) programs and institutions—such as truth commissions—for national reconciliation. The second section considers the geographical, sociological, and cultural influences on the Arab Middle East. It highlights the importance of relationships based on family, patriarchy, gender, kinship, and clientism, and points to the underlying code of honor (and its counterpart, shame) in conflict and conflict management. The third part considers the concept of ritual and its role in conflict control and reduction (as opposed to conflict resolution) and focuses on the rituals of sulh and musalaha as examples of indigenous Arab modes of settling disputes. The final section considers the implications for policymakers and practitioners and suggests an alternative approach to national reconciliation in Lebanon.

Although conflict is a human universal norm, the nature of conflicts and the methods of resolving them differ from one sociocultural context to another. For instance, in contemporary North America, conflict is commonly perceived to occur between two or more individuals acting as free agents pursuing their own interests. Conflict is often thought of as a symptom of the need for change, and while it can lead to separation, hostility, civil strife, terrorism, and war, it can also stimulate dialogue and produce more socially just solutions. In addition, it can lead to stronger relationships and peace.[490]

A basic assumption made by U.S.-based conflict resolution theorists is that conflict can and should be fully resolved.[491] This philosophy, whereby virtually every conflict can be managed or resolved, clashes with other cultural approaches to conflict.[492] Many conflicts, regardless of their nature, may be intractable, and can evolve through phases of escalation and confrontation as well as phases of calm and a return to the status quo. For this reason, this chapter adopts the idea of conflict control and reduction to depict the processes of settlement and reconciliation in the Arab-Islamic tradition, rather than conflict resolution.

Another basic assumption is that conflict usually erupts because of different interpretations regarding data, issues, values, interests, and relationships.[493] According to the prominent anthropologist Laura Nader: “Conflict results from competition between at least two parties. A party may be a person, a family, a lineage, or a whole community; or it may be a class of ideas, a political organization, a tribe, or a religion. Conflict is occasioned by incompatible desires or aims and by its duration may be distinguished from strife or angry disputes arising from momentary aggravations.”[494]

Conflict in Western perspectives is also viewed as having a positive dimension, acting as a catharsis to redefine relationships between individuals, groups, and nations. Such a perception makes it easier to find adequate settlements or possible resolutions.

During the last ten years, more and more voices within the field of conflict resolution have emphasized the importance of acknowledgment and forgiveness in achieving lasting reconciliation among conflicting parties. Many of the world's most intractable conflicts involve age-old cycles of oppression, victimization, and revenge. Racism and ethnic cleansing are only the most dramatic manifestations of such cycles.

These cyclical conflicts, which can have dangerous and long-lasting political repercussions, are rooted in a psychological dynamic of victimization. Usually, acts of violence, whether inflicted on an individual or a group, are the results of deep feelings of being victimized, regardless of who is the victim or victimizer. One of the guiding principles of U.S.-inspired conflict management and resolution is to help conflicting parties acknowledge one another's psychological concerns and needs so that they will be able to overcome their historic sense of victimization.[495] Overcoming feelings of victimization, which, unfortunately, are endemic to the human condition, is the most important step toward healing in the case of nations and ethnic groups in conflict.

According to Western psychologists, conflict usually erupts because some basic needs have not been fulfilled, such as the needs for shelter, food, selfesteem, love, knowledge, and self-actualization.[496] Indeed, the nonfulfillment of these needs may eventually lead to war if the conflict is not resolved. Conflicting parties must actively listen to each other to be able to mutually acknowledge each other's emotions, views, and needs. Thus, communication skills are fundamental to conflict resolution. In many cultures, the art of listening is drowned out by arguments and the never-ending struggle to get one's point across first. The opposite of listening is not ignoring; rather, it is preparing to respond. Active listening is a method that ensures that the whole meaning of what was said is understood.

Actively listening to all sides of a dispute is a specialty of mediators, who are often employed in Western conflict resolution. The mediator confronts two basic tasks when settling a dispute. First, he or she has to encourage people to negotiate in such a way as to reach an equitable outcome. Second, he or she has to be completely neutral and place the power of decision-making in the hands of the conflicting individuals or groups themselves. Negotiation is another important Western tool. ‘Interest-based’ negotiation focuses on people’s long-term interests, rather than on short-term perspectives, and does not encourage ‘hard’ or ‘soft’ bargaining (such as occurs when one of the parties has to give in or compromise), which usually leads to unsatisfactory ‘positional’ compromises.[497]

Truth and justice commissions have also emerged as popular Western means of national healing. Following the collapse of various dictatorial regimes in Latin America and Central Europe (for example, Chile, Argentina, Brazil, East Germany, Czechoslovakia, and Poland), such commissions were formed to “police the past”—that is, to investigate the extent of human rights violations committed against civilians by the former military juntas and communist governments. These efforts encouraged atonement and remorse for past crimes, which, in turn, helped citizens and governments alike to rebuild democratic institutions. A similar commission was also established in South Africa following the dismantling of apartheid and the election of Nelson Mandela as president.

Lebanon shares some of the problems affecting societies in transition, though it should be noted that the country is not fully sovereign. In April 1994, as a contribution to the ongoing efforts at intercommunal reconciliation in postwar Lebanon, the Lebanese American University assembled on its Byblos campus a group of government officials, NGO activists, students, and lawyers for a three- day conference titled “Acknowledgment, Forgiveness, and Reconciliation: Alternative Approaches to Conflict Resolution in Post-War Lebanon.”[498] The conference focused primarily on the psychological and interpersonal aspects of the Lebanese war, especially the politics of identity and the vicious circle of victimization and vengeance that fueled the long conflict.

Conference participants were initially uncomfortable with and suspicious of Western conflict resolution theory and methods. Participants expressed mixed feelings about the applicability of conflict resolution in the Lebanese social context. A U.S.-educated Christian banker noted that conflict resolution theory was initially forged in labor-management relations in the United States, later applied to business, and then to community relations and academia. He raised an important methodological question: “How can a theory which is supposed to be dealing with definite, programmed, institutionalized relationships deal with the unprogrammed, informal, and random relationships characteristic of social and political contexts in a totally different society?”

A Muslim academic and social activist declared that a better concept would be “conflict management” because “it is impossible completely to solve conflicts; the existence of conflicts goes together with human existence.” He raised the point that conflicts were interrelated: the resolution of one conflict was contingent upon the resolution of other conflicts. “The crisis of Lebanon and the Middle East are the best proof of what I am saying,” he concluded. [499]

The conference also revealed interesting insights into Lebanese conversational culture. The National Director of the Young Women’s Christian Association-Leba- non (YWCA) commented that in Lebanon, when individuals are engaged in “heart-to-heart” conversations, they often interrupt with expressions of empathy and support. “It is not like interrupting rudely. The process of the discussion shows our concern because we are a very emotional people. That is the problem: we usually talk all together. We are active talkers and active listeners!”

While active listening involves remaining silent when the other person is talking, especially in cases of intense argument, in Lebanon, remaining silent is sometimes interpreted as meek acquiescence or agreement. A government representative from the Ministry of Education stated that “in the rural areas of Lebanon, if you do not talk, it means you are dull; the more you talk, the more it is assumed you know. People want to show that they know, especially those who go to town and come back to the village. They always talk.”

The conference also addressed the key role of third-party mediators in disputes. In Lebanese culture, as in Arab culture in general, the mediator is presumed to have all the answers and solutions. He therefore has a great deal of power and responsibility. As one participant put it: “If [the third party] does not provide the answers, he or she is not really respected or considered to be legitimate.” Finally, a number of conference participants expressed their expectations that conference organizers and facilitators would provide ready-made solutions to Lebanon’s woes. This expectation was not unusual in the context of Lebanese culture and politics.

For several centuries, politics in Lebanon have been repeatedly penetrated by outside powers, either to foment strife or to impose solutions. The phenomenon of relying on outsiders for answers and solutions reveals one of the fundamental blind spots in Lebanese political thought: a lack of responsibility for one’s actions and behaviors. At a more practical level, many Lebanese have opted to forget about the war and get on with their lives, even if the wounds and consequences of the war are still very much alive in the collective and individual Lebanese psyches.

If the role of the individual is crucial in Western theory, Lebanon is at a disadvantage. A Lebanese woman educator, while acknowledging the value of the Western concepts of acknowledgment, victimization, communication skills, and interest-based negotiation, pointed out that Western conflict resolution tools in the Lebanese context are hindered by the paradox that Lebanon is a “very individualistic society, but unfortunately, we do not have individuals.” She went on to explain that “in order to have conflict management or conflict resolution, you have to recognize the other. But, you do not have the other if you do not have the individual. That is why there is no reconciliation, forgiveness, and conflict resolution [in Lebanon]. The existence of the individual is essential in this process.”

This trenchant observation neatly summarizes the state of society in postwar Lebanon. Rather than a cohesive group of individuals bound together by an agreed-upon set of rights and obligations, (that is, citizens), the Lebanese instead comprise an agglomeration of competing communities, each of which requires absolute allegiance and obedience from its members. Every one of these communities feels victimized by the others, so the process of acknowledgment, forgiveness, and reconciliation has to begin at the community level, rather than at the individual level.

The conference also addressed the issue of government accountability for crimes committed during the Lebanese war. In Lebanon’s case, the state’s apparatus was noticeably absent during the long civil war. Thus, the central government and its institutions bear little, if any, direct responsibility for the atrocities committed between 1975 and 1990. Instituting war tribunals or truth and justice commissions in postwar Lebanon without some form of external, third- party intervention would undoubtedly be perceived as an affront by one community against another.[500]

It is important to understand the sociopolitical, cultural, and historical background of the Middle East in order to comprehend why conflict continues to plague the region. The influences shaping the characters and views of the conflicting parties must be considered if any resolution is to have a lasting effect.

Geography impacts people’s behavior and interactions in terms of protection of scarce resources. The Arab Middle East is distinguished geographically by a variety of landscapes. The Arabian Peninsula is characterized by a large desert and other arid landscapes, and a scarcity of water. In the Levant, environmental conditions are more clement. Jordan and some areas of Israel are semiarid and poor in water while Lebanon and Syria are blessed with milder climates and numerous springs and rivers. Lebanon has a rugged mountainous terrain but also the fertile Biqa’a Valley and is self-sufficient in water.

The reality of Middle East ecology historically resulted in three key modes of subsistence: nomadic, village, and urban. Although communities of pastoral nomads, village farmers, and city-dwelling merchants and artisans were historically distinct from one another, they were nonetheless economically interdependent. Their lives and interests were always in actual or potential contact, and quite often in conflict. Although pastoral nomadism has become increasingly rare as a viable mode of subsistence due to the advent of nation-states with closed borders and the rapid and dramatic urbanization of the region’s population, nomadic peoples and their traditions have nonetheless left a very deep imprint on Middle Eastern culture, society, and politics. One anthropologist hypothesizes that the characteristic form of pastoral nomadism that developed in this semiarid zone accounts for the strikingly similar cultural orientations found throughout the vast area of the Middle East:

<quote>

In the Near East today we find a remarkable similarity among the traditions of many people throughout a large region Islamization, the spread of a religious faith, is often offered as an explanation for this uniformity. But could Islam by itself have become so deeply-rooted among the diverse peoples of such a vast area, unless it was somehow a response to a life experience which all of these people shared in common? ... Extreme arid conditions resulted in independent little herding groups dispersed across the desert and steppe This situation is reflected in the atomistic form which political alliances tended to take.[501]

</quote>

Kinship ties are key to understanding social and political behavior in the Middle East. Despite the creation of modern states following the collapse of colonial rule, the basic unit of identification for the individual is not the state, the ethnic group, or the professional association, but the family.

Sociologically, the peoples of the Middle East remain famous for their loyalty to their families, distinctive rituals of hospitality and conflict mediation, and effective and flexible kin-based collectivities, such as the lineage and the tribe, which until quite recently performed most of the social, economic, and political functions of communities in the absence of centralized state governments.[502]

Patriarchal decision-making plays a powerful role in Middle Eastern family dynamics.[503] The father’s supremacy in his family is an integral part of the more general authority system and maintains not only the genealogical cohesiveness of the family but also the cohesiveness of social life. This patriarchal pattern of power takes shape in the primacy of the za’im (leader) of the family. The za’im controls and defends the unity of the family both inside and outside of the group and acts as the family referee, managing conflicts that erupt within his family, while controlling solidarity and support between family members. He also acts as the family’s ambassador toward outsiders. Each family in a given village is headed by a za’im, who collectively form the assembly of the village zu’ama’.[504]

Several writers on the Arab Middle East have underlined the fact that the only nation-state in the contemporary Arab Middle East is Egypt.[505] Egypt has an homogeneous population that identifies itself first and foremost as Egyptian. The only sizeable ‘minority,’ the Copts, who number about 6 million, consider themselves to be the descendants of the original Egyptians from Pharaonic times. Their allegiance is to Egypt as both government and country.

In Saudi Arabia, on the other hand, a family—the House of Sa’ud—dominates the body politic, as is the case in the other shaykhdoms of the Arabian Gulf. In Syria and Iraq, families from minority communities rule their respective societies.[506] Since Lebanon obtained independence in 1943, it has been ruled by a few prominent families—both Christian and Muslim—such as the Maronite Catholic Gemayel and Chamoun families, the Sunni El-Solh and Salam families, and the Druze Jumblatt family. As a strategy for survival, the patrilineal kinship system of the Middle East has certainly proved flexible and effective over many centuries under a variety of social, economic, and political conditions. Kinship is implicit in nearly every aspect of life and most social institutions, including religion and morality.

Religion also plays a very important role in both private and public interactions in the Middle East. The sociocultural and historic environment that saw the birth and spread of the world’s three monotheistic religions—Judaism, Christianity, and Islam—encouraged a close relationship between the private and public in the individual’s life in the Middle East.

In Judaism, the land (eretz), the people (‘am), and the book (torah) cannot be separated. The same applies to Islam, which is a code of conduct, both temporal and spiritual. The Quran dictates the faithfuls’ relations with God and people of other faiths living within the framework of the Islamic nation (umma). Christianity in the Arab world is very similar to Judaism and Islam in defining people’s identities. For example, for some Christians in Lebanon, religious values are superseded by the fight for survival. Religion is thus used in an ethnic sense.[507]

Middle Eastern societies are defined by a variety of ethnic identities. Armenians, Kurds, Jews, Copts, Circassians, and Maronites are only some of the minorities in the contemporary Middle East. The existence of ethnic and ethnoreligious groups predates the rise of Islam and the creation of modern states in the region. In the Quran, “Peoples of the Book” (Christians and Jews) are treated as “protected peoples,” (dhimmis), which literally means those on the conscience (dhimma) of the Islamic community.[508]

Under Ottoman rule, individuals living in the empire did not identify as Ottomans, Turks, Persians, or Arabs, but rather, as Muslims, Christians, Jews, and Druze. The Ottoman administration was controlled by Sunni Muslims and converts from other religions. Under the Ottomans, Islamic tolerance of Christians and Jews was defined by the millet (nations) system. “Under the system local communities of a particular sect were autonomous in the conduct of their spiritual affairs and civil affairs relating closely to religion and community, such as church administration, marriage, inheritance, property, and education.”[509]

Ethnic groups thus identified with their religious leaders more so than with any abstract notion of the state. The millet system estranged Arab Christians from political life and deepened suspicions between them and Muslims, a legacy that eventually exploded in Lebanon. Christians were treated as foreigners and suspected of being agents of foreign powers; their loyalty was often in doubt. After the fall of the Ottoman Empire and in reaction to their plight, Middle Eastern Christians were at the forefront of the new movement for Arab nationalism, the secular movement in the Arab world, and some among them founded socialist parties, such as the Ba’th (Renaissance) Party now in power in Syria and Iraq.

Political scientist Bassam Tibi notes that:

<quote>

unlike the imperial and the territorial dynastic states that were familiar in Middle Eastern history, the externally imposed new pattern of the nationstate is defined as a national, not as a communal, polity In varying degrees, all states of the Middle East lack this infrastructure In most of the states of the Middle East, sovereignty is nominal.

</quote>

<quote>

The tribal-ethnic and sectarian conflicts that the colonial powers exacerbated did not end with the attainment of independence. The newly established nation-states have failed to cope with the social and economic problems created by rapid development because they cannot provide the proper institutions to alleviate these problems. Because the nominal nation-state has not met the challenge, society has resorted to its pre-national ties as a solution, thereby preserving the framework of the patron-client relationship. [510]

</quote>

Social relationships in the contemporary Middle East thus require a melting of the individual’s identity and personality within the framework of his communal group. A Maronite Catholic in Lebanon belongs to his community from birth to death whether he or she likes it or not. In addition, the confessional system, which is pervasive in Lebanon and other countries in the Middle East, means that the individual citizen must be part of a patronage network. Although patron-client relations “play an important role in facilitating the distribution of goods and services among the population and harnessing popular support behind leaders," patronage ties are essentially asymmetrical: perpetuating these relationships also perpetuates and reinforces the unequal power structure in the starkly stratified societies of the contemporary Middle East.

Patron-client ties ensure that people are kept 'in their place': the rich and powerful maintain their dominant positions, from which they have the advantage of becoming even more rich and powerful, while the less fortunate are kept in their position of dependency, remaining virtually powerless over the decisionmaking processes and larger forces that shape their lives.

Clientelism and the absence of citizenship in the Western sense have profound implications for reconciliation and processes of conflict reduction in the Middle East. Private justice is meted out through a network in which political and/or religious leaders determine the outcome of feuds between clans or conflicts between individuals. Notions of honor and shame also play a key role in this context. Most of the blood feuds among Lebanese, Jordanians, and Palestinians originate from incidents where family honor has been harmed. Usually, women are the direct victims of such tragedies. More and more Arab women are struggling to lessen the impact of honor crimes and fight for the abolition of this feudal tradition.[511]

British sociologist Anthony Giddens wrote that rituals are crucial to both an individual's emotional well-being and communal harmony and social integration:

<quote>

Without ordered ritual and collective involvement, individuals are left without structured ways of coping with tensions and anxieties Communal rites provide a focus for group solidarity at major transitions as well as allocating definite tasks for those involved Something profound is lost together with traditional forms of ritual Traditional ritual ... connected individual action to moral frameworks and to elemental questions about human existence. The loss of ritual is also the loss of such frameworks.[512]

</quote>

This very important observation brings to the fore the malaise that exists in Western society, where anomie and atomistic modes of living have relegated customs and rituals to the trash heap of premodern, nonrational history. In contrast to the family-oriented culture of the Middle East, the individual must fend for himself or herself in Western civilization. In conflicts, individuals in Western societies usually turn to an attorney or a therapist. The family is an alien entity, and alienation leads to violence and despair.

For a country emerging from 16 years of civil strife, priorities do not include training for conflict control and reduction. In Lebanon and other Arab societies, conflict resolution techniques are learned and adopted by professional groups such as businessmen or businesswomen, bankers, or engineers. For the rest of the population, conflict control is handled either by state-controlled courts or by traditional means.

In this context, one of the basic criticisms launched against Western conflict resolution techniques is that they are either too mechanistic or based on therapy- oriented formulas. Although Western methods and skills are relevant and useful, they need to be adapted to indigenous realities.

For instance, the role of social workers in family disputes is not the same in Lebanon as it is in the West. In Lebanon, the majority of social workers are women. They are trained in Lebanon’s major academic institutions, the state-controlled Lebanese University and the Jesuit-controlled Universite Saint-Joseph, and once their degree is completed, they confront the realities of Lebanese society. In conflicts involving couples, they are usually approached by battered wives; husbands, however, often refuse to deal with the social worker. The path to resolution thus goes through the local religious or political za’im, not through the social worker, a typical pattern in patriarchal societies.

Another issue facing social workers attempting to mediate conflicts in Lebanon is child custody matters. In Middle Eastern societies, in the case of divorce, the father is granted custody of the children. In the instances when mothers try to keep their children, the young ones become hostages in a conflict that pits their father's family against their mother.

These examples highlight the problem with applying Western modes of conflict control and reduction in communally-based societies where patriarchy and religious values are paramount. Arab 'citizens' are not citizens in the Western meaning of individuals bound to one another and the state by an agreed-upon interlocking system of rights and duties. Instead, Arabs belong to communities and abide by their rules and rituals. Of course, there are many young professionals and educated men and women who are struggling to establish secular societies based on individual rights and responsibilities and state accountability. But Arab society is still largely traditional.

In large Arab cities, individuals involved in conflicts are more likely than are villagers to resort to the official legal system to settle their disputes. The legal system, however, is clogged and corruption is pervasive. Moreover, the interpretation of the rule of law in sectarian-based societies or societies based on tribal modes of social interaction has a different meaning. The law is usually that of the powerful and the wealthy (politicians and clergy) or heads of village clans or Bedouin tribes.[513]

The rule of law also has to confront the prevalent and powerful influence of patronage and its strong emphasis on asymmetrical power relationships. For example, an individual who has committed a crime can face both the legal justice system and the tribal mode of conflict control and reduction.

This situation underlines the importance of studying closely modes of reconciliation and conflict control in an Arab-Islamic environment. The observer interested in conflict control and reduction in non-Western societies has to look into the rituals that inform individual and community behavior following a crime or any other illegal action.

Among some Middle Easterners, such as the Lebanese, Jordanians, and Palestinians, rituals are used in private modes of conflict control and reduction. Private modes are processes not controlled by the state whereby customary, traditional steps are taken to restore justice. Sometimes, both private and official justice are invoked simultaneously in fostering reconciliation.

One such ritual is the process of sulh (settlement) and musalaha (reconciliation). According to Islamic law (Shari'a), "the purpose of sulh is to end conflict and hostility among believers so that they may conduct their relationships in peace and amity..... In Islamic law, sulh is a form of contract ('aqd), legally binding on both the individual and community levels."[514] Similar to the private sulh between two believers, "the purpose of [public] sulh is to suspend fighting between [two parties] and establish peace, called mawwada (peace or gentle relationship), for a specific period of time."[515]

The sulh ritual, an institutionalized form of conflict management and control, has its origins in tribal and village contexts. "The sulh ritual stresses the close link between the psychological and political dimensions of communal life through its recognition that injuries between individuals and groups will fester and expand if not acknowledged, repaired, forgiven and transcended."[516]

"Sulh is the best of judgments." This is how the Jordanian Bedouin tribes describe the customary process of settlement and reconciliation. Indeed, given the severity of life conditions in the desert, competing tribes long ago realized that sulh is a better alternative to endless cycles of vengeance.

The judicial system in Lebanon does not include sulh as part of the conflict control process, but sulh rituals are approved and encouraged in rural areas where state control is not very strong. Sulh is used today in the rural areas of the Biqa'a Valley, the Hermel area in eastern Lebanon, and the 'Akkar region of north Lebanon.[517] In Jordan, sulh is officially recognized by the Jordanian government as a legally acceptable tradition of the Bedouin tribes. And, in Israel, sulh is still used among the Israeli Arabs living in the villages of Galilee.

The Jordanian judge Muhammad Abu-Hassan makes a distinction between public sulh and private sulh. Public sulh is similar to a peace treaty between two countries. It usually takes place as a result of conflicts between two or more tribes which result in death and destruction affecting all the parties involved.[518] In a conflict, each of the tribes involved takes stock of its human and material losses. The tribe with minimum losses compensates the tribe that suffered most, and so on. Tradition has it that stringent conditions are set to settle the tribal conflict definitively. The most famous of these conditions is that the parties in conflict pledge to forget everything that happened and initiate new and friendly relations. The consequences and effects of public sulh apply whether the guilty party was identified or was unknown at the time of the sulh.

Private sulh takes place when both the crime and the guilty party are known. The parties may be of the same tribe or from different tribes. The purpose of private sulh is to make sure that revenge will not take place against the family of the perpetrator.

There are two possible final outcomes of the sulh process: total sulh, or partial or conditional sulh. The former type ends all kinds of conflict between the two parties, who decide thenceforth not to hold any grudges against each other. The latter type ends the conflict between the two parties according to conditions agreed upon during the settlement process.

Consider a brief sketch of how the ritual of settlement and reconciliation is used in the Middle East. Following a murder, the family of the murderer, in order to thwart any attempt at blood revenge, calls on a delegation of mediators comprised of village elders and notables, usually called muslihs or jaha (those who have gained the esteem of the community). The mediators initiate a process of fact-finding, questioning the parties involved. As soon as the family of the guilty party calls for the mediators' intervention, a hudna (truce) is declared. The task of the muslihs or jaha is not to judge, punish, or condemn the offending party, "but rather, to preserve the good names of both the families involved and to reaffirm the necessity of ongoing relationships within the community. The sulh ritual is not a zero-sum game."[519]

To many practitioners of sulh and musalaha, the toughest cases to settle are usually those involving blood feuds. Sometimes, a blood price is paid to the family of the victim that usually involves an amount of money set by the mediators. The diyya (blood money) or an exchange of goods (sometimes including animals, food, etc.) substitutes for the exchange of death.

The ritual sulh process usually ends in a public ceremony of musalaha (reconciliation) performed in the village square. The families of both the victim and the guilty party line up on both sides of the road and exchange greetings and accept apologies, especially the aggrieved party.

The musalaha ceremony includes four major stages. First comes the act of reconciliation itself, then the two parties shake hands under the supervision of the muslihs or jaha. Next, the family of the murderer visits the home of the victim to drink a cup of bitter coffee, and finally, the ritual concludes with a meal hosted by the family of the offender. The rituals vary in different places but the basic philosophy is based on sulh (settlement), musalaha (reconciliation), musafaha (hand-shaking), and mumalaha ("partaking of salt and bread—that is, breaking bread together).[520]

The Quran is a very important source to understand modes of conflict control and reconciliation in Arab-Islamic societies. The holy book of Islam calls for equity in cases of revenge and for forgiveness in cases of apology and "remission." In the first chapter of the Quran, the Prophet Muhammad describes the extent and limits of punishment (qisas) and retribution:

<quote>

O ye who believe!

</quote>

<quote>

The law of equality Is prescribed to you In cases of murder: The free for the free, The slave for the slave, The woman for the woman. But if any remission Is made by the brother Of the slain, then grant Any reasonable demand, And compensate him With handsome gratitude. This is a concession And a Mercy

</quote>

<quote>

From your Lord[521]

</quote>

Many of the ethnoreligious conflicts that have emerged over the past ten years are based on centuries-old feelings of victimization and powerlessness. Considering the role of power in persuading enemies to settle and resolve their conflicts is crucial for the success or failure of reconciliation efforts. If conflict control and reduction is to succeed in the new global political order, diplomats, policy-makers, and practitioners must first rethink how power is perceived and used.

According to the political philosopher Hannah Arendt, true power has nothing to do with guns, muscles, threats, or dictators:

<quote>

[P]ower is what keeps the public realm, the potential space of appearance between [people] acting and speaking, in existence Power is always ...a power potential and not an unchangeable, measurable and reliable entity like force or strength. While strength is the natural quality of an individual seen in isolation, power springs up between people when they act together and vanishes the moment they disperse. Because of this particularity, which power shares with all potentialities that can only be actualized but never fully materialized, power is to an astonishing degree independent of material factors, either of numbers or means.[522]

</quote>

Empowering victims to help them overcome painful legacies from the past can take place through transformative reconciliation rituals such as sulh and musalaha. “Such rituals readjust individuals and communities to changing aspects of their life-worlds, thereby enabling them to complete difficult and troubling transitions as individuals and as members of a society.”[523]

At the conclusion of the 1994 conference in Lebanon, some participants suggested adapting the ritual of sulh in order to facilitate acknowledgment, apology, and forgiveness at the national, not just communal, level in postwar Lebanon. Ghassan Mokheibar, a prominent Lebanese attorney who has written about traditional reconciliation rituals in Lebanon, has stated that modified processes of sulh and musalaha could play a similar role to that of truth and reconciliation commissions in Latin America and South Africa.

The importance of Arab-Islamic rituals for conflict resolution lies in their communal nature. The problem confronting Western approaches is that the conceptual category of the individual does not have the same validity and importance in the Middle East as it does in Western cultures. In the Middle East, the individual is enmeshed within his or her own group, sect, tribe, or millet. Religion continues to play a crucial role in individual and collective lives.

These and other fundamental features of Middle East society must be taken into consideration when implementing peace processes in the region. Arab states are constructed differently from Western nation-states: the concept of national ‘reconciliation’ must occur within entities that were artificially created after World War II. Further, power in Middle Eastern societies is usually concentrated at the top of the hierarchy, whether in the village za’im or government leaders (presidents, kings, military autocrats). Given the absence of participatory democracy and the pervasiveness of autocratic rule, the population at large cannot be convinced of the desirability of reconciliation unless tangible benefits ensue.

The history of Israeli-Egyptian and Israeli-Palestinian agreements is not encouraging as far as the transformative power of reconciliation is concerned. To the extent that peace has been achieved in these circumstances, it has resulted from military persuasion and economic enticement. At the popular grassroots level, peace is perceived as a deal imposed by a superpower’s need to stabilize a region of the world whose culture and values are unfathomable except through an Orientalist perspective.

Returning to Hannah Arendt’s definition of power, collective empowerment of the community ought to be undertaken in urban, rural, and remote areas alike in coordination with religious and clan leaders, who can pass along a feeling of empowerment to their communities. As long as Palestinians, Egyptians, Lebanese, Jordanians, Syrians, and other Arabs perceive that the peace process is being imposed on them without addressing age-old grievances, the harder reconciliation with Israel will be. The ritual of sulh and musalaha offers an example to follow and adapt.

[488] See Muhammad Abu-Nimer, “Conflict Resolution in an Islamic Context: Some Conceptual Questions,” Peace and Change, Vol. 21, No.1 (January 1996), pp. 22—40.

[489] Many of the Lebanese quoted in this article were participants in the 1994 conference on “Acknowledgment, Forgiveness and Reconciliation: Lessons from Lebanon.”

[490] The author was introduced to conflict resolution and trained to teach and apply its skills by Dr. Merle Lefkoff, an experienced facilitator based in New Mexico.

[491] This worldview is in line with a utilitarian philosophy that pervades intellectual debates in the United States.

[492] For further details, see Paul Salem, “A Critique of Western Conflict Resolution from a non-Western Perspective,” in Paul Salem (ed.), Conflict Resolution in the Arab World (Beirut: American University of Beirut, 1997).

[493] Western processes of conflict resolution range across a continuum that includes situations in which parties have most control (communication, collaboration, and negotiation) to situations where parties have least control (mediation and arbitration).

[494] Laura Nader, “Conflict: Anthropological Aspects,” in David L. Sills, ed. International Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences, Vol. 3 and 4 (New York: The MacMillan Co. and The Free Press, 1968), p. 236.

[495] For further discussion of victimization and its central role in the perpetuation of conflicts, see Joseph V. Montville, “Psychoanalytic Enlightenment and the Greening of Diplomacy,” in Vamik D. Volkan, Joseph V. Montville, and Demetrius A. Julius (eds), The Psychodynamics of International Relations, Vol. 2 (Lexington, Mass.: Lexington Books, 1991).

[496] See Abraham H. Maslow, Motivation and Personality, 3rd ed. (New York and London: Harper and Row, 1987).

[497] In his influential book Getting to Yes, Roger Fisher writes that interest-based negotiation has four basic elements: 1) separate the people from the problem; 2) focus on interests, not positions; 3) invent options for mutual gain; and 4) insist on using objective criteria. For further details, see Roger Fisher and William Ury, Getting to Yes: Negotiating Agreement Without Giving In, 2nd ed. (New York: Penguin Books, 1991).

[498] The author, together with his wife, Laurie E. King-Irani, organized the conference in Lebanon. Funded in part by the U.S. Institute of Peace, this conference was the first organized discussion of the applicability and relevance of acknowledgment, forgiveness, and reconciliation to conflicts in Lebanon and the Middle East.

[499] These comments can be found in George Emile Irani, “Acknowledgment, Forgiveness, and Reconciliation in Conflict Resolution: Perspectives from Lebanon,” in George E. Irani and Laurie E. King-Irani (eds.), Lessons from Lebanon (forthcoming).

[500] As of this writing, only one warlord, Dr. Samir Geagea, head of the Maronite Christian-dominated militia of the “Lebanese Forces” (now dissolved), has been put on trial and is serving a life sentence in jail.

[501] Michael Meeker, Literature and Violence in North Arabia (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1979), p. 7.

[502] For further details see Laurie E. King-Irani, “Kinship, Class and Ethnicity: Strategies for Survival in the Contemporary Middle East,” in Deborah Gerner (ed.), Understanding the Contemporary Middle East (Boulder: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 1999).

[503] A thorough, groundbreaking analysis on the role patriarchy plays in the Middle East can be found in Hisham Sharabi, Neopatriarchy: A Theory of Distorted Change in Arab Society (New York: Oxford University Press, 1988).

[504] Ibid.

[505] For a thorough analysis of Egyptian politics and Arab politics in general, see the work of the Lebanese-American scholar Fouad Ajami, The Arab Predicament: Arab Political Thought and Practice Since 1967 (Cambridge, MA: Cambridge University Press, 1981).

[506] In Iraq, Saddam Hussein and his family, from the Sunni Muslim village of Takrit in north-central Iraq, have dominated Iraqi politics since the early 1970s. The same applies to Syria, where President Bashar al-Assad's minority Alawi community holds all reins of power. Saddam Hussein is grooming his son to take over power as Hafiz al- Assad did in Syria.

[507] See George Irani, The Papacy and the Middle East: The Role of the Holy See in the Arab-Israeli Conflict (Notre Dame: University of Notre Dame Press, 1989).

[508] Regarding the legal status of non-Muslim minorities, see Antoine Fattal, Le Statut Legal des Non-Musulmans en Pays d'Islam (Beirut: Imprimerie Catholique, 1958).

[509] Michael C. Hudson, Arab Politics: The Search for Legitimacy (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1997), p. 58.

[510] Bassam Tibi, "The Simultaneity of the Unsimultaneous: Old Tribes and Imposed Nation-States in the Modern Middle East," in Philip S. Khoury and Joseph Kostiner (eds.), Tribes and State Formation in the Middle East (Berkeley: University of California Pres, 1990), pp. 147–149.

[511] See Hazem al-Ameen, “Beirut: The Arab Women’s Tribunal Symbolized in an Angry Body,” Al-Hayat, March 6, 1998, p. 24.

[512] Anthony Giddens, Modernity and Self-Identity: Self and Society in the Modern Age (Palo Alto: Stanford University Press, 1991), p. 204.

[513] For an excellent analysis of the legal system in the Arab world, see Nathan J. Brown, The Rule of Law in the Arab World (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1997).

[514] M. Khadduri, “Sulh,” in C. E. Bosworth, E. van Donzel, W. P. Heinrichs, and G. Lecomte, The Encyclopedia of Islam, Volume IX (Leiden, Holland: Brill, 1997), pp. 845–846.

[515] Ibid.

[516] Laurie E. King-Irani, “Rituals of Reconciliation and Processes of Empowerment in Post-War Lebanon,” in I. William Zartman (ed.), Traditional Cures for Modern Conflicts: African Conflict Medicine (Boulder: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 1999).

[517] For further details see Nizar Hamzeh, “The Role of Hizbullah in Conflict Management Within Lebanon’s Shia Community,” in Paul Salem (ed.), 1997, op. cit. pp. 93–118.

[518] For further details on Jordanian bedouin rituals of reconciliation, see Mohammad Abu-Hassan, Turath al-Badu al-Qada’i (Bedouin Customary Law) (Amman, Jordan: Manshurat Da’irat al-Thaqafa wa al-Funun, 1987), pp. 257—259.

[519] King-Irani, op. cit.

[520] For further details on the basic principles of sulh as applied in the Galilee, see Elias J. Jabbour, SULHA: Palestinian Traditional Peacemaking Process (Shefar’am, Israel: House of Hope Publications, 1996).

[521] Surah 1:178 in The Holy Qur’an, Text, Translation and Commentary, Abdullah Yusuf ‘Ali New Revised Edition. (Brentwood, Md: Amana Corporation, 1989).

[522] Hannah Arendt, The Human Condition (Chicago: The University of Chicago Press, 1958), pp. 200–201.

[523] King-Irani, op. cit.

 12. Liberal Islam: Prospects and Challenges

Charles Kurzman

Although the focus of research and public perception in the West has been on radical Islamic thought and movements, many Muslims adhere to principles that could be described collectively as “liberal Islam.” This term refers to interpretations of Islam that have a special concern regarding such issues as democracy, separating religion from political involvement, women’s rights, freedom of thought, and promoting human progress. In each case, the argument is that both Muslims and religious piety itself would benefit from reforms and a more open society.[524] These attitudes parallel those of liberalism in other cultures and also of liberal movements in various religious faiths.

It is quite possible that these tendencies will grow more important in the future, perhaps even coming to be the dominant orientation in the years to come. Such a trend could happen because of local factors, modernization and development in Islamic societies, and reasons similar to those that brought about such an evolution in the West.

Liberalism in the Islamic world and liberalism in the West may share common elements, but they are not exactly the same thing. They may both support multireligious coexistence, for example, but go about it in different ways. Within the Islamic discourse, there are three main tropes that I call:

- the “liberal Shari’a”

- the “silent Shari’a”

- the “interpreted Shari’a”

Shari’a is the body of Islamic guidance and precedent that has been handed down from the time of the Prophet Muhammad in seventh-century Arabia.

The ‘liberal Shari’a’ argues that the revelations of the Quran and the practices of the Prophet command Muslims to follow liberal positions. For example, Ali Bulac from Turkey quotes Sura 109, Verse 6 of the Quran: “To you your religion, to me my religion.” He goes into great detail describing the “Medina Document,” a treaty signed by the Prophet Muhammad with the Jewish tribes of Medina in the first moments of the Islamic era:

<quote>

The urgent problem of the day was to end the conflicts and to find a formulation for the co-existence of all sides according to the principles of justice and righteousness. In this respect, the Document is epochal ...A righteous and just, law-respecting ideal project aiming for true peace and stability among people cannot but be based on a contract among different groups (religious, legal, philosophical, political etc.) This is a rich diversity within unity, or a real pluralism.

</quote>

Chandra Muzaffar from Malaysia quotes Sura 49, Verse 13: “O mankind! We created you from a single pair of a male and a female, and made you into nations and tribes, that ye may know each other, not that ye may despise each other.” The Indian Ali Asghar Engineer quotes Sura 2, Verse 256: “There is no compulsion in religion.”[525] Muhammad Talbi from Tunisia quotes Sura 5, Verse 48: “To each among you, have We prescribed a Law and an Open Way. And if God had enforced His Will, He would have made of you all one people.” Hostile and discriminatory forms of inter-religious relations, according to this trope, are un-Islamic. In the words of Subhi Mahmassani of Lebanon: “There can be no discrimination based on religion in an Islamic system.”

The second trope, the ‘silent Shari’a,’ holds that coexistence is not required by the Shari’a, but is allowed. This trope argues that the Shari’a is silent on certain topics—not because divine revelation was incomplete or faulty, but because the revelation intentionally left certain issues for humans to choose.

For example, Humayun Kabir from India argues that the precedent of the early period of Islam does not apply automatically to later periods:

<quote>

The situation changed as the Muslim empire spread rapidly through large areas of Asia and many different peoples were brought within its fold. Many practical problems arose and Muslim political thinking had to find a place for non-Muslim subjects in a Muslim State ... [In India, today, for example,]

</quote>

<quote>

Muslims have condemned compulsion in religion and admitted that different religions must be given due respect.

</quote>

Syed Vahiduddin, also from India, quotes the same Quranic verse as Muhammad Talbi: “In a pluralistic and multi-religious society one cannot do better than to ponder on the Quranic vision of human conflicts: To every one of you we have appointed a right way and open path. If Allah had willed, He would have made you one community ” (Sura 5, Verse 48) But Vahiduddin interprets this verse within the context of the changing needs of an evolving Islamic community: the late twentieth century, he writes, was a period when Muslims were “tempted to take an extremely static view of religion. Their preoccupation with issues which are not of capital importance has made them uncompromising not only in inter-religious dialogue but also in inter-Islamic dialogue.”

Similarly, Abdurrahman Wahid of Indonesia, former leader of the world’s largest Islamic organization and former president of Indonesia, calls the 1945 Indonesian constitution better suited than an exclusively Islamic state for the particularly multicultural setting of contemporary Indonesia. “[T]here is a need for steps to be taken to resist the deterioration of relations between the different religions and faiths in Indonesia,” he writes, and the first of these steps is the defense of democratic freedoms: “First of all, efforts to restore the attitude of mutual respect among people from different faiths should be based on the fundamental legal principles of freedom of speech (even for very small minority groups), the rule of law and equality before the constitution.”[526]

The first trope of liberal Islam holds that the Shari’a requires democracy, and the second trope holds that the Shari’a allows democracy. But there is a third trope that takes issue with each of the first two. This trope is ‘interpreted Islam.’ In the words of the Iranian ‘Abdul-Karim Soroush, “Religion is divine, but its interpretation is thoroughly human and this-worldly”:

<quote>

The text does not stand alone, it does not carry its own meaning on its shoulders, it needs to be situated in a context, it is theory-laden, its interpretation is in flux, and presuppositions are as actively at work here as elsewhere in the field of understanding. Religious texts are no exception. Therefore their interpretation is subject to expansion and contraction according to the assumptions preceding them and/or the questions enquiring them We look at revelation in the mirror of interpretation, much as a devout scientist looks at creation in the mirror of nature ... [so that] the way for religious democracy and the transcendental unity of religions, which are predicated on religious pluralism, will have been paved.

</quote>

Farid Esack from South Africa cites the words of ‘Ali ibn Abi Talib, fourth caliph and son-in-law of the Prophet: “this is the Quran, written in straight lines, between two boards [of its binding]; it does not speak with a tongue; it needs interpreters and interpreters are people.” Esack translates this into contemporary terms: “Every interpreter enters the process of interpretation with some preunderstanding of the questions addressed by the text—even of its silences—and brings with him or her certain conceptions as presuppositions of his or her exegesis.” Esack’s pre-understandings emerge from the multireligious struggle against apartheid in South Africa. He argues that this commitment resonates with the spirit of early Islam, when an “emerging theology of religious pluralism was intrinsically wedded to one of liberation.”[527]

Similarly, the Egyptian Hassan Hanafi wrote:

<quote>

There is no one interpretation of a text, but there are many interpretations given the difference in understanding between various interpreters. An interpretation of a text is essentially pluralistic. The text is only a vehicle for human interests and even passions ... The conflict of interpretation is essentially a socio-political conflict, not a theoretical one. Theory indeed is only an epistemological cover-up. Each interpretation expresses the socio-political commitment of the interpreter.

</quote>

Amina Wadud-Muhsin from the United States argues in a similar vein that "when one individual reader with a particular world-view and specific prior text [the language and cultural context in which the text is read] asserts that his or her reading is the only possible or permissible one, it prevents readers in different contexts from coming to terms with their own relationship to the text."

Abdallahi An-Na'im from Sudan said: "There is no such thing as the only possible or valid understanding of the Quran, or conception of Islam, since each is informed by the individual and collective orientation of Muslims ..."[528]

This third trope suggests that religious diversity is inevitable, not just among religious communities but within Islam itself.

Few, if any, of the authors quoted above have read one another's work, despite the fact that they were all born in the first half of the twentieth century. These liberal positions appear to be emerging independently throughout the Islamic world. This simultaneous appearance is due to three historic shifts of the past several decades.

Widespread higher education has broken the traditional religious institutions' monopoly on religious scholarship. Millions of autodidacts now have access to texts and commentaries, such as nonclerics with secular educations: engineers such as Muhammad Shahrur from Syria and Mehdi Bazargan from Iran; philosophers such as Muhammad Arkun from Algeria (and France) and Tunisian Rachid Ghannushi; and sociologists such as ‘Ali Shari’ati of Iran and Chandra Muzaffar from Malaysia.

For example, Fatima Mernissi from Morocco, trained in sociology rather than theology, examined the hadith (tradition of the Prophet): “Those who entrust their affairs to a woman will never know prosperity!” Consulting a variety of ancient sources, she discovered that the hadith was attributed to Abu Bakra (died circa 671)—born a slave, liberated by the Prophet Muhammad, who rose to high social position in the city of Basra. He is the only source for this hadith, and he reported it 25 years after the Prophet’s death. Mernissi suggests that this hadith, though included in Muhammad ibn Ismail al-Bukhari’s collection of traditions, Al-Salih (The Authentic), and widely cited in the Islamic world, is suspect for two reasons.

First, when placed in context, Abu Bakra’s relation of the hadith seems selfserving. He was trying to save his life after the Battle of the Camel (December 656), when, to quote Mernissi, “all those who had not chosen to join ‘Ali’s clan had to justify their action. This can explain why a man like Abu Bakra needed to recall opportune traditions, his record being far from satisfactory, as he had refused to take part in the civil war ... [Although] many of the Companions and inhabitants of Basra chose neutrality in the conflict, only Abu Bakra justified it by the fact that one of the parties was a woman.” (pp. 116—117)

Second, Abu Bakra had once been flogged for giving false testimony in an early court case. According to the rules of hadith scholarship laid out by Imam Malik ibn Anas (710—796 AD), one of the founders of the science of hadith studies, lying disqualifies a source from being counted as a reliable transmitter of hadith. “If one follows the principles of Malik for fiqh [Islamic jurisprudence], Abu Bakra must be rejected as a source of hadith by every good, well-informed Malikite Muslim.” (p. 119)

Thus, in the world of CD-ROMs and global Internet access, anyone literate in Arabic with a personal computer, like Mernissi, can investigate the sources of Islamic law and question the reigning interpretations.

International communication technologies—radio, television, telephones, and the Internet—as well as newspapers and international trade, are bringing educated people from around the world into ever closer contact. The ideals of Western liberalism, like other Western notions such as nationalism, have entered people's homes around the world. People in Gabon, West Africa, for example, watched the fall of communism in Eastern Europe and started demanding democracy themselves, prompting that country's dictator to comment derisively on the "wind from the east [that is, the communist Eastern bloc] that is shaking the coconut trees."[529]

Another example was when Nurcholish Madjid from Indonesia defended freedom of thought by quoting the famous U.S. judge Oliver Wendell Holmes (1809—1894): "The ultimate good desired is better reached by free trade in ideas—that the best test of truth is the power of thought to get itself accepted [in the] competition of the market ..." Madjid goes on to say:

<quote>

Among the freedoms of the individual, the freedom[s] to think and to express opinions are the most valuable. We must have a firm conviction that all ideas and forms of thought, however strange they may sound, should be accorded means of expression. It is by no means rare that such ideas and thoughts, initially regarded as generally wrong, are [later] found to be right ... Furthermore, in the confrontation of ideas and thoughts, even error can be of considerable benefit, because it will induce truth to express itself and grow as a strong force. Perhaps it was not entirely small talk when our Prophet said that differences of opinion among his umma [community] were a mercy [from God].

</quote>

A further example of how technology is inducing change in the Islamic world is the tremendous Internet activity surrounding the arrest of former Malaysian deputy prime minister Anwar Ibrahim, whose trajectory from youthful Islamist militant to liberal reformist coincided with his increasing use of quotations from William Shakespeare and other crosscultural sources. Ibrahim's political career began with a communalist Islamism that scapegoated Chinese Malaysians. In recent years, Ibrahim has become an outspoken proponent of multireligious coexistence, both in Malaysia and at the global level:

<quote>

The experience of contemporary Islam in Southeast Asia has much to contribute not only to Muslims in other regions but possibly also to the world at large. This is due to the fact that the devout Southeast Asian Muslim practices his religion in the context of a truly multicultural world. Especially in Malaysia, a Muslim is never unaware of the presence of people of other faiths; as friends, colleagues, collaborators, partners or even competitors. [530]

</quote>

Supporters of Ibrahim's reform movement contributed to international communication through Web sites such as Anwar Online <[[http://members.tripod.com/~Anwar_Ibrahim][http://members.tripod.com/~Anwar_Ibrahim]]>, Anwar Ibrahim One <[[http://www.anwaribrahim1.com][http://www.anwaribrahim1.com]]>, Gerakan Reformasi <[[http://members.xoom.com/Gerakan][http://members.xoom.com/Gerakan]]>, ADIL <[[http://members.easyspace.com/reformasi][http://members.easyspace.com/reformasi]]>, Reformasi Dot Com (<http://www.reformasi.com>, quoting poetry by Rabindranath Tagore), and Ibrahim's wife's official Web site, <[[http://www.anwaribrahim.org][http://www.anwaribrahim.org]]>.

Some of these sites registered hundreds of thousands of visitors in two or three months. One flashing pro-Ibrahim Web site noted: "Welcome to J's Reformasi Online, the site of the oppressed and depressed!! In the name of Allah, most gracious, most merciful."

Some countries, such as Saudi Arabia and Iran, have tried to block out foreign ideas precisely because they fear these sorts of intercultural interactions. But blocking foreign ideas, to quote U.S. President Woodrow Wilson out of context, “is like using a broom to stop a vast flood.”[531] Few countries will be able to keep up this level of sweeping for long.

A third factor in the rise of liberal Islam is the failure of alternative ideologies. In particular, there appears to be a growing sense that Islamic regimes have not lived up to their promise. The Sudan and Pakistan, for example, have proved to be no less corrupt after the Islamicization of their governments than before. Taliban rule in Afghanistan, it seems fair to generalize, horrified most Muslims.[532]

The number one disappointment for “fundamentalist” Muslims, however, is Iran. The Iranian revolution of 1979 raised tremendous hopes among Islamists in Malaysia, Africa, and throughout the Islamic world. Iran was to be the showpiece of the Islamist movement. For the first time since the seventh century, a truly Islamic society was to be constructed. It has been painful for these people to find that dream unfulfilled.

There are many examples of this painful disillusionment and the liberal outcome that resulted. Consider ‘Abdul-Karim Soroush, a controversial figure who wholeheartedly favored the Islamic Republic in the early years. Soroush participated actively in the revolutionary reorganization of the universities in Iran, which involved getting rid of many fine professors in the name of ideological purity. Yet by the mid-1980s, even this staunch supporter of the Islamic republic had started to distance himself from official committees on which he had served. Within a few years, he came to realize that the Islamic Republic was not ushering in a new era of justice and righteousness. Soroush started to criticize the government and began to call for a reinterpretation of Islamic law and for academic and intellectual freedoms that his university reorganization had disregarded in the early 1980s. These themes, along with his impressive erudition and his talent for public speaking, made Soroush one of the most popular public speakers in Iran in the early 1990s. He spoke at mosques and universities and on the radio, always to big audiences. Naturally, the Iranian government found his words threatening, and Soroush has since been barred from speaking publicly in Iran. He now speaks outside Iran, when he is allowed to travel, addressing international audiences, mainly in Europe and North America, stressing the commonality of his views with Western interpretations of religion. But the pain of Soroush's break with the Islamic Republic and his disillusionment are apparently so great that he literally cannot deal with his own former hopes and aspirations. In interviews, Soroush denies that he was a supporter of the cultural revolution in Iran or that he was active in the reorganization of the universities.[533] The Islamic Republic in Iran appears not only to be generating liberal ideas, but also may even be erasing the memory of those who once professed Islamist ideals.

Although there are Muslims who find common ground with Western liberals, liberal Islam is not without its detractors. Some claim that liberal Islam is inauthentic, that it is a creation of the West and does not reflect "true" Islamic traditions. "Authenticity movements" have been increasing globally over the past quarter-century, from religious movements such as Islamism or the B. J. P. Hindu nationalist party in India, to ethnic phenomena such as the tribal hostilities that have resulted in gruesome massacres in central Africa. The emphasis on authenticity is not limited to the Islamic world.

One of the crucial characteristics of this renewed interest in authenticity is the idea that one can take a culture and draw a box around it; that a culture can be defined as a discrete entity, separate from other cultures, with well-defined boundaries. In reality, these boundaries are rarely so precise. In Uzbekistan, for example, the government insists that the Now Ruz New Year's celebration was invented in Central Asia, not in Iran—as if cultural practices would be less valuable if they were imported. But of course, claiming to have created the event contributes to Uzbek national pride and identity.

The flip side of this increasing need for cultural ownership is a flurry of criticisms against things or people for not being authentic enough. Because liberal Islam shares concerns with Western liberalism, critics claim, it must not be a valid interpretation of the religion—if X is Western, it cannot be Islamic. This binary opposition ignores the tremendous history of cultural borrowings and influences that have permeated the supposed border over the centuries.

If the first charge is that liberal Islam is inauthentic, and therefore somehow wrong, the second charge argues that liberal Islam should not be tolerated whether or not it is wrong. For example, Gai Eaton, a British Muslim, calls liberal Muslims “Uncle Toms.”[534] (“Uncle Tom” is a derisive term used by African- Americans to describe a black person who is grotesquely servile to whites.) In essence, Eaton is calling liberal concerns treasonous to the cause of Islam. Not only are these concerns wrong, according to Eaton’s way of thinking, but right or wrong, raising these concerns publicly weakens the Islamic world in its struggle with the West. It is like a team sport, where each side demands loyalty from its members and sees any internal critique, any self-critique, as aiding and abetting the other team.

In Iran, for example, the feeling of being besieged by foreign, especially American, hostility is so strong that in order to survive, politicians must prove that they are not “soft” on the “Great Satan.”[535] Iranian politicians who wish to negotiate with the West, or to raise concerns about democracy, human rights, or other issues, are immediately labeled by their political opponents as “soft on Satan.” This pattern is so common and so damaging to liberal concerns that even reformists engage in liberal-bashing in order to ward off criticism. Iran’s president, Muhammad Khatami, is a case in point. Khatami may be more of a politician than a theologian, but his campaign in 1997 adopted liberal positions on civil society, rule of law, and freedom of speech that inspired reformists in Iran and elsewhere in the Islamic world, while making him vulnerable to charges of cultural treason. Possibly to preempt such charges, Khatami interspersed his liberal campaign themes with attacks on some liberal oppositionists, accusing them of having “fallen in the lap of foreigners,” of not being a legitimate political party, and of not coming “from inside society.”[536]

Western ignorance poses yet another challenge for liberal Islam. For centuries, the West has constructed an image of Islam as ‘the Other,’ identifying Islam with its most exotic elements. Islamic faith has been equated with fanaticism, as in Voltaire’s Mahomet, or Fanaticism (1745). Islamic political authority has been equated with despotism, as in Montesquieu’s intentionally redundant phrase “Oriental despotism.” And Islamic tradition has been equated with backwardness and primitiveness, as in Ernest Renan’s inaugural lecture at the College de France (1862):

<quote>

Islam is the complete negation of Europe ... Islam is the disdain of science, the suppression of civil society; it is the appalling simplicity of the Semitic spirit, restricting the human mind, closing it to all delicate ideas, to all refined sentiment, to all rational research, in order to keep it facing an eternal tautology: God is God.[537]

</quote>

Aside from bias, Western policy must better understand the distinctions within Islamic movements. An example is the recent history of Algeria. The Front de Salvation Islamique (FIS) was divided into liberal and radical factions. During the elections of late 1991 and early 1992, the liberal wing was in the ascendant; its leaders were setting the group’s policy, its candidates were running for office, and it stood a great chance of actually coming to power. ‘Abbasi Madani, the leader of the liberal faction, made a number of statements aimed at calming the fears of Algerians and Westerners about the intentions of the FIS, such as: “Pluralism is a guarantee of cultural wealth, and diversity is needed for development. We are Muslims, but we are not Islam itself ... We do not monopolize religion. Democracy as we understand it means pluralism, choice, and freedom.”[538] The FIS had won 81 percent of the first-round elections in December 1991 and was poised to do equally well in the second round in early January 1992 when the Algerian military, supported by France and the United States, canceled the elections, banned the FIS, and arrested its leaders. The result was that the liberals within the Islamic movement were thoroughly discredited for having proposed an effort to win within the rules of democracy. The radical wing prevailed and even murdered liberal Islamic activists who objected to terrorism, such as Muhammad Sa’id and Abd al-Razak Redjam, who were killed in 1995. The Western inability to believe that there might be such a thing as liberal Islam proved a self-fulfilling prophecy.

There is a growing number of Muslims who share common concerns with Western liberalism, one of which is peaceful multireligious coexistence. There are three Islamic approaches in this context which, while still very much minority views, seem to be growing. In the ‘liberal Shari’a’ school, Islamic scholars base their arguments on injunctions in the Quran and on precedents from the early years of Islam. Using an argument that might be called the ‘silent Shari’a,’ Islamic scholars argue that the Shari’a does not speak about certain topics—not because the revelation is incomplete or imperfect, but because these matters have been intentionally left to human invention. The third approach is the ‘interpreted Shari’a,’ where Islamic scholars argue that the revelation is divine, but interpretation is human and fallible and inevitably plural.

These liberal approaches to multireligious coexistence have been stimulated by three historic shifts of the past quarter century: the rise of secular higher education in the Islamic world, which has broken the monopoly of the seminaries over religious discourse; the growth of international communications, which has made educated Muslims more aware than ever of the norms and institutions of the West; and the failure of Islamic regimes to deliver an attractive alternative.

These liberal approaches face serious challenges, including accusations of treason and inauthenticity, and a Western ignorance about the existence and importance of this internal Islamic debate.

[524] This paper draws and expands on my anthology, Liberal Islam: A Source-Book (New York: Oxford University Press, 1988). All quotations not otherwise cited refer to this work.

[525] Ali Asghar Engineer, “The Hindu-Muslim Problem,” in Islam and Liberation Theology (New Delhi: Sterling Publishers, 1990), p. 209.

[526] Abdurrahman Wahid, “Religious Tolerance in a Plural Society,” in Damien Kingsbury and Greg Barton (eds.), Difference and Tolerance:

Human Rights Issues in Southeast Asia (Geelong, Australia: Deakin University Press, 1994), p. 42.

[527] Farid Esack, Qur’an, Liberation, and Pluralism (Oxford: Oneworld, 1997), pp. 50, 179.

[528] Abdullahi An-Na’im, “Toward an Islamic Hermeneutics for Human Rights,” in Abdullahi A. Na’im, Jerald D. Gort, Henry M. Vroom (eds.), Human Rights and Religious Values: An Uneasy Relationship? (Amsterdam: Editions Rodopi; Grand Rapids: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1995), p. 233.

[529] Samuel Decalo, “The Process, Prospects, and Constraints of Democratization in Africa,” African Affairs, Vol. 91, 1992, p. 7.

[530] Anwar Ibrahim, “The Need for Civilizational Dialogue” (Washington, D.C.: Center for Muslim-Christian Understanding, Georgetown University, Occasional Papers Series, 1995), p. 4.

[531] Arno J. Mayer, Politics and Diplomacy of Peacemaking: Containment and Counterrevolution at Versailles, 1918—1919 (New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1967), p. 602.

[532] Aslam Abdullah, “Shaving Is His Protest Against Coercion,” Los Angeles Times, May 10, 1997.

[533] See the Web site devoted to Soroush’s thought, <[[http://www.seraj.org][http://www.seraj.org]]>, and “Intellectual Autobiography: An Interview,” in Reason, Freedom, and Democracy in Islam: Essential Writings of Abdolkarim Soroush, translated by Mahmoud Sadri and Ahmad Sadri (forthcoming).

[534] Gai Eaton, Islam and the Destiny of Man (Albany: State University of New York Press, New York, 1985), p. 12.

[535] Charles Kurzman, “Soft on Satan: Challenges for Iranian-U.S. Rapprochement,” Middle East Policy, Vol. 6, No. 1, June 1998, pp. 63—72.

[536] Salaam (Tehran, Iran), May 6, 1997.

[537] Ernest Renan, Oeuvres Completes (Paris: Calmann-Livy, 1947), Vol. 2, p. 333.

[538] Daniel Brumberg, “Islam, Elections, and Reform in Algeria,” Journal of Democracy, Vol. 2, No. 1, Winter 1991, p. 64.

 13. Inside the Islamic Reformation

Dale F. Eickelman

Like the printing press in sixteenth-century Europe, the combination of mass education and mass communications is transforming the Muslim-majority world, a broad geographical crescent stretching from North Africa through Central Asia, the Indian subcontinent, and the Indonesian archipelago. In unprecedentedly large numbers, the faithful—whether in the vast cosmopolitan city of Istanbul, the suburbs of Paris, or in the remote oases of Oman’s mountainous interior—are examining and debating the fundamentals of Muslim belief and practice in ways that their less self-conscious predecessors in the faith would never have imagined.

Buzzwords such as “fundamentalism” and catchy phrases such as Samuel Huntington’s “West versus Rest” or Daniel Lerner’s “Mecca or mechanization” are of little use in understanding this transformation. They obscure or even distort the immense spiritual and intellectual ferment taking place today among the world’s nearly one billion Muslims, reducing it in most cases to a fanatical rejection of everything modern, liberal, or progressive. To be sure, such fanati- cism—not exclusive to Muslim majority societies—plays a part in what is happening, but it is far from the whole story.

A far more important element is the unprecedented access that ordinary people now have to sources of information and knowledge about religion and other aspects of their society. Quite simply, in country after country, government officials, traditional religious scholars, and officially sanctioned preachers are finding it very hard to monopolize the tools of literate culture. The days have gone when governments and religious authorities can control what their people know and what they think.

What distinguishes the present era from prior ones is the large numbers of believers engaged in the ‘reconstruction’ of religion, community, and society. In an earlier era, political or religious leaders would prescribe, and others were supposed to follow. Today, the major impetus for change in religious and political values comes from below. In France, this has meant an identity shift from being Muslim in France to being French Muslim. In Turkey, it means that an increasing number of Turks, especially those of the younger generation, see themselves as European and Muslim at the same time. And some Iranians argue that the major transformations of the Iranian revolution occurred not in 1978— 1979 but with the coming of age of a new generation of Iranians who were not even born at the time of the revolution. These transformations include a greater sense of autonomy for both women and men and the emergence of a public sphere in which politics and religion are subtly intertwined, and not always in ways anticipated by Iran’s formal religious leaders.

If ‘modernity’ is defined as the emergence of new kinds of public space, including kinds not imagined by preceding generations, then developments in France, Turkey, Iran, Indonesia, and elsewhere suggest that we are living through an era of profound social transformation for the Muslim-majority world.

Distinctive to the modern era is that discourse and debate about Muslim tradition involves people on a mass scale. It also necessarily involves an awareness of other Muslim and non-Muslim traditions. Mass education and mass communications in the modern world facilitate an awareness of the new and unconventional. In changing the style and scale of possible discourse, they reconfigure the nature of religious thought and action, create new forms of public space, and encourage debate over meaning.

Mass education and mass communications are important in all contemporary world religions. However, the full effects of mass education, especially higher education, began to be felt in much of the Muslim world only since the midtwentieth century and in many countries considerably later. In country after country—including Morocco, Egypt, Turkey, and Indonesia—educational opportunities have dramatically expanded at all levels. Even where adult illiteracy rates in the general populace remain high, as in rural Egypt and Morocco, there is now a critical mass of educated people able to read, think for themselves, and react to religious and political authorities rather than just listen to them. Women’s access to education still lags behind that of men, although the gap is rapidly closing in many countries.

Both mass education and mass communications, particularly the proliferation of media and the means by which people communicate, have had a profound effect on how people think about religion and politics throughout the Muslim world. Multiple means of communication make the unilateral control of information and opinion much more difficult than it was in prior eras and foster, albeit inadvertently, a civil society of dissent. We are still in the early stages of understanding how different media—including print, television, radio, cassettes, and music—influence groups and individuals, encouraging unity in some contexts and fragmentation in others, but a few salient features may be sketched.

At the “high” end of this transformation is the rise to significance of books such as al-Kitab wa-l-Qur’an [The Book and the Quran] (1990), written by the Syrian civil engineer Muhammad Shahrur. This book has sold tens of thousands of copies throughout the Arab world in spite of the fact that its circulation has been banned or discouraged in many places. Its success could not have been imagined before there were large numbers of people able to read it and understand its advocacy of the need to reinterpret ideas of religious authority and tradition and apply Islamic precepts to contemporary society. On issues ranging from the role of women in society to rekindling a “creative interaction” with non-Muslim philosophies, Shahrur argues that Muslims should reinterpret sacred texts and apply them to contemporary social and moral issues.

Shahrur is not alone in attacking both conventional religious wisdom and the intolerant certainties of religious radicals and in arguing instead for a constant and open re-interpretation of how sacred texts apply to social and political life. Another Syrian thinker, the secularist Sadiq Jalal al-’Azm, debated Shaykh Yusif al-Qaradawi, a conservative religious intellectual, on Qatar’s al-Jazira Satellite TV in May 1997. For the first time in the memory of many viewers, the religious conservative came across as the weaker, more defensive voice. Al-Jazira is a new phenomenon in Arab language broadcasting because its talk shows, such as “The Opposite Direction,” feature live discussions on such sensitive issues as women’s role in society, Palestinian refugees, sanctions on Iraq, and democracy and human rights in the Arab world.

Such discussions are unlikely to be rebroadcast on state-controlled television in most Arab nations, where programming on religious and political themes is generally cautious. Nevertheless, satellite technology and videotape render traditional censorship ineffective. Tapes of al-Jazira broadcasts circulate from hand to hand in Morocco, Oman, Syria, Egypt, and elsewhere. Al-Jazira shows that people across the Arab world, just like their counterparts elsewhere in the Muslim- majority world, want open discussion of the issues that affect their lives, and that new communications technologies make it impossible for governments and established religious authorities to stop them.

Other voices also advocate reform. Fethullah Gulen, Turkey’s answer to media-savvy American evangelist Billy Graham, appeals to a mass audience. In televised chat shows, interviews, and occasional sermons, Gulen speaks about Islam and science, democracy, modernity, religious and ideological tolerance, the importance of education, and current events.

Religious movements such as Turkey's Risale-i Nur appeal increasingly to religious moderates, and in stressing the links between Islam, reason, science, and modernity, and the lack of inherent conflict between 'East' and 'West,' they promote education at all levels, and appeal to a growing number of educated Turks. Iranian, Indonesian, and Malaysian moderates make similar arguments advocating religious and political toleration and pluralism.

As a result of direct and broad access to the printed, broadcast, and taped word, more and more Muslims take it upon themselves to interpret the textual sources—classical or modern—of Islam. Much has been made of the opening up of the economies of many Muslim countries, allowing 'market forces' to reshape economies, no matter how painful the consequences in the short run. In a similar way, intellectual market forces support some forms of religious innovation and activity over others. In Bangladesh, women's romance novels, once a popular secular specialty, now have their Islamic counterparts, making it difficult to distinguish between 'Muslim' romance novels and 'secular' ones.

The result is a collapse of earlier, hierarchical notions of religious authority based on claims to the mastery of fixed bodies of religious texts. Even when there are state-appointed religious authorities—as in Oman, Saudi Arabia, Iran, and Egypt—there no longer is any guarantee that their word will be heeded, or even that they themselves will follow the lead of the regime. No one group or type of leader in contemporary Muslim societies possesses a monopoly on the management of the sacred.

Without fanfare, the notion that Islam should be the subject of dialogue and civil debate is gaining ground. This new sense of public space is shaped by increasingly open contests over the use of the symbolic language of Islam. Increasingly, discussions in newspapers, on the Internet, on smuggled cassettes, and on television cross-cut and overlap, contributing to a common public space.

New and accessible modes of communication have made these contests increasingly global, so that even local issues take on transnational dimensions. The combination of new media and new contributors to religious and political debates fosters awareness on the part of all actors of the diverse ways in which Islam and Islamic values can be created. It feeds into new senses of a public space that is discursive, performative, and participative, and not confined to formal institutions recognized by state authorities.

Two cautions are in order. The first is that an expanding public sphere need not necessarily indicate more favorable prospects for democracy, any more than civil society necessarily entails democracy. Authoritarian regimes are compatible with an expanding public sphere, although an expanded public sphere offers wider avenues for awareness of competing and alternate forms of religious and political authority. Nor does civil society necessarily entail democracy, although it is a precondition for democracy.

Publicly shared ideas of community, identity, and leadership take new shapes in such engagements, even as many communities and authorities claim an unchanged continuity with the past. Mass education, so important in the development of nationalism in an earlier era, and a proliferation of media and means of communication have multiplied the possibilities for creating communities and networks among them, dissolving prior barriers of space and distance, and opening new grounds for interaction and mutual recognition.

 14. Islamist Movements in the Middle East: A Survey and Balance Sheet

Barry Rubin

More than two decades after Iran's 1979 Islamist revolution, radical 'fundamentalist' forces in the Middle East have achieved two great victories and suffered two major defeats. These four factors give a clear sense of these movements'— and thus also the region's—present and future situation.

The first great victory is that the Iranian regime has survived. Yet this achievement is seriously undermined by popular dissatisfaction with the regime's performance. A movement led by President Muhammad Khatami has challenged the policies intended to produce an all-embracing Islamic state, though it continues to favor such a structure in a more moderate form.

The second big triumph has been that revolutionary Islamist doctrine and groups have become the principal opposition force throughout the region. In virtually every country, there are organized forces that challenge the current rulers.

At the same time, however, these movements have suffered even more impressive setbacks. First, the spread of upheaval has been far less than its advocates hoped and opponents feared. Radical Islamist groups did not find it easy to seize power where they did, and today their prospects for doing so anywhere else in the Middle East are not good.

The other problem is that popular support for these movements has been limited among Muslims and even among those who are pious. There are many good reasons for Islamist movements' relatively low level of mass support or success. These factors include traditional Islam's rejection of radical Islamism, nationalism's appeal, and incumbent regimes' clever mix of repression and cooptation aimed against these groups.

Radical Islamists claimed, in effect, that they were 'fundamentalists' because they were returning to the historic essence and proper interpretation of Islam. In practice, though, these forces more truly represented an attempt to reinterpret Islam—at least as it was generally practiced—by means of modern ideas and new perspectives. The refusal of most Muslims to accept this claim lies at the root of the movement's failures to gain hegemony in the region.

A three-part definition of the movement's key premises is useful here:

1. Islam is the answer to the problems of Muslims' society, country, and region. The relative weakness of Muslims and of Arab societies compared to the West, their slow or stagnant economic development, the failure to destroy Israel, domestic and inter-Arab disunity, inequality and injustice, and other such problems have been due to the failure to implement Islam properly.

Many Muslims would agree with the first sentence but they would find other sources of doctrine or causes of the current situation equally or more acceptable. For example, very large numbers of Muslims embrace Arab (or Turkish) nationalism and other political ideologies. A majority of Muslims are more likely to attribute the failures of modern times to a need for economic progress, more democracy, Arab unity, regional peace, or many other factors.

The virtually single-factor explanation of shortcomings, grievances and solutions marks the radical Islamist groups. A Western analogy might be that while there were many liberals and social democrats, intellectuals and workers who accepted elements of Marxist arguments—demands for social justice, strong trade unions, and a redistribution of economic power, etc.—far fewer were able to accept the narrow (deterministic, monistic) views of that doctrine to such an extent that they were prepared to join communist parties.

2. Implementing Islam and resolving the huge problems of the people and countries require the seizure and holding of power by radical Islamist groups, and not by any other type of government or political leadership. The best-known, though hardly sole, proponent and architect of this premise was Iran's Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, though not all radical Islamists echo his view that Islamic clerics should be the rulers.

Indeed, in many Arab countries, and also in Iran, the leading clergymen favor conservative Islamic views rather than radical Islamist ones. These traditional doctrines involve accepting the existing rulers, at least as long as they are Muslims, and a division of authority between state and religion. They also discourage the use of violence against other Muslims.

In contrast, the radicals interpret the need for Islam to be in full and direct political power as a core value of Islam. Any view of Islam that does not accept this tenet is illegitimate. In historical terms, the problem here is that Islam existed for many centuries with the domination of the completely opposite idea: A ruler should be properly pious but the state need not be ruled and shaped by Islam. While there have been many exceptions, Islam has usually adopted tolerance and pluralism, at least toward its own adherents.

The radicals claim they are returning to the religion's origins in the seventh century (hence, returning to fundamentals), but in fact theirs is a deviant, even heretical, viewpoint. It must be stressed that this approach is simply not accepted by the majority of Muslims, nor even by the majority of clerics. Even in Iran, there were and are many respected senior clerics who reject Khomeini's views. Indeed, those who reject 'fundamentalism' are often more respected and have better scholarly credentials than those who embrace it.

This factor is an enormous problem for the radicals, who often face an uphill battle to gain or enlarge a base of popular support. A Western analogy here would be that while communist movements claimed to speak on behalf of large social groups—workers, oppressed nations and groups, progressive think- ers—these people usually rejected that purported leadership.

3. The only proper interpretation of Islam is the one offered by a specific political group and its leaders. This premise also poses a serious problem. For if the majority does not accept the doctrine as a whole, even more people will not agree with the details of a given group's ideology, program, tactics, and strategy. While some revolutionary groups draw on one or more respected Islamic clerics, they are often small and marginal groups. And of course one man's respected cleric may be another man's charlatan or heretic.

Several additional consequences arise from this premise. Such movements are almost inherently intolerant because they claim to speak with the voice of God, while their opponents' views can only be explained as heretical or even satanic. But intolerance can inhibit growth; it turns the majority of Muslims into enemies whose ideas and worship are wrong. Moreover, since there is only one correct line, the radicals often quarrel among themselves. There is rarely room in any organization for more than one charismatic leader. Factions and splits are inevitable, thus weakening the movement and sometimes leading to infighting.

The claims of the radical Islamist groups also pose a huge problem for Muslim citizens. If the revolutionaries' brand of Islam is valid, then their own personal versions are wrong, despite the fact that they and their ancestors have lived within that framework for their entire lives. In this way, Muslims can see the radicals' struggle as an attack on them rather than as a battle on their behalf. Government propaganda often builds very successfully on this theme.

As political actors, revolutionary Islamist groups face a series of difficult problems.

Because religious doctrine is at the core of their ideology, Sunni and Shi'ite Muslim radicals find it difficult—though not always impossible—to cooperate. In some countries, Iran's ethnically Persian and religiously Shi'ite identities are real barriers to attracting Arab and Sunni followers to a doctrine often identified with its revolution. At the same time, Iran's visible failures and internal problems can also discredit the idea that an Islamist revolution would solve all problems. The fact that Islamists deny these factors does not make them any less real.

As was so long true in Arab nationalist groups, handling foreign sponsorship or interference can be a very difficult and divisive challenge for a revolutionary organization. To cite one example, there are about six different factions of (Palestinian) Islamic Jihad each with different sponsorship (Iranian, Syrian, and Libyan). Afghanistan offers similar examples. Some groups became the surrogates or pawns of regimes, whose rulers need not be radical Islamists themselves. The ability of states to offer safe havens, finances, training, military equipment, diplomatic support, and other benefits makes seeking their sponsorship a very tempting proposition for relatively small revolutionary groups.

For example, at a time when Syria was killing and imprisoning Islamist opponents, Iranian interests dictated a strong alliance with Damascus—including massive oil transfers—in order to isolate Iraq. During the 1990–1991 crisis resulting from Iraq's takeover of its neighbor Kuwait, radical Islamists overwhelmingly supported Saddam Hussein, even though he murdered, tortured, and exiled thousands of their colleagues in his own country.

While radical Islamists may decry the existence of separate nation-states, they cannot be ignored. Indeed, Islamist groups often owe their growth and strength to the fact that they are representatives of ethnic or national groups. In Lebanon, Hizballah is essentially a Shi'ite communal party opposing Christian hegemony, a situation that guarantees opposition from the country's other communities. In Syria, the Islamists represent a Sunni majority, the country's traditional rulers, who oppose an essentially non-Muslim (Alawite) government. In Iraq, the movement represents the Shi'ite community against a largely Sunni ruling elite. With the partial exception of the Muslim Brotherhood network— encouraging some cooperation among the Egyptian, Jordanian, Palestinian (Hamas), and Syrian Muslim Brotherhoods—each movement stands mostly on its own in battling a relatively well-financed and well-armed local government.

Similarly, each radical Islamist movement must develop a strategy and tactics appropriate for its individual country with extremely varied environments. Consequently, the groups grow in different directions, set disparate levels of escalation, and find dissimilar responses to their problems.

Finally, governments are often quite sophisticated in using a wide variety of tactics to counter revolutionary Islamists. These measures include expropriating Islamic symbols, co-opting large elements of Islamic institutions, promoting patriotism and Arab nationalism, or unleashing repression. To cite a few examples:

- Saddam Hussein added the phrase “God is great” to Iraq’s flag and declared his 1990 invasion of Kuwait a holy war. A decade earlier, he murdered Iraq’s leading young radical Shi’ite Islamist cleric and his activist sister.

- Syria’s regime—dominated by a non-Muslim minority group—wiped out one of its own biggest cities in 1982, killing between 10,000 and 30,000 people, to eliminate a center of support for the Islamist movement.

- The kings of Jordan, Morocco, and Saudi Arabia possess considerable Islamic credentials of their own. At one politically sensitive moment, the late King Hussein even grew a beard to court this constituency.

- In Egypt, the government controls a huge Islamic sector, ranging from local mosques to the prestigious al-Azhar religious university. Preachers and teachers in Islamic schools are government employees.

- Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasir Arafat created his own satellite Islamist party, assigned Islamist activists who supported him to high posts, and played a clever balancing act between repression and benevolence to keep Hamas in line.

- The Turkish military outmaneuvered the short-lived Welfare Party coalition government in Ankara, forcing Prime Minister Necmettin Erbakan to sign a decree expelling supporters of his own party from the army and ultimately pushing him out of office altogether in 1997.

Aside from questions of ideology, the use of violence is an extremely controversial and sometimes divisive issue. While all radical Islamist movements want to gain power and never relinquish it, there are differences in method, depending on the situation in specific countries and the views of the local leadership. It should be stressed that while small radical Islamist groups employ violence in trying to seize control of several Arab states, the main revolutionary efforts—within Algeria, Egypt, and Lebanon—have steadily declined.

Some radical Islamists have argued that power can be sought by persuasion, using any pluralist openings offered by the system. In addition to elections and propaganda, groups have developed a large variety of grassroots social programs to build a mass base of support by showing their doctrine in action. These efforts include welfare activities and the creation of school systems and youth clubs. Professional associations and student groups can be taken over through institutional elections, even in countries where parliamentary elections are manipulated by the regime. Control of individual mosques and political Islamist preaching is also a useful tactic.

For Islamist politicians, there could be a careerist element in a decision to work inside the system even if an incumbent government will clearly not allow an opposition win. Accepting the role of ‘loyal opposition’ would keep them out of jail, safeguard their existing wealth, and provide opportunities for additional personal benefits and prestige. In effect, they would gain freedom to operate in exchange for accepting certain limits.

This is not meant to suggest that reformism arises from venal considerations, but such factors can certainly make such a choice more attractive. It can also be a pragmatic response to the failure and relatively limited appeal of armed struggle. Movements that become genuinely reformist try to act as pressure groups to move society toward a more Islamic identity without being able to transform it altogether. It is possible to argue, of course, that this gradualist strategy will eventually arrive at the same result intended by advocates of a revolutionary strategy. Indeed, there is a difference between reformist tactics and a moderation of aims. The movements' opponents often make such an argument, which justifies their ensuring that Islamists never actually take power.

Nevertheless, this trend toward reformist methods that could lead to moderated goals, most clearly true in Turkey and Jordan, could become the dominant trend. But this choice also results in splits, as some militants come to believe that the parent movement has abandoned its original principles. Such was the pattern, for example, in Egypt, where radical groups emerged from the Muslim Brotherhood, whose moderate tactics from the 1970s onward ensured both its survival and its failure to gain power.

There are, indeed, four diverse types of situations for Islamist movements in the Middle East:

1. A highly repressive regime that will kill and imprison radical Islamist activists and ban their movements, as can be seen in Syria, Iraq, and Saudi Arabia. In these cases the government's willingness and ability to apply massive force has crushed Islamist insurgencies.

1. A more flexible regime allows Islamists to operate with a large degree of freedom, establishing and administering a wide range of institutions, but it will not allow them to take power. This is the prevailing situation in Algeria and Egypt where, respectively, a military coup and election rigging have been used to limit the Islamist parties. As a result, large elements among radical Islamist forces take up arms to gain power. These conditions have been the most propitious for the development of a bloody Islamist insurgency, though not necessarily a successful one.

1. The most open regimes, such as those in Jordan, Kuwait, Morocco, Turkey, Israel, and the Palestinian Authority, allow the Islamists a fairer proportion of representation—and in Turkey's case even temporary executive power—while any violent revolutionary forces are dealt with very severely. This situation is made possible by two factors: The government's legitimacy and the system's strength are secure enough that they do not feel endangered by the Islamist forces; and the Islamists themselves are ready to accept the rules of the game because they judge any attempt to seize power would be suicidal.

1. In some places, Islamist forces try to take the place of a nationalist movement in representing an ethnic group that has a distinct confessional characteristic. As noted above, this applies to Hizballah (Lebanese Shi'ite), the Syrian Muslim Brotherhood (Sunni), and Shi'ite groups in Iraq, Saudi Arabia, and Bahrain. These Shi'ite communities are generally geographically concentrated, relatively poor, historically subject to discrimination, and have a disproportionately small amount of political power.

An Islamist group can also be empowered by claiming the job of leading the community against foreign, non-Muslim forces. This was the case with those fighting the Soviets in Afghanistan as well as Lebanese Hizballah and Palestinian Hamas or Islamic Jihad in fighting against Israel. Yet even if they lead a community or direct the fight against infidels, radical Islamist forces are not guaranteed victory. There are always competing—usually nationalist—forces for ethnic loyalties that can usually muster more supporters. Even Hizballah and Hamas, playing on highly popular anti-Israel themes, cannot gain hegemony, respectively, over Amal (the nationalist-oriented Lebanese Shi'ite group) or the Palestinian Authority, which is largely controlled by nationalist Fatah and others from the Palestine Liberation Organization.

The above analysis also indicates the importance and nature of radical Islamist terrorism. Terrorism is not just an insult hurled by the revolutionaries' opponents. It is also a key part of the strategy of some groups. Like those who used similar techniques in Europe a century ago, these radicals believe that bombings and assassinations will delegitimize the government or other enemies and produce a mass uprising. Terrorism also arises from the frustration of groups unable to stage revolutions and increasingly bitter at the masses' refusal to support their cause. The people thus become the enemy.

But there is another way in which terrorism is even more important. By arguing that non-Muslim adversaries have no rights and are enemies of God who should either be driven out or kept out of Muslim territory, the radicals can justify killing any member of a target group—such as Israelis, other communities as in Lebanon, or Western tourists. Such attacks are also designed to raise the revolutionaries' popularity in their own constituency, revenge popular grievances, and show the progress and effectiveness of the organizations involved.

Murdering fellow Muslims is a bigger ideological and practical problem, yet a necessary part of revolutionary armed struggle. Although often contradicted by history—the Iran-Iraq war is a good contemporary example—Muslims are not supposed to wage war on fellow Muslims. The assassination of officials who are Muslims, much less innocent bystanders, often leads to criticism of the radicals as acting improperly in Islamic terms. It brings popular support for government repression. Even suicide bombings against non-Muslims has been criticized by some distinguished clerics as contrary to Islam.

Again, though, it is important to stress that radical Islamist groups have adapted to extremely varied conditions in different countries with distinctive sets of tactics. Three broad categories can be defined, though different organizations may be represented in more than one sector or may change positions over time.

 Revolutionaries

Revolutionary groups have carried out armed struggle in Algeria, Bahrain, Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Syria, and Iraq to overturn existing governments and create a radical Islamist state. Aside from Algeria, these are all relatively small underground organizations though they have larger circles of supporters. The most repressive states—Syria and Iraq—have had the greatest success in suppressing such insurgencies, which embody grievances barred from expression, much less solution, through other means. It should again be noted that four of these six movements are also representatives of ethnic-national communities: Shi’ite in the case of Bahrain, Saudi Arabia, and Iraq; Sunni in the case of Syria.

In Algeria, the full-scale revolt resulted from the military’s refusal to let a broad-based Islamist group, the Islamic Salvation Front (FIS), attain electoral victory. The FIS, then, is a reluctant revolutionary group and many FIS leaders would be happy to achieve a negotiated solution that would give them a share of power. More extreme groups, such as the Armed Islamic Group (GIA), reject any compromise. Ironically, the regime’s relative openness earlier may have created a situation in which more moderate Islamist forces were forced into extreme responses.

An interesting comparison can be made to the case in Egypt, where the Muslim Brotherhood is the equivalent of the FIS. The government lets the Brotherhood participate in electoral politics, hold parliamentary seats, and function as a movement. But the permissible lines are clearly set. Periodic repression and vote-rigging remind the Brotherhood that it will be crushed if it seems poised to actually seize power. The violent revolutionaries are much smaller groups that split off from the Brotherhood because they thought it too timid. The radicals also build their own campus or neighborhood groups. As in Algeria, government responses have been largely successful in containing and reducing the relatively smaller and badly divided radical forces.

 National Liberationists

Palestinian and Lebanese groups (and those in Afghanistan as well) have had a dual purpose. While they wish to establish an Islamic state among their own people, their first priority has been fighting others. Hamas and Islamic Jihad have launched terrorist attacks on Israel while competing for popular support with the PLO-ruled Palestinian Authority (PA). The PA arrests their activists and refuses them any formal political power, but there is also a strong measure of mutual tolerance in order to prevent a civil war.

Within Lebanon, Hizballah attacked Israel and its allies in southern Lebanon until the Israeli withdrawal in May 2000. Now Hizballah is putting a higher priority on its efforts to gain power within the Shi'ite community and in the country as a whole. The non-Shi'ite communities, the Lebanese government, and Lebanon's Syrian masters totally opposed Hizballah's program for Lebanon even when they tolerated or helped its attacks against Israel. The big question for Hizballah is to what extent it will shift its tactics from armed struggle against Israel or within Lebanon and instead use electoral means to try to achieve its goals.

Thus, while the Islamist groups flourish and are allowed to service their constituencies with various institutions, they are also kept from progressing toward national rule. As long as Islamists accept these limits, the situation can continue. But a serious effort to alter the power balance would lead to civil wars more closely resembling those in the first group discussed above.

 Reformists

In Egypt, Jordan, Morocco, Kuwait, Turkey, Pakistan, and Israel, the main Islamist forces have eschewed violence and acted as social and parliamentary movements. Operating within the legal system allows them to exert influence and bring about some changes. Equally or more important, this situation allows them to build a vast social and educational apparatus of institutions which creates a community of supporters.

These movements become interest groups within society rather than standing in total opposition outside society with the principal goal of overturning it. The constituency obtains patronage and services from the party. The leadership receives various privileges, including financial benefits, power, and prestige that might be lost if it challenges the government. In turn, the tolerance and benefits that the government allows these groups gives them something to protect. Thus, such institutionalization—even if intended to provide a base for revolutionary activities—could become a restraining force.

But ultimately each movement will have to decide whether to limit itself to this role, for neither the existing governments nor the political systems—includ- ing the undemocratic electoral systems—will let the Islamists hold power. This could change in the long run, of course, as different societies develop and if Islamist movements prove their democratic, moderate credentials.

In response, the movements argue that their techniques win followers and provide a springboard for taking power in the future. By appealing to conservative practitioners of a more traditionalist Islam—who oppose or distrust the revolutionary movements—they can dramatically broaden their political base of support. It is also possible or even likely—as has happened with other social and political movements—that they themselves will be transformed into factors that ultimately reinforce rather than subvert the status quo. An ability to live an ‘Islamist’ lifestyle as an individual is, after all, an alternative to trying to transform an entire society. Moreover, there are many issues to be contested—including struggles over the distribution of the national budget—that fall far short of a struggle to seize state power.

Still, the underlying question is to define these groups’ aims. Can they construct a program of changes that would satisfy them within the context of the existing society, or do they still seek its ultimate transition into a very different kind of polity? In short, is their reformism limited only to tactics or does it also embody their goals? This process of rethinking is still going on and, in most cases, has not yet taken hold in the movements, though internal debates and struggles over this issue will probably increase in the future.

The American and French revolutions encouraged a wave of democratic revolutions throughout Europe and elsewhere. The Russian revolution inspired the formation of communist parties that struggled to imitate it for many decades.

The Chinese and Cuban revolutions launched many movements that imitated their strategies in the belief that these victories could be duplicated.

Iran’s revolution should be seen in a similar historical perspective. Islamist groups already existed independently—as did parallel movements in the cases of the other revolutions—but were galvanized and strengthened by the seizure of power by their fellows. These organizations provided a response to the failures in their countries of nationalism and other ideologies, the strains of development, shortcomings of existing regimes, pressures of Westernization, and social grievances. They will continue to develop and evolve for some decades to come.

The seizure of power anywhere by an Islamist movement—though this seems unlikely at present—would again inspire imitators. A demographic wave of young people, along with the incumbent regimes’ failures and growing socioeconomic pressures, may allow radical Islamist groups to grow in size as well as ability to challenge current rulers. Equally, the lack of real democratic systems that would let Islamists win elections could bring an eventual rejection of moderation.

More likely is a long-run trend toward moderation, producing some Islamist parties with a reformist orientation. There are even signs of such developments in Iran, where moderates and radicals struggle over the regime’s orientation. In Turkey, the Islamist party is divided into radical and moderate elements, with the latter realizing the movement can never make much progress until it persuades other Turks that it does not seek to establish an Islamist state.

Islamists could become the equivalent of Christian Democratic parties of Europe or Latin America, or of Israel’s Jewish religious parties. In other words, the party would focus on advocacy regarding specific issues and protecting the interests of its supporters or institutions, rather than seeking to transform society as a whole. Party leaders, potential coalition partners, and rivals will all ask whether an Islamist party that did gain power peacefully would also surrender it under democratic conditions.

A trend toward moderation is by no means inevitable. There are strong pressures from Islamist ideology and individual leaders or factions to maintain a hard line. Equally, the fact that employing moderate means is less likely to result in gaining state power also makes this road less attractive. Finally, the momentum of Iran’s militant faction and potential regional events is by no means exhausted. Yet the progress of Islamist movements has been far from the triumphal march into power hoped for, and predicted, by the Islamists themselves. Trends toward moderation, while still limited, are stronger than they have been in the past. Of course, the situation will vary according to each country’s political culture, situation, and regime.

Perhaps, in the long run, the historical function of Islamist organizations may not be so different from the role religion and social movements have played over the centuries in the West. Such groups formed as responses to the challenges of modernization, nation-building, and the alternative appeals of democracy and dictatorship. Indeed, Islamist movements—despite appearances and their own denials—are part of the broader history of nationalism. Moreover, they oppose what are seen as foreign imports that undermine the tradition and authenticity of their societies. True, they ostensibly stress a primary identity in religious rather than nationalist terms. But in the Middle East, religion is often the main marker of ethnicity.

Ultimately, their choices and institutional structures must be set by a determination of the strategy, tactics, type of society, and variety of political system that would best allow for the expression and preservation of that identity.

 Contributors

ALI R. ABOOTALEBI is assistant professor of political science at the University of Wisconsin, Eau Claire. His book, Islam and Democracy: State-Society Relations in the Developing Countries, 1980—1994 is forthcoming.

BULENT ARAS is assistant professor of international relations at Fatih University, Istanbul. He is author of The Palestinian-Israeli Peace Process and Turkey and The New Geopolitics of Eurasia and Turkey's Position (forthcoming), and co-editor of The Oil and Geopolitics in Caspian Sea Region.

OMER CAHA is associate professor of political science at Fatih University, Istanbul. Widely published on the recent political history of Turkey, his most recent book is on intellectuals and democracy in Turkey.

DALE F. EICKELMAN is Ralph and Richard Lazarus Professor of Anthropology and Human Relations at Dartmouth College. His most recent books include The Middle East and Central Asia: An Anthropological Approach; New Media in the Muslin World: The Emerging Public Sphere, co-edited with Jon W. Anderson; and Muslim Politics, co-authored with James Piscatori. His contribution to this volume is a revised and updated version of "Inside the Islamic Reformation," Wilson Quarterly.

SHAFEEQ N. GHABRA is professor of political science at Kuwait University. He is author of Kuwait: A Study of the Dynamics of State, Authority and Society and Israel and the Arabs: From the Conflict of Issues to the Peace of Interests. The author would like to thank Kuwait University (research administration) for the grant that made this study possible. An earlier version of this study appeared in Middle East Policy.

GEORGE E. IRANI is visiting assistant professor in political science at Washington College. From 1993 to 1997, he was a faculty member at the Lebanese American University (formerly Beirut University College), where he was one of the founders of the Lebanese Conflict Resolution Network (LCRN). In 1997— 1998, he was a Jennings Randolph Senior Fellow at the U. S. Institute of Peace. His chapter is based on research he conducted there.

ELY KARMON is a senior research scholar at the International Policy Institute for Counter-Terrorism of the Interdisciplinary Center in Herzliya. He lectures on International Terrorism at the Political Science Department of Haifa University.

CHARLES KURZMAN is assistant professor of sociology at the University of North Carolina and editor of Liberal Islam: A Source-Book and Modernist Islam, 1840—1940: A Source-Book (forthcoming).

MEIR LITVAK is a senior research associate at the Dayan Center for Middle Eastern and African Studies, Tel Aviv University. He is the author of Shi'i Scholars of Nineteenth Century Iraq: The 'Ulama' of Najaf and Karbala', and editor of Islam and Democracy in the Arab World (in Hebrew).

BRUCE MADDY-WEITZMAN is a senior research fellow at the Moshe Dayan Center of Middle Eastern and African Studies, Tel Aviv University. He is author of The Crystallization of the Arab State System, 1945—1954, editor of the Center's annual Middle East Contemporary Survey, and co-editor, with Efraim Inbar, of Religious Radicalism in the Greater Middle East.

NILUFER NARLI is associate professor and chair of the sociology department, Marmara University, Turkey. Her publications include "Moderate Against Radical Islamicism in Turkey," Zeitschrift Fur Turkeistudien; (with Sinan Dirlik), "Turkiye'nin Siyasi Haritas" (The Political Map of Turkey), Turkiye Gunlucu; and "Women and Islam: Female Participation in the Islamicist Movement in Turkey," Turkish Review of Middle East Studies.

REUVEN PAZ is director of the Project for the Study of Islamist Movements at the Global Research in International Affairs Center. His works on Palestinian Islamic movements are widely published, including the first two academic articles ever published analyzing Hamas and the Islamic movement in Israel.

BARRY RUBIN is director of the Global Research in International Affairs Center and its Institute for Turkish Studies. He is the editor of the Middle East Review of International Affairs, and editor of Turkish Studies. A prolific author, his latest book is The Tragedy of the Middle East.

EMMANUEL SIVAN is a professor at the Hebrew University. His books include Radical Islam; the co-edited War and Remembrance in the Twentieth Century: Mythes Politiques Arabes; and Strong Religion.

DAVID ZEIDAN received a Ph.D. from the University of London for his thesis “The Resurgence of Religion: A Comparative Study of Selected Themes in Christian and Islamic Fundamentalisms.” His publications include “The Copts — Equal, Protected or Persecuted? The Impact of Islamization on Muslim-Christian Relations in Modern Egypt,” Islam and Christian-Muslim Relations; and “The Alevis of Anatolia,” Middle East Review of International Affairs.

EYAL ZISSER is a senior research fellow at the Moshe Dayan Center for Middle East and African Studies, and head of the program of Middle Eastern Studies at the Department of Middle Eastern and African History, Tel Aviv University.

 Index

[Page numbers don’t correspond to this version.]

<biblio>

Abd al-Rahman, Shaykh Umar, 13, 17, 19

al-Abdallah, Shaykh Sa‘ad, 119

al-‘Abidin ‘Ali, Zayn, 3

Absent Truth, The. See al-Haqiqah al-

Gha’ibah

Abu Bakra, 195

Abu Hamza, Shaykh, 5

Abu Hassan, Muhammad, 183

Abu Nidal group, 53

Abu Zaid, Muhammad Fuad, 30

Abu Zayd, Nasr, 118

al-‘Adl wal-Ihsan (Justice and Charity movement), 74, 75, 76

al-Adwah, Khalidm, 113

Afghanistan, 4, 8, 19, 33, 197, 213

AIS (Islamic Salvation Army), 3, 80, 82, 83

Akademi, 46. See also Turkish Islamist movements, publications by

Akgonenc, Dr. Oya, 132

Akinci Yolu, 46. See also Turkish Islamist movements, publications by Akit, 131. See also Turkish Islamist movements, publications by

Akman, Nuriye, 143

Akparti (Justice and Development Party), 135

Aksoy, Muammar, 45

Aksu, Abdulkadir, 47, 132

Akyol, Natik, 128

al-Alfi, Hassan, 19

Algeria, 3, 6, 80, 84, 161, 212

Islamist activities in, 69, 76, 79, 80—85

Algerian Hamas, 80

Algerian Muslim Brotherhood, 6. See also Social Movement for Peace

Ben ‘Ali, Zayn ‘Abidin, 3, 77, 78, 79

Alpay, Sahin, 146

Altan, Mehmet, 150

Altayli, Fatih, 52

Amal movement, 93, 96, 97, 98, 100

American embassies, attacks on, 19

Amin, Hussain Ahmad, 118

Anatolian Lions, 128. See also MUSIAD

An-Na’im, Abdallahi, 194

Annan, Kofi, 96

Ansari, Muhamad, 109

al-Aqsa mosque, 28

Arab Child’s House, 27

Arafat, Yasir, 211

Arendt, Hannah, 185, 186

Arkun, Muhammad, 118, 194

Arslan, Fathallah, 76

Asghar, Ali, 192

al-Assad, Bashar, 99

al-Assad, Hafiz, 3, 98, 99

Association of Independent Industrialists and Businessmen. See MUSIAD

Asya Finans, 146

Aujjar, Mohammed, 75

awareness. See wa’i

Ba’ath Party (Iraq), 24, 180

Ba’ath Party (Syria), 24, 180

al-Badir, Sulaiman, 115

Bin Badis, Shaykh Abd al-Hamid, 69

al-Baghdadi, Ahmad, 115—116

Bahrain, 3, 212

Barak, Ehud, 91

Barlas, Mehmet, 150

Barri, Nabih, 93

Bartholomeos, Patriarch, 144

Basesgioglu, Murat, 52

Basri, Driss, 72

Bayramoglu, Ali, 150

Bazargan, Mehdi, 194

Bedouin, 109, 183

Belhadj, ‘Ali, 80, 81, 82

Benjedid, Chedli, 80

Benjelloun, Omar, 73

Benkirane, Abdallah, 74

Bethlehem University (prev. Freres College), 30, 36

Bi-aqlam al-Shabab. See Palestinian Hamas, publications by

Bir, Cevik, 56–57

Birand, Mehmet Ali, 150

Bir Zeit University, 30, 33, 36

Boumedienne, Houari, 80

Bourghiba, Habib, 3, 77

Bosnia, 4

Bouteflika, Abd al-‘Aziz, 84

Bouyali, Mustafa, 80

Bulac, Ali, 192

Caliphate. See khilafa

Cagarici, Irfan, 46

Cakir, Rusen, 149

Candar, Cengiz, 150

Celik, Gulten, 132

Celik, Halil, 53

Ceylan, Hasan Huseyni, 53

Ceysullah, 59

Chamoun, 179

CHP (Republican People’s Party), 126, 129

Cicek, Cemil, 131

Ciller, Tansu, 130, 150

Civil society. See al-mujtama‘ al-madani

Coskun, Ali, 132

Cultural Social Society (jam‘iyyat al-Thaqafah al-Ijtima‘iyah), 107, 108

da’wa, 2

Da’wa associations, 2

Dayton agreements (1995), 4

Demirel, Suleyman, 49, 58, 126, 127,

145, 146, 148

Democratic Forum (al-Manbar al-Dimuqrati), 112

Democratic Left Party (DLP), 51, 125, 130, 133

Democratic Party (DP), 125, 129 dhimmis, 17, 179—180. See also Islam, Christians and Jews in

Dirani, Mustafa, 100

Djaballah, Shaykh Abdallah, 80

Donmez, Kemal, 52

DSKO. See World Shari’a Liberation

Army

Eaton, Gai, 198

Ecevit, Bulent, 51, 55, 56, 126, 127,

145, 146, 148

Egypt, 3–4, 6, 110, 160, 161, 173, 211,

215

Egyptian Jihad, 5, 29

Egyptian Muslim Brotherhood, 5, 7, 11, 12, 14, 27, 36, 71, 77, 107, 210, 212, 214

Eickelman, Dale F., 145

EIK-TM. See Turkish Fighters of the Universal Islamic War of Liberation EKC-SIM. See Universal Brotherhood

Front—Shari’a Revenge Squad Erbakan, Necmettin, 41, 46, 47, 49, 50— 51, 52–53, 56, 125, 127, 131, 135, 148, 211

Erdis, Salih Izzet (Salih Mirzabeyoglu), 51

Erdogan, Recep Tayip, 126, 131, 134, 135, 149

Esack, Farid, 193

Esmerer, Abdurrahman, 128

Ethiopia, 5

Evren, Kenan, 127

al-Faluji, Shaykh ‘Imad, 7

Faraj, Abd al-Salam, 14, 17

Neglected Obligation, The, 13 al-farida al-gha’ibah. See Neglected Obligation (Faraj), The al-Fasi, ‘Allal, 70

Fatah, 34, 35, 53, 213

fatwa (religious legal edict), 17

Faldlallah, Muhammad Husayn, 97, 98

Fatma Gate, 96

Fazilet Party. See FP

Fellah, Tariq, 75

fiqh, 15

FIS (Islamic Salvation Front), 6—7, 47, 53, 78, 80–83, 160, 199, 214

FIT. See Tunisian Islamic Front

Fighters of the Islamic Revolution (IDAM), 42

FLN (Front de Liberation Nationale), 79, 80

Fountain, The, 145. See also Turkish Teachers’ Foundation four schools of Islam, the. See madhabs FP (as Virtue Party, as Fazilet Party), 50, 51, 53, 57, 126, 129, 132, 134, 135, 148, 149

France, 70, 84, 92, 204

Freres College. See Bethlehem University

Front de Liberation Nationale. See FLN fundamentalism, 157–158

Gaza Strip, 23, 24, 25, 27, 37

Gemayel family, 179

al-Ghannushi, Rashid, 9, 77–80, 164, 165, 194

gharb, 69, 70

al-Ghazzali, 159

Gholizadeh, Abbas, 45

GIA (Islamic Salvation Group), 3, 18, 44, 81–84, 214

Giddens, Anthony, 181

God’s sovereignty. See hakimmiyya

Gokalp, Ziya, 151

Golan Heights, 100

Graham, Billy, 205

Great Eastern Islamic Fighters Front, The. See IBDA-C

Green, Jerrold, 167

Guessous, Muhammad, 70

Gul, Abdallah, 47, 132

Gulen, Fethullah, 53, 142–144, 146, conception of Turkish Islam, 141, 143144

149, 152, 205

opposition to, 147–150

political influence of, 145 support to, 144–145, 150

See also Gulen movement

Gulen movement, 144–146, 150–152.

See also Journalists’ and Writers’ Foundation; Turkish Teachers’ Foundation; Gulen, Fethullah

Gurses, Emin, 54

HADEP (People’s Democracy Party), 129–130

hadith, 15

al-Hajji, Yusef, 106

hakimmiyya (God’s sovereignty), 12

Haktanir, Korkmaz, 55

Hama, massacre, 3

Hamas. See Palestinian Hamas

al-Haqiqah al-Gha’ibah (The Absent Truth), 36

al-Harakah al-Islamiyyah al-Tulabiyyah (The Islamic Student Movement), 34

Harakat al-Islah wal-Tajdid (Movement for Reform and Renewal), 74

Harakat al-Tawhid wal-Islah (Movement for Unification and Reform), 74

Harb, Muhammad, 29

al-Haroun, Dr. Musaid, 114

King Hassan II, 71, 74

policies of, 72–73

Hebrew University, 37

Hebron University, 29

Hermassi, Abd al-Baki, 70

High Education Council. See YOK hijra (Muhammad’s original flight from Mecca to Medina), 13, 16

Hizballah, 7, 91, 93–95, 97, 99, 101, 210, 212

Iranian support to, 92, 94, 95, 97, 98, 99, 101

opposition to, 96–97, 98, 99

struggle against Israel, 92, 93, 95–96, 99–101, 214

Syrian support to, 92, 94, 95, 98, 99, 101

use of violence by, 92, 94

Hizb al-Tahrir al-Islami. See Islamic

Liberation Party

Huntington, Samuel P., 78, 166, 203

al-Husayni, 27

Hussein, Saddam, 3, 210

IBDA-C (The Great Eastern Islamic Fighters Front), 44, 52, 53, 59, 133 publications by, 46. See also Turkish

Islamist movements, publications by use of violence by, 45, 46, 51, 52

Ibn Anas, Imam Malik, 195

Ibn Hanbal, 159

Ibn Qatada, Shaykh, 5

Ibn Taymiyya, 15, 19, 159

Ibrahim, Anwar, 196

al-Ibrahim, Hassan, 108

ICCB (Union of Islamic Associations and Societies), 59

ICM. See Islamic Constitutional Move ment

IDAM. See Fighters of the Islamic Revolution

IKO. See Turkish Islamic Liberation

Army

IKP-C. See Islamic Liberation Party

Front

Ilicak, Nazli, 132, 133

IMO. See Turkish Islamic Fighters Army

Imset, Ismet, 42, 43, 47

INA. See Islamic National Alliance

Independent Islamists, The. See al-

Islamiyyun al-Mustaqillun

Intifada, 27, 32, 35, 36, 101

IPA. See Islamic Popular Alliance

Iran, 8, 35, 44, 54, 55, 143, 158, 160, 161, 163, 167, 204

Islamic Revolution in, 29, 34, 42, 43, 71, 92, 93, 107, 155, 157, 159, 163, 197, 207 and relations with Turkey, 46—48, 50, 55

support to Hizballah by, 92, 94, 95, 97, 98, 99, 101 support to terrorism by, 44, 47–48, 50, 57 and war with Iraq, 44, 213

Iraq, 179,

and war with Iran, 44, 213 and war with Kuwait, 110, 210, 213

Islam, 155, 161, 180, 208–209

Christians and Jews in, 17, 179–180.

See also dhimmis

civil society in, 157, 163 and democracy, 155, 157, 160, 162,

164, 166, 167

doctrine of, 155, 158, 162

See also ‘ulama; Shari’a

Islamic Action, 45, 46

Islamic Action Front. See Jordanian

Muslim Brotherhood

Islamic Constitutional Movement (ICM),

111, 113, 115, 117

Islamic Group, The (al-Jama’ah al-Islamiyyah), 34

Islamic information centers, 26

Islamic Jihad Squadrons (Saraya al-Jihad al-Islami), 35

Islamic Jihad Squadrons Jerusalem/the temple (Saraya al-Jihad al-Islami Bait al-Maqdes), 35

Islamic Liberation Party (Hizb al-Tahrir al-Islami), 24, 42

Islamic Liberation Party Front (IKP-C), 42

Islamic Movement (Islami Hareket), The,

42, 43, 45, 52, 59–60

Islamic National Alliance (INA), 111

Islamic People’s Command, 131

Islamic Popular Alliance (IPA), 111

Islamic Resistance (Islami Direnis). See

Islamic Movement (Islami Hareket)

Islamic Salvation Army. See AIS

Islamic Salvation Front. See FIS

Islamic Salvation Group. See GIA

Islamic Social Reform Society (al-Islah al-Ijtima‘i), 106, 107, 108, 111

Islamic Student Movement, The. See al-

Harakah al-Islamiyyah al-Tulabiyyah

Islamic University of Gaza, 25, 28, 31,

33, 34, 35, 36

Islamist movements, 1–4, 6, 8, 9, 12,

41, 76, 78, 94, 100, 160, 207, 208, 211–217

activities of, 2, 4, 5, 6, 28, 75, 142

ideology of, 4, 44, 156, 157, 160, 166

and Israel, 28, 33, 34, 36, 49, 53,

56–57, 92, 93, 95–96, 99–101, 213–215

opposition to, 3, 6

publications by, 27–29, 43, 46

use of violence by, 3, 18, 45, 49, 213

Islamist Welfare Party. See RP

al-Islamiyyun al-Mustaqillun (The Inde pendent Islamists), 34

al-Israa’ wal-Mi’raj, 28

Israel, 4, 12, 24, 25, 37, 163, 177, 212

Hizballah’s struggle against, 92, 93, 95–96, 99–101, 214 and Islamist movements, 28, 33, 34, 36, 49, 53, 56–57, 92, 93, 95–96, 99–101, 213–215 relations with Lebanon, 29, 91, 92, 95, 96, 98, 101, 214 relations with Syria, 95, 99, 100, 101 relations with Turkey, 49, 53, 56–57

Israeli-Palestinian conflict, 100, 161

itjihad (legal reinterpretation), 8, 15

‘Iz al-Din Ibrahim, Dr. See al-Shqaqi, Dr. Fathi

‘Iz al-Din al-Qassam Brigades, 34

jahiliyya (pagan ignorance), 12, 15

Jalal al-‘Azm, Sadiq, 205

al-Jama’ah al-Islamiyyah (Palestinian). See Islamic Group, The al-Jama’at al-Islamiyya (Radical Islamic societies), 7, 11, 12, 19, 160

jama’at. See al-Jama’at al-Islamiyya

Jamaat-i Islami, 159

Jama’at al-Jihad or al-Jihad (Society of Struggle), 12, 14–16

use of violence by, 13, 17–19

Japanese Red Army, 53

al-Jaza’ira, 83, 205

Jerusalem, 23, 25

jihad, 12, 17, 33

Jordan, 3, 4, 173, 177, 211, 212, 215

Jordanian Communist Party, 24

Jordanian Muslim Brotherhood, (Islamic

Action Front), 7, 27, 32, 210

Journalists’ and Writers’ Foundation, 145, 150. See also Gulen movement

JP (Justice Party), 126–127, 129

Jumblatt family, 179

Justice Party. See JP

Justice and Charity movement. See al-

‘Adl wal-Ihsan

Justice and Development Party. See Akparti

Kabir, Humayun, 192

Kabir, Rabah, 82

Kadiris, 59

Kamhi, Jak, 45

Karaday, Ismail Hakk, 148

Karamanoglu, Altan, 53

Karimov, Islam, 53

Kazan, Sevket, 131

Khamene’i, Ayatollah Ali, 44, 53, 57,

98, 158

kharijis, 19

Khatami, Muhammad, 57, 133, 158,

198, 207

Khatib, Abd al-Karim, 74

khilafa (Caliphate), 14, 15, 19, 35

Khomeini, Ayatollah Ruhollah, 34, 43,

44, 80, 84, 97, 158, 208

al-Khorafi, Jassem, 119

Kilic, Altemur, 150

al-Kindari, Jamal, 114

Kirca, Ali, 46

Kislali, Ahmet Taner, 51, 52

al-Kitab wal Quran (Shahrur), 118, 205

Kubba, Laith, 167

Kutlar, Onat, 45, 46

Kurdistan Workers’ Party. See PKK

Kurds, 129, 130, 132, 133

Kutan, Recai, 131, 133, 149

Kuwait, 3, 105, 106, 109, 110, 118,

120, 121, 160, 164, 215

application of Shari’a in, 111–112,

114, 117, 119

and conflict with Iraq, 110, 210 relations with the United States, 110, 116

Kuwait University, 107, 109, 113–114, 120

Kuwaiti Islamic movements, 109, 111 political of activities of, 107–108,

112–115

revival of, 105, 107, 117

Kuwaiti Muslim Brotherhood, 107, 108, 111, 117 bin Ladin, Osama, 19

Lapidot, Anat, 42

League of the Islamic Future. See Rabitat al-Mustaqbal al-Islami

Lebanese American University, 176

Lebanese University, 182

Lebanese Hizballah, 53

Lebanon, 4, 92, 106, 160, 173, 177,

179, 182

Maronite-Sunni community in, 93, 94, 98, 181

and relations with Israel, 29, 91, 92,

95, 96, 98, 101, 214

Shi’ite community in, 91–93, 94, 95

Western culture and, 176, 177 legal reinterpretation. See itjihad

Lerner, Daniel, 203

Libya, 3

Madani, Dr. ‘Abbasi, 80, 81, 82, 199

madhabs (the four schools of Islam), 15

al-Madhkur, Khalid, 117

Madjid, Nurcholish, 195–196

Mahcupyan, Etyen, 150

mahdi, 11, 18

Mahmassani, Subhi, 192

majlis al-shura, 13

Makovsky, Alan, 56, 58

Malatya (Islamic Youth), 61, 133

Mandela, Nelson, 176

al-Manbar al-Dimuqrati. See Democratic Forum

March 1991, revolt of, 3

Markaba, 100

Mashriq, 69, 70

Mawdudi, Abul A’la, 159

Mawdudi, Mawlana, 77

Mernissi, Fatima, 70–71, 194–195

Merzaq, Madani, 82, 83

MGK. See NSC

MHP. See Nationalist Movement Party

MIA (Mouvement Islamique Arme), 81

Milliyet, 55

Mirzabeyoglu, Salih. See Erdis, Salih Izzet

MIT. See Turkish National Intelligence Organization.

Morocco, 3, 4, 6, 69, 70, 75, 211, 215

Islamist activities in, 73, 75, 76

Motherland Party, 129

Mouvement Islamique Arme. See MIA

Mouvement Populaire Democratique et Constitutionnel. See MPDC

Movement for Reform and Renewal. See

Harakat al-Islah wal-Tajdid

Movement for Unification and Reform.

See Harakat al-Tawhid wal-Islah

MPDC (Mouvement Populaire Democratique et Constitutionnel), 74

Mu’awad, Rene, 94

Mubarak, Hosni, 3, 5, 47

mudawwana (Moroccan personal status law), 72, 76

mufassala kamila (total separation), 16

King Muhammad VI, 71, 72, 73, 75

Muhammad’s original flight from Mecca to Medina. See hijra mujaddid, 11

mujahidin, 19

al-Mujtama, 117

al-mujtama‘ al-madani (civil society), 78, 157, 163, 165 al-Mukhtar al-Islami. See Islamist movements, publications by Mumcu, Ugur, 45, 47, 48, 49 al-Muntalaq, 30, 31. See also Palestinian Islamic groups, publications by musalaha, 174, 183–186. See also Shari’a

MUSIAD (Association of Independent Industrialists and Businessmen), 128

Muslim Youth Association, 29

Mustafa, Shukri, 13

al-Mutawa, Abdallah, 111, 118

al-Mutayri, Mufaraj Nahar, 113 al-Muti, Abd al-Karim, 74, 75 Muzzaffar, Chandra, 192, 194

Mzali, Muhammad, 78

Nader, Laura, 174–175

al-Nahda movement, 7, 9, 77, 80, 164

Nahnah, Shaykh Mahfoud, 6, 80

al-Najah university, 30, 32, 34, 36

Nakshibendis, 59, 126

Naksibendi, Bahaeddin, 146

NAP (National Action Party), 126—127

Nasrallah, Hasan, 94, 96, 100, 101

Nasser, 11

National Action Party. See NAP

National Order Party. See NOP

National Palestinian Council, 29

National Salvation Party. See NSP

National Union of Kuwaiti Students, 119

National View, 53

National Youth Foundation, 59

Nationalist Movement Party (MHP), 43, 51, 129

Neglected Obligation, The (Faraj), 13

Neo-Destour party, 9

New Jihad Group, The (Vanguards of the Conquest), 18

al-Nidaa. See Palestinian Hamas, publications by

NOP (National Order Party), 125—126

November 17 Organization, 53

NSC (National Security Council), 44, 49, 50, 58, 128, 131, 134, 135, 147

NSP (National Salvation Party), 41, 126–127, 129 al-Nur. See Palestinian Islamic Jihad, publications by al-Nur al-Ilahi. See Palestinian Islamic

Jihad, publications by al-Nur al-Rabbani. See Palestinian Islamic

Jihad, publications by

Nur movement, 141, 142, 161, 205

Nurcu movement. See Nur movement

Nurcus, 126

Nursi, Said, 141, 142, 143, 162

Risale-i-Nur, 142

Objektif, 43, 46. See also Turkish Islamist movements, publications by Ocalan, Abdullah, 53, 54, 55, 58, 133

Ocalan, Osman, 55

Oman, 164, 203

One Minute of Darkness for Enlightenment protest, 131. See also Turkey, political discontent in

Orientalists, 155

Ottoman Empire, 142, 180

Ozal, Turgut, 46, 47, 128, 129, 143

Ozdag, Umit, 54

Ozdalga, Elisabeth, 146

Ozkaragoz, Mehmet, 144

Ozdemir, Hasan, 52

Ozkok, Ertugrul, 51

Ozturk, Prof. Yasar Nuri, 52

pagan ignorance. See jahiliyya

Pakistan, 3, 5, 215

Paladin Howitzer crisis, 116

Palestine, 33, 36

Palestinian Authority, 36, 37, 214

Palestinian Communist Party, 29, 31 Palestinian Hamas (Palestinian Muslim Brotherhood), 4, 7, 23, 24, 27, 28, 33, 35–36, 47, 160, 210, 213 and activities in universities, 29–31 publications by, 29, 32 social activities of, 26–28 use of violence by, 26

Palestinian Islamic groups, 23, 27, 28,

30, 32, 34

activities of, 28, 29, 33

publications by, 30, 31, See also al-

Muntalaq; al-Nidaa

Palestinian Islamic Jihad 23, 26, 27, 28, 33, 34, 44, 101, 210, 213, 214 publications by, 29, 34, 35 use of violence by, 35

Palestinian Liberation Organization. See PLO Palestinian Muslim Brotherhood. See

Palestinian Hamas

Palestinian society, 24–26, 36, 37 Pan-Arabism, 1, 70

Parti de la Justice et du Developpement.

See PJD

Party of the Blissfulness. See Saadet Party People’s Democracy Party. See HADEP

People’s Liberation Army of Kurdistan, 53 PJD (Parti de la Justice et du Developpement), 74

PKK (Kurdistan Workers’ Party), 42, 46, 47–49, 50, 55, 56

use of violence by, 52, 53

PLO (Palestinian Liberation Organiza tion), 25, 26, 27, 28, 33, 36, 213

PMMC Report (Prime Minister’s Monitoring Council), 58

Protestant Ethics of Capitalism, The (Weber) 151–152

Qadhafi, Muammar, 3, 131

al-Qaradawi, Shaykh Yusuf, 5, 205

al-Qasim, Na’im, 94, 100

Qutb, Sayyid, 11–12, 34, 77, 82, 159

Rabitat al-Mustaqbal al-Islami (League of the Islamic Future), 74

Ra‘d, Muhammad, 101

Radical Islamic movements. See Islamist movements.

Radical Islamic societies. See al-Jama’at al-Islamiyya

Rahman, Fazlur, 159

Rahmet Group, 54

Rassemblement National Democratique. See RND

Redjam, Abd al-Razak, 199

Refah Party, 148, 149

Religious legal edict. See fatwa

Renan, Ernest, 199

Republican People’s Party. See CHP

Resalat, 56

Revivalist. See salafi al-Risalah. See Palestinian Hamas, publications by

Risale-i-Nur (Nursi), 142

RND (Rassemblement National Democratique), 82

Rosefsky Wickham, Carrie, 163

RP (Islamist Welfare Party), 41, 47, 48

49, 50, 53, 57, 126, 127, 130, 131,

132, 211

al-Rube‘i, Ahmad, 114

Saadet Party (Party of the Blissfulness),

134

al-Sa‘adoun, Ahmad, 116

Sabah, 106

al-Sabah, Shaykh Sabah al-Ahmad, 119

al-Sabah, Shaykh Sa‘ud Nasser, 116

Sadat, 12, 13, 29

al-Sadiq al-Nayhum, 118

al-Sadr, Musa, 93, 97

Sa’id, Muhammad, 199

al-Salaf organization, 107, 108, 111

salafi, 14, 24, 69, 71, 83

Salam family, 179

Salvation from Hell group, 18

Santillana, 160

Saraya al-Jihad al-Islami. See Islamic Jihad Squadrons

Saraya al-Jihad al-Islami Bait al-Maqdes. See Islamic Jihad Squadrons Jerusa- lem/the temple

Saudi Arabia, 12, 24, 42, 71, 111, 143, 160, 164, 206, 211

Savasir, Iskender, 150

Sawt al-Haqq Wal-Quwah Wal-Hurriyah. See Palestinian Hamas, publications by

Sayari, Sabri, 42

September 1980 military coup, 41, 43, 127

September 11, 2001, attacks of, 19, 121

Sezer, Ahmet Necdet, 149

Shaba’a Farms, 100, 101

Shabiba (lijan al-shabibah lil-‘amal al- ijtima’i, youth committees for social work), 31

al-Shabiba al-Islamiyya, 74, 75

al-Shafi’i, 159

Shafiq, Munir, 8

Shahrur, Muhammad, 118, 194, 205

Al-Kitab wal Quran, 118, 205 al-Shqaqi, Dr. Fathi (pseud. Dr. ‘Iz al-Din Ibrahim), 29, 44

Shari’a (Islamic law), 5, 14, 15, 19–20, 80, 109, 111, 142, 143, 158, 159, 161, 192, 199, 200. See also Islam; sulh ritual; musalaha al-Shatti, Dr. Isma‘il, 117 al-Shawayyib, Fahid Abd al-Rahman, 111 al-Shihab. See Palestinian Hamas, publications by Shu‘ayb, ‘Alya, 115

shura, 8, 77, 159

Siddiqui, Kalim, 43

Sidky, ‘Atef, 19

Sizinti, 145. See also Turkish Teachers’

Foundation

SLA (South Lebanese Army), 96

SMC (Supreme Military Council), 49

Social Movement for Peace, 6

Society of Muslims. See Takfir wal-Hijra

Society of the Rebirth of Islamic Tradition, 111

Society of Struggle. See al-Jama’at al-

Jihad

El-Sohl, 179

Soroush, Abdul Karim, 164, 165, 193,

197

South Lebanese Army. See SLA

Soviet Union, 2, 42

Sudan, 2, 8, 160, 161, 167

Suez Canal, 3

Sufi tradition, 141—142, 152

sulh ritual, 174, 183—186. See also

Shari’a

Sunna, 14

Syria, 3, 33, 58, 110, 160, 177, 179,

211 relations with Israel, 95, 99, 100, 101

support to Hizballah by, 92, 94, 95,

98, 99, 101

Syrian Muslim Brotherhood, 53, 210, 212

Tabligh, 74

Ta’if Agreement, 93, 94, 98

Tajammu al’Islah party, 7

takfir (unbelief), 12, 13

Takfir wal-Hijra or al-Takfir (Society of Muslims), 13, 15, 17–18

ideology of, 12, 14–16, 19

recruitment by, 13–14,

use of violence by, 18, 19

Talbi, Muhammad, 192, 193

Taleqani, Ayatollah, 158, 162

Taliban, 160

talqin, 5

al-Tamimi, Shaykh As’ad, 35

taqnin al-Shari’a, 7

Taraf, 46. See also IBDA-C, publications by; Turkish Islamist movements, publications by

tawaghit (idols), 15

Tehvid, 43, 46. See also publications by Turkish Islamist movements

Tekdal, Ahmet, 53

Ten-member consultation committee. See majlis al-shura

Territories, the. See Gaza Strip; West Bank

THKP-C. See Turkish People’s Liberation

Party Front

Tibi, Bassam, 180

TIKB. See Turkish Islamic Liberation

Union

TIK-C. See Turkish Islamic Liberation Front

Total separation. See mufassala kamila

Tozy, Mohamed, 74

True Path Party, 129, 130

TSIK. See Turkish Shari’a Revenge

Commandos

al-Tufayli, Shaykh Subhi, 97, 98

Tunc, Abd al-‘Aziz, 55

Tunisia, 3, 6, 69, 70, 74, 76–77, 79

Tunisian Islamic Front (FIT), 7

al-Turabi, Hasan, 8, 71, 80, 162

Turkes, Alpaslan, 126, 127

Turkey, 3, 7, 41, 47, 51–52, 125–127,

163, 204, 212, 215

conflict between Sunnis and Alevis in,

127, 129 130, 144

political discontent in, 127, 130, 131. See also One Minute of Darkness for Enlightenment protest and relations with Iran, 46–48, 50, 55

and relations with Israel, 49, 53, 56

57 socioeconomic situation in, 125, 127, 128, 130, 133, 134

Turkish Businessmen’s and Industrialists’ Association. See TUSIAD

Turkish Fighters of the Universal Islamic War of Liberation (EIK-TM), 42

Turkish Hizballah, 42, 43, 44, 47, 52,

54, 59, 60, 133

use of violence by, 45–46, 51, 53

Turkish Islamic Fighters Army (IMO),

42

Turkish Islamic Jihad, 42, 44, 45 Turkish Islamic Liberation Army (IKO), 42

Turkish Islamic Liberation Front (TIK-C), 42

Turkish Islamist movements, 41, 42, 48, 50, 125, 126, 129, 132, 134 ideology of, 44, 127—128 influence of Iran on, 133—134 publications by, 43, 46, 131 use of violence by, 45, 49 See also CHP (Republican People’s Party); Democratic Left Part (DLP); Democratic Party (DP); Fighters of the Islamic Revolution (IDAM); FP (Fazilet Party); IBDA-C (The Great Eastern Islamic Fighters Front);

ICCB (Union of Islamic Associations and Societies); Islamic Action; Islamic Liberation Party; The Islamic Movement; Nationalist Movement Party (MHP); NOP (National Order Party); NSP (National Salvation Party), PKK (Kurdistan Workers’ Party); RP (Islamist Welfare Party); Turkish Fighters of the Universal Islamic War of Liberation (EIK-TM); Turkish Hizballah;

Turkish Islamic Fighters Army (IMO); Turkish Islamic Liberation Army (IKO); Turkish Islamic Liberation Front (TIK-C); Turkish Islamic Liberation Union

(TIKB); Turkish National Intelligence Organization (MIT); Turkish People’s Liberation Party Front (THKP-C); Turkish Shari’a Revenge Commandos (TSIK); Universal Brotherhood Front—Shari’a Revenge Squad (EKC-SIM); World Shari’a Liberation Army (DSKO)

Turkish Islamic Liberation Union (TIKB), 42

Turkish-Islamic Synthesis, 41—42, 46, 49, 57

Turkish National Intelligence Organization (MIT), 42

Turkish People’s Liberation Party Front (THKP-C), 59

Turkish Shari’a Revenge Commandos (TSIK), 42

Turkish Teachers’ Foundation, 145. See also Gulen movement; Fountain, the; Sizinti; Yeni Umit

TUSIAD (Turkish Businessmen’s and Industrialists’ Association), 128

‘Ubayd, Abd al-Karim, 100

‘ulama, 155, 156, 159, 162, 166

role in Islam of, 157—158

See also Islam

umma, 5, 14, 71, 159

unbelief. See takfir

Union of Islamic Associations and Societies. See ICCB

Union Socialiste des Forces Populaires (USFP), 72, 74

United Arab Emirates, 110

United States, 84, 92, 173—176

relations with Kuwait, 110, 116

Universal Brotherhood Front—Shari’a

Revenge Squad (EKC-SIM), 42

Universite Saint-Joseph, 182

UN Resolution 425, 100

USFP. See Union Socialiste des Forces Populaires

al-’Uthman, Layla, 116

Vahiduddin, Syed, 193

Vanguards of the Conquest. See New

Jihad Group, The

Velioglu, Huseyni, 55

Virtue Party. See FP

Voice of Truth, Power and Freedom (Sawt al- Haqq Wal-Quwah Wal-Hurriyah). See Palestinian Hamas, publications by

Wadi al-Anjil, 3

Wadud-Muhsin, Amina, 194

Wahabi, 24

Wahid, Abdurrahman, 193

wa’i (awareness), 28

Waqf, 23, 24, 27

Wasat party, 7, 9

Wendell Holmes, Oliver, 195

West Bank, 23, 24, 25, 27, 36, 37

Western conflict-resolution model of,

173–174, 175, 182

Wilson, Woodrow, 196

World Trade Center, first bombing of, 19

World Shari’a Liberation Army (DSKO), 42

Wright, Robin, 158

Yalcin, Hasan, 53

Yarar, Erol, 128

Yasin, Shaykh Abd al-Salam, 74, 75, 76

al-Yasin, Shaykh Jasim Muhalhal, 111

Yasin, Nadia, 76

Yassin, Shaykh Ahmad, 30

Yazdi, Ibrahim, 158, 161

Yemen, 3, 4, 7

Yeni Safak, 131. See also Turkish Islamist movements, publications by Yeni Umit, 145. See also Turkish Teachers' Foundation

Yeryuzu, 43, 46. See also Turkish Islamist movements, publications by

Yesevi, Ahmed, 146

Yildiz (Islamic Youth), 60

Yilmaz, Sevki, 53

YOK (High Education Council), 147

Youssoufi, Abd al-Rahmane, 72, 73, 75

Youth committees for social work (lijan al-shabibah lil-'amal al-ijtima'i). See Shabiba

Yuksel, Nuh Mete, 53

al-Zammur, ‘Abbud, 18

al-Zamzami, Fqih, 74

Zartman, I. W., 71

al-Zawahiri, Dr. Ayman, 18

Zeituni, Jamal, 83

Zeroual, Liamine, 82, 84

Ziyad, Abd al-Ilah, 75

Zoubri, ‘Antar, 83

Zubaidi, Sami, 48
</biblio>

#title The Book in the Islamic World

#subtitle The Written Word and Communication in the Middle East

#author George N. Atiyeh

#authors George N. Atiyeh, Muhsin Mahdi, Jacques Berque, Franz Rosenthal, Seyyed Hossein Nasr, Annemarie Schimmel, Wadād al-Qāḍī, Ramzi Baalbaki, Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn al-Munajjid, David A. King, Priscilla P. Soucek and Filiz Çağman, Geoffrey Roper, George N. Atiyeh, Dale F. Eickelman, Michael W. Albin

#date 1995

#source <[[https://archive.org/details/bookinislamicwor0000unse][archive.org/details/bookinislamicwor0000unse]]>

#publsher SUNY Press. <[[https://sunypress.edu/Books/T/The-Book-in-the-Islamic-World2][sunypress.edu/Books/T/The-Book-in-the-Islamic-World2]]>

#isbn 9780791424742

#lang en

#pubdate 2024-07-30T15:53:19

#topics

#notes Footnote reference 59 was missing from Chapter 3, but it seemed clear where it was meant to be placed, so it has been added where it’s guessed it was meant to go.

#DELETED temporarily

#cover g-n-george-n-atiyeh-the-book-in-the-islamic-world-1.jpg

 [Front Matter]

 [Title Page]

The Book in the Islamic World

The Written Word and Communication in the Middle East

edited by

George N. Atiyeh

State University of New York Press

The Library of Congress

 [Copyright]

Published by

State University of New York Press, Albany

©1995 State University of New York

All rights reserved

Printed in the United States of America

No part of this book may be used or reproduced in any manner whatsoever without written permission except in the case of brief quotations embodied in critical articles and reviews.

For information, address the State University of New York Press, State University Plaza, Albany, NY 12246

Production by Christine Lynch

Marketing by Dana E. Yanulavich

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

The book in the Islamic world : the written word and communication in the Middle East / edited by George N. Atiyeh.

p. cm.

Consists of papers presented at a conference held November 8–9, 1989 at the Library of Congress, Washington, D.c.

Includes bibliographical references and index.

ISBN 0-7914-2473-1 (alk. paper). — ISBN 0-7914-2474-7 (pbk. : alk. paper).

1. Books—Middle East—History—Congresses. 2. Middle East— Intellectual life —Congresses. 3. Manuscripts, Islamic—History— Congresses. 4. Printing— Middle East—History—Congresses.

1. Atiyeh, George N. (George Nicholas), 1923-

Z8.M63B66 1995

94–29487 200021.0956-عل

CIP

10987654321

 Contents

Figures

Introduction

George N. Atiyeh

1. From the Manuscript Age to the Age of Printed Books

Muhsin Mahdi

2. The Koranic Text: From Revelation to Compilation 17

Jacques Berque

3. “Of Making Many Books There Is No End”: The Classical Muslim View 33

Franz Rosenthal

4. Oral Transmission and the Book in Islamic Education 57

Seyyed Hossein Nasr

5. The Book of Life-Metaphors Connected with the Book in Islamic Literatures 71

Annemarie Schimmel

6. Biographical Dictionaries: Inner Structure and Cultural Significance 93

Wadād al-Qāḍī

7. The Book in the Grammatical Tradition: Development in Content and Methods 123

Ramzi Baalbaki

8. Women’s Roles in the Art of Arabic Calligraphy 141

Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn al-Munajjid

9. Some Illustrations in Islamic Scientific Manuscripts and Their Secrets 149

David A. King

10. A Royal Manuscript and Its Transformation: The Life History of a Book

Priscilla p. Soucek and Filiz Çağman

11. Faris Al-Shidyaq and the Transition from Scribal to Print Culture in the Middle East

Geoffrey Roper

12. The Book in the Modern Arab World: The Cases of Lebanon and Egypt

George N. Atiyeh

13. Mass Higher Education and the Religious Imagination in Contemporary Arab Societies

Dale F. Eickelman

14. The Book in the Islamic World: A Selective Bibliography

Michael W. Albin

Appendix: Ottoman Imperial Documents Relating to the History of Books and Printing

Notes on Contributors

Index

 Figures

1.1 A Koran printed in Hamburg, Germany in 1694 by Officina Schultzio-Schilleriana.

1.2 The “Opening” of the first Koran printed in Europe (Venice, ca. 1537) by Alessandro Paganino.

1.3 Title page of Medici edition (Rome, 1593).

2.1 Sample pages of the Bach Mamluk Hajj Zuhayr Koran.

2.2 Sample pages of the Bach Mamluk Hajj Zuhayr Koran.

9.1 Numerous mechanical devices are illustrated and described in this eleventh-century Andalusian treatise, discovered less than 20 years ago.

9.2 A geometrical diagram accompanying the solution of a problem in spherical astronomy.

9.3 An illustration of a non-Ptolemaic planetary model from a treatise of the thirteenth-century Maragha school.

9.4 The astronomers of the Istanbul Observatory with some of their instruments. This miniature is a veritable gold-mine of information which has yet to be fully exploited.

9.5 Non-standard astrolabes illustrated in the treatise on astronomical instruments by al-Marrakushi (Cairo, ca. 1280). The text is based on al-Bîrünî (Central Asia, ca. 1025), who abridged the discussion of them by al-Sijzi (E. Iran, ca. 1000).

9.6 The back of the astrolabe of the Yemeni Sultan al-Ashraf, dated 690/1291. This is the only known Islamic astrolabe on which the back is devoted to astrological information and also one of the few on which the sun, moon, and five planets are indicated by their symbols. The very same pecularities are featured in an illustration found in al-Ashrafs treatise on astrolabe construction—see figure 9.7.

9.7 One of numerous illustrations in al-Ashrafs treatise on astrolabe construction. If any proof were needed that the New York astrolabe was indeed due to al-Ashraf...but none is. The treatise also deals with sundial construction (no medieval sundials are known from the Yemen) and contains the earliest known description of a magnetic compass in any astronomical text.

9.8 The universal astrolabe of Ibn al-Sarraj (Aleppo, 1328.29), the most sophisticated astrolabe ever made.

9.9 An illustration of the rete of a universal astrolabe in Ibn al-Sarraj’s treatise on astronomical instruments.

9.10 On the left, the Ka’bah is depicted—appropriately inclined to the meridian—on a crude cartographic grid from which one can determine the qiblah very approximately by joining one’s city to the Ka’bah (here Bursa is shown connected to the Ka’bah [via Medina]). On the right is a diagram of sacred geography, showing various areas around the Ka’bah and indicating the astronomical horizon phenomena which define their qiblahs.

9.11 A qiblah-indicator from Isfahan, ca. 1710, unique of its genre. The qiblahs and distances from Mecca of 150 localities marked on the cartographic grid—which can be read from the circumferential scale when the diametral rule, centered at Mecca, is laid on the marker for the locality in question—are given accurately for all practical purposes.

9.12 An eleven-sector scheme of sacred geography from a manuscript of al-Qazwmfs Athar al-bilad (Iraq and Syria, ca. 1250). The information on the qiblah in each sector has been suppressed. Also one of the sectors in the original scheme has been omitted by mistake.

9.13 An eight-division scheme of sacred geography from a manuscript of the treatise on cosrnogrphy by Pseudo-Ibn an-Wardi (Aleppo, ca. 1420). There are several different traditions of sacred geography in the numerous manuscripts of his treatise; the illustration in the published text shows two of these but are hopelessly corrupt.

9.14 Two different twelve-sector schemes of sacred geography with associated astronomical horizon phenomena for finding the qiblah, as found in a manuscript of a thirteenth-century Yemeni treatise on folk astronomy.

9.15 An Ottoman scheme of sacred geography with 72 divisions of the world around the Ka’bah, suitable for marking on a horizontal qiblah- indicator—see figure 9.17.

9.16 An Ottoman sundial cum qiblah-indicator on which a scheme of sacred geography has been included on the circular base.

9.17 The imposing ventilator on the Musafirkhane in Cairo, one of the few surviving examples. In medieval times, most buildings in Cairo were fitted with such ventilators, all astronomically oriented.

9.18 A diagram showing the orientation of ventilators in medieval Cairo, found in the treatise on astronomical instruments of Ibn al-Sarraj (Aleppo, ca. 1325).

9.19 The different qiblahs accepted in medieval Cairo. In the case of the southerly qiblahs, any direction between the rising and setting of Canopus would have been considered acceptable.

9.20 On the left is a ground-plan of the Ka’bah (the rectangular shape is here exaggerated) and on the right a diagram which associated the edifice —incorrectly oriented—with the cardinal directions and their intermediaries,the winds, and the qiblahs of various localities.

9.21 The basic orientation of the Ka’bah and the directions of the four “cardinal” winds as recorded in various medieval texts. Actually, the minor axis is aligned with the most southerly setting point of the moon.

9.22 The basic information on the Ka’bah contained in figure 9.20 (r.h.s.). The orientation of the Ka’bah has been “corrected”—in fact (see figure 9.10 (l.h.s.) and figure 9.21), its major axis is at about 30ȯ E. of s.

9.23 A diagram showing 28 traditional divisions of the world, from a manuscript of the geographical treatise of Abu al-Fida’ (Hama, ca. 1320) which never made it into the published text.

10.1 Topkapi Sarayi Müzesi, Hazine 1510, fol. 775b, Colophon ofNizamf Khamsah.

10.2 Topkapi Sarayi Müzesi, Hazine 1510, fol. 484b, Colophon of Firdawsl Snâh-nâmah.

10.3 Turk ve Islam Eserleri Müzesi, T. 1950 fol. 464b, Colophon of Khusraw DihlavL ‘Alnah-i Iskandan.

10.4 Topkapi Sarayi Mzesi, Hazine 1510, fol. 1510, fol. 7a, “Colophon Signed by Warqah ibn ‘Umar Samarqandi”.

10.5 Topkapi Sarayi Müzesi, Hazine 1510, fol. 498a, “Firman in the Name of Husayn Bayqara”.

10.6 Topkapi Sarayi Müzesi, Hazine 1510, fol. la. Dedication medallion in the name of Husayn Bayqara.

10.7 Topkapi Sarayi Müzesi, Hazine 1510, fol. 4994, Dedication medallion in the name of Shah Rukh.

10.8 Topkapi Sarayi Müzesi, Hazine 1510, fol. 6820, “In Praise of Spring.”

10.9 Topkapi Sarayi Müzesi, Hazine 1510, fol. 13b, “Dahhak Enthroned.”

10.10 Topkapi Sarayi Müzesi, Hazine 1510, fol. 5O2b, “In Praise of His Patron: A Prince Enthroned.”

11.1 The back page of al-Shidyaq’s newspaper, al-Jawa’ib, no. 1077 Istanbul, 19 Ramadan 1298/25 August 1880. The right-hand column gives a price list of al-Jawa’ib Press books available from the newspaper offices, starting with al-Shidyaq’s own works, including the original Paris edition of his alSaq’ala al-saq—“of alien appearance” (‘ala shakl gharib). On the left are other Arabic and Turkish books which can be supplied, including some from “Syrian,” that is, Lebanese, presses, followed by a list of those available from the Egyptian agent of al-Jawa’ib.

11.2 Two pages from al-Shidyaq’s al-Lafiffi kull ma’nâ tarif, Malta, 1839, showing his use of punctuation marks: dash, comma, question mark, and colon. The typeface, which has been admired for its beauty, was specially cut and cast in Malta, almost certainly to his designs. The only incongruous feature is the use of Western numerals for the page signature.

11.3 A-B (together). Autographed manuscript, dated 1850, of an appendix on qalb and ibdal in an early draft of al-Shidyâû’s Kitab al-Jâsüs ’ala al-aâmüs. The text differs from his later published work on the subject (Sirr al-layal h al-qalb wa-al-ibdâlı \ stanM, 1284/1868).

13.1 Statistics on secondary education in Egypt, Morocco, and Oman.

 Abbreviations

ALECSO = Arab League Educational Cultural Scientific Organization

BRISMES = British Society for Middle Eastern Studies

CMS = Chruch Missionary Society

ENAL = Enterprise Nationale du Livre (Algeria)

GEBO = General Egyptian Book Organization

IBLA = Institut des Belles Lettres Arabes (Tunis)

MELA = Middle East Librarians Association

IRCICA = Research Centre for Islamic History Art and Culture (Istanbul)

SI = Studia Islamica

TKD = Türk Kütüphaneci Derenğı

 [Epigraph]

Encouraging the study of books in society is one of the purposes of the Center for the Book in the Library of Congress, which exists ε ‘to heighten public interest in the role of books and printing in the diffusion of knowledge.” Drawing on the rich resources of the Library of Congress, the conference on which this volume is based brought scholars, librarians, diplomats, and other public officials together to examine the Islamic book and its influence. An exhibition of Islamic books and printed materials prepared by the Library’s Interpretive Programs Office enhanced conference discussions and informed the general public about the role of the book in Islamic civiliiation. The conference and exhibition demonstrated the special significance of the Library of Congress as a center for the study of the history of the book and the printed word.

The Center for the Book in the Library of Congress was established by law in 71977 to stimulate public interest in books, reading, and libraries and to encourage the study of books. Its projects and publications are supported primarily by contributions from individuals, corporations, and foundations. The Near East Section and the Center for the Book are pleased to present this volume as a contribution to the study of the history of the book.

John 7 Cole

Director

The Center for the Book in the Library of Congress

 Introduction

A book is obviously not simply a physical thing. It is a living entity. People’s lives are definitely influenced by this old and basic vehicle of communication. Our planet’s civilizations and cultures, one may safely state, did not begin to flourish and expand until the book was invented. Books have become so general and extensive that we need not emphasize what is manifestly plain.

In the West, the study of the book as a vehicle of culture has been common and fruitful, but is not so in the world of Islam. There, the book, so much esteemed and cherished, has not been the subject of many serious studies as an entity and as a vehicle of cultural development. Aware of the need for further studies on the subject, the Library of Congress, which holds one of the largest collections in the world of books and other materials from the Islamic countries, convened an international conference on 8–9 November 1990, and mounted an exhibit in order to discuss and display the role of the book in the development of civilization in the Islamic world. It thus provided an opportunity for a number of distinguished scholars to examine and reflect upon this very important aspect of Islamic civilization, and it is hoped that this would open the doors for further studies. All the papers in this volume, except for my own, were read and discussed, and sometimes debated, by the scholars who wrote them and the scholarly public who attended the conference.

The study of “the book” as an entity is complex and multifaceted. Any such study embraces the origins, production, content, use, and role of books in culture, education, and society in general. The production of books involves materials, formats, script, typography, and illustration, among other things. As an instrument of communication, the book in its many forms has been and still is the greatest factor in the growth, development, and preservation of culture, inasmuch as it carries the knowledge, the ideas, and the messages without which an advanced culture cannot exist. Whether in the form of clay tablet, scroll, codex, or volume, the book remains central to culture. In the words of Dr. Guy Story Brown, Director of the Bureau of Educational and Cultural Affairs at the United States Information Agency, “the idea of culture itself originally emerged in connection with cultivation of learning through the written word.... The idea of the book or centrality of writing as a universal human inheritance in a sense involves a fundamental change in the idea of culture, a change that itself is characteristic of modernity, and underlies the ubiquity of books.”

Although the development of the book, from its rudimentary form into the codex, and later the book manuscript, owes much to Christian scholarship in the Roman and Byzantine periods, the book in the Islamic world was more fundamentally integrated with Islam as a religion and with the Arabic language and script, which were the early means of communication in the Islamic world. Scarcely has the literary life of any other culture played such a role as in Islam. The Koran, referred to as the Book or al-Kitab, has a privileged place in Islam in that it is considered to be the word of God and in that it is inimitable (mu’jizah). It was only natural that The Book affect greatly the course of Arabic and Islamic culture. Under its stimulus, the various sciences (‘ulitm, plural of ‘Um) developed. Science, or learning (‘ilm), by which is meant the whole world of the intellect, engaged the interest of the Muslims more than anything else except perhaps politics during the golden age of Islam, that is, the early part of the Abbasid period. It was a period that saw the elaboration of methods of publication, transcription, bookbinding, and book selling to a great degree. The circulation of books was greatly assisted by the introduction of paper in the eighth century. Literature and the art of the book received a great impetus from the manufacture of paper. The Muslims developed paper manufacturing through the employment of new materials and the discovery of new methods. This was as much a revolution as the one achieved in the fifteenth century by Gutenberg. As Professor Irfan Shahid says, “Neither parchment nor papyrus was able to bring about such a revolution.” The extraordinary efflorescence of book making is reflected in the large number of repositories, or libraries (maktabat), and the large number of manuscripts that have reached US. Once the printed book came into being and the process of dethroning the manuscript began, opposition to the new technology by the Islamic ·ulama’ grew. The ‘ulama’, until the invention and spread of printing, monopolized the transmission of knowledge. The manuscript, moreover, represented for the Muslims an historic and cultural value. This remains so until today. Most of the Muslim scholars who visit me at the Library of Congress begin their questioning by asking how many Arabic or Islamic manuscripts the Library holds. Printing meant a new cultural direction. The manuscript, which represented the old culture, became the center of controversy between the old and the new. Although it is presented in different forms and on many levels, this controversy remains with us today.

The rise of al-warraq, a person who made a profession out of transcribing books, was a high point in the “Civilization of the Book.” The warraqun (plural of warraq) were the link between men of letters and the general public. They were interested not only in beautiful calligraphy, but also in reproducing correctly and exactly the text. They were not only copyists, but also booksellers, and oftentimes they were men of letters themselves. al-Jahiz (d.255/868), who was a versatile author and a great bookworm, hit upon the idea of hiring booths from the warraqun and spending the nights in their shops reading. In his famous book, Kitab al-hayawan (The Book of Animals), al-Jahiz dedicates a lengthy section to the topic of “the book”. In it he responds to a critic of books by describing the value of the book as a companion, a vehicle of learning, and a versatile tool for the success of all human endeavors. He recites stories about book collecting, calligraphy, ancient writing, the preservation of cultural heritage, translation in general and translation of religious books, book editing, and the conflict between the written and oral traditions. Throughout the history of Islam, oral transmission of “the book” proceeded alongside the written. Many considered the written as merely a corroboration of and complement to the memory.

There is indeed a great need to look into the role of the book in the development of the Islamic world and its culture. The history of the book, not only as an artifact, but also in terms of intellectual content and physical properties, needs to be seriously explored. An investigation into the creation, manufacture, and use of the book in its written and printed forms has not been systematically approached, although there have been several attempts to do so. The kinship between the book and civilization is obvious yet understudied. Investigating it, as far as the Islamic world is concerned, can offer many insights into the nature and characteristics of that world.

The term “Islamic world” should be clarified. We don’t mean by it the ummah, or community of believers, rather the countries that became mostly Muslim by religion and contributed to the growth and characterization of the widely spread Islamic civilization. The essays and studies in the present volume are, however, concerned only with what might be called the core of the Islamic world, namely, the Middle East.

The distinguished professors and scholars who participated in the conference expounded on many aspects and problems related to the book and its study in the Islamic world. Professor Muhsin Mahdi, in his issue-raising paper, confirms the need for more information on the history of books in the Islamic world. He explains the reasons why the printing of religious books by Muslims came late, as late as the nineteenth century, and wonders why the excellent scribal traditions of dictation, collation, and illustration have not been applied to the exigencies of modern book production. He systematically raises many issues resulting from the introduction of printing, such as the impact of translations on the development of the sciences, languages, and even orthography. Furthermore, he calls for the preservation and sustenance of scholarly traditions and systems while looking forward to the new technologies in the editing and preservation of the great wealth of manuscripts remaining in the Islamic world. Jacques Berque elaborates more abundantly on the meaning of the term al-Kitab (the Book) and the methods used in compiling the text of the Koran in its final form- looking at the early conditions under which the task of compilation was initiated. Looking at the properties having to do with the Koran, Professor Berque discerns a structure of type strongly akin to the synchronal and concludes that the Koranic “edition” attests to a reflective and orderly character and is not a miscellany of disorganidation and arbitrariness. The text of the Koran was the outcome of a laborious effort and is laden with potentialities that have stood the test of time well.

Professor Franz Rosenthal discusses Muslim attitudes ء rd books and the dilemma caused by the abundance of books in terms of quantity and quality. Books were often so plentiful that one could think of discarding some, but this was generally considered wrong. The destruction of books is discussed, when and why it occurred, the meaning and scope of originality, and the relationship between knowledge and books. Rosenthal points out the persistent distinction between oral and written information, a theme that appears in several papers and is effectively handled by Professor Seyyed Hossein Nasr, who discusses the great significance throughout Islamic history of oral transmission in education and the spoken word as compliment to the written text. The Islamic intellectual tradition itself has functioned with the belief that oral tradition is of central importance. Oral teaching always accompanied the written text.

Professor Annemarie Schimmel considers the metaphor connected with the book in Islamic literature. After discussing the great love Muslims have for books, she deals with the figurative language in which books are used as metaphors in the works of the Persian and Persianate poets, showing the central role the imagery of the book played in Islamic poetry.

Biographical books are among the earliest and most extensive genres of Arabic literature. Professor Wadād al-Qāḍī believes that biographical dictionaries are not only indispensable tools of research, but also a mirror in which are reflected important aspects of the intellectual and cultural development of the Islamic community. A study of the inner structure of biographical dictionaries produced during the first nine centuries of Islam reveals that development. Professor Ramzi Baalbaki traces the development of the grammatical book by examining three stages in the history of Arabic grammar, based on Sibawayhi’s book (Kitab) as the focal point in this development. He concludes that Sibawayhi’s originality was not to be matched by any of the later grammarians. Professor Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn al-Munajjid discusses the role of Muslim women in learning, and after explaining the position of calligraphy in Islam, he investigates women's role in the copying of Korans and narrates the achievements of several women who distinguished themselves in that field. Professor David King considers the significance of certain categories of book illustrations, especially in works on astronomical instruments, and concludes that there are numerous illustrations in Islamic scientific books which further our understanding of different aspects of Islamic science, and even aspects of Islam and Islamic civilization.

Illuminated and illustrated books in the Islamic world were sought after diligently by kings, princes, and scholars. The special prestige attached to books with a royal or princely provenance appears to have encouraged another method of book collection used by rulers, that of appropriating volumes from each other's libraries. Professor Priscilla Soucek and Dr. Filiz Çağman follow the path of such a volume now kept in the Topkapi Saray in Istanbul.

The transition from scribal to print culture, as exemplified by Ahmad Faris al-Shidyaq, is ably presented by Dr. Geoffrey Roper, who has shown that al-Shidyaq personifies in his career, as well as in his attitudes, the dawn of a new cultural era for the Arab and Islamic worlds, an era in which the communications revolution caused by the printing press brought radical changes to intellectual, political, and social life. In my article on the book in the Arab world, I survey the history of book publishing in the modem Arab world, describing the general attributes of book production and dissemination, and the prevalent trends that characterized the different periods of the last two centuries. Professor Eickelman's work, although it does not seem to be related to the history of the book as a cultural vehicle, is indirectly related in that it attempts, in a new approach, to show the impact of new means of communication in the field of education, a field that used to be associated almost exclusively with the book.

One can see from the sum total of the studies in this volume that we have only touched upon the surface of a whole new multifaceted discipline, the history of the book as a cultural vehicle. We hope that our efforts will lead to and point the way for further studies on this important and serious subject.

In the editorial work we have sought uniformity but not conformity. We adopted the Library of Congress' transliteration system and one style for the annotations. All foreign words found in Webster's Third New International Dictionary are not italicized. Some proper names are written as they have been commonly used by the press or as they have been established by their owners. Names of cities are transliterated only when there is no English equivalent. The dates appear according to the Hijrl as well as Gregorian calendars. Whenever the solar instead of the lunar system is used for the Hijrl year, this is indicated. The words Koran and tankh are transliterated as Qur'an and ta'rikh whenever the author has requested it.

The editor wishes to thank a great number of colleagues and friends for their most valuable assistance. A special mention, however, should be made of Michael Albin, who did not spare any time or effort in making the conference "The Book in the Islamic World" the success it was, and to John Cole, the director of the Center for the Book at the Library of Congress, who co-sponsored the conference and supported it morally, administratively, and financially.

The editor also wishes to take this opportunity to express his gratitude to Shaykh Ahmad Zaki Yamani, the Institute of Turkish Studies, Saudi ARAMCO, the United States Information Agency, and the Embassy of the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia for their financial and moral support, which made holding the conference possible. He also wishes to thank all those staff members in the Near East Section and the Library of Congress whose help was crucial in organizing the conference and the exhibit that accompanied it, in particular Christopher Murphy, Anne Boni, Doris Hamburg, and Carol Ido.

<right>

George N. Atiyeh

</right>

 1. From the Manuscript Age to the Age of Printed Books

Muhsin Mahdi

The period of transition from the manuscript age to the age of printed books is the second and less important transitional epoch in the history of the book in the Islamic world. The first and more important epoch was the initial emergence of the book during the first two centuries of the Islamic era, the seventh and eighth centuries of the common era. The seriousness and persistence with which scribes and scholars in the Islamic world were able during that period to preserve and transmit the text of the most important of all books in that world, the Koran, and, next, the traditional collections of the sayings and deeds of the Prophet of Islam, meant that, once codified, their preservation and transmission could remain free of the many problems besetting the preservation and transmission of most other books, both religious and secular, during the transition from the manuscript age to the age of printed books.

In contrast, the disturbing manner in which European printers took liberties with the text of the Koran (when compared to the care taken in printing the Gutenberg Bible, for instance) could not but raise doubts among Muslims regarding the virtues of printing when they first came into contact with the new technology. One look at the title page of the Koran printed in Hamburg in 1694 (figure 1.1) must have made Muslim readers of the Koran think that only the Devil himself could have produced such an ugly and faulty version of their Holy Book; and the same must have been the impression made on them by Alessandro de Paganino’s Venice Koran printed in the 1530s, where the printer, perhaps following some contemporary Arabic vernacular, did not distinguish between certain letters of the alphabet, such as the dal and the dhal (figure 1.2). One would expect a handbook on medicine and medicaments, such as the Arabic text of Avicenna’s Canon, to be free of printing errors, since errors in a book of this nature can easily lead to unfortunate results. Yet the Medici edition (Rome, 1593) of this work commits a serious grammatical fault, to say nothing of the syntactical infelicities, on the title page itself (figure 1.3). Unlike a faulty manuscript copy by some ignorant scribe, such printed books involve an orderly organization, extensive financing, and the distribution of a large number of copies with the same errors, making it less easy to dismiss them as unimportant or inconsequential incidents.[1]

[[g-n-george-n-atiyeh-the-book-in-the-islamic-world-2.jpg][Fig. 1.1. The Koran printed in Hamburg, Germany in 1694 by Officina Schultzio-Schilleriana. Copy in Library of Congress.]]

[[g-n-george-n-atiyeh-the-book-in-the-islamic-world-3.jpg][Fig. 1.2. The “Opening” of the first printed Koran in Europe (Venice, ca. 1537) by Alessandro de Paganino.]]

[[g-n-george-n-atiyeh-the-book-in-the-islamic-world-4.jpg][Fig. 1.3. Title page of Avicenna’s Canon of Medicine printed in Rome, 1593, by the Medici Press.]]

This brings US to the frequently cited objections made in the Islamic world to printing when it was first introduced, delays in introducing the printing of books dealing with religious subjects, and the strictures against printing religious works.[2] Were the initial fears of the dangers of printing books on religious subjects justified? Yes, if we recall the examples just cited. But why were no ways found to overcome such problems before the nineteenth century? Various economic or doctrinal hypotheses have been presented to explain this phenomenon. What is clear is that in many cultural centers in the Islamic world a scribal tradition flourished with standards of accuracy that could not be assured in printed books, especially when the printing was done outside the Islamic world by printers with limited knowledge of the languages involved; and many of the early printers both outside and inside the Islamic world were not Muslims and not well versed in Islamic religious sciences. These strictures did not last; ways were found around them, primarily in the control of standards that made it possible to print books in all religious subjects, starting with the Koran.

But the expertise shown in the printing of the Koran and the hadith was a carryover from the expertise developed during the manuscript age in the strict disciplines associated with these highly specialized texts. There was, on the other hand, a more general scribal tradition specializing in the transmission of books in the manuscript age and which, depending on the field it was in, had developed specialized techniques and methods of dictation, collation, and illustration that seem to have deteriorated with the advent of printing. Why were those techniques of editing not transferred in an orderly fashion to the exigencies of book production when using movable type? What was the extent of the effort to recover, systematize, improve upon, and make use of the old scribal art in the new conditions? Why was the printed book treated as though it were a manuscript copy, with printed comments placed or variants noted on the margin of the text? The art of textual criticism developed in Europe during the second half of the nineteenth century does not seem to have reached the Islamic world, and the beginnings made in introducing it during the present century remain limited and partial. The result has been the loss of knowledge of the techniques and approaches of earlier Islamic scholarship, now replaced by only an incomplete and imperfect knowledge of the new European tradition. A number of works were no doubt edited and printed in an exemplary manner in the Islamic world. It is equally true, nevertheless, that on the whole printing has simply fixed and diffused many books that are hardly superior to any stray manuscript copy untouched by a careful scholarly hand, and others whose scholarly form is mere pretension.

The period of transition from the manuscript age to the age of printed books in the Islamic world was long and tortuous, extending over centuries and presenting the student of the history of the book with different sorts of problems from one century to another and from one region of the Islamic world to another. Then, after it largely came to an end sometime during the last half of the nineteenth century and the beginning of the twentieth, a new problem arose: the Islamic world slowly forgot what it meant to depend on scribes and manuscript copies for the creation, diffusion, and transmission of knowledge. In the mind of the vast public at least, printed books came to represent a degree of solidity and authority that went far beyond the solidity and authority of the manuscript copy or copies of the same book. Not only has the manuscript age by now come to an end in the mind of the public—hardly anyone copies an entire manuscript by hand anymore (unless it is in preparation for printing it, and photographic reproduction and printing have in some cases made even this effort unnecessary)—the manuscript tradition has for all intents and purposes ceased to be alive and to develop as it had done for more than a millennium.

It is impossible, of course, to cover, or even touch upon, all the problems arising from every aspect of the period of transition from the manuscript age to the age of printed books. Indeed, it is foolish even to try to do so, given how much remains unknown about the cultural, social, and economic history of the period and how risky it is to establish any causal relation between the introduction and spread of printed books in the Islamic world and particular social, economic, and cultural factors that may have interacted with the introduction of printing and the spread of printed books. Nevertheless, it may be useful to raise some of the questions that need to be answered if one is to gain a fuller picture of what happened during the period of transition and learn about the issues involved in the transformation of books already there in manuscript form into printed books in particular.

There are, to begin with, the numerous cultural and social implications of the transition from the manuscript age to the age of printed books: the spread of printing in the second half of the nineteenth century went hand in hand with the rise of national sentiment among the various Muslim peoples and, as happened in Europe earlier, Muslims became less and less likely to speak or be able to read more than their own national language and had to have translations from other Islamic languages in order to preserve some of the cultural homogeneity of the Islamic world. There is the role of the state in encouraging translations and the spread of secular culture through control of some of the early presses. There are the new cultural vistas and literary forms opened up through printing. And there is the role of non-Muslim communities in spreading the printing of books, first in Europe and then inside the Islamic world.

Then there are the authors (leaders of mystical fraternities, leading thinkers, reformers, and pamphleteers) who wrote original works during the nineteenth century and made a massive contribution to cultural change through printed books. There are a number of interesting questions to be asked about the diffusion of the works of those contemporary authors. How many of the original works printed during the period of transition survive today? How did the transition help create a new profession, that of the author engaged not merely in writing or dictating an original copy of his work and presenting it to a prince in the hope of financial reward and otherwise hoping for the best as to its survival and diffusion in manuscript form, but the author who could see his work printed, corrected, published, diffused in many copies, and sold, establishing himself slowly as a professional writer whose works are read immediately upon their publication by wider circles of readers?

To what extent and how fest did such contemporary works, be they literary, scientific, or religious, replace older ones? Who were the authors who commanded large audiences? When did the reading public become so large that only printing could satisfy it? Did printed books create the mass culture and the standardization of reading habits, or was it the emergence of a mass of educated readers that led to the spread of printing? Who was buying or reading the newly printed books? Did the transition merely expand readership or did it change its character as well? How was the expansion of readership connected with the change in the educational system and the emergence of new classes of professionals and educated people, the change from the time students of religion and bureaucrats were the main readers to the time after the emergence of new free professions—teachers and students of the new secular schools, new types of lawyers, doctors, engineers—who began increasingly to collect and read printed books?

Then there is the impact of translations and the role of printing in encouraging the paraphrase and translation of foreign books, especially those from European languages, which were instrumental in introducing modern science and technology to the Islamic world. Finally, one needs to consider such questions as the importance of the press in the diffusion of scientific literature, whether ancient or contemporary and Western, and of technical manuals of medicine, military science and strategy engineering, and so forth.

Then there are the political and economic aspects of the production of printed books. It was precisely that so many identical copies could be made of printed books which made printing into a mass medium, drew the attention of public authorities, religious and secular, and made it possible to exploit printed books as instruments of state policy, to censor them, or to forbid their diffusion when they were thought not to agree with, or to run counter to, the policy of the state, something not easy to accomplish in the manuscript age. But the state also came to own presses; it was able to distribute copies of printed books free of charge; and it acquired the authority to decide which books should be printed for use in its educational system. The state and the mystical fraternities seem to have been the initial sponsors of the printed book in secular and religious fields, respectively. In the case of the state, a ready clientele, consisting of functionaries and students of technical and generally of secular schools, and government subsidies, made the printing of books on non-religious subjects economically feasible. But the role of the mystical orders in spreading the printing of religious books is a subject that is well worth investigating also. Like the state, they had a ready market in their membership, which made it less risky to undertake the printing of books. Some mystical fraternities had vast memberships spreading out in many countries of the Islamic world, a readership that made the printing of literature of interest to these mystical fraternities economically feasible. When and to what extent did printed religious books begin to compete with printed secular literature, both ancient and contemporary? How did the proportion of the latter grow relative to the total?

To answer such questions, it is important to collect, preserve, and study the archives of publishers wherever they can still be found in the Islamic world, but especially in major centers of printing such as Istanbul, Cairo, and Teheran. One needs to study not only the fact of a book’s publication, but how many editions and printings there were, the size of each, and the pricing of copies. We may even learn from these archives how slow or rapid the transition was from the manuscript age to the age of printed books in each major center. In general, one expects the new technologies to have exceeded by far the old in making books both widely accessible and accessible at greatly reduced prices, and to have penetrated new markets and social and economic strata of society. But did any of this happen? To what extent and at what point? What was the weight of the role of the state as against such private institutions as religious fraternities or private commercial enterprises? Which books were promoted by which sector? Which books were in demand by which sector of the reading public? What proportion of printed books were read by members of each of the two educational systems, the religious and the scientific or secular, after they parted company, and what portion by the wider public?

Then there is the impact of printing on the development of language. At the beginning of the transition from the manuscript age to the age of printed books in the Islamic world, the Arabic language was still the international Islamic language in the religious and secular sciences, even though works on modem European science and technology were translated into national languages other than Arabic, such as Turkish and Persian as well. What happened after the introduction of printing? To what extend did Arabic maintain its position? Was Arabic gradually replaced by the other national languages? When did this take place in the case of each nation with a native tongue other than Arabic, and in what fields? That is to say, when and how did languages like Persian, Turkish, and Urdu, in the main vehicles of literary culture and of the administration, become vehicles of modern scientific disciplines as well? How is it that even today, in matters of common concern to the Islamic world, works are written in Arabic by writers from countries such as Iran, India, and Pakistan?[3]

Then there is the impact of printing on the orthography, structure, and vocabulary of each of the languages of the Islamic world. To what extent did printing contribute to simplification and uniformity in any of these aspects of each of these languages? Would the problem of orthography have come to the fore in Turkey without the spread of printing? Would the problem of orthography in Arabic, that is, the unsuccessful campaign for the use of Latin characters, have been even thinkable without the spread of printing? How did printing contribute to the spread and use of punctuation, and why is it that the only strict punctuation system remains the one employed in printing the Koran, while one faces utter confusion, in Arabic at least, in the punctuation of books printed with movable type? Similar questions need to be asked regarding other aspects of scholarly form and techniques, such as the use of abbreviations. What explains the rise and decline of strict standards of typography, of orthography, punctuation, and design?

Then there is the role of linguistic and literary renaissance in the case of each of the national languages during the nineteenth century in the recovery and diffusion of older works of prose, poetry, narrative—in some cases recovered from rare manuscript collections or libraries not accessible beyond small circles of owners and scholars who happened to be in, or to have traveled to, the place where the collection or library was located. To what extent did printing contribute to the resurrection of works forgotten for a long time and made for another age, with its own taste and preoccupations? How was the development of printing related to the development of language education and literacy? And how important was government intervention in the spread of printing (e.g., the availability of printed readers, grammars, dictionaries)? Above all, to what extent was the diffusion of older works through printing a sign that these works were being read, not merely acquired as collectibles?

It is characteristic of the transformation for the manuscript age to the age of printed books in the Islamic world that it was a continuous process rather than a violent turning point. Originally, the book in the Islamic world had coexisted with an oral tradition in which memory played an important role and writing was intended as an aid to memory. Yet writing is supposed to decrease reliance on memory. The question is the extent to which printing may have accelerated this trend. Apart from the question of memory, however, the writing of books itself underwent many changes as to organization, the materials on and with which books were written, and the techniques used by scribes and readers to assure the book’s integrity and correctness. This scribal and scholarly tradition underwent certain changes over time in the material it used, in the scripts it developed, and in the organization of book production; and local sub-traditions developed in various parts of the Islamic world, in different languages, and in different disciplines. By the time printing had become more than a curiosity in the Islamic world, a strong scribal and scholarly tradition was in place which was devoted to the book in manuscript form; and one of the most urgent tasks of the students of the transition from the manuscript age to the age of printed books in the Islamic world is to find out precisely what this scribal and scholarly tradition consisted of in the main centers of Islamic civilization during the eighteenth century its transformation during, the nineteenth, and its role in the introduction of printing. For it is that tradition which was instrumental initially in making the transition to the age of printed books.

One needs to ask, therefore, what were the technical and oiganizational features of the book reproduction industry, not during the manuscript age in general, but at the end of the manuscript age in particular: who engaged in it, patronized it, subsidized it, helped sell the scribes' works, and supplied the materials necessary for the exercise of the profession? Were they merchants, technicians, learned men, calligraphers? Were there scriptoria for the mass production of manuscript copies? What was the market for manuscript copies like in places such as Istanbul, Cairo, or Isfahan? How far did manuscript copies travel, and in which direction? Was the trade confined to the Islamic world? Did the manuscript copies of certain books tend to remain in certain localities and not cross certain borders? For instance, to what extent was the experience of the Ottoman statesman and man of letters Ragib Mehmed Pasa (1699–1763), in looking for Mulla Sadra's Asjar, unique? Ragib Pasa was a voracious book collector who travelled through the Ottoman Empire and occupied important political positions in Syria, Egypt, and Iraq. Yet he tells US that this comprehensive work of illuminationist philosophy and mysticism was not well known in Anatolia and that he had to bring a copy from Iraq, from which then one or two copies were made.[4] Since it is known that a vast number of manuscript copies produced in the Safavid Empire reached Constantinople, and that this particular work was well known throughout the Safavid Empire and the Indian subcontinent, was the absence of this particular book from the book market in Istanbul and the libraries of Anatolia due to its subject matter and doctrinal content? And why even now can one hardly find a lithographic copy of it in Egypt, for instance, when it had served as the basic textbook of philosophy in many schools in Iran and India?[5]

Let us turn to the printing and diffusion of books surviving from the manuscript age. Of the millions of manuscript copies existing at the time when printing began to spread in the Islamic world, not all could be printed; a selection had to be made. By whom and on what basis was this selection made? By the political authority aiming to spread knowledge of the practical arts necessary for building a modern state? By booksellers with a view to large printings and profit? What works and what literary forms disappeared from view without being remembered except by a new generation of specialists? Were the books most widely diffused in the Islamic world in manuscript form at the time printing was introduced the ones printed? That is, did printing simply continue to feed people's interest in books that were the most widely read before? Who were the ancient Muslim authors selected and printed? How did the ancient Muslim authors not usually read at the end of the manuscript age fare with their new audiences? One could learn a great deal about such questions from studying the holdings of libraries in Istanbul, Cairo, and Teheran that ceased to grow as printing became widespread, provided one realizes that most of the mosque and school libraries did not contain many types of books—popular literature, practical disciplines, astrology, forbidden things—that were diffused and tended to be widely read outside the schools and scholarly circles, and that such books were also the ones more likely to perish. In general, then, one needs to find out what the impact of printing was on the literary culture of the time. To what extent did printing change the type of books available to readers, as compared to before the introduction of printing? How and why did this change take place? What kinds of books were involved? How much of the earlier literature became more widely available? Was this partly due to the ease with which the text of rare manuscript copies of a book could now be multiplied, to access to libraries and collections in places that had been inaccessible before, or to the printing and diffusion of information about manuscript copies through printing in general and manuscript catalogues in particular?

It is a mistake to think that the scribal and scholarly tradition still alive when the transition to printed books was taking place in the Islamic world was as competent or achieved the same high standard when transcribing every kind of book. In addition to the text of the Koran and the Traditions of the Prophet, there were certain disciplines in which accurate and correct transmission was essential. This was largely true of manuscript copies of books in scientific fields, such as astronomy, medicine, and mathematics, where mistakes and corruption could be easily detected by experts and render the manuscript copy almost worthless as far as they were concerned. Many scribes copying manuscripts in these disciplines were themselves experts to some extent or had developed a method of copying that reproduced the exemplar with an unusual degree of precision. In other fields (a vast majority of manuscript copies are in literary fields, such as narratives, history, and geography) the language and sometimes even the content of the work was consciously or unconsciously modernized as manuscripts were copied from one generation to another. Much of the so-called Middle Arabic features found in manuscript copies of books by early authors can be attributed to this tendency.

In the age of printed books, the musahhih—literally the person in charge of producing a “correct” printed version—performed a task similar to that of the scribe in the manuscript age, that is, he corrected and sometimes revised the language of the manuscript copy before it was sent to the printer, and the same person contributed to assuring that the proofs were properly corrected and a list of errata was appended to the printed book. Especially during the period of the renaissance of linguistic learning (of the fuşhâ in Arabic, for instance), it was the function of the musahhih to make sure that the language of the manuscript copy prepared for the printer was free of grammatical mistakes and stylistic blunders. But by “good” Arabic during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries one did not mean the stage the language had reached in the eighth or ninth under the Umayyad or Abbasid dynasties; it was already a neoclassical Arabic with its own features.[6] Thus, while the attempt was made to stem the tide of so-called Middle Arabic, and in most cases much of this kind of Arabic was eliminated, there was no assurance that it was replaced by the Arabic current during the second or third century of the Islamic era. And sometimes the attempt to reverse the evolution of the language led to making the printed book more archaic than its author had meant it to be. The revision of the language of all the first four printed versions of The Thousand and One Nights is quite instructive in this respect.

It is therefore also important to trace the fortunes of this scribal and scholarly tradition as printing came to be widespread in the Islamic world; study the role of its representatives as publishers, editors, and proofreaders in printing establishments; and learn about their educational background, first in the religious institutions and then as part of the new Europeanized educational system, where as scholars, teachers, and students they continued to play a significant role in transforming the culture of the manuscript age into the culture of printed books. This will require careful study of the techniques used in preparing the manuscript for the printer; what manuscript material was reproduced and what manuscript material was not reproduced (the fate of marginal corrections, conjectures, variant readings, and comments) when a manuscript was copied and corrected in preparation for being printed; the extent to which these were reproduced or suppressed or placed in a different position on the page; and whether dispensing with variant readings and the comments in printed books was due to technical or economic reasons.

A systematic study of early printings can instruct US on whether and to what extent the printed text was a better or worse scientific instrument that a manuscript copy of the same book current before the introduction of printing. [7] Yet the printed copy, which may not have been better than an imperfect manuscript copy, was now published in hundreds if not thousands of copies, sought by everyone interested in that book, and taken by the public to represent the book itself, the book to which reference is made and from which quotations are reproduced. It came to have the authority and finality only the author s copy could have claimed in the manuscript age. It is therefore important to find out when and to what extent printed books relegated manuscripts to a secondary position so that readers came to be psychologically oriented to look for, and expect to read, a printed book rather than a manuscript copy; and when and to what extent the habit of reading a manuscript copy—the ability to handle a manuscript copy with ease, interact with it, and learn from it—disappeared from the reading public and became a specialty confined to a few scholars and to those planning to transform the book from manuscript to print. Here again, a study of libraries, public and private, and their use over time, especially those that froze at a particular point in time, could help clarify such questions.[8]

Nevertheless, the transition from the manuscript age to the age of printed books in the Islamic world is not something that took place in the past only. Even though a lot has happened during the past two centuries or so, in certain respects the transition is still with US. Books in manuscript form continue to be transformed into printed books, and this process will continue for the foreseeable future, since a vast number of books produced during the manuscript age in the Islamic world remain in manuscript form and their transformation, by way of printing, editing, and re-editing, is not likely to come to an end very soon. Indeed, it is hard to conceive of a future date when the Islamic world will cease to be concerned with the question of the transition from the manuscript age to the age of printed books and with the many problems connected with the transformation of its heritage at the hand of printers and editors. One can only hope that, slowly, the transition will be controlled by scholars with increasingly better knowledge of the scribal and scholarly tradition that produced the books in the manuscript age, rather than by predators in search of gain or fame.

Nor has the transformation always been directly from the book in manuscript form to the printed book. We recall, for instance, the continuous role played in the transformation of manuscript copies into printed books by photography, microfilming, xeroxing, and, more recently, word processing. Think, for instance, of the accuracy and ease with which photographic reproductions of manuscript copies are now being printed. Is the product of this process a manuscript copy or a printed book? Then there are other techniques, some of which once played a significant intermedian' role between the book in manuscript form and books printed with movable type: lithography, xylography, metal plates—processes that were once current in India, Iran, Egypt, and Morocco. Their use in printing books of common prayers, the Koran, religious tracts of all sorts, and secular books as well, is known.

Just at a time when the Islamic world seems to be reaping the benefits of the technological and cultural revolution brought about by printing, that revolution is being increasingly superseded by another revolution, one that is replacing both the manuscript book and the printed book with the electronic. machine-readable book. This is perhaps the most significant question we must keep in mind as we look at the transition from the manuscript age to that of printed books. But we need to remember also that, even without this recent technological revolution, at least since the beginning of this century the printed book began to lose some of its hold on the human race. One could say that until about 1914 there was no other "mass" communication medium (apart from the human voice of narrators, teachers, and preachers) besides the book, the pamphlet, or the flier. There was no radio or television, no record or tape, no film, to compete to any significant extent with only a limited role, and illustrations were rather rare and expensive. The printed/written word held a preeminent position; there were as yet no serious competitors to reckon with. Whenever a serious question was disputed in the Islamic community—Wahhabism, coffee drinking, smoking—the dispute was enshrined in printed books, pamphlets, and fliers.

In some respects, the book in electronic, machine-readable form will mean a return to one of the main features of the manuscript age: copies can be made and subjected to continuous change and improvement, free of the fixed form introduced مجل printing and movable type. With the use of various means of communication, it will be possible to make what is initially a single copy available immediately across the globe and as far as humans can reach beyond this globe, with the possibility that, from one copy, an infinite number of copies can be made, used, and disposed of.

The potential of this revolution is, or should be, of particular interest to those engaged in the effort to collect and organize information about the enormous surviving manuscript heritage of the Islamic world in all Islamic languages. This potential extends far beyond the use currently made of it in cataloging books and manuscripts. Sooner or later, the electronic, machine-readable book—consisting of digitized text, digitized graphics, or a mixture of digitized text and graphics—is likely to replace both the book as it was known in the manuscript age and the book in print; for it will be the most convenient way to access the content of books, including books that exist already in manuscript form or in print. And the electronic, machine-readable form will in turn determine the most convenient ways of packaging the book, just as it was the manuscript and printing that determined its characteristic material components.

Given the speed with which the technology is changing, however, it remains to be seen how many forms the new electronic, machine-readable book will take. It seems certain that the main advantages of the printed book, wide diffusion and an affordable price, will continue to favor certain types of printed books, perhaps those that are popular. Otherwise, many scholarly works, and generally all works of specialized interest, including illustrations, will be available in electronic form, more easily accessible across the globe, not requiring the publication of a large number of hard copies. The other function of the printed book, that of reproducing the content of books existing in manuscript form, and certainly much of the body of books produced in the manuscript age on which scholars are likely to be working in the future, will be transferred directly from the original manuscript form to electronic, machine-readable form, rather than going through the printing stage, which can now clearly be seen to have been yet another intermediate stage. But whether this transition is carried out successfully or we end up with another mess on our hands depends on how willing we are to learn more about the book in the manuscript age, how willing we are to learn the lessons of the delays and problems encountered during the transition from the manuscript age to the age of printed books, and how determined we are to face and overcome the difficulties encountered during the transition to the age of the electronic, machine-readable book.

[1] To see that such problems can arise in books edited in more recent times by authors who could not be accused of ignorance or malice, one can consult the edition of the work on the proof of prophecies by the tenth-century Isma’îlî thinker Abu Ya’qub al-Sijistam, Ithbat al-nubuwat, ed. ‘Arif Tamir (Beirut, 1966), p.76, where the editor took the liberty of rewriting a paragraph of the original text in twentieth-century Arabic.

[2] The relevant decrees, legal opinions, and related documents have been discussed recently by Wahid Gdoura, Le Debut derimpritnerie arabe a Istanbul et en Syrie (Tunis, 1985), pt. 1, ch. 2, pt. 2, ch. 2: and Fawzi Abdulrazak, “The Kingdom of the Book,” PhD Dissertation, Boston University, 1990, ch. 4.

[3] Consider, for instance, the Arabic writings of thinkers like Khomeini, Mawdudi and 8.8. Nadvi.

[4] Ragib Pasa, Safinat al-Raghib (Bulaq, 1282/1865 or 66), p. 322.

[5] The single lithographic copy of the work I came across in Egypt had been brought there by an Indian scholar and reached the marketplace when his library was sold after his death.

[6] Once, in the manuscript reading room of the old Dar al-Kutub Library building in the Bab al-Khalq, in Cairo, I saw across the table a blind Azharite scholar with a youngster next to him reading from an old manuscript copy and holding a ballpoint pen in his hand to transcribe the text of the manuscript in a notebook. The youngster read aloud as he transcribed the manuscript while the scholar listened, sometimes nodding in approval but frequently instructing the youngster not to transcribe what was in the manuscript copy but what was to the scholar’s mind a more correct version of the text. Worse than this, he seems to have arranged with the youngster that the latter should also correct the text of the manuscript itself with his ballpoint pen. Whether because the scholar was eminent or influential, I do not know, but the keeper of manuscripts at Dar al·Kutub, the late Fu’âd Sayyid, did not dare protest the practice.

[7] Modern editors treat printed books of which they cannot find the manuscript source as just another manuscript copy, with all the potential virtues and defects of a manuscript copy.

[8] I recall, for instance, having to consult some Arabic manuscript copies in the Küprülü Library in Istanbul, where the only other users of the tables and chairs in the reading room, were high school students reading (modern Turkish) school books they had brought with them rather than ary of the manuscript copies for which that library is known to users like myself.

 2. The Koranic Text: From Revelation to Compilation

Jacques Berque

Nowadays, the term that springs immediately to mind, and that is also commonly used in discourse to designate the Koran, is the word “Book” with a capital letter, that is, “Kitabun” in the indefinite, and “al-Kitabu” with the definite article. Such a designation, however, is not helpful in specifying its subject. In itself, “kitab” is generic rather than specific and, per se, it means nothing more than “written.” It is context alone that can determine precisely whether the designation is of a simple inscription, of a holy writ, of fate as pre-ordained by God, of the roll that those called to justice in the Last Judgment shall wear around their necks, or else of the Koran proper, as is the case here. It should be noted here that the Koranic message, when first revealed to mankind, was not delivered in written form, but rather in the form of intermittent vocal communications, which varied widely in length.

It should also be noted that, according to dominant tradition, the opening word of the Revelation consisted of the well-known injunction “/ˌ7ʏa’ı” of Surah 96. This term, however, is one that we often find a problem with: What does it really mean?

If we take “/ˌ?ra”’ to mean simply “Read,” as is often done, then what text could the imperative “fgra”’ be referring to? Could it be the standard archetypal codex, “al-Imam,” of which the Koran presents itself as an extract? On the other hand, the communication initiated from God to the Prophet had taken, as it has always done, the auditory medium as well as the mediation of the Archangel Gabriel. For a more accurate reflection of this aspect, “Chant or Psalmody” is perhaps a more appropriate translation than simply “Read.”

A third option which should not be excluded out of hand is the translation “assemble or compile.” One reservation, however, is that it references an ulterior operation, now already completed, namely, the collection or recension of all revealed messages. Admittedly, from the point of view of faith, this ordering (sequencing) partakes of divine inspiration, hence of the atemporal and the preordained. Human logic, nonetheless, is liable to be confounded and puzzled by seeing reference to the collected message at the very opening of the revelation.

In this, indeed, the main psychological and didactic dynamic is not so much to anticipate, but to recollect. Hence there is all the richness that we find in

”,Even the Koran qualifies itself as dhikr, “recall ”حمججلا٦، the uses of the root inasmuch as it calls up from, the depths of human memory truths long thought obliterated. It also endows upon itself credibility for all time.

Certain listeners even go so far as to claim a special faculty for “re-saying” the revealed message. The function of those “keepers by heart,” or “huffazr is not to be confounded with that of qurra and muqriTn, “readers and reciters.” The astounding reliability of the huffaz’s memory, not uncommon in this type of society, did provide a link between the transcendental communication operating through the voice of the Prophet, and deep resonances evoked in the primary consciousness and discourse of the people.[9]

Shortly after the death of the Prophet, there appeared other modes of preservation. Followers of the faith, according to tradition, began to inscribe the message in segments, more or less long ones; they even attempted to bring the text together as it was being revealed. They used any materials available to them, for instance, scraps of parchments, shoulder blades, palm leaves cut lengthwise, and so on. These picturesque inscriptions, however, provided only limited guarantees of reliability. Apart from discrepancies or inconsistencies, they risked omission. By definition, these fragments were disconnected. Besides, there was no way the followers could have given consideration to the elaborate taxonomy which, starting from a certain date, guided the compiling of the pieces into graduated surahs.

It was the Prophet himself, we are told, who assumed the task of compiling the Koran in written form. His actions were guided by inspiration, though he was aided by secretaries and experts. To one of the most active among them, Zayd ibn Thabit, is attributed the statement: “We were at the Messenger of God’s [house] to collate the Koran from disparate scraps,” or “nu’allifu al-Qur’an min al-riqa’.”[10]

Hence, the setting of the revelation into written form, defective as it was, was nonetheless not wanting for a base in dogma, at least provisional, considering that the order in which the pieces were to be fitted together was in a large measure contingent upon the course of revelation that the Prophet alone could foresee in advance.

In two surahs, 27, The Ant, and 15, Hijr, the opening verses juxtapose the appellations “Koran” and “Kitab”, inverting the order from the one to the other, respectively: “ayatu al-kitabi wa-qura’nin mublnin” and “ayatu al-qura’ni wa-kitabin mublnin.” Shaykh T. Ibn ‘Ashür underlines this chiasmic structure, which puts the stress alternately on revelation as an ongoing process and on the objective entity which it now constitutes. In fact, the two formulations concerned, being close in date of revelation (48th and 54th, respectively), do not allow for the hypothesis of a change in intent from one formulation to the other. It allows for the differentiation to me made between two referents which have come to be generally confounded in subsequent usage. And thus it is all the more reason to question the hypothesis of Bell, whereby a “Koran Period” is to have preceded a “Book Period” at about the time of the Battle of Badr.[11]

Furthermore, it is of interest to note the passages that have to do with putting the revelation “in lines”, mastiiran, in 17, The Night Journey. 58; and 33, The Clans. 6. These texts are classified as 50th and 90th in order of revelation by tradition, and 67th and 103rd according to Noldeke, Theodor that is, for the first surah, long before the Hijrah. Inasmuch as the revelation of the text, as is often the case, keeps referring to temporal data (asbab), the written recording had not only begun, but also was taken into consideration in the revelation itself, along with an indication we ought not to forget, that of lines being drawn in ink on a surface.

If we are to believe al-Bukhari, the Prophet at his death could not have left a Koran that was fully inscribed, and only four of his Companions then knew the full text of the message by heart.[12] The precariousness of a method of preservation that was fully entrusted to memory naturally gave cause for concern to those responsible. The very concern for the preservation and protection of so sacred a heritage from the hazards of segmented transcriptions or of memories subject to the risks of negligence, oblivion, or death—this is what later on led the caliph ‘Umar ibn ‘Abd al-‘Azîz to compile the hadlth— prompted a first attempt at systematic compilation under the caliph Abû Bakr. It was done on unbound sheets, qaratis. The effort was renewed in a more systematic way at the time of the cahph ‘Uthman. It succeeded. The text then acquired, in physical appearance and layout, the form that we currently know, that is, that of a coherent text made up of divisions (surahs) and subdivisions (verses). It was Zayd ibn Thabit who presided over this accomplishment.[13]

It was expected, both in establishing the corpus of content, as well as the organization, to follow unswervingly the tradition of the Prophet. The Prophet, we should again emphasize, had himself set this arrangement. The tradition, however, is not so explicit with regard to the comprehensiveness of the initial organization. Reliable sources limit it to the long surahs, the Hawamim, surahs that begin with the two initials H. M. (hâ’mîm), and the Mufassal, commonly understood as the totality of the smaller text placed at the end of the collection.

Such, at least, is the traditional view, one that we have no way of contesting. To do so, like some others have, would trigger endless controversies. We would even be running the risk of endangering any attempt at a scientific approach to the subject. On the other hand, what we can do, and ought to do, is look into the early circumstances of an effort initiated while the revelation was still in progress, and sustained throughout the period of delivery of the message; we could thus cover the whole set of texts throughout its growth. It goes without saying that a chronological sequence of individualized surahs such as we would be able to reconstruct could not have been proven to be so until a sufficient quantity of verbal material had been amassed in the memories of the reciters. What classification were we to follow, or what order to establish, if, first of all, there had been no identifiable units to be distinguished from one another and placed in a serial order? This, at least, is what common sense would suggest.

A first step was perhaps illustrated in the words of surah u. Hud’. 13ؤ “Produce ten surahs like it (this one)But if the said surah fell in the eleventh place in the sequence of the material collected, it would rank, in the sequence of revelation, 52nd (or even 75th, according to Noldeke). Such a start is troubling indeed.

One should take special note of this remarkable aspect, that the tradition has kept no record of any substantial disagreements over the text. We only know that the Caliph gave orders to burn the already existing codices, just to avert all debate. Was it to avert it or to close it, or both at the same time? In a community so prone to argument of a subject held close to heart by all, one wonders whether or not to attribute the silence of the sources, just as the latter themselves do, to the unanimous consensus of the multiple witnesses (tawatur) (except for slight phonic variations on a text so collated, and eventually on the details of the layout). Once more, we have no grounds to doubt that. But unanimity on such a scale as the believers claim is owing to divine grace rather than to sociological laws of transmission.

Another form of silence that impresses US is one that concerns the reactions that were likely to be stirred up in the process of compiling the Koran, as a result of the shift from the vocal to the visual medium. Obviously, the functions of huffaz and muqrVm were only partially replaced by reading, a skill of little currency at the time. Surely, their ritualistic, psychological and social roles persist up to the present. This fact, however, has not prevented the “written” to assume a certain halo of dignity which it did not possess initially. In matters of religious texts, the transition from the spoken word, a carrier of a breath of life, into signs restorable in resonant equivalents would not generally occur gratuitously. The Bible becomes the echo of a “passion” which affects the word of God when put in script. Such a kenosis does not usually occur without risks.[14] An affective reaction by some might sanction the despoiling of an original fullness inherent in the breath and voice. A tradition, actually quite isolated, has it that Ummayah ibn Abi al-Salt was the first to have read the written Koran. In no way will this eliminate all adjudication in this case. The association with this suspect poet, envious of prophetism, should it have happened, would not be comfortably accepted.[15]

Still, at the time of the Umayyad caliph ‘Umar ibn ‘Abd al-‘Azîz, who presided over the compilation of hadlth, divergences in approach were noted regarding the issue of the relative suitability of writing as opposed to memory for the preservation of the Sunnah. In this connection, Malik mentions a question put by the Prince to facph and the reassuring answer of the latter: “There is no objection to the recording of science.” This was, after all, the opinion of Abü Hanîfah.[16] It is true that this consultation applied to Sunnah and not to the Koran; a question of principle was nevertheless raised.

We must also stress that in Islam the transcription of the Koran into written form did not in any way substitute completely the use of “live and permanent voice.” In the absence of more positive evidence to invalidate our observation, we consider the reticence of the sources with regard to such a development as somewhat amazing.

At the time and in the region, writing was scriptio defectiva, that is, lacking periods and diacritical marks. The writing medium remained primitive, obviously closer to an elliptical epigraphy than to a genuine form of transcription. The successors of Muhammad, no less than Muhammad himself, could not have ignored the existence of more advanced forms of writing, for instance, Hebrew, Syriac, Greek, and Latin. This is especially true since the Prophet had frequently visited the markets of Byzantine Syria. He must also have seen the scrolls of the Torah in Mecca. He had them presented to him several times. His Companion, Warqah ibn Nawfal, once a Christian, is believed to have transcribed the Gospels in Hebraic characters.

The Koran refers to these works with the ancient biblical term of sajr, plural asfar.[17] The ironic anecdote of the donkey laden with books, carrying with solemn compunction his precious load, conveys a perhaps all too familiar image (62, The Day of Congregation: 5). There were, moreover, other words available to translate a message into conventional signs, using any procedure of stable encoding (tattooing, inscription). Let US recall a verse by Labid: “The flood channels of al-Rayyan, their traces are laid bare, worn smooth, just like writing on the rocks” (kama damina al-wuhiya’ silamuha). Thus goes the mu’allaqah. The critics analyze al-wuhiya’ as a plural form, and the term has more than one appeal to it, especially since it was the one retained for “revelation”. Several examples of Lisan al-‘Ârab attach to the meaning of the term many suggestive undertones, especially those of a secret language, not easily accessible to others, just as we would imagine it was initially done for writing. Let US also cite in this connection the verse of Abu Wajzah al-Sa’dî: 660 dwelling of Asma, which the rippled streams reduced to a wasteland, just like the writing, or the original that the scribe spells.”

As for the material surfaces on which they wrote, we have already mentioned a variety of surfaces utilized by the early reciters of the Koran. For ancient scriptures, for instance, the Torah, which was preserved in volumina which could be unrolled, animal parchment, al-riqq, was used (52, The Mount: 2).

Poetry, furthermore, uses another vocable, qitt, which we can construe as an abbreviation of qifah, “a piece of parchment or paper.” This was indeed a “perfidious scriptum” qitt mudallil, that al-Mutalammis threw into a river when he read into it his own loss. Obviously, the writing was hastily done and “antlike,” munmal, or munammal, a figure of speech used in this context by Abu al-‘Iyâl al-Hudhall.

It is also true that in other periods of paganism, namely, at the time of the letters of Tarafah and al-Mutalammis (Sahifat aTMutalammis), as well as the imprecatory writings and vows that people used to throw at the Ka’bah at that time, it was the term sahlfah, “surface,” hence, “sheet”, that came to prevail.

When the Koran was finally collated in a systematic way into an official manual, and in order to designate the edited volume, a term with the same root was resorted to, following the two pronunciations of mushaf and mishaf. The first is deemed to be the older one, unless this has to do with a tribal inflection of the m, Tamim being inclined towards a vocalization with i, while Qays leaned towards u. This noun, being still currently in use, was supposed to have been derived from the preterit ushifa, indicating the setting together of a manuscript into leaves, suhuf, the plural of sahlfah. This original term was commonly used to designate a plate made out of wood provided for feeding about five persons. The diminutive sahlfah has long been given the special meaning that concerns US here, namely, “page, sheet, folio.”[18] Since then and until the present, the book wherein the Islamic revelation has been collected was to carry three names:

- aTKitab, where the dominant connotation seems to refer, in the absence of contextual precision, to the archetype held by God;

- Koran (Qur’an), which was a phonic unit subject to a repetitive, continuous psalmody; and

- Mushaf, as a visual object, an assembly of sheets, a “book,” as we now say, which brought among the Arabs the revolution of the book, a revolution that followed, other things being equal, the revolution of tanzfl, or revelation.

Let us compare this second stage with the stage when the message was being communicated at the time of the Prophet. This communication unfolded over a period of about twenty years. It was delivered in successive fragments, in a scattered order. Regrouping it into sets of surahs could not normally be achieved without a certain maturing in the memory of the Prophet, and of some of his close affiliates, just as the individuatio (to borrow a medieval term) of these future chapters were shaping up. This quality, we shall so call it for the moment, was not to crystallize for the large surahs, such as the surah of al-Baqarah (The Cow) (we are informed of when its revelation started but never when it was completed), before several months, or even years, had elapsed. Inevitably, the dictation of the surahs would interfere with the dictation of other texts.

It is true, some would retort, that this argument will not hold as long as we cannot attribute human normality to a process marked by divine intervention. But the Sunnah, concerned with preserving the strictly human attributes of the Prophet that the Koran explicitly assigned to him, allows for an interpretation along the lines of human normality. Allow me, in a witticism, to help illustrate the notion by which we can come to conceive of so complex a process. This whole process could be visualized as though the Messenger had gradually solved a crossword puzzle, as the letters and boxes were revealed to him in successive and partial strokes. Let US, however, draw away from this playful analogy. What really matters is the inchoate and reflective characteristic of an operation that is essentially diachronic, just like the revelation itself, a characteristic sharply in contrast with the final collection that henceforth we have before our eyes.

This question has to do, let US repeat, with a book that was indeed put out in a rudimentary form; but in spite of this, or rather in spite of the many ways of reading it—eventually reduced to seven—it maintains through recitation, whether individually or collectively, a stable and practically permanent constitution which has endured since then, up to the present.

This book, on which the believers began to meditate, possesses features particular to it alone, when compared to other monotheistic messages to which it refers, that is, the Torah, the Psalms of David, and the Gospels. And if we are to extend the comparison to approximately contemporary works, be it Latin (Digesta), or Greek, Maximus the Confessor, Romanos Melodos, and, more pertinently, The Fount of Wisdom of John the Damascene, there is no doubt the Koran would present a more vivid contrast. The originality that astounded the Arabs and, soon after, even the Byzantine polemicists, will not but gain in intensity if submitted to a probe of its intrinsic properties, properties of which we are most assured. Being inherent to the Koran, these properties owe nothing to the speculation of others, not to a tradition that we can easily deem as broken, nor to methods anachronic to such things.

Let us turn once more to those properties having to do with the composition of the Koran, for they address best of all its quality as a book. It is exactly here that the majority of Westerners will see nothing more than a miscellany of disorganization and arbitrariness. We believe, however, that we can discern a structure of a type strongly akin to the synchronal. There, for instance, is a didactic recurrence of themes and the proliferation of alliterations, and also the frequent overlapping and merging of motives.

The argument for a synchronal structure suffers, nonetheless, from a central shortcoming. The traditional sequence of the revelation is maintained for eleven surahs, numbered 31 to 51, and these alternately enclose ten non-successive units. Within this entire group stand out such radiant texts as \ö. Yasrn and 40. The Believers; we could perhaps talk here of a central reinforcing support where the two dimensions, the chronological and the synchronal. would converge.

This would be even so much more convincing, since with surah 52. The Mount, begins the second half of the Book, as it is commonly accepted. A change of tone occurs then and there. The short surahs, which have an apocalyptic ring to them, and which proceed from the first Meccan period, pile up in the second part, while the homilies of the third period are symmetrically paralleled in the first part. On the other hand, the surahs of Medina, generally focusing on social matters (organizational and legislative’, are strewn among surahs 49 to 110, over almost the totality of the collected work. All this cannot be due to mere chance.

Many other features of what we ought to call. rightly. the Koranic edition attest to the same reflective, orderly character (even deliberative. 1 daresa\ \. 1 pass over the many mutations of the metatext, or the contents bearing on the discourse itself; the significance of the role grien in many surahs to the median verse; the presence of rhythmic expressions, often decimal; in sum. a number of facts bearing on form as well as content which we stressed elsewhere.[19]

The rejection of a classification of surahs in terms of the sequence of their revelation was an option carrying a crucial demarcation value. The Koranic discourse was thus destined to leave the domain of metahistorx in order to enter, as an object of culture, the history of man. Was it not. after all. complete, and did it not, at the same time, close the era of revelation? By the very movement with which it closed up itself, it made room for human ritualistic and repetitive practices, psalmody, exegesis, and a model; it returned to sacred history Its own levelation, along with the prophetic dictums which have accompanied it.

There is, moreover, an additional aspect which we have not touched upon yet, that is, its potential as an art form. Writing, in Islam, was not to remain a minor art confined only to the pages of a manuscript, nor even a social art. similar to Roman epigraphy. Rather, it was to assume the pro portions of a major art. plastic as well as spiritual, embodied in the superb mural works in stucco, plaster, and so on. which were to succeed one another over the centuries in a manner that has no analogy in the West.[20]

Another development, no less rich in cultural value, is the importance ascribed by Islamic tradition to the “science of letters,” ‘ilm al-huruf. Esoterism, Hermetism, and cosmogony all combined with phonetics and calligraphy in a manner little intelligible to moderns. We cannot but refer in this connection to the analysis recently made in relation to a work by Ibn ‘Arabi.[21] But even though this may be no more than very old speculation, in part preceding Islam. the elaboration of the letters into proper Arabic characters does not seem to have occurred before the third/ninth century.[22]

The final form of the Koran certainly had not been reached by the time the first copies of the Koran were made on parchment, and later on papyrus and paper were made. The caliph ‘Uthman, if we are to believe the tradition, was to have been the first among the copyists. He is said to have been assassinated while holding in his hand a copy of the Koran that he himself had written.[23] His assassin, al-Ghafiql, is said to have kicked the venerable volume with his foot.[24] For what reason? A few years later, the calligrapher Zayd ibn Aslan made a copy of the Koran for ‘A’ishah and another for Hafsah, both widows of the Prophet.[25]

In his comments on the renowned calligraphy of Ibn al-Bawwab (4.413/1022), D s. Rice brings into focus the evolution of styles of writing,[26] starting from the most ancient, the angular, through Kufic, and up to the cursive Naskhi, which prevailed toward the end of the fourth/tenth century. Many of these styles, illustrated with rich colors, were the object of study in a number of scholarly monographs.

For our part, our attention will turn to a Koran, printed in color in Italy by the Tunisian publisher A. Ben ‘Abdallah, based on a photocopy of a text calligraphed by Bach Mamluk Hajj Zuhayr, who had died, almost a centenarian, in 1904. This copy, dating from 1275/1858, was revised by Shaykh Muhammad ‘Ali al-Dalla’.[27] The 619-page volume, ornate with delicate colorings, presents a distinctive peculiarity. On each page, at the rate of one to three times per page, certain words or clusters of words are colored in red. The words affected consist in all grammatical forms,— substantives, pronouns, adjectives, ١’erbs, and so on. The referents did not seem to present any special character. The only oddity is that every time we open the volume flat, these words or clusters of words written in red on the right-hand page, the even-numbered page, also appear exactly at the corresponding place on the left-hand page, the odd-numbered page.

Coincidence, we might say? Impossible, since the same arrangement recurs from one end of the book to the other, or just about. It all begins with the Fatihah, hence to the right, the word al-dln of yawm al-dîn, wa of wa-iyyaka, alladhina of sirat alladhina parallel to the left of the words ladhina of alladhina yu’minuna, of wa of wa-mimma razaqnahum, alladhina of alladhina yu’minima. Now, is this graphic tour de force due to a judicious prolongation of horizontal features in the body or writing? Undoubtedly, at times, it is. But coincidences or unusual tours de force are both apt to lead to perplexity, then stupor, when, we become aware that those symmetries, no matter how artificial they may be, persist from the beginning of the book to page 600

There is even more. In surah 26, The Poets, symmetry brings back, and recrossing them, nine lines of writing from page 378 to page 381. Translators are well aware of the refrain that recurs, with its own sameness, V. 103 and 104, on pages 121–122, 132–140, and 174–175. We had to have, however, the all too special configuration of this manuscript for these four distichs to overlap respectively two by two, from odd-numbered page to page.

For these regular visual patterns to stand out in 300 other interfaces of the volume, one would need to allow each of the recurrences to be lodged in its proper place through the transcription of fifteen lines on a page and the exact positioning of horizontal pot-hooks and intervals. This is quite strange, since the verbal material which is spread out over the sheets of our volume, as we all know, first appeared in a vocal and discursive manner in a sequence completely different from that of the manuscript.

The Koranic text has always been the focus of research, from philological investigation to numerical speculation. Nowadays, with the aid of computers, the focus has turned to the study of frequency patterns. This is how many features peculiar to the Book are now surfacing. To mention only one, the frequency of the letter qaf in the two Medinan Surahs, 2̈/and al-Shura, was 57 in each, totalling 114 times. This number, curiously, matches the number of surahs in the Book. Based on features of this kind, believers are apt to keep entertaining new arguments in support of the miraculous nature of the Koran. The secular researcher, rightly or wrongly, would see no more into it than an extreme case of internal regularity such as we often detect in the core of a poetic text, like the phonic symmetry noted by H. Meschonic in Victor Hugo, or the anagram of “spleen” only recently noted by Roman Jacobson in the poem carrying the same title تمجل Baudelaire, and so on.

However, let US suspend the discussion at this point. What matters is to end with a conclusion based on hard evidence, and include a question for a further investigation.

1. The conclusion: The symmetries of the two-color manuscript described above do indeed confirm the highly analytical character of Koranic recension dating from the time of ‘Uthman. This is a conclusion we have reached through methods of internal textual criticism.

By becoming “foliar,” mushaf, the message had found a concrete visual form, quite at variance with its initial rhythm. One is now bound to view it as a “single composition,” jumlah wahidah (25, al-Furqan: 30), or as “unrolled sheets,” suhufun munashsharah (84, al-Mudaththar. 52). These definitions, however, were once disclaimed, and indeed they did not fit into the early stages of the message.

We must bear in mind, though, that it was through organized recitation that the Koranic message sustained its phonic power, connected with a remembrance, with a breath, with a voice, all so linked together as to evoke the image of the collectivity, rather than mere individuality.

Reading, tilawah, in fact, is different from a psalmody, qirn’ah, and, a fortiori, from intonation, taghanni, and from chanting, tartll. Reading calls for exegesis and for tradition, and it seeks an intellectual, in-depth grasp of the text, by meditating on it, and pursuing the analysis of its contents through the appropriate methods of exegesis or hermeneutics.

Materially, as already seen, this process has led to the development of several arts, including calligraphy, illumination, binding, gilding, and so on.

2. As to the question called up earlier, we still uphold the skepticism and doubt underlying the search we are venturing on.

The text of tanzll, “revelation,” turned into a book under ‘Uthman, was the outcome of an elaboration so rich in possibilities that throughout the centuries, it has held fast. What strikes US most in the present study is the active involvement, just less than one generation after the death of the Prophet, of an entire task force of experts designated by the Caliph himself, and apparently not without the full consensus of the Companions.

Yet again, how can we help being intrigued by the complete silence kept by the sources? This feeling will continue to live with US so long as there is no new evidence available to break this silence.

We can ill imagine, indeed, how an attempt at putting the Koran into shape, critical as it was, could have ever happened without arousing some opposition! Given the high stakes involved, one assumes there must have been some reaction, including some reactions that would qualify as hostile, if not even frightening. Is it not likely that some such reaction may well have initiated the uprising that finally took the life of the Caliph who had inaugurated the Mushaf?[28] Perhaps the relatively flimsy excuses invoked by the conspirators in vindication of such an outrageous action could well offer, a contrario, a clue to this action’s motive? This is an assumption that has yet to be, and perhaps never will be, sustained.

Translated by

Dr. Naim N. Atiyeh

American University of Beirut

[9] The data summarized below are made explicit in all works dealing with Koranic Islamology, especially R. Blachere, Introduction au Coran, 2nd ed. (Paris, 1959); w. Montgomery Watt, Bell's Introduction to the Qur'an (Edinburgh, 1970); and the introduction of the great commentator Shaykh Muhammad al-Tahir ibn 'Âshür, al-lahrir wa-al-tanwlr (Tunis, 1984), vol. 1.

[10] Ibn 'Ashur, op. cit., 1: 86.

[11] Montgomery Watt, op. cit., pp. 137 ff.

[12] El-Bokhari, Les traditions Islamiques, trans, o. Houdas (Paris, 1908), 3. 527 (Hadlth Anas).

[13] El-Bokhari op. cit., 3: title 66, ch. 3 and r.

[14] See Eugen Biser, "God's Word," in Dictionnaire de theologie, 1988 ed., p. 511ff.

[15] Abu al-Faraj al-Isbahani, Kitab al-aghânî, ed. İbrâhîm al-Abyârî, 31 vols. (Cairo, 1969), 4: 1335.

[16] Malik ibn Anas (al-Imam), al-Muwatta', ed. 'Abd al-Wahhab 'Abd al-Latif (Beirut, 1981), p. 330.

[17] Where another term comes close, phonetically, is in zabr, plural zubur. See Koran, 27: 192: Zubiir awwallna. The term zabur is particularly related to the Psalms of David.

[18] Ibn Manziir, Lisan al-‘Arab (Cairo, 1966).

[19] Reference here is made to the exegetical study which follows the introduction to my translation of the Koran into French (Paris, 1990).

[20] The monumental role of writing is made the subject of a study by Armando Petrucci, La Scrittura ideologia e rappresentazione (Turin, 1986). Emile Male had already brought out the relations between the ornamentation of cathedrals and the illumination of manuscripts. About the calligraphy of the Koran as a strictly regulated art, see Abü ‘Amr ‘Uthman ibn Sa’îd al-Dânî, al-Muqni’ firasm maşahif al-amşâr ma’a kitab al-naqat, ed. M. Sadiq Qamhawl (Cairo, 1978).

[21] See Denis Gril, “La science des lettres,” in Ibn ‘Arabi, Les illuminations de la Mecque, ed. Michel Chodkiewicz (Paris, 1988), p. 385ff.

[22] According to Sahl al-Tustarl (4.283/896) and Ibn Masarrah (d.319/931), for example.

[23] al-Tabari, Les quatre premiers califes, trans. Hermann Zotenberg (Paris, 1981), p. 325.

[24] Manuscript no. 14,246 of the National Library of Tunis. Also, M. Hia, The Prophet’s Establishing a State and His Succession \ةاآلاةمه١ةلع 1988)و p. 147.

[25] Ibn Anas, Muwattd’, p. 344.

[26] D.s. Rice, L’unique manuscritdIbn al-Bawwab, trans, from English, Club de Livre, Philiippe Leband, 1972.

[27] Manuscript no. 14,246 of the National Library of Tunis.

[28] There are indications given by Hichem Djait regarding the participation of the Qurra’, especially those of Kufah, in the rebellion against the Caliph. See his La grande discorde (1988), p. 125ff. and passim. According to Abd Allah ibn al-Ash’ath al-Sijistanî, in his Kitab al-maşâhif(C airo, 1985), p. 20ff., the conflict of the Companion ‘Abd Allah ibn Mas’ûd with the Caliph and with Zayd ibn Thabit on the question of the Koran has left aside the case of transcription.

[[g-n-george-n-atiyeh-the-book-in-the-islamic-world-5.jpg]]

[[g-n-george-n-atiyeh-the-book-in-the-islamic-world-6.jpg]]

[[g-n-george-n-atiyeh-the-book-in-the-islamic-world-7.jpg][Sample pages of the Bach Mamluk Hajj Zuhayr Koran (Tunisia, 1858)]]

 3. “Of Making Many Books There Is No End:” The Classical Muslim View

Fran; Rosenthal

In our time, we seem to have reached the point where we may well ask ourselves whether the incessant production of books might not be too much of a good thing. The more books we throw away (actually or figuratively), the more there are to take their place. It is no longer unjustified to hope against hope that book production could be limited, even if, on the face of it, it clearly involves an uphill battle comparable to the limitation of population growth. Of course, those in the book business, whether out in front or in the rear echelons, do not welcome the prospect of reduced production and consider the idea as anything from eccentric to scurrilous to outright dangerous.

Books have been valuable and cherished possessions all through history. For the first time, their devaluation as material objects could possibly have occurred in medieval Islam, what with the introduction of a rather cheap, yet durable, writing material and the feverish and almost global activity in science and scholarship.[29] This could conceivably have happened, but it did not. Before the Muslim era, no reahstic opportunity existed for the feeling to arise that just too many books might be around. The famous verse of Ecclesiastes 12:12: “Of making many books there is no end, and much study is a weariness of flesh,” at the most expresses a tentative apprehension as to theoretically uncontrollable quantities of books, and so do other putative complaints about the vastness of existing knowledge.[30] The biblical verse presents many difficulties for the understanding and lends itself to various interpretations. To the best of my—admittedly very limited—knowledge, no unanimity has as yet been reached as to what it really meant in its historical context. Whatever it did mean originally, it does not contain evidence that already in ancient times, people complained about too many books as physical objects being around. There were not, and could not have been.

The fact that Eccl. 12:12 is widely considered a later addition poses a further problem,[31] but this is a minor matter. Among the principal difficulties is, for one, the great variety of meanings of the Hebrew verb “to make” and, in the second colon, the meaning of the hapax legomenon lahag. Recent translations include a conservative “book learning” for “to make = to use,”[32] or “a thing of no purpose” for “no end,”[33] as well as more radical suggestions such as assuming that lahag is in fact parallel to “no end”[34] or re-interpreting the entire passage as “Und lass dich, mein Sohn, von ihnen gut belehren, viele Biicher ohne Unterlass zu benutzen und viel zu meditieren bis zur Korpermiidigkeit.”[35] The question of the applicability of “to make” to “books” appears to have been settled by the existence of an equivalent idiom in Aramaic meaning “producing...a document (spr znh zy ’nh ‘bdt)” and the Akkadian usage of ennesu as a stage in the bookmaking process.[36] The possibility that “making” here might mean “collecting” (with reference to EccL 2:8 “I got me singers”)[37] must be put on hold for the time being, although it would go well with the Arabic idiom of ikthar min al-kutub for collecting many books.[38] However, the production or overproduction of books would seem to be connected in Eccl. 12:12 to the physical process of writing rather than the intellectual task of composing works.

Lahag, translated traditionally as “study” reflecting the Greek translation and a combination with Arabic lahija “to be deeply engaged in something” (preferably, in study)[39] remains uncertain. The derivation from the root hagah (or a Ugaritic hg)[40] cannot be dismissed offhand but leaves room for doubt. Rabbinical associations of lahag with l-~-g and h-g-wy are as much guesswork as modern theories. It should, however, be noted that both ك-^عج and h-g-wy are based upon the uttering of sounds, such as stammering or scoffing. The Targum speaks of “(making) books of wisdom” as parallel to “(the occupation with and understanding of) the words of the Torah.”[41] More to the point, the Syriac translation has man(l)la which is most readily understood as “speech.” Following this lead, a Syriac commentary of Ecclesiastes used “words (melleyr[42] And Arabic knows a noun lahjah in the meaning of “tongue, speech, dialect,” whose history, however, is not quite clear.[43] It is thus possible that lahag, whatever its derivation, refers to some sort of oral expression. This was suspected also by M. ٧. Fox who states that “either ‘study’ or ‘utter’ would make sense here, because study in the ancient world was essentially oral recitation.”[44] Taking it all together, we may conclude that Eccl. 12:12 indeed referred originally to the combination of two modes of study, the reading and reproduction of written materials and oral discussion. Whatever mode was used committed, in the eyes of the author, the student to an endless and painful task.

It may be worth noting that Eccl. 12:12 seems to be more famous now than it was in premodern times. Generally speaking, the verse was not much discussed and, again speaking generally, it was not frequently cited. From the medieval Muslim environment, we have a comment by the tenth-century Karaite Salmon ibn Yeruham, paraphrased by G. Vajda: “Et garde-toi encore des livres innombrables qui ont ete faits.” Man must not attempt to become too wise.

Nobody should make the rounds of cities and markets to search for philosophical and heretical works.[45] Reflecting further the attitude of certain segments of Muslim scholarship, Abu al-Barakat al-Baghdadl (d. ca. 547/1166) interprets Eccl. 12:12 as a warning against wasting time on books that are an outgrowth of the human imagination, whose study could take up more than a human lifetime. Abu al-Barakat translates lahag as hadhayan “talking nonsense.”[46]

It was too much knowledge, not too many books, that was complained about in ancient times and continued to be complained about through medieval Islam. Knowledge, especially in certain fields, could not be mastered in its entirety; of books there were, in a way, never enough. In the course of time, we often hear it said that works in a given discipline were “many.” For example, Ibn Khallikan (d. 682/1282) said that he did not intend to include caliphs among his biographees, because “the many works on them are sufficient.”[47] Works on history were so many that they obviously could not all be listed.[48] And, in particular, anything connected with hadlth and other religious subjects produced an enormous literature.[49] When an eighth/fourteenth-century scholar wrote a commentary of al-Bukhârî’s Sahih, he was able to draw on 300 earlier commentaries;[50] for him, this was a boast rather than a complaint. This superabundance of specialized works also to an unwholesome restriction to standard works.[51]

Despair in the face of an overwhelming amount of existing knowledge was the almost universal complaint and the situation most generally referred to. The physical problem of the multitude of books was much less obvious. There were many reasons for this state of affairs. In the first place, it has to do with the character of our sources. They were the work of authors who naturally would not wish to play down the desirability of making more books —preferably, of course, their own. Like ourselves, they would rarely be willing to admit that anything of theirs could be superfluous, let alone harmful. In their forewords, the one thing they generally avoided was referring to an existing glut of other works on the subject.[52] A second, more objective reason was the frequent lack of books in a given environment and the constant need to replenish the stock. In an area as vast and diversified as the Muslim world, imbalances in the supply of books were unavoidable. Books that were plentiful in one place were hardly known and accessible in another.[53] Since books were expensive, scholars, with rare exceptions, had to build up their libraries by copying materials with their own hands; this was so not only at the beginning of their careers, but usually continued throughout their lives. Not many were so fortunate as to be able to buy (or inherit) books or have others do the copying for them as a favor or inexpensively, and it was probably quite unique for a scholar to have a wife whom he could train in proper copying.[54]

A third reason is peculiar to Muslim civilization and of great import for the attitude toward books. It resulted from the never abandoned fiction—very soon to be enshrined in the very center of Muslim intellectual activity, the science of hadith—of the primacy of the spoken word. Books were seen as innovations that came about only after the year 120/738 when the true models of scholarship, the men around Muhammad and most men of the second generation, were dead,[55] and so on. In fact, of course, written books were indispensable almost from the outset, as was admitted in various ways, for instance, by claiming that memory had been good enough among the ancient Arabs to suffice for preserving and safely transmitting all knowledge; among later generations, this was no longer the case.[56] It became a matter of pride to own, or, at least, have access to, as many books as possible. Yet the deep conviction lingered that there was, in addition, something else that was essential for civilization, no matter how many, or how few, books were around. As a result, their numbers were basically inconsequential. Yet even in this climate, subdued feelings not only about the very existence of books but also about their numbers can be observed on occasion. Religious scholars would complain that once knowledge was committed to writing, there developed an unending process of writing “book after book after book,”[57] the implication being that oral transmission was more restricted and thus less contaminated and more reliable than the endless array of written material. Even for secular scholars, the great increase in books (al-kutub wa-al-taşânîf) made it possible for ignoramuses to infiltrate the ranks of qualified intellectuals, and actually diminish the quality of books.[58] In a way, this can be read, as another faint complaint about the proliferation of literature.

There were other ways in which feelings of this sort tried sporadically to work their way to the surface. This is the subject of the following pages.

The formation of large libraries which was eagerly pursued inevitably led to problems caused by quantity and variety. Selectivity in forming a library, be it that of a private individual or one of semi-public character, was indicated.[59] It was an occasional problem then and, needless to say, has remained one to this day. Not discarding any book was considered the better part of wisdom, even if it was a book on a subject beyond the owner's interest and competence. The brief chapter on "the amassing of books (al-ikthar min aikutub)" in the Khatib al-Baghdâdî's (d. 464/1071) Taqyid al-'Hm "The written fixation of knowledge" contains the essence of medieval thought on the importance of each single book for the educated. As the title suggests, the Taqyid ultimately comes out in favor of the written word but balances and, in a way, conceals the message by first presenting a full array of negative attitudes toward books. The chapter in question deals with three considerations that work against selling any of the books in one's library or not buying books one has the opportunity of buying. Anecdotal as it is, it is best reported in the Khatib's own words.[60]

The first of the three considerations is that a book deemed disposable may later on turn out to be badly needed: "As remarked by some scholar, a person must hoard all kinds of subjects, even subjects he does not know. He must amass works on very many subjects. He must not believe that he can dispense with any subject. If he can dispense with some books on one occasion, he may need them on another. If he is unhappy with them at one time, he may enjoy them at another. If he has no time for them on a given day, he may have time for them on another day. He must not act in a hurry (to sell a book or pass up the opportunity to buy one), lest he later regret very much to have done so. It could happen that someone discards a book and then wants it badly but cannot get hold of it. This may cause him great trouble and many sleepless nights. We have a story about a certain scholar who said: ،Once I sold a book thinking that I did not need it. Then I thought of some matter that was dealt with in that book. I looked for it among all my books but could not find it. I decided to ask some scholar about it the next morning, and I stayed up on my feet all night.' When he was asked why he did not sit down rather than stand, he replied: "I was so perturbed that I could not get a wink of sleep.'"

This scholar only lost a night's sleep and apparently was able to find a replacement in a colleague's library. But it could also be terribly frustrating and expensive to sell or discard a book, as described by the Khatib in the following two stories: "Someone sold a book thinking that he did not need it.

Then he needed and looked for a copy but could not find any either to loan or to buy. The man to whom he had sold his copy had left for his place of residence. He went to him and told him that he would like to cancel the sale and return the purchase price. When the man refused, he asked him to lend him the book, so that he could copy the passage he was interested in. Again, he received a negative response, so he went home frustrated and swore that he would never again sell a book. There was someone else who sold a book which he thought he did not need, but later he did need a passage from it. He went to the new owner and asked him to let him copy the passage in question but was told: 'You won't copy it unless you pav me the price of the entire book.' So he had no choice but to return the price of the book, in order to copy the passage he wanted."[61] The words of someone who was asked why he did not sell the books he did not need sums it all up: "If I do not need them today, I may need them the next day."

The second consideration is that books in fields with which their owner is unfamiliar at the moment may give him the opportunity to familiarize himself with that field. Of course, any field of scholarship has its special interest: "When someone bought a book outside his own special field and asked why he did that, he replied: "When I buy a book outside my own field of learning, I do it in order to make that particular field part of my knowledge." And when someone else was asked why he did not buy books to have them in his house, he replied that it was his lack of knowledge that prevented him from building up a library. He was told that one who does not know buys books in order to know. Again, someone else who used to buy every book he saw replied to the question why he bought books he did not need: "I may need (at some time) what I don't need (now)."[62] We may add here that the Khatib's chapter ends with an anecdote about the great bibliophile al-Jahiz (d. 255/868) to the same effect, with the stress on the idea that all written materials should be investigated as to whether they contain information not found elsewhere. Nothing should ever be dismissed offhand.[63]

The third consideration concerns books as a scholar's indispensable tools. He should therefore have them handy at all times: "A judge," the story goes, "used to go into debt to buy books. Questioned about it he replied: 'Should I not buy something that has taken me so far (in the world, i.e., to a judgeship)?'[64] Further in the same vein: "A carpenter had to sell his ax and saw. He was sad about it and regretted having sold his tools, until one day he saw a scholar, a neighbor of his, in the booksellers' market selling a book. Now he was consoled. He remarked: 'If a scholar can sell his tools, a craftsman is certainly excusable, or even more so, when he sells his.'

We may conclude from this discourse in praise of books—which is one among many—that books were often so plentiful that one could think of discarding some, but this was generally considered wrong and something one was not supposed to do. There was, however, a dissenting voice if a rather lonely one according to our knowledge. The well-known physician and scientist in eleventh-century Egypt, Ibn Ridwan, tells US that he either sold the books for which he had no use or stored them away in chests. Selling them, he contends, was preferable to storing them.[65] It is not quite clear whether he meant that it was better to put unneeded books back into circulation rather than keeping them out of sight. It is, however, more likely given, Ibn Ridwan's great concern with his finances, that he was unwilling to pass up an opportunity to make some more money. He was well known as the champion of the hotly debated view that learning from books was better than by means of oral instruction. It does not seem that he was complaining about owning too many books, or more than he was able to cope with, although this could have easily been the case.

Large semi-public libraries faced a bigger problem as to what to do with their holdings when they grew too large. Books being valuable, the most common danger for libraries, not the least the libraries of which every college had one with a scholarly librarian, was frequent inroads into their holdings by neglect and theft (the always present danger of accidental destruction by fire or water damage does not concern US here). When large libraries were dissolved, it proved a bonanza for scholars who could acquire or appropriate books cheap or sell worthless or made to appear worthless, library books for their own benefit.[66] The failure to return books borrowed from libraries or individuals was often bemoaned in verse and prose. It was thus probably much more difficult to hold together large libraries than trying to weed out unwanted materials. However, we also hear about an author's hesitancy as to whether his works would be accepted for incorporation into a large library.[67] Selectivity was always practiced by collectors and was required in forming a waqf library.[68]

The deliberate destruction by fire or other means such as erasing (maha), washing off (ghasala), tearing up (kharraqa), or burying (dafana) should be mentioned here, even if it had other motives than the weeding out of books when they had become too many. Regrettably, as elsewhere in the world, book burnings were not unheard of in Islam. They affected principally books adjudged heretical or otherwise religiously objectionable.[69] This contributed to the virtual disappearance of manuscripts of such works over the centuries. Where there were both fervent partisans and violent opponents in substantial numbers, of course, the situation was different. This, for instance, is shown by Ibn ‘Arabi’s (d. 638/1240) voluminous corpus. Even if there were those who wrote fatwas, permitting the destruction of all books by him,[70] or who went to such scurrilous lengths as tying the Kitab al-Fuşüş to the tail of a dog,[71] his innumerable followers saw to it that copies of his works survived. An instructive story’ on the destruction of a work of presumably literary merit is reported in connection with a book by the blind poet al-Ma’am (d. 449/1057) which supposedly criticized the Qur’an. A librarian, of all people, destroyed it. He was challenged by al-Wajlh al-NahwI (532-612/1137[81–1215) with a witty argument: If the work was indeed equal to, or better than, the Qur’an, it would be untouchable; on the other hand, if it was, as there could be no doubt, inferior to it, it ought to be preserved as a witness to the inimitability of the Holy Book.[72] Perhaps, the underlying and unexpressed moral of the al-Wajlh’s remark was disapproval of the destruction of books in general.

The destruction of valuable property such as books expectedly found the attention of jurists. Strict Hanbalite opinion, for instance, was expressed by a scholar of the stature of Ibn Qayyim al-Jawziyah (d. 751/1350). Other schools and individuals saw the matter differently.[73] Ibn Qayyim al-Jawziyah held that no financial responsibility resulted from the destruction of books. It was as legal and free from liability as the destruction of everything connected with wine. Ibn Qayyim al-Jawziyah’s basic tradition is one of Abu Bakr al-Marrudhi (al-Marwazi) (d. 275/888) who consulted Ibn Hanbal (d. 241/855) on whether he thought that he could burn or tear up a book he had borrowed that contained objectionable matters. Ibn Hanbal expressed the view that it was permissible, quoting a tradition to the effect that the Messenger of God once saw a book in ‘Umar’s hand in which ‘Umar had written down material from the Torah that had pleased him because it agreed with the Qur’an. The Prophet s face showed such anger that ‘Umar rushed to the furnace and threw the book into it. How then, Ibn Qayyim al-Jawziyah continued, would the Prophet have felt had he been able to see books which contradicted the Qur’an and his Sunnah as were published later. Only the Qur’an and the hadlth were permitted to be put down in writing, and this is presented as the view of Ibn Hanbal himself.

All books on TO here, approximately, dogmatic and juridical speculation—and all the more so, all books on other subjects were anathema as leading to error. To err is human, Ibn Hanbal is said to have opined, but the most prone to error are those who write books. While the composition of books was seen as a complicated legal problem, Ibn Hanbal and his followers were adamantly opposed to books that were in conflict with the Qur’an and the Sunnah. It was, however, different with works written against those books; they could fall into any of the positive legal classifications as necessary, preferable, or permitted.[74] It does not take much to realize that we have here a good example of the eternal problem of censorship. Once set in motion, does it have proper limits, and can they be observed without detriment to intellectual life and growth? We do not know the answer.

Another common theme is that of an author himself burning his books or ordering their destructions. Among litterateurs, Abü Hayyan al-Tawhldi (d. after 400/1009) is famous or infamous for having “burned his books at the end of his life because they served no longer any purpose and he did not want those who did not appreciate their worth to have them after his death.” In a letter, in which he defends his action, he speaks of burning his valuable books or washing them off. Having lost everybody near and dear to him, he says, ٤٤1 found it difficult to leave them to people who would play around with them, besmirch my honor when looking into them, gloat over my oversights and mistakes when studying them more closely, and look at each other (and say how) incompetent I am.”[75] This makes it clear that al-Tawhldi speaks about his own books and not about books by others in his library. It would seem a bit curious that he would burn his own works when they included books that had been published and had been in general circulation for a long time. Therefore, speaking about his own “books,” there can be no doubt that he had in mind his unpublished manuscripts and, in particular, his notebooks and drafts.[76] This also applies to, and is confirmed by, his list of those early Muslims who served as model and excuse for his action. The earliest name in al-Tawhîdî's list is Abu 'Amr ibn al-'Alâ' who buried his books. A Sufi, Dawud al-Tâ'î (d. 205/821)و threw his books into the river,[77] while Yusuf ibn Asbat locked his away in a mountain cave.[78] Another Sufi, Aba Sulayman al-Dârânî, burned his books in a furnace.[79] The great Sufyan al-Thawri (d. 161/778) tore his manuscripts to pieces and scattered the pieces in the wind.[80] The last name in the list is that of a teacher of al-Tawhidf Aba Sa'îd al-Sîrâfî (d. 369/979). who exhorted his son (Aba) Muhammad[81] to burn his books if they turned out to play him and others false and distract them from acquiring religious merit; as in the numerous examples from modern times for requests to destroy the literary Nachlass of famous men, this request, of course, may or may not have been honored. The variety of ways for the disposal of books we find in al-Tawhidfs list is owed to his sense of style, and not necessarily to the sources from which he derived his information.

With the possible exception of Abu Sa'îd al-Sîrâfî who, however, was highly praised for his asceticism, all these men were famous exemplars of Muslim piety and religious commitment. Their alleged actions expressed their suspicion of the written word in general. But they hardly were appropriate models for al-Tawhldl who, in spite of pietistic episodes in his life, produced mainly works that were quite worldly in character. As other sources make abundantly clear, the destruction of one's written materials is a topos of the science of hadith and of mysticism. How much reality was connected with the topos, we cannot judge. Later biographers showed a certain lack of enthusiasm for reporting these data.

We thus hear it said already about the first/seventh-century 'Abldah al-Salmam that he called for his "books" and erased them when he lay on his deathbed. Asked for his reason, he replied that he feared that some people might get hold of them who would not treat them properly (yada'unaha ghayr mawadPiha).[82] This seems to be the earliest and, superfluous to say, fictitious example within the tradition of hadith scholarship. The Khatib al-Baghdadl mentions already Ibn Mas'üd among his many examples of men who erased written hadith material .[83] He tells of Abu Qilabah that he willed his "books" to another scholar if the latter survived him; if not, they were to be burned or, according to another recension, torn up.[84] A certain Yunus ibn'Isa meant to burn his books.[85]

Shu’bah ibn al-Hajjaj (d. 160/777) directed his son Sa’d to wash off and bury his “tooks” after his death, which was done.[86] Others buried eighteen chests and baskets of books for Bishr al-Hâfî.[87] It is to the credit of Ibn Hanbal that he could not see any sense in burning books.[88]

These and similar data continued to have a long life. The seventeenth-century Hajj! Khallfah has a list that includes al-Tawhîdî’s Abu ‘Amr ibn al-‘Alâ’, Dawud al-Tâ’î, and Sufyan al-Thawrli. He took their names not from al-Tawhldl but from other sources which he indicates, but which I have been unable to check. He added the Sufi Ibn Abu al-Hawari (6th/12th century) from the Hilyah of Abu Nu’aym al-Işfahânî (d. 430/103(0). The Hilyah presents different recensions, all of which agree that Ibn Abi al-Hawarl was motivated by his conviction that books may serve as guides to gnosis but become superfluous as soon as a person attains gnosis and reaches the Lord.[89]

It is to Hajj! Khallfah’s credit that he clearly distinguished between the two strands that defined all the statements about the destruction of “books.” One of them, he realized, was the need of hadith theoreticians to produce telling evidence for the alleged superiority of oral over written transmission. The other was the persistent claim of pious individuals and devoted mystics to have direct access to the divine which made any material medium such as books altogether unnecessary and undesirable.[90] Hajj! Khallfh considers the view expressed by Ibn Hajar in connection with Dawud al-Tâ’î that the motivation for the destruction of their books by men like him was the prevention of their transmission in a way that might lead to their being branded as “weak transmitters.” On his part, Hâjjî Khallfah realized that more was involved here: “This explanation,” he says, “would not hold for the destruction of their notebooks (dafatir) by Ibn Abi al-Hawârî and his ilk. Dawud al-Tâ’î did what he did because he was concerned about the resulting weakness of his isnad. On the other hand, Ibn Abi al-Hawarl did it because of his asceticism and devotion to God. The explanation why he (and others like him) chose to destroy (their books, instead of selling them or giving them away) might perhaps be (sought in their fear) that, if they had divested themselves of the possession of their dafatir through gift or sale, their emotional (qalbf) attachment to them would not have been severed completely and they could not be sure that they might not at some time get the urge to go back to them and study them, thereby occupying themselves with something other than God.”[91]

In historical cases, the evidence for such destruction is occasionally ambiguous. Thus, we hear that Ahmad ibn Ismâ’îl ibn Abi al-Su’üd (814-870/ 1412–66) reached the point, probably because of religious scruples (3), where he wanted to give up all his literary activities, and he washed off all his poetical and prose writings, so that only his previously published works survived. However, another source maintains that this did not happen intentionally. When Ibn Abi al-Su’üd was in the process of sorting out the poems he did not like in order to destroy them, a colleague appeared unexpectedly and he went out to meet him. Meanwhile, he ordered someone to destroy the papers on the right in his study. That individual became confused and destroyed the papers which Ibn Abi al-Su’üd wanted to keep. When Ibn Abi al-Su’üd came back and saw what had happened, he was very dismayed (suqitafi yadihi) and destroyed the rest.[92]

Such destruction of papers and notes, or books in our sense, whether historical or not, did not reflect on the size of book production. This, I feel, probably also applies to a statement telling US that, at the time it was made, there were people who disapproved of all authorship (al-taşnîf wa-al-ta’lîf), even of those who were qualified and knowledgeable enough to write books. So far, I have been unable to trace this statement to any source earlier than Badr al-Dîn ibn Jamaah (639-733/1241-1333) who mentions it in his well-known treatise on education, entitled Tadhkimt alsami’ wa-al-mutakallim[93] Ibn Jama’ah strongly disapproves of this attitude. If, he argues, there is no legal disapproval of the written fixation of poetry and entertaining stories, provided no indecency is involved, why, then, should the writing of books on useful religious subjects be disapproved? It is obvious that unqualified people should never be allowed to write books on any subject. As Ibn Jama’ah sees it, the only possible explanation for the disapproval of authoring books is the constant envy and competitiveness among generations (al-tahasud bayna ahi al-a’şâr).[94] Quoting Ibn Jamâ’ah’s view, Hâjjî Khalifah then goes on to criticize it as a reflection of the popular attitude that considers only the achievements of earlier generations as important and routinely holds contemporary scholars in low esteem, and he treats his readers to the verses:

You who think nothing of contemporaries, considering the ancients to be out in front: The ancients were once young/new, And the young/new will stay on and become ancient.[95]

Neither Ibn Jama’ah nor Hâjjî KhalTfah seem to be correct. The disapproval of composing books may also here be rooted rather in the pietistic/mystic attitude and the long tradition of philosophers (such as Socrates) and, above all, mystics who feel revulsion at the thought of profaning their insights. It is not impossible that the expression could be explained as a complaint about the proliferation of books, but this does not really seem plausible.

The problem of overproduction is more directly addressed in the strong sentiment in favor of abridgements and brief handbooks as against long, comprehensive, and scholarly works. The latter were, of course, always produced in large numbers. They were, in fact, quite characteristic products of medieval Muslim civilization. However, the attitude, serious in part and in part a snobbish pretense, that big books are a nuisance was old and deeply engrained. al-Tawhidi put it succinctly: “Big books are boring (al-kutub al-tiwal mus’imah).[96] As A. Mez stressed long ago, writers of Muslim civilization’s so-called golden age feared nothing more than boring the reader.[97] This fear persisted through the centuries and found expression in the frequently professed aversion to unnecessary length and the claim of having exercised restraint for the sake of brevity. While conciseness had special meaning for the entertaining literature, it soon invaded the scholarly and scientific community where it led to the popularity of compendia. Resistance to the trend never faltered entirely. For instance, in the introduction of his long geographical dictionary, Yaqut (d. 627/1229) expressed himself with strong emotion against any attempt to shorten his work, quoting al-Jahiz as having been of the same mind when he stated forcefully that an author is “like a painter; his work is a painting representing its subject perfectly, and the idea of abridging it means atrocious mutilation.[98] The practice (often also indulged in by us) of exploiting large works for educational and/or commercial reasons by compiling shortened versions. which, as noted by Yaqut, stood a better chance of achieving wide dissemination, was part and parcel of medieval Muslim life.

It was recognized that progress dictated the creation of larger and better works. Treatments of new and as yet unexplored subjects tended to start out small and then grow to ever larger size in the course of time.[99] Originality was stressed as the fundamental purpose of and justification for writing and was one of the guiding principles of research.[100] The remark, already used by Abu Tammam (d. 231/846) the poet as a cento,[101] was constantly repeated: “How much did the ancients leave for later generations (kam taraka al-awwalu lil-akhiri).” al-Jahiz is quoted again by Yâqüt as having stated that nothing is more harmful to science and scholarship than the opposite contention that the ancients did not leave anything for later generations, as this had a discouraging and debilitating effect.[102] The consequence, however, was the constant creation of new disciplines and subdisciplines, small at first and then often expanding to barely manageable proportions. With the technical means then available, they were probably unmanageable and required forgetting and discarding. More, and better, techniques are available now and offer a certain, possibly deceptive, measure of hope that we shall be able to keep up with the accumulation of knowledge and of books.

The theoretical approach of philosophers to the overwhelming mass and variety of knowledge put into writing was to suggest, as did al-Tawhidi and al-Miskawayh (d. 422/1030), that “since the particulars (juz’îvât) are infinite, and whatever is infinite cannot achieve existence, it is the generalities of each discipline, which comprise all its particulars inpotentia, that should be aimed at.”[103] Deprived of its technical philosophical trimmings, the idea also lived on and found expression, for instance, in al-Zarkashfs (d. 794/1391) detailed elaboration of the different Quranic sciences. Since, he claims, “the ulum al-Qur’ân are innumerable and the Qur’an’s meanings are inexhaustible, one must deal with them (not exhaustively but) to the degree possible.” And “since earlier scholars composed no work comprising the different topics (anwa’) of Quranic science in the way it was done in relation to the science of hadith," he wrote his comprehensive work covering forty-six topics, but, he says,

I am aware that every one of these topics cannot be dealt with exhaustively by any human being. If anyone tried, the whole of his life would be spent, and yet, he would not accomplish his task. Therefore, we have restricted ourselves to the principles (uşül) of each topic, with (only) occasional hints at the details (fiışûl), for—quoting Hippocrates without naming him—"the craft is long and life is short."[104] We have dealt with as much as can possibly be achieved by imperfect speech, in accordance with the verse:

They said: Take the essence/eye (!ayri) of everything! I replied: There is excellence in the essence/eye, but the beholder of the essence/the glance of the eye (is imperfect).[105]

In the popular and entertaining literature, a simpler analogy was proposed in a saying which, like the philosophical approach, also had its roots in classical antiquity: Like a bee, an author should select the best flower. A more direct version of the same idea was attributed to ancient Muslims such as 'Abd Allah ibn 'Abbas (d. 68/686) and Ibn Şîrîn (d. 110/728): "Knowledge is too much for being comprehended in its entirety. Thus, take the best of every knowledge!"[106]

The statement of Ibn 'Abbas was combined later with another one attributed to al-Sha'bî who, like Ibn Şîrîn, lived a generation after Ibn 'Abbas. al-Sha'bî (d. 105/723) supposedly also alluded to Hippocrates without naming him. As he phrased it: "Knowledge is much, and life is little. Thus, take of knowledge the variety of its inner spirit (arwahy—that is, its essences Çuyûri)—and leave alone its outward expression (hurüf)\"[107]

This advice was meant for the creative scholar and intellectual. For the mass of the educated, the compendium, the short exposition of the essentials or high points of a subject or the selective presentation of details, promised a better approach toward the elusive mastery of knowledge in its infinite variety. Another approach was for an author to justify writing a book by suggesting that his work, being an original product, would serve to replace all other works in the field[108]—this, we might say, being one way of dealing with the avalanche of books. In writing his great chronological work, al-Bırûnî (d. 440/1048), for instance, claimed that the highly educated person who asked him to compose such a work did so in order to have a book that would make it superfluous for him to consult a large number of sources.[109] More commonly, authors expressed on their own the hope or conviction that they were about to replace any need to consult all the earlier works that had dealt with their subject. The large number of titles such as al-Mughni, it may be noted, also attests to this motivation. On the other hand, it could also happen that a would-be author originally thought that the existing literature was exhaustive and made another work on the same subject unnecessary. After much research, however, he discovered that this was not the case, and he was justified in going ahead with his project and compose a more complete work likely to supplant all his predecessors' efforts. He reflected, at the end, "how much the ancients had left for later generations to do."[110]

The production of compendia in order to cope with the great amount of material to be read and digested and to make the acquisition of knowledge easier for the student eventually found full discussion in both its positive and its negative aspects in Ibn Khaldun's Muqaddimah.[111] As Ibn Khaldun (d. 808/1406) saw it, the great number of scholarly works, coupled with the refinement and sophistication reached in many fields, is an obstacle to scholarship, while the great number of brief handbooks is detrimental to the formation of a sound scholarly habit and thus of outstanding scholars. In many disciplines such as grammar[112] the literature is too vast for everything to be perused. More recently, says Ibn Khaldun, this has also come to apply to the many writings on literary criticism which were produced in addition to the four standard works on the subject.[113] An even more crowded field, the science of hadith, had developed an enormous amount of books and this had the consequence that a limited number of basic works was exclusively used for reference.[114] Ibn Khaldun, it seems, considered this a rather dubious development. He did not go as far as to suggest that there were too many books on the market, but he clearly intimated that something was wrong with the prevailing situation and called for remedies if such could be found. Focusing his attention on the handbooks, abridgements, and compendia, he acknowledged that one of the legitimate purposes of authorship was generally recognized the production of brief and succinct abridgements.[115] The custom, he said, had become popular in his time (although it was, of course, widely practiced in preceding centuries). He considered such abridgements as often awkward but did not object to them as such. He pointed out that on the one hand, they tended to be too succinct and complicated for beginners, while, on the other, they were likely to stultify genuine scholarly minds, for true scholarship, he argued, required the painstaking study of long and detailed works over a considerable extent of time. It is clsar that for Ibn Khaldun and those who followed him, the issue was not seen simply as the superabundance of books, although he realized that it caused a problem. It was rather a question of the proper methods and goals of scholarly and literary activity which were appropriate for a highly developed civilization such as his. These methods and goals, however, happened unavoidably to be dependent on the relentless production and wide availability of books. By his time and very probably much earlier, their numbers had come to seem threatening.

Ibn Khaldun’s discussion greatly impressed Hâjjî Khallfah who utilized it in the introduction of his large catalogue of Arabic books in Istanbul or otherwise known in his time.[116] In his capacity as a bibliographer, Hâjjî Khallfah might well have had special feelings about the cultural significance of the riches of book production in Islam. About seven centuries earlier, the situation was different. In his famous Fihrist, Ibn al-Nadlm (d. 380/990) had already vast numbers of titles to report on, but there was no real reason for him to sense, let alone comment on, too many books. So he concerned himself in his opening pages with the technical aspects of bookmaking which to him meant handwriting and scripts in their various forms and historical development. In the century before Hâjjî Khallfah, Tashkbpriizadeh produced a mammoth catalogue of the sciences, entitled Miftah al-sa’adah. His interest lay in the enormous amount of what he classified as special disciplines that together constituted the sum total of written knowledge no longer to be mastered in its entirety; he had occasion to mention only a limited number of standard works. It is due to Tshkoprizadeh’s influence that Hâjjî Khallfah in his introduction discourses lengthily on knowledge and its multiple disciplines, instead of book production as would have been logical. Thus, he misses out on the opportunity to speculate on the subiect that interests US here most. He remarks, however, in the beginning that an exhaustive bibliography such as his had become finally necessary, “because the scholarly disciplines and books are many, and the lives of individuals are preciously short.”[117]

In conclusion, let me state that the feeling that there are simply too many books in the world remains a present-day phenomenon and is left to US not only to ponder but also to try to do something about it, if this is in our power. Possibly the fate of our civilization depends on it. In medieval Islam, books as physical objects were valuable since, for the ordinary individual, they were difficult to obtain and to amass; although plentiful in some locations, they could be scarce in others. The censorial destruction of books for one reason or another did occur at times, to the detriment of modern scholarship, but contributed little to limiting the constant increase in the number of books. The relationship between knowledge and books remained determined by a fictitious and, from our point of view, unfortunate distinction between oral and written information. Again, this did not contribute much to diminishing book production. It did, however, give some slight encouragement to the age-old tradition that some type of special secret or sacred knowledge was better left unwritten. Still, in the face of the pretended behef in the superiority of oral transmission, it was generally recognized that all)knowledge was important and would disappear without books. This recognition often extended to the realization that all written materials were valuable and required preservation. The only practical attempts, however, to regulate, if modestly, the flood of books consisted of the production of works that were supposed to take the place of all the previous publications in a given field, and of the composition of handbooks and compendia, but the value and efficacy of these procedures did not remain unquestioned. Before the age of printing and modern technology, this was probably the most that could be done. The Muslim scholars cited here deserve credit for having been aware, if ever so dimly, of the problems resulting from the overproduction of books as an unintended by-product of the intellectual flourishing of their civilization. As it turned out, of making many books there was no end in medieval Islam, and we have every reason to be glad that this was so.

[29] A good brief survey of contemporary scholarship on all aspects of bookmaking is by G. Endress, in Grundriss derarabischen Philologie, ed. by Wolfdietrich Fischer (Wiesbaden, 1983), l:271ff.

[30] While I was working on this paper, the Book Review section of th eNew York Times of 20 March 1989 pubhshed an essay by Arthur Krystal, “On Writing: Let There Be Less,” dealing interestingly with our subject as reflected through the ages. Krystal mentions the Ancient Egyptian statement of Khakheperre-sonbe, which reads in the translation of WK. Simpson: “He said: Would that I had unknown speeches, erudite phrases in new language which has not yet been used, free from the usual repetitions, not the phrases of past speech which (our) forefathers spoke.” See WK. Simpson (ed.). The Literature ofAncient Egypt (New Haven and London, 1972, 1973), pp. 230–33. This should not be understood as a complaint about the existence of too much literature. Rather, it is an expression of the author’s desire to be original. Expectedly, the modern plea for fewer books elicited heated responses among the essay’s readers, as shown by letters to the Book Review of 30 April 1989, p. 5.

[31] An exception is Michael V. Fox, Qohelet and his Contradictions (Sheffield, 1989. Bible and Literature Series 18), p. 311. I am grateful to Robert R. Wilson for bibliographical guidance through the vast ocean of biblical studies.

[32] Cf. R.B.Y. Scott’s commentary on Ecclesiastes in the Anchor Bible (Garden City, NY, 1963).

[33] Fox, op. cit., 237.

[34] According to M. Dahood, cf. H.L. Ginsberg, Koheleth (Tel Aviv 1961), p. 139.

[35] Osweld Loretz, Qohelet und derAlte Orhw? (Freiburg-Basel-Wien, 1964), p. 139.

[36] Cf. Ginsberg, loc. cit.; Michael Fishbane, Biblical Interpretation in Ancient Israel (Oxford, 1985), pp. 30–32: Fox, op. cit., p. 328f.

[37] The presence of a possessive pronoun, which strengthens the meaning of collecting, would hardly be needed or fit into the syntax of Eccles. 12:12.

[38] It seems as yet undecided whether harbeh (=Aram. Saggi) is used here as an adjective or as an adverb (cf. L Goldin, “The end of Ecclesiastes,” in A. Altmann, ed.. Biblical Motifs [Cambridge, 19661, pp. 135–58.) The adverbial combination, lit., “the much making of books,” appears preferable. In Semitic languages there is no easy distinction between “much” and “too much.” Thus, harbeh in Eccles. 7:16 is translated by Ginsberg “don’t overdo,” cf. his The Five Megilloth (Philadelphia, 1969), p. 68.

[39] Cf. for instance Muhammad ibn al-Rahman al-Sakhw al-Daw’ al-lami’ li-ahl al-Qam al-Tasi’, 12 vols. (Cairo, 1353-55/1934-36), 9:259, “lahija bi-talab al-hadith wa-al-qira\ah:\

[40] See above, n. 6, and M. Dahood, “Canaanite-Phoenician influence in Qoheleth,” in Biblica 33 (1952), p. 219.

[41] According to the publication of A. Sperber, The Bible in Aramaic, 4 vols. in 5, (Leiden. 1968), 5:167.

[42] Cf. w. Strothmann (ed.), Kohelet-Kommentar des Johannes von Apamea (Wiesbaden, 1988. Gottinger Orientforschungen, I Reihe: Syriaca, Band 30), P-182. It is, however, not surprising to find huggaya “meditation” as a translation of lahag, cf. w. Strothmann, Kohelet-Kommentar des Dionvsius bâr Salibi (Wiesbaden, 1988, Band 31).

[43] I am greatly obligated to M. Ullmann for communicating to me his Worterbuch entries for lahjah. They seem to leave doubts in his mind as to the relationship between the root l-h-j and lahjah.

[44] Fox, op. cit., p. 328.

[45] Cf. G. Vajda, Deux Commentaires Karaites sur l’Ecclesiaste (Leiden, 1971), pp. 61, 75.

[46] Aba al-Barakat Hibat Allah al-Baghdadl, al-Mutabar, 3 vols. (Hyderabad, 1357-58/1938-39)و 2:347و line 12ff. I owe this reference to Moshe Perlmann.

In the following generation, Moses Maimonides interpreted the Mishnaic expression “heretical books (.sefarim hitsonim) as including books on history and adab which constitute a waste of time, cf. his commentary on the Mishna Sanhedrin, 71 و, ed. I. Qafih (Jerusalem, 1934), p. 210.

[47] Ibn Khallikan, Wafayat al-a’yan, 8 vols., ed. Ihsan ‘Abbas (Beirut, 1968–72), 1:20.

[48] Cf. al-îjî and al-Sakhawl as quoted in F. Rosenthal, A History of Muslim Historiography² (Leiden. 1968), pp. 24211., 388.

[49] Cf. Murtada al-Zabîdî, ithaf alSadah, 10 vols. (Cairo, 1311/1893). Reprinted in Beirut, 1:273, line 14ff.

[50] Cf. al-Sakhawl, Daw’, 10:21. The number 300 appears again in connection with al-Khiraqfs Mukhtasar. See The Encyclopedia of Islam, 2nd ed. (EI²), SV Hanabila, 3:159, col. 1, line 30 and again s.v. al-Khiraki (H. Laoust), 5:10, col. 1, line 23, but, of course, other figures appear as well. In all cases, it can be assumed to have been a boast about the large number of sources consudted.

[51] Cf. Ibn Khaldun, Muqaddimah, tr. by F. Rosenthal, 3 vols. (New York, 1958; Princeton, 1967), 2:455. See below, p. 43.

[52] See the most useful dissertation by Peter Freimark on Das Vorwort als literarische Form in der arabischen Literatur (MviVrc, ل%ו. Ü2, on Latin Prose Prefaces (ʕ>vü, 1964,Acta Universitatis Stockholmianiae, Studia Latina Stockholmiana 13), Toe Janson apparently found nothing in his material on the overwhelming amount of available books on a given subject, nor did Freimark in Arabic.

[53] Murtada al-Zabîdî, ithaf, 1:274, line 121.

[54] ALSakhawi, Daw', 2:180, line 4 from bottom.

[55] ALGhazzall, ihya'ulüm al-dîn, 4 vols. in 2 (Cairo, 1372/1953), 1:70, line 4ff., from Abu Talib ai-Makki, Qut al-qulub, 2 vols. (Cairo, 1310/1892)4 :1:159 و vols. in 2 (Cairo, 1351/1932), 2:37.

[56] See, for instance, Ibn 'Abd al-Barr, Jami' bayan al-'Um, 2 vols., (Cairo, n.d.), l:69f.

[57] Ibn Qayyim al-Jawziyah, al-Turuq alrhukmlyah (Cairo, 1372/1953), p. 277.

[58] Abu al-Barakat Hibat Allah aLBaghdadi, alUabarfi al-hikmah, 3 vols., (Hyderabad, 1938–39), 1:3.

[59] See below p. 000.

[60] al-Khatlb al-Baghdadi, Taqyld al-‘Um, ed. Youssef Eche (Yusuf al-Tshsh) (Damascus, 1949, reprint 1975), pp. 136–38.

[61] Some trickery might be used by a rare book dealer, in order to raise the fee for lending a book to what the price of the entire book should have been, cf. al-Sakhawl, Daw’, 9:148. The owners of lending libraries as a rule would seem to have been honest and often generous.

[62] Here follow verses attributed to al-Sârî ibn Ahmad al-Kindl, i.e., al-San al-Raffa’. They are not included in the 1355/1936 and 1981 editions of his diwan They deal with the widespread topos of the lasting value of all knowledge and have little to do directly with the subject of books.

[63] Cf. also, for instance, Ibn Hazm, Maratib al-‘ulüm, in Anwar Chejne, Ibn Hazm (Chicago, 1982), text, 234, trans., p. 2O2f. Ibn Hazm also called it an error to decry the amassing of books.

[64] Al-Jahiz already discussed at length the “pleasure” of spending money on books, if it was done for the sake of scholarship and not for purposes of religious ostentation as, he claims, was done by the Manichaeans. Cf. Kitab al-Hayawan, 7 vols., ed. ’Abd al-Salam M. Hârün (Cairo, 1938–45), 1:56. See also Ibn Hazm, loc. cit.

[65] Cf. J. Schacht andM. Meyerhof, The Medico-Philosophical Controversy between Ibn Butlan and Ibn Ridwan of Cairo, Arabic text 5 (Cairo, 1937), p. 38, from Ibn Abi Uşaybi’ah; E Rosenthal, “Die arabische Autobiographic,” Studia Arabica I (Rome, 1937, Analecta Orientalia 14), p. 22, from the manuscript of Ibn Ridwan’s autobiography. The eighteenth-century Murtada al-Zabîdî, ithaf, 1:66, lines 15–67, line 11, still found the passage interesting enough to quote it.

[66] Cf. Youssef Eche, Les Bibliotheques arabes (Damascus, 1967), p. 250. Selling books “by the lot (bi-al-‘adaâ)’’ from a bookseller’s estate might have been necessitated by their large numbers but, above all, indicated general ignorance and a lack of discrimination by potential buyers, cf. al-Sakhawl, Daw’, 3:150, line 6. An ignorant cmutakhallif 9) son of Ibn Yunus would sell the books and works of his father left to him “by the pound cbi-al-artaT),” cf. Al-Şafadî, Wafi (Stuttgart, 1988. Bibliotheca Islamica 6u) 21:226, line 8.

[67] Cf. Eche, op. cit., 104 from Yaqut, Irshad al-anb, ed. D.S. Margoliouth, 7 vols. (Leiden-London, 1907–27), 1:2423 ed. A.F. Rifâ’î, 20 vols. (Cairo, 1355-57/1936-1938), 4:6.

[68] Eche, op. cit., 198, from al-Qiftl, Ikhbar al-‘ulamâ’ bi-akhbar al-hukama’, ed. J. Lippert (Leipzig, 1903), p. 269.

[69] The justification for book burnings was probably always sought in lese-religion. The sad case of a grandson of ‘Abd al-Qadir al-Jîlânî, ‘Abd al-Salam ibn ‘Abd al-Wahhab (548-611/1154-1214), whose books on magic and star worship were publicly burned, illustrates the blend of personal, academic, and religious politics with suspicions of heresy that could lead to legal proceedings and autodafes, cf. Ibn al-Tmad, Shadharat al-Dhahab, 8 vols. (Cairo, 1350-51/1931-32), 5:451.

[70] Cf. al-Sakhw Daw’, 3:32, line 17.

[71] Cf. Ibn Hajar, Inba’, 9 vols, (Hyderabad, 1387-96/1967-76), 7:394, anno 823, quoted by al-Sakhawl, Daw’, 3:31.

[72] Cf. Eche, op. cit., 188, following Yaqut, Irshad, ed. Margoliouth, 6:235· ed. Rifa’1, 27:591.

[73] See ibn al-Jamâ’ah, below, p. 42. (regarding the attitude towards the disapproval of writing books.)

[74] Cf. Ibn Qayyim al-Jawzlyah, al-Turuq al-hukmiyah, pp. 275–77.

[75] Cf. Yâqüt, Irshad, ed. Margouliouth, 5:386ff.;ed. Rifâ’ı, 15:16, 9:21ff.

[76] Hâjjî Khallfah, Kashfal-Zunun, ed. Serefettin Y Itkaya, 2 vols. (Istanbul, 1945–47), vol. 1, intro., col. 52b, quotes the section of Kuna from Ibn ‘Asakirs History of Damascus as using dafatir in connection with Sufyan al-Thawrl (below no. 52). Although historically, daftar had different meanings (see EI², s.v. “Daftar” [B. Lewis]), in our context “notebooks” is intended. It need hardly be stated expressly that the range of meanings of Arabic Kitab is not coextensive with our “book.”

[77] According to al-Khaftb al-Baghdadi, Tarikh Baghdad, 14 vols., (Cairo, 1349/1931), 8:348, line 2f., Dâwüd al-Tâ’î did so after he felt sure that he no longer needed the books and was ready to devote himself conclusively to solitary divine worship.

[78] Mention of the mountain cave is not found in the biographical notices. They say that he buried his books, with unhappy results for the reliability of his traditions. See al-Bukhari, Tai, 8 vols. (Hyderabad, 1360-78/1941-58), 4 pt. 2:385, Ibn Abî Hatim al-Râzî, Jarh (Hyderabad, 1941–53), 4 pt. 2:218 on the authority of his father Abu Hatim al-Râzî; al-Dhahabl, Mizan al-Tüdâl, 4 vols. (Cairo, 1382/1963), 4:162: Ibn Hajar, Tahdhib aTtahdhib, 12 vols. (Hyderabad, 1325-27/1907-9), 1:408. This does not necessarily indicate that alTawhldl invented the mountain cave for artistic effect—he could have found it in some other source—but it is quite likely.

[79] Abu Sulaymân al-Dârânî was an authority of Ibn Abî al-Hawârî (below, no. 61) و who was a contemporary of Sufyân al-Thawrl.

[80] I have not gone through the large literature on Sufyân to find out whether this information is repeated elsewhere.

[81] The text has Muhammad, but he is presumably Abu Sa'îd's son Abu Muhammad ibn al-Hasan (whose name is occasionally distorted), see Ibn al-Nadim, al-Fihrist, p. 62f., also 31, line 23, as well as Bayard Dodge's English translation, 2 vols. (New York, 1970), 1:136, and the Persian translation by M. Rida Tajaddud (Teheran, 1343/1965), p. 106; 'Alî ibn Yûsuf al-Qifti Inbah al-rhwah, ed. M. Abu al-Fadl Ibrahim, 4 vols. (Cairo, 1369-93/195073), 1:314; Ibn Khallikan, Wafayat, ed. Ihsan 'Abbas, 2:79: Sezgin, GAS, 9:98; al-Sîrâfî's long biography in Yaqut, Irshad, ed. Margoliouth, 3:48–125; ed Rifâ'î, 8:142–232, draws on al-Tawhîdî's works, but the request to have his books burned is not mentioned there. On Abu Sa'îd al-Sîrâfî, see also, more recently, G. Endress, "Grammatik und Logik" in Burkhard Moisisch (ed.), Sprach-philosophic in Antike und Mittelalter (Amsterdam, 1987, Bochumer Studien zurr Philosophic 3).

[82] Ibn Sa'd, Tabaqat, ed. E. Sachau and others, 9 vols. (Leiden, 1904–40), 4:63, lines 17ff.;al-Khatîb al-Baghdadi, Taqyld, p. 61; Ibn 'Abd al-Barr, اد' bayan al-'dm, 1:67, لا ح.

[83] Taqyid, p. 39, line llf. Ibn Mas'üd was put on the spot for transmitting a hadfth differently from what his son had written down.

[84] Taqyid, ج.·فى·

[85] Ibid. Yûnus ibn ‘Isa was an authority on Bishr al-Hâfî.

[86] Ibid.

[87] Taqyld, p. 63. According to Ibn Hajar, Tahdhib, 1:445, Bishr disliked the transmission of hadlth and therefore buried his books. Abû Nu’aym has nothing on the subject.

[88] Ibid.

[89] Abû Nu’aym, Hilyat al-awliya’, 10 vols. (Reprint Beirut, 1387/1967), 10.61.

[90] On the other hand, scholars were considered foolish to brag about composing works without recourse to relevant literature. Such disregard of their predecessors meant that they would not know what distinguished their works from those of others, cf. al-Zarkashi, al-Burhanfi ‘ulûm al-Qur’an, 4 vols. (Cairo, 1376/1957), 1:16.

[91] Cf. Hâjjî Khalifoh, Kashf, kintro., col. 32f. The wish to approach God (qasd wajh Allah) was generally accepted goal and precondition for any successful study. Without it, collecting books would be useless, see, for instance, Yûsuf al-Balawi, Kitab alif ba’, 2 vols. (Bûlâq, 1287/1870), 1:17, line 2f.

[92] See al-Sakhawi, Daw’, 1:232[.

[93] See Ibn Jama’ah, Tadhkirah (Hyderabad, 1953), p. 30. In the context, Ibn Jama’ah mentions al-Khat b al-Baghdadi, but the quoted statement is apparently not included in the reference. In a somewhat shortened form, with the omission of the qualified and knowledgeable persons, the statement is quoted by Hâjjî Khalufah, kintro., col. 39. On his own, it seems Hâjjî Khalîfah adds mutlaqan “absolutely (disapproved).” Tasnif usually referred to the original composition of books. Cf., for instance, al-Sakhâwî> Daw’, 1:46, line 19ff., on the very learned İbrâhîm ibn Khidr: “In spite of his learning, he did not occupy himself with tasnif, although he made valuable notes on many books.” Cf. also Ibn Hajar, al-Durar al-kdminah, 1st ed., 4 vols. (Hyderabad, 1348-50/1929-31), 3:490: idem, Inba’, 1:184, or al-Sakhawi, Daw’, 2:79.

[94] One may compare, from a different time and situation, al-Jâhiz’s remark about an ignoramus who progressed from finding fault with al-Jâhiz’s works to condemning the writing of books in general (·Kitab al-Hayawan, ed. Hârûn, (37–38 1:19و

[95] See also below, p. 44.

[96] Cf. al-Tawhîdî, al-ImtcC wa-al-mu’anasah, ed. Afimad Amîn and Ahmad al-Zayn, 3 vols. (Cairo, 1939–44), 2:194, line 6.

[97] Cf. Mez’s introduction to his edition of Abulkasim, ein bagdader Sittenbild (Heidleberg, 1902), viii f.

[98] Cf. Yâqût, Mu jam al-buldan, ed. F. Wiistenfeld (Gottingen, 1866–73), -The Introductory Chapters of Yaquts Mu’jam al, \ح ١١قيب\ةلد ١٠.٦٦؟.,لم٢لأة؟ل’ةة Buldan (Leiden, 1959), p. 16.

[99] Cf. F. Rosenthal, The Technique and Approach ofMuslim Scholarship (Rome, 1947. Analecta Orientalia 24), p. 43a, and idem, A History of Muslim Historiography², p. 71, n.3.

[100] As indicated in the enumeration of items that justify the writing of books, see below, n. 87.

[101] See Yâqüt, trans. Jwaideh, p. 9, n. 4.

[102] See Yâqüt, Mufam, 1:6, trans. Jwaideh, p. 9. Jwaideh notes that the statement recurs in the biography of al-Jâhiz in Yâqüt, Irshad, ed. Margoliouth, 6:58, ed. Rifâ'î, 16:78.

[103] Al-Tawhd and Miskawayh, al-Hawamil wa-alshawamil, ed. Ahmad Amin and al-Sayyid Ahmad Saqr (Cairo, 1370/1951), p. 268f.

[104] Below, in the reference by al-Sha'bi to the common idea that human life is all too short to know everything, it is not as certain as it is here and elsewhere that the first aphorism is indeed the inspiration, but it seems highly probable.

[105] This appears to be the correct interpretation of the verse to be read:.. .wa-lakin naziru al-'ayni. See al-Zarkashl, Burhan, 1:9, 12, quoted in part by al-Suyütî, Itqan, 2 vols. in 1 (Cairo, 1317/1899), 1:5.

[106] Cf. Freimark, p. 64, referring to al-Washsha', Muwashsha, for Ibn 'Abbas, and to Ibn 'AM Rabbih, 'Iqd, for Ibn Sirin. This latter ascription appears also in al-Balawi, Kitab alif ba', 1:14, line 19.

[107] See 'All al-Ghuzul, Matair al-budur, 2 vols. in 1 (Cairo, 1299-1300/1881) 1:7.

[108] Cf. Freimark, pp. 40ff., 164.

[109] Cf. al-Bîrünî, al-Aîhâr al-baqiyah, ed. Sachau (Leipzig, 1878), p. 4, line 5 quoted by Freimark, p. 142.

[110] Cf. Ibn al-Athîr, al-Nihayah fi gharib al-hadith, 5 vols. (Cairo, 1322/1904), 1:15, line I5f.; 6, line 18; 8, line 15ff.; 9, line 17.

[111] Ibn Khaldun, Muqaddimah, trans., F. Rosenthal, 3:288–91.

[112] Op. cit., 3:324.

[113] Op. cit., 3:3401·

[114] Op. cit., 2:455.

[115] Op. cit., 3:287. See 284, n. 1123, for parallels. Ibn Khaldün mentions the writing of abridgements as the last of the seven justifications for authorship. Al-Maqarri, Azhar al-riyad, 3 vols. (Cairo, 1358/1939), 3:34, puts abridgements in the sixth place. They were promoted to fourth place in Hâjjî Khalîfah, Lintro., col. 35.

[116] Hâjjî Khalîfah, Kashf, lintro., col. 43f.

[117] Op. cit., Lintro., col. 1. For the allusion to Hippocrates, see above,

 4. Oral Transmission and the Book in Islamic Education: The Spoken and the Written Word

Seyyed Hossein Nasr

The revelation of the Qur’an was auditory before becoming crystallized in a written text. The Prophet first heard the term iqra’ and only later recited the first revealed verses on the basis of their audition. The whole experience of the Qur’an for Muslims remains to this day first of all an auditory experience and is only later associated with reading in the ordinary sense of the word. There is an ever present, orally heard, and memorized Qur’an in addition to the written version of the Sacred Text, an auditory reality which touches the deepest chords in the souls of the faithful, even if they are unable to read the Arabic text.

Since it is the “Mother of Books” and also the prototype of the written word in Islam, the oral dimension of the Qur’anic reality, combined with the traditional significance of memory in the transmission of knowledge, could not but affect the whole of the Islamic intellectual tradition and educational system. It could not but enliven both the poetic and the prose memory of the Islamic peoples, strengthen the significance of oral transmission, and leave something of its impact upon the very understanding of the book in the context of traditional Islamic culture. As a result of the influence of the Quranic revelation and also other factors related to the rise of the whole Islamic educational system, the significance of the oral tradition and memory as a vehicle for the transmission of knowledge came to complement the written word contained in books, especially those books which became central texts for the teaching of various schools of thought and which figured prominently in the relationship between the traditional master (al-ustadh) and the students (tullab).[118] Such books became more than simply the written text. Rather, they came to accompany and in a sense became immersed in the spoken word, through an oral teaching transmitted from master to student and stored in the memory of those destined to be the recipients of the knowledge in question. Such books were not exclusively written texts whose reality was exhausted by the words inscribed in ink upon parchment.

The oral tradition also played a cultural role in determining which book or books of a particular master would become texts to be discussed in study circles and would act as a vehicle for the transmission of the teachings of the master in question. The oral transmission helped to establish the authority of teachers who were to follow and it served as the criterion with the aid of which one could distinguish one student from another as far as his closeness to the master and understanding of the latter’s message were concerned, although naturally debates often ensued.

This paper seeks to pursue this theme in one field, namely Islamic philosophy (al-falsafah), and its close ally in later centuries, theoretical gnosis (al-ma’rifah or al-‘irfan), with which it merged especially in Persia and the other eastern lands of the Islamic world. Our analysis is based not so much upon scholarly research, as upon over twenty years of continuous study with traditional masters in Persia in the field of Islamic philosophy and gnosis, masters who would mention at the beginning of their instruction that the good student must learn not only to read correctly the black lines of the text in Arabic or Persian but that he must also be able to read what they would call “the white parts” of the page or what in English would be called reading between the lines.[119] But this reading of the “unwritten” text had to be carried out not according to the student’s individual whim and fancy, but in accordance with the oral transmission stored in the memory of the master and going back through generations of teachers to the original author of the text and ultimately to the founders and major figures of the school in question—figures who also possessed a “vertical” and non-historical relation with the source of that traditional school.

As far as philosophy and gnosis are concerned, there is also a factor of a more external order to consider. In order to avoid the criticism and condemnation of certain exoteric ‘wlama’ and also the uneducated who might misconstrue their teachings, most philosophers couched their ideas in deliberately difficult language whose meaning they then taught orally to their chosen students. Although there are exceptions in this matter, as one sees in the case of Mulla Sadra, the majority of the masters of Islamic philosophy practiced this art of dissimulation through a deliberately complicated language, the key to whose understanding remained in the hands of those well acquainted with the oral tradition which alone could elucidate the meaning or the levels of meaning of the technical vocabulary (al-iştilâhât).[120] The significance of the oral transmission was by no means limited to this function, but this role is also of some importance in the total understanding of the oral tradition and the spoken word in Islamic intellectual history and education.

Before turning to an examination of the works of individual authors, we should note that, in the context of the traditional educational system, knowledge of a particular figure meant and still means a penetration in depth into the thought of the author in question rather than a study of his thought in breadth. Today, in the modern Western method of study, if a person wishes to master the thought of let us say a St. Thomas or for that matter Kant, he goes back to their original writings in Latin or German and examines all their work. In fact one would not dream of writing a serious book on a particular philosopher before reading all his writing. In the traditional Islamic context, on the contrary, the greatest interpreters of Ibn Sina, whose knowledge of Avicennan metaphysics could not be matched by anyone in the West, would probably have cast no more than a cursory eye over his metaphysical works beyond the ilahiyat of the Shifa', the Najat, and the Isharat, not to speak of the mashshcfi master's numerous other writings. I have seen traditional masters who have spent fifty years studying the Shifa' and the Isharat, often along with numerous commentaries, and who have had an incredible understanding of Ibn Sînâ's ontology without having delved into the many other works of the master dealing with the subject.

In this context it is important also to mention how in a manner that is often mysterious, if viewed from the outside, one or two works of a master survive and become a main text in the teaching of a particular school accompanied by the oral transmission of his teachings, while other works do not enjoy such a status. The reason in certain cases such as that of Ibn Sina are easy to understand while other instances are much more difficult to explain. What distinguished the Tatnhld al-qawa'id of Ibn Turkah or the Kitab al-hidayah of Athlr al-Dîn Abharl from other highly qualified available texts and made the former main items in the traditional curriculum?[121] Must not the answer be sought in the spoken word, the oral transmission which accompanied such texts, and the reception of these teachings by immediate students of the authors in question, students who then propagated these teachings and established the "privileged position" of the works in question? Surely the oral tradition along with the special master-disciple relationship must be considered, not to speak of intellectual and spiritual links between scholars and philosophers of different generations and the existence of affinities among various figures in the non-historical and atemporal dimensions of reality which remain outside of the framework of intellectual history as understood in the West today.

With these brief comments in mind, let US turn to a few of the outstanding Islamic intellectual figures. The first major Islamic philosopher, al-Kindl, certainly left his mark upon later Peripatetics but left no work behind which came to be established as a text in the traditional curriculum of Islamic philosophy. The towering figure of Ibn Sina in a sense eclipsed such earlier figures as al-Kindl and Abu al-Hasan al-'Amirî, although al-Kindl continued to be honored in later centuries as a great philosopher. The type of studies devoted to his writings by both West and modern Muslim scholars, especially since the discovery of the manuscripts of a large number of his works in Istanbul half a century ago,[122] did not exist among those who kept the torch of mashsha'i philosophy alive in the Islamic world itself, and in fact his particular interpretation of mashshâ'î philosophy did not gain acceptance among later members of this school, namely al-Fârâbî, Ibn Sînâ, and Ibn Rushd.

Turning to the towering figure of al-Fârâbî, again one notes that such major works of his as the Kitab al-huruf remained peripheral to the development of most of later Islamic philosophy and its significance has only recently been discovered as a result of the publication of its Arabic text by M. Mahdi.[123] Even al-Fârâbʏs greatest masterpiece of political philosophy, Ara' ahi aimadmah al-Jadilah, although very influential in the genesis and growth of Islamic political thought, did not become a main text in the later phases of development of the Islamic philosophical tradition. It was only his somewhat enigmatic work, the Fuşûş al-hikmah, considered by a number of modern scholars to be not by him but by Ibn Sînâ, [124] that has continued to be studied and taught over the centuries, accompanied by an oral as well as a written tradition of commentaries. It was enough to attend the teaching sessions of Mahdi İlâhî QumshaT, one of the outstanding traditional masters of hikmah in Persia in recent times who translated this work into Persian,[125] to realize the vast "unwritten philosophy" and the spoken word which have accompanied the written text attributed to al-Fârâbî.

With Ibn Sînâ the presence of the oral transmission, which has survived for a thousand years, becomes felt more than before for anyone who experiences the teachings of the traditional masters of mashshâ'î philosophy. It is in fact a profound lesson in comparative philosophy to juxtapose the understanding of Avicennan ontology by such traditional masters of the subject during this century as 'Allâmah Hâ'irî Yazdî Mazandarânl, author of Hikmat-i Bit 'All, or Mahdi Hairi,[126] and such Western masters of medieval philosophy as E. Gilson and H. Wolfson.[127] The difference in their treatment of the subject emanates not only from different methodologies, but also from the existing oral transmission in the one case and the simply written text in the other. The oral transmission did not certainly prevent different interpretations from being made in the Islamic world itself as one sees in the case of Naşîr al-Dîn Tûsî and Mîr Dâmâd, or the Sadrian interpretation of Ibn Sînâ made by certain followers of the school of Mullâ Şadrâ in the Qajar Period as against the views of a Mirzâ Abu al-Hasan Jilwah.[128] But all of these differences remained within the matrix of the traditional world with the presence of the oral or spoken word as well as the written text and therefore differ from the understanding of Ibn Sînâ emanating from the study of only his written words.

There is no doubt that there have been scholars in the West such as Wolfson or Corbin who had read more of Ibn Sînâ than most of the traditional Persian masters whom we came to know personally. But the latter, who usually limited their study in depth to the Shija' and Isharat, with an occasional interest in the Najat, had an understanding of Ibn Sînâ of a different order resulting from being immersed in an Avicennan world in which the written and the spoken word were combined in a unity that transcended the simply literal, historical, and grammatical understanding of the written text. It is important to note in this context that even the brilliant reconstruction of Ibn Sînâ's "Oriental Philosophy" by Corbin,[129] based so much on the understanding of the later Islamic philosophical tradition, must be seen as a part of the vaster world of Avicennan ontology and cosmology dominated during later centuries by the two basic texts of the Shija' and the Isharat and not in isolation from them.

Nowhere in the history of Islamic philosophy is the significance of the oral transmission and the spoken word more evident than in the case of SuhrawardI, the Master of Illumination (Shaykh al-ishraq), whose masterpiece Hikmat al-ishraq[130] is itself the crystallization in written form of the spoken word received orally both “horizontally” and “vertically”, that is both through unspecified historical sources and the angelic pleroma of which Suhrawardi wrote so vividly.[131] Later Islamic intellectual history knew him primarily through the Hikmat al-ishraq and to some extent the Hayakil al-nür while, in comparison, his other writings, especially the doctrinal works al-Talwihat, al-Muqawamat, and al-Mashari’ wa-al-mutârahât,[132] remained more or less neglected by most later philosophers, Mulla Şadrâ again being an important exception.

The whole nexus between the Hikmat al-ishraq, written so rapidly towards the end of its author’s tragic life, and the later tradition of ishraql philosophy relies upon oral transmission and the spoken word. The figure who revived Suhrawardl’s thought a generation later through his masterly commentary on the Hikmat al-ishraq, namely Muhammad Shahrazun, had not known Suhrawardi personally.[133] Yet he was bound to the master not only by the written text of his works, but also by a spiritual and intellectual bond which definitely must have issued from a living oral tradition. In reading Shahrazurls commentary on the Hikmat al-ishraq as well as his own masterpiece, the as yet unpublished al-Shajarat al-ilahiyah, one feels as if Shahrazuri had sat at the feet of Suhrawardi for many years. What relates the two figures to each other is not only a written text, but also the spoken word or an “unwritten book” which delineated the universe of ishraql wisdom shared by both figures. There must have been a special oral teaching which accompanied the Hikmat al-ishraq surviving Suhrawardi and surfacing later in the works of Shahrazuri and Qutb al-Dîn Shirazi and even during later centuries in the writings of Jalal al-Dîn DawanI and Mulla Şadrâ. How could Mulla Şadrâ have written his glosses „ on the Hikmat a.l-ishrâqi![134] without an oral tradition which linked him beyond the written words of the text to the founder of the School of Illumination? This continuity is what in fact characterizes an intellectual tradition which unfolds over the centuries on the basis not only of what the founding figure has written but also of the oral tradition which he has left behind, a tradition which remains alive through both the “vertical” renewal of the tradition and the ever present oral transmission, which in turn makes possible successive crystallizations of the doctrines and teachings in question in written form.

The crucial role of oral tradition is also evident in the case of Ibn ‘Arabi whose influence swept over the Islamic world shortly after Suhrawardl. How different the intellectual history of at least the eastern lands of Islam would have been if the Ibn ‘Arabi of the Futuhat al-makkiyah had become better known than the Ibn ‘Arabi of the Fuşüş al-hikam, especially as interpreted by Sadr al-Dîn Qunawl!,[135] Of course the Futühat was known to many authors but not as a whole. Rather, to quote a leading authority on the Futuhat, M. Oiodkiewicz, the work served “as an overflowing cornucopia of symbols, technical terms and ideas from which everyone picked his choice.”[136] In any case it was providential that the Fuşüş seen through Sadr al-Dîn’s interpretation, itself based upon the closest intimacy with Ibn ‘Arabi, became the central work associated with Ibn ‘Arabi and seen primarily as a text of theoretical gnosis which had the profoundest influence upon not only Sufism but also later Islamic philosophy and even theology, as we see in the case of Shah Wallallah of Delhi. Outside the circle which became heir to the Akbarian current of Sufism, Ibn ‘Arabi came to be viewed not so much as the master of practical Sufism and the Sharfah and fiqh interpreted esoterically in the Futuhat, but as the metaphysician of the Fuşüş seen through the eyes of Qunawl, Mu’ayyid al-Dîn Jandi, ‘Abd al-Razzaq Kashani, and others.[137] Even the most characteristic doctrine associated with Ibn ‘Arabi, namely wahdat al-wujüâ, derives from the teachings of his disciples and the oral teachings which must have accompanied the Fuşüş rather than from Ibn ‘Arabfs own written works. ⅂ΛVȝ do not know what Ibn ‘Arabi taught Sadr al-Dîn and others orally, but we do know how Sadr al-Dîn interpreted the written text of the master in the light of those oral teachings and it is this which is of significance as far as the oral teachings of Ibn ‘Arabî are concerned.

The Ibn ‘Arabi seen by centuries of Islamic metaphysicians and philosophers is not the same as the Ibn ‘Arabi who emerges from a scholarly study of all his works put alongside each other and without recourse to the oral teachings received from a living master. The whole difference between the Ibn ‘Arabi seen by Kâshânî, Mulla Şadrâ, al-Nabulusi, or Isınâ’îl Haqqi and the one seen by modern scholars, whether they be Westerners or Muslims, but basing themselves solely on the extant texts, is again the spoken word, the oral tradition as it has been transmitted over the centuries by generations of masters, some of whom have claimed direct contact with Ibn ‘Arabi in the “invisible world” Çâlam al-ghayb) besides being heirs to the historical oral tradition of his school.

Whether current Western scholarship accepts the authenticity of this oral tradition or not is of secondary significance. What is most important is that the Islamic intellectual tradition itself has functioned with the belief that the oral tradition is of central importance. In the case of Ibn ‘Arabi, for example, such recent masters as ‘Allamah Tabâtabâ’î or Sayyid Muhammad Kazim Aşşâr, with both of whom we studied gnosis and philosophy for some twenty years,[138] would insist that it was of little use to simply read the text of the Fuşûş and understand the Arabic by oneself. Rather, it was necessary to study it with a real teacher who could also impart to the qualified student the oral tradition which alone can clarify the meaning of the written word. That is why in gnosis, as in philosophy, a person who is said to have really studied the subject is called ustad didah, literally one who has “seen” a master, that is, one who has benentted from the oral teachings and also the presence chudur) of the master who embodies those teachings and who renews and revives them through the very act of living their truths.

Turning to later Islamic philosophy, we see the same principles at work as in earlier centuries. The Sharh al-ishârâî of Naşîr al-Dîn Tusi caused the revival of the school of Ibn Sina. But later traditional philosophers did not consider this work to be solely the product of the exceptional intellectual powers of Naşîr al-Dîn but also the result of the oral transmission of teachings which Tüsî received through several generations of masters stretching from Ibn Sînâ to himself. As for the Sharh al-ishârât, [139] it in turn became a main item of the later philosophical curriculum taught by generations of teachers going back to Tusi and his circle in Maraghah where he imparted oral teachings to accompany this exact and exacting philosophical text.

After Tusi, numerous works inspired by the Avicennan or mashsha’i school appeared in both Arabic and Persian including the encyclopedic work of Qutb al-Dın Shirazi, the Durrat al-taj. But it was again one work, the Kitab al-hidayah of Athlr al-Dîn Abhari, which became a popular text in educational circles in Persia and was taught and commented upon by many teachers both orally and in writing. One needs only to recall the Sharh al-hidayah of Mulla Şadrâ which gained so much popularity in India that it became the main text for the teaching of mashshâ’1 philosophy in the subcontinent and gradually came to be known as Sadra. When students claimed to have studied Sadra, they did not mean that they had studied the various works of Mulla Şadrâ,[140] but the single text of the Sharh al-hidayah which was again accompanied by an oral teaching. The selection of Abhari’s original work in philosophical circles, as well as Mulla Şadrâ’s later commentary, was based not on the texts alone of these works, but on the accompanying oral teachings and the later masters who were well versed in those teachings and therefore chose to teach those texts rather than numerous other works which were also available.

The same truth holds for the writings of Mir Dâmâd, Mulla Şadrâ, and later philosophers. Whether it was the Qabasat of Mir Dâmâd or the Asfar ofMullâ Şadrâ, an oral teaching always accompanied the written text.[141] In the case of these later figures, the chain of transmission of the oral teachings is much better known. For example, such an undisputed master of the school of Mulla Şadrâ as Sayyid Abd al-Hasan Qazwini, with whom we again had the privilege of studying the Asfiir for many years, could trace his teachers back through the Qajar masters of this school to Mulla Şadrâ himself and displayed an almost “personal” relation to him as if the two were not separated by four centuries of human history. In his presence one felt that his link with Mulla Şadrâ was not only the lithographed edition of the Asfiir which he would hold in his frail hands and read before expounding his commentary and explanation. It was also a common universe of discourse and a lived and experienced intellectual reality which he shared with the Safavid master through the unwritten yet very much alive word, through the spoken truth transmitted orally as well as the written text from which he read. That was why, when he held the book before his shining eyes and read it, the book revealed another dimension of its meaning, one which would remain hidden if one were to turn to the text oneself without the help of the oral teachings.[142]

The reality of the oral tradition constitutes the reason why the line of transmission of traditional Islamic philosophy is nearly as important as the silsilahs of the Sufis. In the latter case a barakah and initiatory power are transmitted which alone allow the soul to ascend to the higher levels of being, while in the former it is an oral teaching which is the necessary concomitant to the written text, a complement without which the text does not reveal all of its meaning save in exceptional cases. In both instances, there is a truth to be transmitted which is not simply discursive and which cannot be exhausted in letters and words written upon the page, a truth which must remain in part oral to be transmitted to those prepared to receive it.

Although the subject of this essay is limited to the field of Islamic philosophy, it is not possible to speak of the oral tradition and the spoken word without saying a few words about the distinctly Sufi view of the subject. This view was shared in part by many later Islamic philosophers (falasifah) and by those whom we might call theosophers (hukamay-i İlâhî) those thought to be distinguished from what philosophy has come to mean for the most part in the West today.

One cannot speak of the spoken word without mentioning that primordial “book” which is inscribed in the very’ substance of our being and with which the Sufis have dealt more directly than the Islamic philosophers. Jalal al-Dîn Rûmî, whose Mathnawi alone consists of six long volumes of poetry, says:

<verse>

The book of the Sufi is not black lines and words,

It is none other than the whitened heart which is like snow.

</verse>

In the Islamic tradition the heart is the seat of the intellect and the instrument par excellence of original knowledge of which mental activity is a relatively externalized reflection. True knowledge is the knowledge of the heart, and it is here that man carries within himself the real “book” of knowledge. This book is composed of unwritten words. It is the inner chamber wherein the spoken word in the highest sense of the term, which means none other than the Word of God, reverberates. This inner “hook” is not available for all to “read”, for not everyone is able to penetrate into the inner chamber of his or her being, which is the heart, nor possesses a purified heart as white as the snow which has not as yet become sullied by the darkness of man’s passionate soul.

Yet, this inner “book” has resonated and still resonates within the being of certain men and women and through them has left its deepest effect upon the intellectual life of Islam, not only in the domain of theoretical Sufism but also in later Islamic philosophy. It manifests itself directly in many illuminative passages of a philosopher such as Mulla Şadrâ who often refers to such crucial pages of his works as tahqiq[143] ‘arshi, that is, “truth verified through the Throne”, the Throne being not only the Transcendental Throne of God but also the heart which is ‘arsh al-rahman or Throne of the Compassionate.[144]

The significance of the oral tradition, its continuation over the centuries, its “vertical” renewal by certain masters of a particular school, and the emphasis upon the memory to preserve the oral tradition are all affected by the reality of that other inner “book” to which Rûmî refers, a “book” whose reality has always subsisted in the firmament of Islamic intellectual life at whose center stands the Book, namely the Quran which is at once an oral and a written reality. One must never forget that to know something really well and to committ the spoken word to memory in an abiding manner is to know it by heart. It is this knowledge by heart[145] which has made possible, not only in Sufism but also in Islamic philosophy, the continuation of an ever-renewed oral tradition which has played such an important role in the Islamic education system and the modality of the transmission of knowledge from teacher to disciple over the centuries.

The oral tradition has affected the manner of reading and interpreting the written text, its teaching and transmission, and the role of certain texts and commentaries in the educational circles of the Islamic world. It is even significant in the correct reading of a particular manuscript and in the selection of manuscripts for establishing the text of a particular work. The spoken word is the key to the solution of many enigmas concerning the continuity of certain teachings as in the already mentioned cases of the ishraqT school and the predominance of a particular interpretation over others as in the case of Şİ al-Dîn Qunawfs interpretation of Ibn ‘Arabi. The oral tradition also provides a direct link between the student and a master who might have lived generations ago, enabling the student to study the teachings in question in depth and to concentrate on one or two works which are then penetrated inwardly over a whole lifetime rather than to study horizontally the text of many works written by the same master. There have been exceptions such as Mulla Sadra, who had, in addition to oral instruction, an encyclopedic knowledge of earlier philosophical, theological, and mystical works ranging from al-Fârâbî, al-‘A irl, and Ibn Sînâ to Shahrastânî, Fakhr al-Dîn Razî, al-Ghazzâlî, and Ibn ‘Arabi, a knowledge which he combined with the oral tradition.[146] But usually the oral tradition and the spoken word created a different type of intellectual ambience from the modern one, an ambience in which one or two works surrounded by a vast oral commentary came to constitute knowledge in depth of the teachings of the traditional authority.

The oral tradition transformed the written book from the definitive text which was the sole basis of the ideas to be understood to the gate to a whole living world for which the book became the point of departure. We recall once when studying al-Insan al-kamil of ‘Abd al-Karim al-Jîlî with the late Mahdi İlâhî Qumsha’i, he read the Arabic text and then gave a long discourse on divine love and its manifestations which seemed to have little connection with the outward meaning of al-Jîlî’s words. When asked how these words conveyed such meanings, he answered that one should look at these words as signs to the spiritual world and not in their usual literal meaning and as concepts closed in upon themselves. He added that only by becoming familiar with these words through understanding the traditional oral commentary upon them would one be able to fly with their help from the earth of literalism to the heaven of symbolism. The nexus between oral tradition and esoteric interpretation of gnostic and philosophical texts must not, however, detract from the outward meaning and diminish the role of oral tradition in enabling the written text to be read correctly, albeit outwardly. The traditional masters insist that the major texts of Islamic thought such as the Isharat or Asfar cannot in fact be “read” correctly without the help of oral tradition, hence the central importance of having studied with a master. In a sense the spoken word makes possible the full understanding and correct “reading” of the written text.

Much of what has been said here is of course to be found mutatis mutandis in other traditions, such as the cabbala in Judaism, and is not exclusive to Islam. But in Islam the oral tradition and the spoken word have played and continue to play even to this day such a central role that their importance must be asserted in the face of all the historicism and positivism which have sought to reduce the reality of the Islamic intellectual tradition to written texts and historically established influences. Historical studies and careful attention paid to the written text do of course also possess their own validity and significance but they cannot become exclusive and totalitarian without destroying the integrity of the Islamic intellectual tradition.

Today not only are the physical remains of the Islamic book in the form of manuscripts being destroyed in many parts of the world, but also much of the oral tradition and the spoken word is being lost as a result of the destruction of the traditional methods of education and transmission. Paradoxically it is therefore necessary to put into writing for posterity and also for the present generation much that was transmitted until now only “from the breast” of one person to another. But in doing so, one should never lose sight of the great significance throughout Islamic history of oral transmission in education and of the spoken word as the complement of the written text. Even today, when due to exceptional historical conditions so much is being recorded and needs to be recorded and preserved in written form, the essence of the oral tradition continues to survive as oral tradition, especially that primordial Word which can only be heard and yet remains eternally inscribed upon the very substance of our soul as human beings.

[118] Concerning the texts used in traditional curricula of the madrasahs and in private circles, see, for example, S.H. Nasr, “The Traditional Texts Used in the Persian Madrasahs,” in his Islamic Life and Thought (London, 1987), ch. 10: M.S. Khan, “The Teaching of Mathematics and Astronomy in the Educational Institutions of Medieval India,” Muslim Educational Quarterly 6 (1989), no. 3: 7–15: and the major study of G. Makdisi, The Rise ofColleges—Institutions ofLeaming in Islam and the West (Edinburgh, 1981), which contains a wealth of information on the use of texts in Islamic madrasahs as well as an extensive bibliography on Islamic education including works on the use of texts in various schools.

[119] On the living tradition of Islamic philosophy in Persia see H. Corbin, “The Force of Traditional Philosophy in Iran Today,” Studies in Comparative Religion (Winter, 1968), pp. 12–263 S.H. Nasr, Islamic Philosophy in Contemporary Persia (Salt Lake City, 1972)3 and T. Izutsu’s introduction to The Metaphysics of Sabzavari, trans. M. Mohaghegh and T. Izutsu (Delmar, NY, 1977).

[120] Books dealing with these technical terms have therefore been always important and have served as a basis for the exposition of teachers or have complemented for the student the oral explanation of the master. That is why books such as the whole class of al-Iştilâhât al-şüfyah by ‘Abd al-Razzaq Kashani and others, al-Ta’rîfât of Sayyid Sharif al-Jurjani, Kashshaf iştilâhât al-fünûn by al-Tuhawi, and other works on terminology have been so important in the history of Sufism and Islamic philosophy. See the still valuable studies of L. Massignon, especially his Essais sur les origines du lexique technique de la mystique musulmane bs, l95م١• ,١.l Ml, ل£ Sou, marocain Ahmad ibn ‘Ajiba et son mi’raj-Glossaire de la mystique musulmane (Pans, ل9٦ح>١٠, p. Nwyia, Exegese coranique et langage mystique (Beirut, 1970) J. Nurbakhsh, Sufi Symbolism (London, 1986-): and M. Horten, “Philogogische Unter-suchungen zur islamischen Mystik,” Zeitschrift fur Semitistik und verwandte Gebiete 6 (1928), pp. 57–70. Concerning JurjanFs Ta’nfat see G. Fliigel (ed.), Definitiones Sejjid Scherif AH... (Leipzig, 1845).

[121] On these little-known figures, as far as the West is concerned, see H. Corbin (with the collaboration of s. H. Nasr and o. Yahya), Histoire de la philosophic islamique (Paris, 1986), pp. 365 ff.; Corbin, En Islam iranieri 3 (Paris, 1972) pp. 233 ff.; and S.H. Nasr, “Theology, Philosophy and Spirituality,” in Nasr (ed.) Islamic Spirituality—Manifestations (New York, 1991), pp. 431 ff.

[122] Discovered by Massignon and published later by M. Abü Rldah as Rasâ’H al-Kindl al-falsafiyah, 2 vols. (Cairo, 1950–1953).

[123] See M. Mahdi, Alfarabi’s Book of Letters (Kitab al-huruf) (Beirut, 1969).

[124] See, for example, s. Pines, “Ibn Sina et l’auteur de la Risalat fuşûş fi’l-hikma,” Revue des Etudes Islamiques (1951), pp. 122–4.

[125] See ilâhı Qumshah, Hikmat-i İlâhî khâşş wa ’amm, vol. 2 (Tehran, A.H. solar 1345).

[126] See, for example, his Hiram-i hasti, (“The Pyramid of Existence”) (Tehran, 1983).

[127] Both Gilson and Wolfson have dealt with Avicennan ontology as expounded by Ibn Sina himself or by later Peripatetics in several of their works, for example E. Gilson, LEtre et l’essence (Paris, 1948); and his Avicenne et lepoint de depart de Duns Scot ؟د Extrait des Archives d’Histoire Doctrinale et Litteraire du MoyenAge 2 (1927). As for H.A. Wolfson, see his “Avicenna, Algazali, and Averroes on Divine Attributes," Homenaje a Millds-Vallicrosa 2 (Barcelona, 1956), pp. 545–71: and his "Goichon's Three Books on Avicenna's Philosophy," Muslim World 31 (1941), pp. 11–39.

[128] See S.H. Nasr, "The Metaphysics of Sadr al-Dîn Shirazi and Islamic Philosophy in Qajar Iran," in C.E. Bosworth and c. Hillenbrand (eds.), Qajar Iran—Political, Social and Cultural Change 1900–1925 İ·ı·, M), PP. 177–983 and S.J. Ashtiyani's introduction to Mulla Muhammad Ja'far ١لل١·ة, Shal risalat al-masha r of Mulla Sadra ٦%٩١·

[129] See Corbin, Avicenna and the Visionary Recital, trans, w. Trask (Irving, TX, 1980).

[130] See Suhrawardi, Oeuvres philosophiques et mystiques, vol. 2 ed. H. Corbin (Tehran, 1977): and H. Corbin, Sohravardi, Le Livre de la sagesse orientale (Paris, 1986).

[131] See S.H. Nasr, Three Muslim Sages (Delmar, NY, 1975), ch. 2.

[132] Even in contemporary scholarship these works have remained relatively neglected in comparison with the Hikmat al-ishraq, edited in its entirety by Corbin, and his complete Persian works, edited by Nasr. Corbin edited the section of these works on metaphysics but not those on logic and natural philosophy. See Suhrawardi, Oeuvres philosophiques et mystiques, vols. 1 and 2 ed. Corbin (Tehran, 1976–7): vol. 3 ed. Nasr (Tehran, 1977). Recently H. Ziai has turned to the study of the logic of al-Talwihat and other neglected doctrinal works of Suhrawardi in his Knowledge and Illumination: A Study of Suhrawardi's Hikmat al-Ishraq (Atlanta, GA, 1990).

[133] See H. Ziai, “The Manuscript of al-Shajara al-Ilahiyah, A Philosophical Encyclopedia by Shams al-Din Muhammad Shahrazuri,” (in Persian), Iranshenasi 2 (1990), no. 1: 89–108.

[134] See H. Corbin, “Le theme de la resurrection chez Molla Şadrâ Shirazi (1050/1640) commentateur de SohrawardI (587/1191)”” in Studies in Mysticism and Religion Presented to G. Scholem (Jerusalem, 1967), pp. 71–115.

[135] See ل. Morris, “Ibn ‘Arabi and His Interpreters,” Journal of the American Oriental Society 106 (1986), pp. 539–51, 733–56, 107 (1987), pp. 101–19; M. Chodkiewicz, et al.. Les illuminations de la Mecque (Paris, 1988): and the major new study of w. Chittick, The Sufi Path of Knowledge (Albany, NY, 1989).

[136] From a paper delivered at the conference on Medieval Persian Sufi Literature at the University of London in November 1990.

[137] See w. Chittick’s several studies on Sadr al-Dîn al-Qûnawî and his students, e.g., “The Last Will and Testament of Ibn ‘Arabi’s Foremost Disciple and Some Notes on its Author,” Sophia Perennis, 4 (1978), no. 1: 43–58; and “Sadr al-Dm Qunawi on the Oneness of Being,” International Philosophical Quarterly 21 (1981), pp. 171–84.

[138] On ‘Allamah Tabâtabâ’î, whose writings are gradually becoming known in the West, see the introduction of S.H. Nasr to his Shi’ite Islam, trans, and ed. by S.H. Nasr (Albany, NY, 1975). As for ’Aşşâr, unfortunately none of his works have as yet been translated, but some have been published in the original Persian and Arabic, for example, Wahdat-i wujiid wa bada’, ed. with introduction on the author by S.J. Ashtiyanl (Tehran, AH solar 1350).

[139] Printed in both Tehran and Cairo (the Cairo edition edited by s. Dunya, 1960: and the Tehran edition without editor, 3 vols., AH 1378), this work has never been seriously studied by Western scholars of Islamic philosophy, although many have drawn attention to it.

[140] See S.H. Nasr, Ma’ârif-i İslâmî dar İahdn-İ mu’âşir (Tehran, AH solar 1348), ch. 8.

[141] On the relation between Mulla Şadrâ and Mir Dâmâd see S.H. Nasr, The Transcendent Theosophy of Sadr al-Dîn Shîrâzî (Tehran, 1977), pp. 32–3, 40, 41, and 45–46.

[142] S.J. Âshtiyânî has traced the intellectual lineage of such figures and their link with the Safavid masters of the “School of Isfahan” in his already cited introduction to Lâhîjânî and also in his introduction to Mulla Şadrâ, al-Shawahid al-rububiyah (Meshed, 1967).

[143] Mathnawi, ed. R.A. Nicholson (London, 1925–40), ii. 159.

[144] See, for example, his Wisdom of the Throne, trans. J. Morris (Princeton, NJ, 1981), where he refers to such crucial sections as basirah kashfiyah (insight revealed to inner vision) or qa’idah mashriqiyah (principle from the source of illumination).

[145] On the traditional significance of the heart as the seat of knowledge see F. Schuon, L’Oeil du coeur (Paris, 1974).

[146] See Nasr, The Transcendent Theosophy..., pp. 69 ff.

 5. The Book of Life-Metaphors Connected with the Book in Islamic Literatures

Annemarie Schimmel

“Man is mighty in volume, with him all things are written, but veils and darkness do not allow him to read that knowledge within himself.”[147] This is not a quotation from John Donne’s Devotions, where a similar comparison is used, but from Maulana Jalaladdm RumTs (d. 1273) prose works Fihi mafihi.

The saying well reflects the close relationship between man and book, for as Frithjof Schuon once said with a daring comparison, “God became Book for man [i.e., in the Qur’an] and man must become book for God”—a book in which the secrets of Divine creation can be recognized.[148] Thus, ‘Ah Khan, an officer and poet at the court of the Mughal emperor Aurangzeb, could describe himself:

<verse>

I am like a book, both silent and talking;

The content of my question is hidden in my answer.[149]

</verse>

The Muslims were great book lovers, and the history of libraries in the Muslim world, from the collections in medieval Baghdad to the famous library of Akbar’s generalissimo ‘Abd al-Rahman Khankhanan (d. 1627), to mention only one major example, is well known. Public and private libraries all over the Muslim world, many of them still uncataloged, give witness to the bibliophilia of scholars and rulers in bygone times.[150] Most of the collectors would probably have agreed with Molla Jâmî (d. 1492) of Herat:

<verse>

There is no better friend in the world than the book;

In the house of grief in this time there is no better consoler,

Every moment a hundred kinds of peace come from it

In the corner of loneliness and it never hurts the heart.[151]

</verse>

Classical Arabic literature contains numerous sayings and verses about books, some of which have been translated into German by Christoph Biirgel in his article “Von Freud und Leid mit Biichern” (About happiness and grief caused by books).[152] There, one hears the collectors’ laments about the loss of books due to theft, to fire, or to “book loving” insects. I once found a long maqamah in highly polished rhymed prose in praise of a glorious tomcat who deserved his master’s eternal gratitude because he saved his master’s library by catching the numerous mice that were interested in the manuscripts, for unscholarly purposes.[153] With a comparison that occurs rather frequently, an Ottoman poet of the sixteenth century sang of his joy in books:

<verse>

The heart of those who are narrow-hearted like the bud opens like the rose—

It seems that the book is a hundred-petaled rose in spring’[154]

</verse>

Gesu Daraz (d. 1422), the Chishti Sufi saint of Gulbarga in the Deccan, goes so far as to describe his book as his beloved:

<verse>

My book became my beloved —

Thanks to it my pressed heart was opened.

You say: “Lend it to me!”

Has anyone ever lent his beloved [to someone else]?”[155]

</verse>

However, allusions to the actual form of books, let alone descriptions of specific books, seem to be comparatively rare. One may think of allusions to Quran manuscripts in comparison with beautiful human faces or bodies: Khaqanl (d. 1199) suggests to his beloved to wear red and yellow garments, as the Qur’an is written in red and gold (for she is as flawless as a Qur’an page).’[156] Maulana Rumi tells in a delightful story how some ants walked across a beautifully illuminated manuscript and were wondering whether this was a garden with roses and herbs; then they learned that this “garden” was produced by the pen, which served the hand, which in turn was depending upon the arm; the arm, however, relied upon the spirit’s command which was inspired by God—thus, every movement led back to the One and Unique Creator.[157]

Yet, in a small group of verses, Persian-writing poets from the fifteenth to the seventeenth century have composed verses in honor of actual manuscripts. It seems that such descriptions reflected the book culture at the Timurid and Mughal courts, and it is certainly no accident that book imagery became quite prominent during Mughal times. Jami sings of an album which was probably made for his patron, Sultan Husain Baiqara:

<verse>

Before this copy, which is the pleasure ground of intellect and soul, the eye of reason is bewildered.

It is a cheerful garden filled with roses and odoriferous herbs;

The pages are roses and the lines sweet basil, rihan.[158]

</verse>

The last line plays on the double meaning of rihan, rihânî, which is not only “sweet basil”, but also a calligraphic style which was used mainly in copies of the Qur an and important manuscripts. This pun appears in most Persian and Turkish writings from the Middle Ages onward.

Perhaps the finest description of an album is found in Abu Talib Kalim’s (d. 1650) Diwan. The poet, who lived in Shahjahan’s time, mainly in Kashmir, describes some albums which were collected by Jahangir and then arranged for his son Shahjahan after 1628. Calligraphic pages with superbly illuminated borders alternate with fine miniatures, so that, as he claims, “the tress of the [long] letter lam in the calligraphy is combined with the tresses of the houri-like beauties” on the miniatures. It may well be that he speaks of one of the collections to which parts of the so-called Kevorkian Album in the Metropolitan Museum belonged.[159]

To understand the importance of the metaphors of the book or of writing in Persian and Persianate poetry, it suffices to look at the numerous poems with the (recurrent rhyme) nawisand, “they wrote” or niwishta, “written,” or radifs derived from the Turkish root yazmaq, “to write,” in Ottoman poetry. As much as this imagery may appear repetitive, one can yet find delightful verses by some lesser-known authors, such as the clever comparisons that the south Indian polymath Azad Bilgraml (d. 1784) used in his Mir’ât al-jamal, “The Mirror of Beauty,” to admire his beloved’s tresses:

<verse>

Are these two locks of hair on the whiteness of her cheeks,

Or two marginal columns on the book of beauty?

Or two nights of the two ‘Id that came together,

Or are these two of the seven mu’allaqat hung on the Ka’bah[160]

</verse>

Sometimes, poets offer the reader whole lists of books they had perused during their lifetimes, as did the fourteenth-century North Indian author

Mutahhar Karh (d. 1390), who speaks of WaqidFs historical work, of Nâşirî, that is, the ethical work, Akhlaq-i Nâşirî, and of Abu Hafs ‘Umar al-SuhriwardFs Sufi handbook, ‘Awarif al-ma’ânf, along with some others, which makes US understand what kind of material was used in medieval Indo-Muslim education.[161] Even more sophisticated is a poem by the Urdu poet Wall Deccani (d. after 1707), who describes his state of mind and the beauty of his beloved exclusively in words that are pen-names of poets such as Firdusi, “paradisiacal,” Jami, “cup-like,” Anvari, “most radiant,” Shauqi, “longing,” and so on.[162]

More frequent, however, are allusions to famous books whose titles can be used in puns: ‘Attar’s Mantiq al-tayr, “The Birds’ Language,” and Sa’dî’s Gulistan, “Rose Garden,” appear, as is to be expected, mainly in poetry devoted to spring; NizamFs Khamsah, the “Quintet,” could be connected with the five senses; the Kashf (either Hujwlrfs Kashf al-mahjitb or MaibudhFs Kashf al-asrar) appears now and then as opposed to the rational interpretation of the revelation as is found, according to poetic parlance, in Zamakhsharfs Kashshaf, the important commentary on the Qur’an. Hafiz offers a good example of this combination.[163] On the other hand, Ibn ‘Arabis (d. 1240) Fuşûş alrhikam, “The Bezels of Wisdom,” are used not only in strictly mystical context, but also in love poetry for the lip of the beloved is like faşş, “bezel,” of ruby. Thus, Jâmî, followed by many others, may claim that the life-bestowing lips of his beloved would be worthy of being described in the chapter about Jesus in Ibn ’Arabi’s Fuşûş, for the breath of Jesus quickens the dead as does the kiss of the beloved that quickens the near-dead lover.[164] Similarly, Jami can also see the dangerous, tempting eyes and sweetly smiling lips of his beloved as a commentary on the Qur’anic verse, “He created death and life” (Surah 67, 2), for while the eyes kill with their glance, the sugar lips grant new life.[165]

It is not surprising that the imagery of the book plays such a central role in Islamic poetry. The Qur’an itself uses this imagery frequently: We often hear of the “book of actions” and also of the “kiram al-kcitibm” (surah 8211 و), the noble scribe angels who note down man’s actions in the books that will be shown at Doomsday and should therefore not be blackened by too many sins.

Nâşir-i Khusrau, the great Ismaili philosopher and poet of the eleventh century, admonishes his readers:

<verse>

The soul is a book, thy deeds are like the writing.

Write not in thy soul aught else than a fair inscription.

Write what is wholly good in the book, brother,

For the pen is in thine own hand.[166]

</verse>

Much later, in the mid-eighteenth century, one finds in the Nöda-i'Andalib of the Delhi mystic Nâşir Muhammad 'Andallb advice which he may have taken from some earlier Sufi poet, but which he may also have written himself:

<verse>

I want to correct the nine books and to select the manuscript of Existence, to empty the library of the heart line by line from unfitting letters, to purify the picture gallery of the body page by page from the pictures of eating and sleeping, to transform the black book of the crimes of the lower soul (nafs) into the first page of the exordium of good works.[167]

</verse>

But how to perform such a purification?

The poets discovered that there is a way to clean the books blackened by sins, namely, weeping. Most oriental ink is soluble in water, hence, books could be and have been washed off comparatively easily—and what would be a better way than to weep so profusely that the tears of repentance wash off the black writing of the book of actions?

Poets liked this idea, and they often—especially in later times—combined it with the image of the tear as a child that runs away from the eyelashes. Thus, the Kashmiri poet Fam (d. 1670), whose poetry contains a remarkably great number of writing metaphors, says:

<verse>

How many copies did our child see and wash off! But due to its confusion this child “Tear” has never become acquainted with the book.[168]

</verse>

The same poet refers to emperor Akbar’s device, “Peace with all”, and applies it to the mystical intoxication which makes mankind forget the differences of religions and sects:

<verse>

When the old master of the tavern teaches the book “Peace with all!”,

One can wash off the pages of the different religious sects with the wine of tawhid, [declaration that God is One].[169]

</verse>

One wonders whether his remark was an answer to Baba Fighânî’s (d. 1519) ghazal in which he had joked:

<verse>

Figham, the safinah, [notebook, anthology], of your heart is polluted—

Wash off the dust of griefs with wine from the book![170]

</verse>

In connection, one should remember that the term “book”, kitab, is rarely used for anything but the Qur’an, or at least a religious, important work, while books of poetry are referred to as safinah, “boat,” that is, a small book stitched together at the narrow end. Such safinah became very popular as anthologies in Timurid times, and are usually written in delicate nasta’llq script. Often the designation of a book as daftar occurs, that is, a notebook bound only loosely or consisting of loose pages.[171]

The religious importance of books is reflected time and again in allusions to books by mystics and mystically inclined writers. The Prophet of Islam, being ummi, “illiterate,” appears as the one who did not need any book knowledge but knew everything that had ever been written.[172] Thus, the mystics, too, tried to find access to the great book of creation and to discover and interpret its âyât, its signs. Did not God Himself state that He had put His signs “in the horizons and in yourselves” (surah 41, 52)7 Thus, the magister magnus of theosophical Sufism, the Andalusian Ibn ‘ Arabi, conceived of the whole cosmos as a book, readable to the understanding people, and his near-contemporary in Iran, ’Azizaddin Nasafi, used the same image, as did many other thinkers and poets. An additional feature of this comparison was the fact that surah 68 begins with the words, Nun wa-al-qalam, “Nun, and By the Pen!,” an expression that lead some Sufis in Ibn ‘ArabFs tradition to speculate that the letter nun, as suggested by its very shape, could be interpreted as the primordial inkwell that belongs with the primordial Pen that writes on the Well Preserved Tablet whatever is to happen.[173]

However, the idea that the cosmos or the universe is a book occurs long before Ibn ‘Arabi. Sana’! of Ghazna (d. 1131) writes in his didactic epic, Hadlqat al-haqîqah’.

<verse>

The form of the universe is like a book in which advice and fetter (pand u band) are together.

Its form is a fetter for the body of the blameworthy, its qualities are advice for the hearts of the wise.[174]

</verse>

To have understood such advice in the book of the universe was a claim of numerous mystically inclined writers. Akbar’s court poet, Faizi (d. 1595), boasted that he had seen:

</verse>

One by one the details of the notebook, daftar, of existence and place, kawn wa-makan, and table by table the pages of the calendar of the sky.[175]

</verse>

That means, he was able to understand and interpret the astrological chart, jadwal, which shows how the sphere rules human life.

<verse>

A century later, Fânî offered a fine comparison:

The world is like a book filled with knowledge and justice.

The bookbinder Fate made two volumes of it with two points of return.

The stitching at the back, shirazah, is the sharfah and the different religions are the pages:

Tonight we are all disciples, and the Prophet is the teacher.[176]

</verse>

Interestingly, most poets who used book imagery developed a rather pessimistic worldview, and one is pleasantly surprised when discovering the lines of one Ashraf, a little known Kashmiri poet in Mughal times:

<verse>

Everyone who has seen the notebook of the days from top to bottom, has seen the day between the lines of the nights,[177]

</verse>

For the book does not only contain the dark and sometimes crooked script of fate, but also the white background, the days of happiness.

There are also other interpretations of the Book of the Universe. One pun that is found in hundreds of verses is that on khatt, which means both “line, script” and “down,” the first black signs of a growing beard on the cheeks and upper lip of a teenage boy.[178] This pun makes it next to impossible to render into a Western language a great number of Persian and Turkish verses which are replete with plays on khatt. A fine example are the lines by Zebun-Nisa (d. 1701), emperor Aurangzeb’s gifted daughter, who writes:

<verse>

I have seen the library of the world page by page—

I have seen your khatt and said: “That’s the real purpose!”[179]

</verse>

The punning with khatt goes back to much earlier days of Persian poetry and is used by Sa’dî (d. 1292), who addresses a beloved:

<verse>

O you: from the booklet of your moral qualities, the husn-i khatt [“beautiful script” or “lovely down”] is just one chapter, and sweetness is just one letter from the book of your qualities.[180]

</verse>

As the face was considered to be a book of loveliness, even in a veritable Qur’an copy, the khatt plays a very special role:

<verse>

Due to the musk colored khatt his cheek appeared like the book of beauty, for the commentator himself has written carefully these marginal notes.[181]

</verse>

The down sprouts by itself, and therefore the poet could think that the black lines of the down were nothing but the author’s commentary of his own book which he wrote, as is customary, on the margins, that is, the cheeks.

Poets allude to the custom to put a dot on a certain place of a manuscript to indicate a verse or a single word or letter which should be chosen for its beauty or elegance:

<verse>

Sit like the point of selection in the margin of the books of the assembly.[182]

</verse>

Thus Fanl admonishes someone who is very special. One often finds verses like the following one by Farigh, another Kashmiri poet:

<verse>

My high nature has selected his stature from out the world;

That means, it has selected the letter alif from this book.[183]

</verse>

The combination of the straight, upright letter alif and the elegant, slender stature of the beloved is commonplace and can be easily combined with the religious interpretation of the alif as pointing to God’s Unity and unicity, as its numerical value is One, and as all the other letters, according to the calligraphic rules of Ibn Muqlah Id. 940), are shaped by measuring the alif just as Adam was created “according to His, God’s form.” Hafiz’s famous verse:

<verse>

There is nothing on the tablet of my heart but the alif of the friend’s stature.

What can I do? My teacher did not give me any other letter to remember, [184] plays most skillfully on the double meaning of alif and has therefore been imitated by innumerable poets.

</verse>

As already mentioned, the comparison of a beautiful face to a book, in particular to the Qur’an, in whose copies not the smallest mistake must be seen, occurs often in poetry. That is not only the case in Hurilfi poetry, where comparisons of human limbs with letters and the idea of the entire human being as a divinely written book form the center of the worldview, but also in earlier and later poetry.[185] Writers who may never have heard of Hurufi interpretations of the letters used such comparisons, for they seemed to be quite natural. Thus, a poet in the Indus valley, Isma'il Bakhshi, is quoted as having written:

<verse>

Your face is like a Qur'an copy without any mistake and flaw which the Pen of Destiny has written exclusively from musk.

The eye and your mouth are verse...dots for stopping, the eye-brows a maddcih, the eyelashes signs of declension, the mole and the down letters and dots."[186]

</verse>

Such allusions, especially of the eyebrows to the tughra, of eyes, nose, mouth, ears, and curls to the individual letters of the alphabet, abound in Arabic, Persian, and related poetry.

One aspect of the comparisons of beautiful, pure things with the Qur'an is that the Holy Writ was used for prognostication. Poets made use of this quality of the Qur'an, too, and could compare Love to a Qur'an from which one might be able to receive some information about the future. But, as Amir Khusrau Dihlawl (d. 1325) wrote:

<verse>

When Khusrau opens the Book of Love for prognostication,

From the first page of grief my story appeared.[187]

</verse>

Frequently, the heart is compared to a Qur’an copy, and the custom to write the Holy Book in thirty parts, juz’, made many a poet think that his heart is also a collection of thirty parts. Kalfm, however, expresses his concern differently:

<verse>

I tore my heart to pieces page by page,

For from this book one has rarely seen the prognosis of well-being.[188]

</verse>

The comparison of the heart with the Qur’an leads sometimes to strange exaggerations. Thus, Mir Dard of Delhi (d. 1786), never exactly modest in his mystical claims, compares himself in a subtle way to the Prophet, his ancestor, by remarking:

<verse>

I am unlettered, but I have a heart thanks to whose mystical grace, faiz, every letter of mine is a book in the world.[189]

</verse>

That is, wisdom is poured onto his heart, which thus produces wonderful, inspired books (he indeed claimed that all his Persian and Urdu works were written under inspiration).

Two centuries before him, ‘UrfT (d. 1591), noted for his grand ambitions, had claimed:

<verse>

Every book for which I am the last chapter—

Its first page is the well-preserved Tablet.[190]

</verse>

This, again, sounds rather like a claim if not to prophethood, at least to the status of the Perfect Man.

However, not every poet used the imagery of the book in this way. More common, and probably easier to appreciate, are verses in which the garden is seen as a book, just as books were compared, by earlier writers, to a garden. Everyone who has studied the elements of Persian is aware of Sa’dî’s line in his Diwan:

<verse>

Every leaf on the green trees is in the eyes of those who understand a page from the hook of the Creator’s wisdom.[191]

</verse>

Jami sees the “children of spring” practice the letter alif in the garden,[192] and Kalim takes up this idea when he says:

<verse>

Every spring is a child in the school “Garden”

Every bud that ovens becomes his book.[193]

</verse>

The poets in the Islamic world, as elsewhere, loved especially the rose and saw it as a wondrous book with a hundred petals, that is, pages. Most of the later writers would agree with the Mughal poet Urmd:

Urmd, speak like the rose of your heart that is in a hundred pieces; talk about one page, for this book is all blood.[194]

The combination of the red centifolia with bloodstained pages that resemble the bleeding heart of the lover is quite common in later Persian poetry and is particularly well expressed in FighanTs lines:

Who washed the booklet of the rose with the spring cloud’s weeping?

For every petal is a booklet filled with the blood of the suffering ones![195]

If I understand his train of thought correctly, he means that it was not right that the rain was washing the roses, as these are signs of the martyrs, those who died in unfulfilled longing—and according to Islamic law, martyrs’ bodies are not washed before burial.

In earlier centuries, however, the cheerful, or at least delightful, aspect of the “book Rose” is more prominent:

The rose has made correct its page with dew—

the stamp on this page is all pearls![196]

Thus says Amir Khusrau, and he continues this line with the remark that the line, khatt, of greenery is even prettier than this page. Whether he intends the vernal green in the meadow or the fresh down on his friend’s rose-cheek remains an open question.

But Figham also looks at the safinah, the anthology, of the heart and wishes that every page of the booklet might be in the hand of some charming person:

I want that the safinah of the heart be opened like the rose, page by page (or, petal by petal), and that every page be in the hand of some angelic beauty![197]

Is not the “rose of the cheek” a lovely book that contains innumerable love songs? Hafiz, as so often, coined the classical formulation of this thought:

Not I alone sing ghazals for the rose of the cheek, for you have thousands of nightingales on all sides[198] a verse which inter alia contains a fine pun on hazaran, “thousands” and “nightingales”.

The morning breeze opens the “notebook of the rose” to sing of the curls of the beloved.[199] Thus thinks Amir Khusrau, and even a nearly contemporary poet like Iqbal (d. 1938) sees the Creator writing His message on the petals of the tulip.[200]

Persian poets sometimes invented strange metaphors in their spring songs.

One wonders what lead Fânî Kashmiri to compose the verse:

The rose wrote with writing, khatt, of greenery in the book of spring:

The cloud of the wine bottle is better than the sun of spring.[201]

Does he mean to say that rain would be more welcome than sun at this point in time, or else does he claim to prefer wine indeed to the radiant sunshine of a Kashmiri spring day...?

Yet, one is not surprised when the nightingales are heard reciting the Mantiq al-tayr from the book of the roses,[202] for rose petals can play various roles in the imagery of the book. They may just be a book filled with mysterious tales, as in the previous example, or else a book that contains the story of grief:

Every rose petal is a tongue to explain the commentary of grief—

Not in vain does the nightingale lament when it sees the rose.[203]

Thus says one of the greatest Turkish poets, Fuzuli (d. 1556). One of his predecessors, Jami, who influenced him considerably, remarks, however:

I struck together the booklet of the rose like the wind, because in these pages there is no letter about your beauty![204]

How could one leave intact a book which does not speak of the rose-like cheek of the beloved? Fani even wants to blacken rose petals with the color of the tulip;[205] he alludes to the black scar on the heart of the tulip which is compared to the black scar in the suffering lover’s heart, from which one can easily produce a collection of poetry.

To this century, poets have invented comparisons between the book and the garden; thus, the Egyptian poet Sami al-Bârüdi (d. 1904) wrote, at the beginning of this century:

The hand of wind writes letters on the pond that could be read and sung by birds.[206]

Perhaps the finest verses that compare gardens and books are not those in which birds recite from the booklet Rose, but rather the colorful descriptions of the autumnal garden. Jami sees it as a notebook colored by red and yellow leaves—a notebook from which the insightful spectator understands that the “white book”, that is, the snow-covered ground, will soon appear.[207] Fuzuli similarly takes up the radiant colors of autumn, but uses the image ever more ingeniously than Jami:

The scribe of Destiny made from the autumnal leaves a golden sprinkling for the pages of the garden;

Cutting off the stitching, shirazah, of running water [which held in shape the book], autumn has confused the pages of the manuscript of the garden.[208]

Similarities with books could be discovered in all of nature: An early poet of Baghdad did not see the garden or flowers as a book, but discovered a book with lines in the glittering skin of a snake.[209]

One often finds a concretion of abstracts in Persian poetry, and almost “mythical” transformation of material and spiritual objects. An early Persian poet, Akhsikatl, speaks of the “book of poverty”,[210] and Maulana Rumi mentioned “the library of my needs”, which the beloved is supposed[211] to study. When Sana’! claims:

As much as I read the booklet of the lovers,

Yet, in love of you I am still a beginner who learns the alphabet,[212]

he alludes to the fact that love, in its true essence, can never be understood by studying the books that speak about it, and that everyone has to start again with a new experience, with new suffering. Nazlri (d. 1612), the leading poet of Mughal India, took up the same idea:

Ever so many books and Qur’an copies are the register for the chapter Love —

When you find the real tale, you don’t read any page any more![213]

Jami sees it somewhat differently: Although intellectually he wanted to give up loving, yet, the friend’s khatt (down, script) seduced him again:

I washed off the book of Love with the management of reason,

But again, your khatt brought the lesson of the alphabet, abjad, into my head.[214]

The manuscript of Love is usually black—one can combine it with the term muswaddah, “black copy” (i.e., rough draft). This is so, on the one hand, because lovers suffer from melancholia, “black liver,” and from bakht-i siyah, “black fortune,” that is, misfortune, but also because this misfortune is caused by the black tresses and black down of the beloved. Bedil (d. 172 1)و in good Sufi manner, gratefully acknowledges that this black manuscript became radiant when the lesson of beauty was written on it, so that by looking at the friend’s beauty the reader became aware of himself,[215] for the lover is nothing but a mirror for the beloved’s beauty. And one should not forget that even though the book of Love is black, it need not be afraid of God:

for this sin [that is love] was not written in the account-book, jarldah, of the [black] tress.[216]

That, at least, is what Fan! claims.

Poets might boast of their intimate relation with the primordial book or with the Book of Love. Thus, an Indo-Persian poet whose name is barely found in any history of Persian literature claims:

The title of the books of mystery is our fate [samivisht], “what is written on the forehead“

The exordium of the book of Love is our disposition.[217]

But many of them were aware that one should never trust the book of Love. Is it not strange that:

His (the friend’s) mole is in the eyes of the rival and the scar of longing is in my heart—

In the book of love-game the dots have fallen on the wrong places!

Is it right that the rival can study the friend’s beauty spot from a close distance while the poor lover only suffers from the black scars which unfulfilled longing has stamped into his heart? There must be some taşhîf, a wrong placement of the diacritical marks, in this strange book![218]

At a rather late stage of Indo-Persian poetry, combinations of the reed pen, which is used for writing, and the reed mat, burya, on which the derwish, the true lover, is supposed to sleep, can be found. The reed, in its different aspects as pen, as flute, and as sugarcane, had been praised and described in earlier poetry, but the “Indian style” of Persian poetry abounds in allusions to the reed mat. Thus, Bedil, the most difficult of the poets who wrote in the “Indian style,” excels here, as elsewhere, in difficult cross references:

You break a hundred reed pens to reach the practice of good behavior, adab: There are lines in the book of the school of the reed mat! [219]

For if one sleeps on the reed mat (which was even compared by the poets to the ruler, mastarah, that is needed for good writing),[220] the lines of the hard mat leave their marks on the body and thus “educate” it in proper modest behavior.

Many poets knew that:

The book of generosity and kindness is a sign, ayah, of Mercy,

But the pages of this book do not come together.[221]

For it is hard to find more than a few scattered pages of such books as much as everyone looks out for them.

A book, however, should be stitched carefully in order to keep the pages in the right sequence, and the shirazah, “stitching,” occurs frequently in later Mughal verse—so much so that ‘Abdul Jain Bilgrarm (d. 1743) sees the “wave of the kha\\” appear as the “shirazah off the book of Beauty.“[222]

At about the same time, Bedil saw the vein of the rose petal as the thread of binding for the collection, majmliah of life and love, a collection in which one finds the blackness of, or the passion for, sawda, the friend’s khatt.[223]

Nazir appears more matter-of-fact when he describes his state:

<verse>

Your love is the stitching of my parts;

Longing for you is the register, fihrist, of my whole being.[224]

</verse>

A century earlier, Fuztill, in the Turkish area, had used the idea of “stitching together” in a somewhat more elegant way:

<verse>

The true lovers stitch together with the thread of the soul

Every book in which the tale, hadith, of your ruby lips is written![225]

</verse>

In the nineteenth century, Ghalib (d. 1869) (who even speaks, in his Urdu verse, of “looking” as the shirazah of the eyelashes)[226] invented a fine image:

<verse>

The story of longing does not fit into binding, alas!

Let this manuscript remain in parts![227]

</verse>

Iqbal, on the other hand, expressed his philosophy of development and longing in a related image:

<verse>

Wish is the stitching for the book of actions—[228]

</verse>

It is only man’s burning wish and striving that makes true, useful action possible.

He is thus quite different from his predecessors in whose verses a melancholy mood overshadows everything, including, and perhaps especially, images connected with the book:

<verse>

The sign of cheerful life is not to be found in the pages of this time, dahr—

Someone has made a wrong selection from this book![229]

</verse>

Poets did not believe much in hope and expectation, and knew from experience that:

<verse>

It is not good when a goal is attained;

When the page is complete it is turned over.[230]

</verse>

Probably the most outspoken criticism of the Book of Life comes from Sarmad, the Judeo-Persian convert to mystical Islam, who paid with his life for his daring and often seemingly blasphemous utterances after his protector, the Mughal heir apparent Dara Shiköh, had been executed in 1659. The content of his famous quatrain turned out to be true:

<verse>

To trust the promises of humans in the world is wrong.

“Yes”: wrong. “Sure”: wrong. “Tonight”: wrong. “Tomorrow”: wrong.

Don’t ask how the manuscript of the diwan of my life looks;

The script wrong, the meaning wrong, the composition wrong, the orthography wrong![231]

</verse>

No, there was no reason in hoping against hope:

<verse>

Behold my magnanimity: a hundred leaves from the book of Hope have I torn into a hundred pieces and washed them off with tears of blood![232]

</verse>

This little-known poet from the days of Emperor Akbar still sees the possibility of casting away the pages of hope; Ghalib, in nineteenth-century Delhi, is even less positive:

<verse>

Future and past are wish and longing,

It was a “Would it were!” which I wrote in a hundred places.

Not in a single manuscript was the meaning of the word “hope” [as much as] I had written the register of the chapters of wishes.[233]

</verse>

What is existence but a strange, often incomprehensible book? What is left to mankind but tajrid, complete isolation from all created beings, abstaining from wishes and hopes? Perhaps the most impressive description of a wise person’s attitude comes from Khaqani, whose verse seems unsurpassable in depth and expressiveness:

<verse>

I wrote the alphabet of isolation, tajrid, and then, I painted it with the red and yellow of the [red] tears and [pale] face as though it were a nashrah [an amulet for children painted in several color].

When I had learned by heart this alphabet, whose beginning is from nothingness, I forgot the riddle whose title is “Existence”[234]

</verse>

There seems little doubt that this line has inspired one of the famous verses by Mirza Ghalib who wrote, in his Persian Diwan’.

Death is a letter whose title is “Life.”[235]

Poets in former centuries often spoke of God the Creator as the master calligrapher, for they knew:

Creation was not prepared without a creator;

To decorate pages is impossible without the scribe’s writing.[236]

Thus thought Anvarl in the twelfth century. The same concept of the Divine Scribe, so frequently used in a positive way, as in Maulana Rums poetry, [237] is transformed in Ghalib’s introductory lines to his Urdu diwan into a rebellious outcry of the letters against the Divine Master who put them “in a paper shirt,” that is, who wrote them the way He wanted, without apparently caring for the letters’ feelings.[238] What, then, do we know about the meaning of the world?

Kallm admits his ignorance about creation and world in his oft-quoted verse:

We do not know anything of the beginning and the end of this world— The first and last page of this old book have fallen off.[239]

The mystics had always pretended to be averse to bookishness, and many of them pretended, also, to follow the example of the “unlettered Prophet,” or else to know only one letter of the alphabet, that is, alif. But we cannot deny that they probably wrote more books than those whom they criticized for their literary and scholarly activities, so that the output of mystical writings in Arabic, Persian, Turkish, Urdu, as well as the regional languages of Indo-Pakistan. Southeast Asia, and Africa, seems to have no limits. Yet a book was only a medium which should be studied under the supervision of a master who would know what to teach the disciple and how to explain the difficulties, the inner meaning, according to time-honored and often experiential methods. That is why one finds numerous remarks, especially among Sufis, against the use of books. But even Muhammad Iqbal, the poet-philosopher of the Indian Muslims and spiritual father of Pakistan, criticized the reliance on books, be they philological or scholastic. Is not the Muslim jurisconsult of modern times who knows only books and does not feel true religious experience like Qârün? Under the weight of the dead load of books on Arabic grammar he sinks into the earth, as did Qarun under the burden of his useless treasures, instead of breathing the air of divine Love.[240]

In another metaphor, Iqbal juxtaposes the bookworm, which leads a miserable life in the pages of manuscripts of Farabi and Avicenna, with the moth that casts itself lovingly and longingly into the candle to burn there in ecstasy.[241] He also coined the fine expression:

Love is umm al-kitab, “Mother of the Book,” scholarship is the “Son of the book.”[242]

Love is the primordial basis for revelation, while scholarship is dependent upon written, that is, second-hand, knowledge.

Long before him, Jami had admonished the reader of his Lawa’ih:

Strive to lift the veils, not to collect books.

For by collecting books the veils are not lifted.

Where vuld be the joy of love in traversing books?

Roll up all of them, return to God, and repent![243]

Rûmî had combined the book and the garden, expressing his pity for those who look only at books and, as it were, turn themselves into a library:

If you are a library, you are not someone who seeks the garden of the soul.[244]

For, as he sings in the Mathnawi:

For the lovers, the friend’s beauty is the teacher, his face is the notebook and lesson and instruction for them.[245]

For it is the page of the heart that matters:

From the undecorated page of the heart I found the reality which you seek in books.[246]

The heart, however, is perfected when it has been polished as a mirror to reflect the beloved’s beauty, which confuses everyone. Therefore, a minor Mughal poet sings:

I keep the sheet of the mirror under the arm instead of a book;

I am the child that reads the alphabet in the schoolhouse of confusion.[247]

What would be a book when one wants the radiant reflection of beauty? Gesu Daraz, whose description of the book as beloved we quoted in the beginning, seems to have changed his opinion and, refuting his own previous statement, writes in another quatrain:

If you have a book as your beloved,

Then you have something that has a black heart!

God forbid that a book be your beloved—

What kind of friendship with Abyssinians and Barbarians![248]

Maulana Rûmî admonished himself in hundreds of ghazals to be silent, and Mir Dard, more than 500 years later, emphasizes the importance of silence, so that the true Speaker and Author, God, can speak:

O you who has wasted this life in debate:

One point of silence is better than a hundred kinds of books![249]

Could any book describe properly what the lover feels?

This notebook has reached its end, but the story still goes on:

One cannot tell the situation of a longing heart even in a hundred notebooks![250]

Thus said Sa’di, and, confronted with the dilemma of wanting to write books and yet knowing that all of them are but a veil, what can one do except follow Sanâ’î’s remark:

First I wrote books with effort great—

At last I broke the pen, confused![251]

[147] Fihi mâfîhi, trans. Arthur John Arberry, Discourses of Rumi (London, 1961).

[148] “Comprendre rislam,” in La Voie des Lettres, ed. Jean Canteins (Paris, 1981), p. 76, note 21.

For the whole problem of calligraphy’s influence on the art of the book, literature in general, and Sufism, see Annemarie Schimmel, Callugraphy and Islamic Culture (New York, 1984; paperback, 1989).

[149] Armaghan-i Pak, ed. Shaykh Muhammad Ikram (Karachi, 1953), p. 259.

[150] Abdul Baqi Nihawandi, Ma’âthir-İ Rahimi, 3 vols., ed. M. Hidayat Hosain (Calcutta, 1916–1931), is devoted to the Khânkhânân’s political and cultural activities. For the deplorable decay of such libraries, however, see Aloys A Catalogue of the Arabic, Persian, and Hindu’stany manuscripts of the Libraries of the King of Oudh, compiled by Order of the Government of India (Calcutta, 1854, repr. Osnabiich, 1979) 1: X: “The books are kept in about forty dilapidated boxes—camel trunks- which are at the same time tenanted by prolific families of rats, and any admirer of Oriental lore who wants to visit this collection will do well to poke with a stick into the boxes before he puts his hand into them, unless he be a zoologist as well as an orientalist.”

[151] ‘Abdurrahman Jami, Dîwân-i kamil, ed. Hashim Riza (Tehran, 1341 H solar/1962), rubai no. 49.

[152] J. Christoph Bürgel, “Von Freud und Leid mit Bdchern. Gereimtes und Anekdotisches aus dem arabischen Mittlealter,” in Einheit in der Vielfalt, Festschrift Peter Lang (Bern/Frankfurt/Paris, 1988).

[153] Annemarie Schimmel, Die orientalische Kaize, 2nd ed. (Munich, 1989), pp. 87–92. The book lover was Abu Ja’far al-Awsî.

[154] Latifi, in Elias J.w. Gibb, History of Ottoman Poetry, 6 vols. (London, 1900–1909: repr. London, 1958–63) 6:165.

[155] ikram, Armaghan-i Pak, p. 161.

[156] Afdaladdin Ibrahim Khaqani, Diwan, ed. Ziâ’addîn Sajjadi (Tehran, n.d.), p. 326.

[157] Jalaladdin Rumi, Mathnawima’nawi, 7 vols., ed. and trans. Reynold Alleyne Nicholson (London, 1925–40), 4: line 5722ff. The story is found in Abu Hamid al-Ghazzali, ihya’ ‘ulumal-din, V. 4, bab al-tawakkul, “The Chapter of Trust in God”, which is Rumi’s source.

[158] Jami, Diwan-i kamil, rubai no. 48.

[159] Stuart Cary Welch et al., The Emperors’ Album (New York, 1987), pp. 42–43.

[160] Annemarie Schimmel, “Islamic Literatures in India,” in History of Indian Literature, vol. VII, ed. Jan Gonda (Wiesbaden, 1973), p. 46.

[161] Ikram, Armaghan-i Pak, p. 142.

[162] Garcin de Tassy, Les Oeuvres de Wali: publies en Hindoustani (Paris, 1834; traduction et notes, Paris 1838).

[163] Hafiz, Diwan, eds. Nadhlr Ahmad and Jalal Nâ’inl (Tehran, 1971), p. 75.

[164] Dlwan-i kamil, p. 470, ghazal no. 78

[165] Jâmî, Diwân-İ kamil, p. 185, ghazal no. 137.

[166] Edward Granville Browne, A Literary History of Persia, 4 vols. (Cambridge, 1921), 2:232.

[167] Muhammad Nâşir ‘Andallb, Nâda-i ‘andalib, 2 vols. (Bhopal, 1309/ 1890–91), 1:646.

[168] Muhsin Fam Kashmiri, Diwan, ed. G.L. Tikki (Tehran, 1964), p. 82.

[169] Fanl, Diwan, p. 10.

[170] Bâbâ Fighanl, Diwan, ed. A.s. Khwansarl, 2114 ed. (Tehran, 1340 H solar/1961), ghazal no. 358.

[171] Professor Vincent M. Monteil, Paris, in an oral communication, remarked that in Omar Khayyam’s famous quatrain about the “book under a tree, and wine,” the correct reading is not kitab, “book,” but with the change of one dot, kabab, “roast meat,” which makes much more sense both in the context and in the usage of the term kitab.

[172] Annemarie Schimmel, And Muhammad is His Messenger (Chapel Hill, 1985), Index: s.v. ummi, especially pp. 71–74.

[173] Annemarie Schimmel, Calligraphy and Islamic Culture, p. 79. relying on Sulaiman, Sa’daddln Mustaqlmzadah, Tuhfat al-khattatin, ed. Ibnul Emin Mahmud (Istanbul, 1928), p. 7 (among the forty hadith on writing).

[174] Majdaddin Majdad Sana’!, Hadiqat al-haqiqah, ed. Mudarris Rizawl (Tehran, 1329 H solar/1950), p. 457.

[175] ikram, Armaghan-i Pak, p. 193.

[176] Fanl, Diwan, p. 144.

[177] Muhammad Aşlah, 7adhkirat-i shu ara-yi Kashmir, 5 vols., ed. Sayyid Hussamuddln RashdI (Karachi, 1967–68) 4: 1736. A is the basic text, 1-IV the additional notes supplied by the editor.

[178] Schimmel, Calligraphy and Islamic Culture, Index: s.v. khatt, especially pp. 128–34.

[179] Aşlah, Tadhkirat A, p. 107.

[180] Muslihaddin Sa’dî, Kulliyat, ed. Furughi (Tehran, 1342 H solar/1963), ghazal no. 517, p. 498, line 8.

[181] Aşlah, Tadhkirat A, p. 363.

[182] Fânî, Diwan, p. 135.

[183] Aşlah, Tadhkirat A, p. 275.

[184] Hafiz, Diwan, p. 363 (num no. 9).

[185] Schimmel, Calligraphy and Islamic Culture, pp. 106–11.

[186] Ismâ’îl Bakhshi, quoted in Mir ‘Alîsîr Qani’, Maqalat al-shu’ard’, ed. Sayyid Hussamuddin Râshdî (Karachi, 1956), p. 44.

[187] Amir Khusrau, Diwan-i kamil, ed. Mahmüd Darwish (Tehran, 1343 H solar/1965).

[188] Abu Talib Kalim, Diwan, ed. Partaw Baidâ’î (Tehran, 1336 H solar/ 1957), ghazal no. 214.

[189] Khwajah Mir Dard, Diwan-i farsi (Delhi, 1310/1891-92), p. 65. About Dard’s attitude to writing and books, see Annemarie Schimmel, Pain and Grace (Leiden, 1976), pt. 1.

[190] Muhammad ‘Urfi Shirazi, Kulliyat, ed. Ghulam Husain Jawahiri (Tehran, 1336 H solar/1957), ghazal on p. 283, line 5.

[191] Sa’di, Kulliyat I, ghazal no. 296, p. 282, line 4.

[192] Jami, Diwan-i kamil, rubcTi no. 90.

[193] Kalim, Diwan, ghazal no. 539. Cf. also Khaqani, Diwan, p. 42, “birds in the garden learn the alphabet like little children.”

[194] Aşlah, Tadhkirat A, p. 569.

[195] Fîghânî, Diwan, ghazal no. 151.

[196] Amir Khusrau, Dlwan-i kâmil, no. 336.

[197] Fîghânî, Diwan, ghazal no. 363.

[198] Hafiz, Diwan, p. 119, ghazal no. 59. This verse, which is usually quoted as one of Hafiz’s finest puns, appears only in a footnote.

[199] Amîr Khusrau, Dlwân-İ kamil, no. 476.

[200] Muhammad Iqbal, Zabiir-i ’ajam (Lahore, 1927), pt. 2, no. 29.

[201] Fânî, Diwan, p. 109·

[202] Gi\0\0, History of Ottoman Poetry, 6:80.

[203] Fuzuli, Diwan, ed. Abdulbaki Gdlpinarli (Istanbul, 1948), no. 34.

[204] Jami, Diwân-İ kamil, p. 260, ghazal no. 331.

[205] Fani, Diwan, p. 140.

[206] Carl Brockelmann, Geschichte der arabischen Literatür (Leiden, 1938), suppl. 3: 12.

[207] Jami, Diwân-İ kamil, p. 401, ghazal no. 598.

[208] Fuzüli, Diwan, no. 132.

[209] Ibn Abi ‘Awn, Kitab al-tashbihat, ed. M. Mu’id Khan (London/Leiden, 1960), p. 58.

[210] Daulatshah, Tadhkirat al-shu’ara’, ed. Edward Granville Browne (Leiden, 1900), p. 136.

[211] Jalaladdin Rumi, Diwân-İ kabir yâ Kulliyat-i Shams, 10 vols., ed. Badi’uzzaman Furuzanfor (Tehran, 1957), ghazal no. 1425.

[212] Sana\,Diwan, ed. Mudarris Razawi (Tehran, n.d.), p. 899.

[213] Naziri Nishapuri, Diwan, ed. Mazahir Muşaffa (Tehran, 1340 H solar/1961), ghazal no. 520.

[214] Jami, Diwan-i kamil, p. 884.

[215] Bedil, Diwan (Bombay, 1302/1885), p. 207.

[216] Fani, Diwan, p. 100.

[217] Aşlah, Tadhkirat I, p. 118, line 7 (Ilahi).

[218] ادلآلادح tashif, see ١٤٨٢٩٢ة\-لؤ>خا, al-Tanbih’ald huduth al-tashif, ed. al-Shaykh Muhammad Hasan Al Yasin (Baghdad, 1967). See A. Schimmel, Calligraphy and Islamic Culture, ch. 4, notes 4–6.

[219] Bedil, Kulliyat, 4 vols. (Kabul, 1962–65), 1:5.

[220] Kalim, Diwan, ghazal no. 316.

[221] Fani, Diwan, p. 124.

[222] Qani’, Maqalat al-shu’ara’,. p. 412.

[223] Bedil, Kulliyat, 1:32.

[224] Naziri, Diwan, ghazal no. 483.

[225] Fuzuli, Diwan, no. 71.

[226] Mirza Asadullah Ghalib, Urdu diwan, ed. Hamid Ahmad Khan (Lahore, 1969), p. 155.

[227] Ghalib, Kulliyat-i farsi, 17 vols. (Lahore: University of the Punjab, n.d.), 5: qasidah 36.

[228] Iqbal, Asrar-i khudi (Lahore, 1915), line 285.

[229] Aşlah, Tadhkirat A, p. 593, line 27.

[230] Qudsi, in Aşlah, Tadhkirat III, p. 1249.

[231] ikram, Armaghan-i Pak, p. 239.

[232] Ja’fer Beg Asaf Khan Qazwini, in Badaoni, Muntakhab al-tawarikh, 3 vols., eds. William Nassau Lees and Ahmad All, trans. George S.A. Ranking, WH. Lowe, and Wolseley Haig, (Calcutta, 1865–893 repr. Patna: Academia Asiatica), 3: text 217, trans, p. 301.

[233] Ghalib, Kulliyat-i farsi, 1: no. 284.

[234] Khaqani, Diwan, p. 209.

[235] Ghalib, Kulliyat-i farsi, 1: no. 284.

[236] Anvari, Diwan, ed. Sa’id Nafisi (Tehran, 1958), qasidah fi al-tawhid, p. 175, line 10.

[237] For examples, see Annemarie Schimmel, The Triumphal Sun (London/The Hague, 1978), chapter on “Divine Calligraphy.”

[238] Ghalib, Urdu diwan, no. 1. For the interpretation, see Annemarie Schimmel, A Dance ofSparks: Studies in Ghalib’s Imagery (New Delhi, 1979), chapter on “Calligraphy and Poetry.”

[239] ikram, Armaghan-i Pak, p. 227.

[240] Iqbal, Bâl-i Jibril (Lahore, 1936)و p. 50.

[241] Iqbal, Payam-i mashriq (Lahore, 1923), p. 119.

[242] Iqbal, Zarb-i Kalim (Lahore, 1937), p. 14.

[243] Jami, Lawa ih, no. 40. Bedil, too, combines book collecting with afsurda dili, “having a frozen, dried-up heart,” Kulliyat, 1:226.

[244] Jalaladdin Rumi, Diwân-İ kabir, ghazal no. 2481.

[245] Jalaladdin Rumi, Mathnawi, 3: line 3847.

[246] Fani, Diwan, p.42.

[247] شم·l, Tadhkirat A, 0. 320 ٢Qalaדדdarı.

[248] Gesu Daraz, Anis al-ushshaq (Hyderabad/Deccan, 1940), p. 188.

[249] Dard, Diwan-i farsi, rubcTi no. 82.

[250] Sa’di, Kulliyat, 23: no. 586.

[251] Sanâ’i, Diwan, p. 801.

 6. Biographical Dictionaries: Inner Structure and Cultural Significance

Wadād al-Qāḍī

Biographical dictionaries seem to be, for the researchers in the Islamic Arabic library, both a blessing and a curse. When a researcher seeks to identify a relatively unknown person whose identification is crucial for his/her research, finding this person’s biography in a biographical dictionary produces unparalleled relief, joy, and a sense of salvation. When he/she does not, however, the frustration is great, and the chances of coming out with solid results are postponed—perhaps indefinitely. And, in fact, it is quite possible that a researcher would not find what he/she is looking for, not only because the Arabic biographical dictionaries, or what has survived of them, do not, and perhaps could not, include the biographies of every single person mentioned in the history of Islamic peoples across the centuries, but also because the promise that those dictionaries have, and the actual evidence of their tremendous usefulness, raise the hopes and aspirations of the researcher, creating thereby an image which does not necessarily stand up to the reality. If X were to identify a poet named Muhammad, my expectation would be that, even if I failed to find his biography in all the available dictionaries on poets, I would eventually find him in Jamal al-Dîn al-Qiftfs (d. 646/1248)[252] dictionary, al-Muhammadun min alshu’ara’ wa ash’aruhum, which has entries for the Arab poets called “Muhammad.” I may not, however, find him there either, the fact being that the book has not survived in its entirety. And there is, after all, another obstacle, namely the sheer number of these biographical dictionaries: they seem to be endless—“in their hundreds or thousands,” as Stephen Humphreys aptly put it[253]—and one is always afraid that one may have forgotten to consult a relevant dictionary, or that a new dictionary has been published without one being aware of it.

Whereas all this is true for anyone who has had to use Arabic biographical dictionaries extensively what is certainly as true is that having to handle these, dictionaries is an experience that puts one in the very midst of one of the major areas of medieval Islamic book production. After all, biographical composition is a form of historical composition: this is a fact that had been recognized by Muslim scholars of old,[254] and its echoes continue to be heard in modern scholarship today.[255] It is also a fact that is true of other cultures with well-developed historical traditions,[256] although in the Islamic one in particular, the biography, especially in the form of biographical dictionaries, has had an unparalleled level of prominence[257] for a variety of specific, historical reasons.[258]

Given the importance of this genre of writing, it is not surprising that there has been a sizeable number of studies on it. Some of these studies are brief. or detailed, surveys of the literature;[259] others are more analytical.[260] The latter discuss issues such as the motives for writing biographical dictionaries,[261] their origin,[262] provenance,[263] sources,[264] or organization,[265] the criteria for inclusion used by compilers,[266] typical contents of biographies there,[267] and so forth. Few of the studies venture to dwell at length on the question of the development of the genre,[268] and even fewer try to discern a relationship between this development and stations of change in Islamic society and civilization across time.[269] Though admitted,[270] this aspect of studying biographical dictionaries remains almost absent; generally, one gets perceptive remarks about the genre,[271] but the remarks are not linked to social and cultural development.

It is this last idea that the present paper wishes to investigate. The investigation is based on my belief that biographical dictionaries are indeed a mirror in which are reflected some important aspects of the intellectual and cultural development of the Islamic community, at least in the first nine centuries of Islamic civilization. What this study will attempt to do is to highlight these aspects by concentrating mainly, but not exclusively, on the inner structure and organization of biographical dictionaries, produced during these early centuries of Islam.

But let me, before going into the heart of the topic, define what I mean precisely by “biographical dictionaries.” This is necessary not only because there is no equivalent in Arabic for the term “biographical dictionaries” (although the expressions “kutub al-tabaqât”[272] [books on “classes”] or “kutub al-tarajim” [books on biographies] are frequently used), but also, and more importantly, because there are many genres of writing that come close to being identified as biographical dictionaries when they are, strictly speaking, not: one is to be reminded of how closely biographical dictionaries have been associated with history for example.[273] Thus, a biographical dictionary, as I would define it, is a prose work whose primary structure is that of a series of biographies, regardless of the order in which these biographies succeed each other.

According to this definition, the works that fall into the category of biographical dictionaries in the Arabic Islamic library can be one of two kinds. The first is what I would call “general biographical dictionaries.” These works include: biographies of individuals from all walks of life, professions, epochs, places, ranks, beliefs, and so forth. Two good examples of this kind are Şalâh al-Dîn al-Şafadî’s (d. 764/1362) voluminous al-Wafi ” and Ibn al-Tmad al-Hanbalis (d. 1089/1678) large Shadharat aidhahab. The second type is what I would term “restricted biographical dictionaries,” dictionaries which contain biographies of individuals who share one common, yet specific, trait. Most frequently these individuals belong to the same discipline of scholarship: Jalal al-Din al-Suyuti’s (d. 911/1505) Tabaqat al-mufassirin records only the biographies of the interpreters of the Qur’an; Jamal al-Dîn al-Mîzzî’s (d. 742/1341) Tahdhlb al-kamal those of the transmitters of hadith; Abu Ishaq al-Shirâzî’s (d. 476/1083) Tabaqat al-fuqaha’ those of the jurists; Tzz al-Dîn Ibn al-Athîr’s (d. 630/1232) Usd al-ghabah those of the companions of the Prophet; Ibn Qutaybah’s (d. 276/989) alShi’r wa-alshu’ara’ those of the poets; al-Qifts Inbah al-rüwât those of the grammarians and philologists; pseudo-Abu Sulayman al-Manöqî al-Sijistanfs (d. ca. 380/990) (Muntakhab) Siwan al-hikmah those of philosophers, both Greek and Muslim; and Yaqut al-Hamawfs 626/1228 .هع)Mu’jam al-udaba’ (Yftowu as Irshad al-arib ila ma’rifat al-adîbı those of the compilers among the litterateurs, for example. Often, too, these “restricted dictionaries” record the biographies of individuals who share a certain theological or religious orientation, like Ibn al-Murtada’s (d. 840/1436) Tabaqat al-mutazilah, for the Mu’tazili theologians of the Muslim community until the time of the author, and Abu Nu’aym al-Işfahânʏs (1.430/1038) Hilyat al-awliyd’, for the Muslim ascetics and the Sufis until his day. Others include entries on those individuals who have lived in or passed by a particular city or district, such as al-Khatib al-Baghdadis (d. 463/1070) Ta’rikh Baghdad, which records the biographies of figures connected with the city of Baghdad, or Hamzah ibn Yusuf al-Sahmfs (d.427/1035) Ta’rikh Jurjan, which has entries only for the scholars connected with the town of Jurjan. In still other works, the individuals entered all belong to a particular profession, as one finds in Muhammad ibn Khalaf Waki’s (1.306/918) Akhbar al-qudat, for the judges, and Ibn Abi Uşaybî’ah’s (d. 668/1270) ‘Uyun al-anba’ ft tabaqat al-atibba’, for the physicians and related medical professionals. Or, in other instances, those covered may be individuals who share a peculiar characteristic, no matter how significant or insignificant it is for their work, such as Abu Hatim al-Sijistanfa (d. 248/862) al-Mu’ammarun wa-al-waşayâ, which has entries for prominent figures known for longevity, Şalâh al-Dîn al-Şafadî’s Ak al-himyan fi nukat al-‘umyân, whose entries deal with blind men, and al-Jâhiz’s (d. 255/868) larger al-Burşân wa-al-‘urjân wa-al-‘umyân wa-al-hûlân, which handles the biographies of litterateurs who were lepers, lame, blind, and squint-eyed.

What this definition would exclude are works whose primary structure is not that of a series of biographies, in spite of the fact that they may contain a large number of biographies, and, in fact the biographies included in them may be an essential component of the books, and may be extremely useful for the researchers. Books on genealogies, ansab, for example, often look as if they were biographical dictionaries, but they really are not, since the primary criterion in them is the tribe, clan, and so forth. Accordingly, a work very rich in biographies like al-Baladhuri’s (279/892) Ansab al-ashraf is not to be considered among the biographical dictionaries, for it is, essentially, an indirect history of the early Muslim community as it is envisioned through the achievements of its prominent Arab men. Similarly, several annalistic histories, such as those of al-Tabari (d. 310/922) and Ibn Taghribirdi (d. 874/1470), which often include biographies of individuals at the end of the historical reportings of many years, are by no means biographical dictionaries, just as geographical dictionaries containing many biographies, such as Yaqut al-Hamawi’s Mu jam al-buldan, are not either, because the city, district, or locale is their primary structural criterion. On a more subtle level, a great deal of biographical information, in biographical form, is available in some lexicons, like al-Murtada al-Zabidfs (d. 1205/1790) Taj al-‘arüs (most frequently under al-mustadrak at the end of the entries), or in works which specialize in documenting the correct spelling and pronunciation of proper names, such as Ibn Makûlâ’s (d. 475/1082) al-Ikmal or Ibn Hajar al-‘Asqalani’s (d. 852/1448) Tabsiral-muntabih; but, there again, the essential format is not that of biographical dictionaries, properly speaking. Several other kinds of quasi-biographical books also cannot be considered biographical dictionaries since biographies are not the determining factor in their construction. Examples of these include travel books, especially late medieval Maghribi ones, like Ibn Rushayd al-Sabtis (d. 721/1321) Rihlat ibn Rushayd; bibliographical books, like the famous al-Fihrist of Ibn al-Nadlm (1. 380/990 or 412/1021): mashyakhat or baramij books, that is, books which record the life and times of the authors’ teachers,[274] such as the Mashyakhah of Ibn al-Jawzi (d. 597/1200) or the Bamamaj of al-Wadi’ashî (d. 749/1338)و large compendia which are encyclopaedic in their scope, such as Ibn Fadi Allah al-‘Umarî’s (d. 749/1348) Masalik al-absar, even if their scope were somehow restricted (such as al-Maqqars [d. 1041/1631] Nafh al-tîb, which is concerned only with the news of Andalusia); major commentaries on famous, important or widely-read early texts, like Ibn Abi al-Hadld’s Nahj al-balaghah, which is a commentary on the sayings, orations, and letters of ‘All ibn Abi Talib; or even books which are concerned with recording the available information on “the firsts,” awa’il, that is, the first persons to perform certain things, such as Abu Hilal al-‘Askarî’s (d. 395/1004) Kitab al-awa’il.

With this clarification out of the way, we can now begin to look at the manner in which the biographical dictionaries reflected some traits of the intellectual and cultural development of the Muslim community in the first nine centuries of Islamic civilization.

1. One of the most striking features of the Arabic biographical dictionaries is that they do not make their appearance until the beginning of the third/ninth century, the two earliest extant dictionaries[275] being Ibn Sa’d’s (d. ca. 230/845) Kitab al-tabaqat al-kablr and Ibn Sallam al-Jumahi’s

(d. ca. 231/846) Tabaqat fuhiil al-shuara'. This by itself is a significant fact, for it indicates that the genre of biographical dictionaries evolved in Islamic civilization at the time when that civilization was beginning to develop a clear self-image, and when it was reaching towards formalizing its stances. It is therefore a genre which is by no means "preliminary" or "simple"; it is one which belongs to the age of the maturing of the civilization in which it arose. This is further confirmed by the fact that this genre was preceded by a presumably simpler genre of writing, namely that of the single biography, or monograph.[276] Unfortunately, none of these monographs, with the exclusion of the Prophet Muhammad's Slrah, have survived. However, Ibn al-Nadim's Fihrist provides US with ample examples of them, such as Abu Mikhnafs (d. 157/774) Kitab al-Mukhtar ibn Abi 'Ubayd and Kitab Zayd ibn 'All[277] Ibn al-Kalbfs (d. 206/821) Akhbar al-Abbas ibn'Abd al-Muttalib ۅاًلۅ Kitab Musaylimah al-kadhdhab wa-Siiâh[278] and al-Haytham ibn 'Adi's (d. 207/822) Kitab akhbar Ziyad ibn Abihi and Akhbar aTHasan ibn 'All wa-wafatihi[279] These and similar works must have been among the basic sources for the early biographical dictionaries. What the biographical dictionaries essentially did was to compile them and to create from them, in addition to other historical and literary sources, complex and elaborate structures.

But perhaps the best evidence we have of the complexity and maturity of the genre of biographical dictionaries in its earliest stages is the structure of the dictionaries themselves. For an examination of the structures of the two works mentioned above (Ibn Sa'd's and Ibn Sallam's) reveals that their authors were struggling hard to simplify complex material, and, where possible, to create clear and comprehensible presentations of their materials, go beyond the unitary vision of things dictated by the earlier, single-format works, and present comprehensive and global visions of the two disciplines they were addressing in their works.

Of the two earliest dictionaries, Ibn Sa'd's Tabaqat is the more complex and much longer one,[280] for in it the author uses so many criteria in organizing his material that one senses that he is working against serious odds to achieve clarity side by side with comprehensiveness. The work is without an introduction; it begins with a lengthy Slrah, biography, of the Prophet, together with an account of the maghazi, the early campaigns. Immediately following the Prophet’s biography, there is what amounts to a statement of purpose: “Naming those whom we have counted from the companions of the Messenger of God, from the -’ ‘ ‘ - and the Anşâr, and those who lived after them from their offspring (abncTihim) and their followers, of the people of knowledge (fiqh), learning (’،7m), and transmission of hadlth, and what has come down to US about their names, genealogies, agnomens (kuna), and reports (sifatihim), class by class (tabaqatan tabaqah.).”[281] This sentence gives US a clear idea of the comprehensiveness that the author is aiming for; it does not, however, tell US how he is going to arrange the massive amount of material he has: the biographies of the religious scholars who lived in the first two centuries of Islam. In the next main part of the book, however, the reader begins to have a sense of the arrangement. This second part covers the biographies of the Prophet s Companions, and its organization indicates that the author has decided to choose the criterion of “sabiqah” (precedence of priority in accepting Islam) in arranging his entries. I hus, the biographies of first converts to Islam—those who fought in the first major battle which the Prophet fought (the battle of Badr, in the year 2 A.H.)—are entered first. But within this section, another criterion is introduced, namely that of the precedence of the Muhajirun (mainly the earliest Meccan converts from the tribe of Quraysh) over the Anşâr (mainly the later converts from the city of Medina): a tribal/place criterion. In the next section, this criterion is dropped, and the sabiqah criterion is resumed, so that the biographies of both the Muhajirun and the Anşâr who fought at the battle of Uhud (in the year 3 A.H.) and the following battles are mentioned, albeit only if they had been among the emigrants to Abyssinia—still an additional criterion. The last section retains the sabiqah criterion, with a slight twist to it: it includes the biographies of the Muslims who accepted Islam prior to the conquest of Mecca (in the year 8 A.H.). This section concludes the first part on the Companions of the Prophet.

In the following part, which covers most of the remainder of the book, the author abandons the sabiqah criterion completely and assumes two concurrent criteria: place and time. Accordingly, the biographies of the Followers of Medina—the Prophet’s adopted city—are, first, followed by the biographies of the Followers of Mecca, then those of Tâ’if, Yemen, Yamamah, Bahrain, Kufah, Basrah, Wasit, Mada’in, Baghdad, Khurasan, Syria, the Jazirah, Egypt, then Ayla.[282] Within each of the sections on each center of learning, the biographies are arranged in classes, tabaqat, usually carrying an ordinal number, that is, the first tabaqah, second, third, et cetera. This structure shows not only the place criterion most clearly and the time one a little less,[283] but also the factor of transmission of hadlth or religious learning in general, where there are instances when an older person may narrate from a younger one or from a peer. This factor comes into play in particular in the sections on Kufah and Basrah, where there are many sub-sections within a class depending on which scholars the members of this class narrated hadlth from. Thus, in the section on Kufah, and within the first class, there are ten sub-sections, each of which includes the biographies of those who narrated hadlth from ‘Umar alone,[284] from ‘Umar and ‘All,[285] from ‘All alone,[286] from ‘All and Ibn Mas’ûd,[287] from Ibn Mas’üd alone,[288] and so forth. The presence of this factor in the two sections of this third part is so strong that it amounts to being an independent, additional criterion, thus adding all the more to the complexity of the book’s structure. The book ends with a special part on women, with no subdivision.[289] There the criterion of 5،2٥z،7«/z/time/piety/fame come into play all at once.

The conclusion one can draw from this analysis is that Ibn Sa’d, in the earliest surviving biographical dictionary, achieved comprehensiveness and attempted to achieve clarity regardless of complexity. In spite of all the intertwined criteria, clarity was not far from being reached: we have a large eight-volume work,[290] with over 4,250 entries, recording the biographies of the Companions of the Prophet, then of the Followers of the Companions, then their Followers, then of the Muslim women who played a role in early Islamic society and Islamic learning. It must be noted, however, that the complexity of the work was bound to be overwhelming for any author attempting this genre at such an early point in Islamic culture. The result was that many prominent Muslims came to have more than one biography in the book, simply because they fulfilled several of the criteria the author was struggling to organize and put under control. Also, some information is repeated in several places in the book (though sometimes in different versions), thus pointing to the hardships endured in compiling this pioneering biographical dictionary.

In Ibn Sallam’s Tabaqat,[291] no such overlapping takes place and no poet has more than one entry. The book is better controlled, with a relatively lengthy introduction on literary criticism and the author’s method. Ibn Sallam explains that he is going to divide the Arab poets into two main groups: the pre-Islamic poets and the Islamic poets. Within each group, he is going to have ten classes, and in each class there will be biographies of four poets who are similar to each other in poetical achievement. The book, then, takes into consideration two main criteria: time, then artistic achievement/fame. In general, the book has a much clearer structure; it is also much shorter and its material is more limited. And yet, signs of pioneering efforts persist. The time factor is not always an absolute one: the biographies of the “mukhadramun,” that is, poets who lived partially after its advent, are sometimes put among those of the pre-Islamic poets and sometimes among those of the Islamic ones. The number of classes selected and the strict number of four within each class is so arbitrary that it defies explanation, inasmuch as it is sometimes very difficult to figure out why certain poets were lumped together in one class. But, we have to remember, all this is the result of the struggle of an ambitious author treading on strange, virgin soil: he tries his best, and achieves as much as he can.

This analysis of the inner structure of the two earliest of our biographical dictionaries, written at the beginning of the third/ninth century, point out that in addition to the attempt at complexity and comprehensiveness at that moment in time in Islamic civilization, the civilization had already begun to mature and define itself more clearly.

Ibn Sallam’s dictionary is but a culmination of that civilization’s enduring tendency to compare and contrast poets in terms of output and artistic achievement—eventually with fame. It is a record of the “fuhtül” among the poets, the best of them, that is, those who set the linguistic and artistic standards for other poets for a long time. On the other hand, Ibn Sa’d’s dictionary is, above all, a presentation of the self-image of Islamic civilization at that time, which considered participation in Islamic learning a criterion for prominence in it. And the details of that structure reveal without doubt the importance of the idea of the sabiqah which was developing then: the earlier one adhered to Islam, the higher his position in learning would be. Thus the Companions come before the Followers. Interestingly enough, the criterion of tribe or tribal grouping had great significance, too. In the Companions' part, the biographies of the Muhajirun come before those of the Anşâr: the Quraysh comes first. The Quraysh is the tribe of the Prophet, and Ibn Sa'd is telling US that the Prophet has a special position. This is why Ibn Sa'd's work begins with Muhammad's Sirah, and two volumes, or almost a quarter of the work, are accorded to it. But the Quraysh is also the stock of the caliphs, the supreme rulers of the Islamic community, now already in power for two centuries. The Quraysh are also the paramount notables, ashraf, among the Arab Muslims. Thus, even after centuries of urbanization and of Islamization of non-Arabs, the supreme Arab tribe, that of the Prophet and the caliphs, is still accorded a distance treatment (cf. Baladhur's Ansab al-ashraf). On the other hand, we have to remember that the Muhajirun mean also Meccans versus Medinans. The precedence of the first vis-â-vis the second, however, is adhered to by the author only in the Companions' part; in the Followers' part, the order is reversed: Medina comes first and is then followed by Mecca. But this is understandable. Islamic civilization then saw Medina as THE center of learning since the main Companions lived in it after the death of the Prophet, and it was in Medina that the Followers took their religious knowledge from the Companions. Medina was also the capital of the first caliphs, the center of the emerging Islamic state, the heir to which was the contemporary Islamic state. After Ibn Sa'd is through with Medina and Mecca, he opts for treating other centers of learning in Arabia, and then he moves to Iraq. In the section on Iraq, he begins with Kufah rather than Basrah, a fact which is significant. Kufah, again, was a kind of capital for a part of rule of the last "Rashidi" caliph, 'All; also, more Followers who had transmitted hadlth and religious learning from the Companions lived there. These two facts, at least, give it precedence over Basrah, in the view of the formative scholars of the early third/ninth century. But Kufah also, much more than Basrah, was the center of the largest number of religious controversies; hence the introduction by the author of the criterion of "the narrator": who your authority is in learning affects the stance you take on various issues, be they legal, political, or theological. The overall image of the Islamic community, as advanced by Ibn Sa'd, is represented by its religious scholars, after the part on the Companions; the mere division of the book into locales, places, or centers of learning indicates how the early Muslims saw their tradition, as one that grew in separate milieus (hence the contemporaneous rihlahfi talab al-‘Um). Finally, Ibn Sa’d’s handling of women in a separate part is indicative of the view Islamic civilization then took of women’s role, as one which is distinct from the role of men in religious learning: the criteria that apply to the latter need not apply to the first.

2. Looking again at the two earliest biographical dictionaries, one cannot but be struck by the fact that the genre of biographical dictionaries deals with the fields of poetry and religious learning, with an underlying, hidden stratum of history. This is significant, for it indicates that at the time when Islamic civilization had begun to define itself, at the beginning of the third/ninth century, poetry and religious learning came to the forefront as fundamental, defining criteria. Hardly anything need be said about religious learning: without adherence to Islamic learning, its roots as well as its perpetuation, there is no such thing as Islamic civilization, and this is precisely the message of our earliest biographical author, Ibn Sa’d. As for poetry, and Arabic poetry in particular, it is the most firmly rooted Islamic genre which continued in great force after Islam, in spite of early Islamic reservations about its sources and function. This is not the right place to go into the reasons for this continuation; what is relevant to our discussion here is that the major figures in this genre get their biographies recorded at the same time as the religious scholars do, right at the outset of the self-definition of Islamic civilization. Does one sense a dichotomy here? Only in appearance, perhaps, but not in reality. After all, our first comprehensive biographer of the poets chose thtfuhul from those poets. The meaning of the word “fiihur is ambiguous, but it must include at least two things: the artistic and the linguistic abilities of the poets concerned. The artistic component keeps US in the realm of poetry proper, but the linguistic component takes US a little out of it, into an area which brings US back to the religious sphere: Arabic is, after all, the language of the Qur’an. This way, poetry becomes a supporting factor for the definition of a civilization which conceived of itself as primarily religious.

The role of history alongside the two fields of religious learning and poetry at the outset of the genre of biographical dictionaries is quite obvious. In order to be comprehensive requires in the first place that one think in historical terms. Actually, the criterion of time, or a certain chronological setup, is present in both works we have been discussing.[292]

3. The two books under study can be the starting point for examining yet another way in which the biographical dictionaries of the Arabic Islamic library reflected important traits of the intellectual development of the Muslim community. This way revolves around the question of specialization.

One of the most striking things about biographical dictionaries is that they were, right from the start of the genre, and for at least the four following centuries, solely of the “restricted” rather than the “general” kind:[293] most of them dealt with specific fields mostly, although some of them were restricted by criteria other than field. This field-related restriction makes them, in a wav. “specialized” books: one does not look up biographies of other than poets in Ibn Sallam’s Tabaqat, nor for biographies of other than religious authorities in Ibn Sa’d’s Tabaqat. This phenomenon needs explanation, for an observer of any given civilization might expect the reverse: that within a certain genre there should be a tendency towards recording the general first, then the particular. We must not forget two things, however. The first is that the genre of biographical dictionaries belongs to the age of maturity of early Islamic civilization, not of infancy; and the second is that this civilization perceived itself primarily as a religious one, with a necessary linguistic component and a linguistic/poetic one. Specialization was unavoidable; indeed, it is a marker of the civilization at hand. A comparison of the genre of early biographical dictionaries with the related genre of history in its early stages, for example, shows that the tendency towards specialization rather than generality is common between them; it is even stronger in the early historical works than it is in the early biographical dictionaries, as the chapter on the historians in Ibn al-Nadim’s Fihrist shows.

But there is something else to note with regard to “specialization” in the development of the genre of biographical dictionaries, namely that with the passage of time, the tendency towards specialization actually increases. Whereas all the religious scholars are biographical subjects in Ibn Sa’d’s dictionary, a few decades later, Bukhari (d. 256/869) includes in his al-Ta’rlkh al-kabir only the biographies of the hadith transmitters; and, two centuries later, Aba Ishaq al-Shirazi includes in his Tabaqat al-fuqaha’ only the biographies of the jurists. The circle becomes even narrower, and more specialized, later on. Instead of al-Shirâzî's jurists of all schools, we begin to observe, after him, dictionaries concerned only with jurists from the Maliki (e.g. al-Qâdî 'lyâd's [d. 544/11491 Tartib al-madarik), Hanafi (e.g. Ibn Abi al-Wafâ"s [d. 775/1373] al-Jawahir al-mudiyah), Hanball (e.g. Ibn Aba YaTa al-Farrâ's [d. 526/1131] Tabaqat al-hanabilah) or Shâfî'i (e.g. Tâj al-Dîn al-Subki's [d. 71/1369] Tabaqat al-shafi'iyah al-kubra) rites. And instead of Bukhârî's hadith transmitters, we get special books on reliable transmitters (e.g. al-Mizzfs Tahdhlb al-kamal), or fairly reliable transmitters (e.g.. Shams al-Dîn al-DhahabFs [d. 748/13741 Mizan al-i tidal), or weak transmitters (e.g., Ibn Hajar's Lisan al-mizan). What this tells us is that although the genre of biographical dictionaries began as a specialized genre, its specialization was limited to what the civilization perceived as broadly indicative of itself; it was an "inclusive" rather than an "exclusive" kind of specialization. As for later "sub-specialization" within the genre, it was bound to happen, as the civilization became more and more advanced and sophisticated. Paradoxically, the writing of general rather than restricted biographical dictionaries began quite late in Islamic civilization, six and a half centuries after the advent of Islam, with Ibn Khallikan's (681/1282) Wafayat al-a'yân. But, again, this is quite natural. A great deal of time was needed before one could see the general picture and reconj biographies of distinguished men in all fields, places, eras, and walks of life.

4. Another feature of biographical dictionaries that appeared rather late in the history of the development of the genre is that of the "continuation," dhayl. By "continuation" I mean that a compiler would take the biographical dictionary of a predecessor, possibly, but not necessarily together with the predecessor's criteria, and, write his own biographical dictionary, including the biographies of the people who lived in the period between the predecessor's time and his own. Interestingly enough, this phenomenon appeared for the first time not in the Islamic East but in the Islamic West, in Andalusia and the Maghrib. The first person to attempt it was Ibn Bashkuwal (d. 578/1183),[294] the very title of his book, Kitab al-şüah [= the book of addendum], clearly conveys a sense of "continuation," and the book is indeed a continuation of Ibn al-Faradi's

(404/1013) Tabaqat al-fuqaha’ wa-abniwat Hl-’Um bi-al-Andalus, on Andalusian religious scholars. Ibn Bashkuwal’s book itself was picked up for continuation in the following century, when Ibn al-Abbar (d. 658/1259), again with an indicative, explicit title, wrote his longer Kitab al-takmilah [= the book of supplement] li-kîtâb alsilah. A few decades later, Ibn ‘Abd al-Malik al-Marrakishi (d. 703/1303) did the same thing with Ibn al-Abbar’s book in his conmeiim, al-Dhaɪɾl wa-al-takmilah wa-al-mawşûl ba’d al-şüah. As the title indicates, this book was meant by the author to be not simply a continuation but also a comprehensive record of the Andalusian and Maghribi scholars until his time, hence the duplication in it of some of the previously recorded biographies.

The phenomenon of continuing the work of a previous compiler in biographical dictionaries is, in my opinion, indicative of the confidence that this genre gained over time, and hence its emergence rather late, a number of centuries after the genre had made its first appearance. The fact that it surfaced for the first time in Andalusia and the Islamic West has its cultural significance. At the time when Ibn Bashkuwal wrote his Kitab al-silah, there was a great deal of intellectual restlessness in Andalusia, expressed in the form of a rebellion against servility to the Islamic East, against considering Andalusia a mere subservient follower of the cultural traditions of the East, or an echoer of every line of intellectual or artistic production taking place there. The most outspoken intellectuals to express this rebellion are three of Andalusia’s greatest thinkers and historians: Ibn Hazm (d. 456/1064), Ibn Havvan (d. 469/1076). and Ibn Bassam (d. 542/1147).[295] In fact, Ibn Hazm wrote a whole treatise on the merits of the Andalusians (Risalahfifadl ahi al-Andalus);[296] whose main message was that the Andalusians made their own undoubted original contribution to Islamic civilization and culture, and his treatise was soon complemented by other Andalusian intellectuals.[297] Ibn Bassam, in the introduction to his huge biographical compendium, al-Dhakhirah fi mahasin ahi al-Jazfrah, quoted Andalusia’s great historian, Ibn Hayyan, in his rebellion against servility to the traditions of the East, and after that he went on to record the biographies of his Andalusian contemporaries from the litterateurs in the rest of his book. It appears to me that by using the “continuation” format to record the biographies of the religious scholars up to their respective times, what Ibn Bashkdwal, Ibn al-

Abbar, and Ibn Abd al-Malik were doing was to precisely highlight the Islamic West's continued tradition of original scholarship—and on its own; hence the close relationship between the appearance of this phenomenon in the genre of biographical dictionaries and in the Islamic West.

The genre, having taken this direction, could not remain restricted to the West, but was bound to come to the East. Only a few decades after Ibn Bashkuwal wrote his first continuation, Ibn al-Dabithi (d. 637/1239), in the East, wrote a continuation to al-Khatlb al-Baghdadi's (d. 463/1070) Ta'rikh Baghdad, حالآ١١ا\هج Dhayl a rikh madinat al-salam Baghdad. ١لآأه ١لل ا١لآة بلآ ٠بلاً ١ن al-Dabithi brought up to date the biographies of long- and short-term residents of Baghdad who contributed to Islamic civilization. Shortly thereafter, another, longer continuation to the same book appeared, Ibn al-Najjâr's (d. 643/1245) Dhayl tâ'rîkh Baghdad. A similar process was undertaken a century later by Ibn Shakir al-Kutubi (d. 763/1361), who, in his Fawat al-wafayat, recorded and brought up to date the biographies which were left out by Ibn Khallikan (in his Wafayat al-a'yân), and brought them up to date. At the same time, al-Kutubi's contemporary, al-Şafadî (d. 763/1361), wrote a comprehensive biographical dictionary, his voluminous al-Wafi bi-al-wafayat, duplicating most of the biographies present in Ibn Khallikan's and Ibn Shakir al-Kutubi's dictionaries, thereby doing the same thing Ibn 'Abd al-Malik al-Marrakishi did with the works of Ibn Bashkuwal and Ibn al-Abbar in the Islamic West.

5. Going back to the inner structure of the biographical dictionaries, one notes that, with the passage of time, these structures become smoother and easier for the user to handle. It was noted above how the signs of complexity, and even abstruseness, marred the structures of the earliest dictionaries (Ibn Sa'd's and Ibn Sallam's), making it frequently impossible to predict where a particular biography is to be found, and making it very difficult to use these books without the help of indexes—unless one reads the books in their entirety, of course. This changed rather quickly, progressing step by step. A few decades after these two works appeared, Bukhari (d. 256/870) produced his al-Ta'rikh al-kabir, including in it brief biographies of the transmitters of hadlth. At almost the same time, Ibn Hibban al-Busti (d. 254/868) wrote his Kitab al-majrühîn.

The structure of these latter two dictionaries clearly represent attempts at smoothness; their order is, in principle, based on the letters of the alphabet in their oriental sequence. But the smoothness does not go very far: only the first letter of the first name of a given hadith-transmitter is taken into consideration. Thus people with names like “Ibrahim,” “Ahmad,” “Ishaq,” and “Adam” come first simply because the first letter of their names is an alif. Within this letter, as in all other letters, however, there is no particular order whatsoever: the second letter of the name is not taken into consideration, nor the following letters in the first names. The reader thus knows approximately where the biographies of certain persons are going to be, but only within the large range of the first letter of their first names. A mechanism for smoothness, is, however, added by Bukhari (and Ibn Hibban) to make things a little easier for the user: all the biographies of persons with the same first name are grouped together. Thus, for example, all the “Ibrahims” are grouped together, and all the “Muhammads” are grouped together. This structure proved to be quite influential in the early history of the genre of biographical dictionaries, especially in the field of hadlth-transmission, maybe due to the great stature of Bukhari and Ibn Hibban. Almost a century after these two scholars, al-‘Uqayü (d. 322/934) used their structure in compiling his Kitab al-du’afö’ al-kübîr, and Ibn Abi Hatim al-Razi (d. 327/938) used it in putting into final form what were mainly his father’s notes, his voluminous Kitab al-jarh wa-al-ta’dîl.

It was not until the seventh/thirteenth century that complete smoothness was reached in the inner structures of biographical dictionaries, and that came with the appearance of Yaqut al-HamawI’s Mu’jam al-udaba’ (or Irshad al-arlb). From the time that book appeared onwards, the arrangement of biographies in biographical dictionaries became more and more frequently alphabetical, with all the letters of the first name, as well as those of the father’s name, and sometimes even the grandfather’s name, being taken into consideration. This phenomenon came rather late in the genre of biographical dictionaries in Islamic civilization, but here again, the amount of time needed for the establishment of and confidence in a tradition has to be taken into account. It is to be noted that although the smoother style came to be dominant in the majority of the biographical dictionaries produced, traces of the older, Bukhari/Ibn Hibban style did not disappear. Thus it is that some of our most influential later books carry those traits, namely al-Khatlb al-Baghdadi’s (d.

464/1071) Ta’rikh Baghdad, and, to a lesser extent, Ibn Khallikan’s Wafayat al-a’yân.

6. In al-Khatlb al-Baghdadi’s book, there appears another characteristic of some, but not many, of the later biographical dictionaries in regard to the degree of strictness to which their authors adhered to alphabetical arrangement. Like Bukhari, al-Khatlb adhered only to partial, rather than to full, alphabetization. He followed Bukhari in another very interesting phenomenon, namely that he set aside the biographies of those persons called “Muhammad” and began his book with them, and only after that did he go to the normal sequence of the letters of the alphabet, beginning with the letter alif. Why Bukhari and al-Khatlb chose that particular break from the order that they otherwise adhered to in their respective books is not difficult to explain. “Muhammad” is the name of the Prophet, and it is in deference to him that anybody called by his name is given precedence over people called by other names. In other words, this is an act of piety. Mixing piety with scholarship in a civilization that perceives itself primarily as religious is not strange at all; indeed, one may expect more such expressions of piety. One does find these, in feet. In later works, one meets some biographical dictionaries which not only begin with the “Muhammads,” but also give precedence to the “‘Abd Allahs” within the compound names starting with the letter ‘ayn (‘Abd al-Rahman, ‘Abd al-Malik, ‘Abd al-Wahld, etc.)—a thing that breaks their alphabetical structures much more than does beginning them with the “Muhammads.” A good example of this is al-Şafedî’s al-Wafi bi-al-wafayat, which begins with the “Muhammads” and puts the “‘Abd Allahs” before the other compound names within the letter ‘ayn. Ibn Hajar’s Tahdhib abtahdhlb does not begin with the “Muammads,” but its author follows al-Şafadî in giving priority to the “‘Abd Allahs” within the letter ‘ayn. A11 this is done, again undoubtedly, as an expression of piety: Allah’s name should precede any other names (although al-Rahman, al-Malik, al-Wahld, etc., too, are names of God, but they are descriptive in nature). As acts of piety, such interference with the normal order of the biographical materials was bound to increase rather than decrease with the passage of time: in religious civilizations, the farther away one is from the source, the more one is desirous of expressing piety.

7. Returning to the issue of smoothness, one notes that with the development of the genre of biographical dictionaries and its increasing tendency to make its materials more easily accessible to the readers, methods of organization other than alphabetization were used. The most notable method used is that of arranging biographies within fixed time spans or periods, though arbitrary they may often be. The seeds of this system, it appears to me, were sown by Bukhari's al-7a'rîkh al-şaghîr, a relatively short biographical dictionary whose biographies are arranged, in principle, according to time spans. These time spans, however, are not always the same: the first time period is defined by the lifetime of the first prominent men of Islam, the Prophet and the first four caliphs, that is, until the year 40 A.H. After that, decades are used: "[the biographies of those who died between [the years] 40 [A.H.] and 50 [A.H.]," and so on. Decade-long spans are adhered to in much of the book, but sometimes they change to spans of five years (e.g., the years 211 to 215, 216 to 220), and, towards the end of the book, beginning with the year 250, they change to one-year time spans.

But this was only the beginning, and beginnings are normally rather crude. With time, this system was refined and it became a prime server of the principle of smoothness and ease. Most frequently, time spans of either decades or centuries were used. A good example of the first is the biographical part of al-Dhahabi's comprehensive Ta'rlkh aTIslam. An example of the latter is Taj al-Dîn al-Subki's Tabaqat alshafTiyah al-kubrd, a dictionary of the scholars who followed the Shafi'i rite in law. This book is structured according to centuries, but not for convenience, rather because al-Subki believed that a paramount position should be given to the tradition of the Prophet which says that there will be a reformer (mujaddid) of Islam at the beginning of every century. According to al-Subki, the reformer at the top of the second century [A.H.] was al-Shâfı'1 himself, the founder of the Shâfi'î school (d. 204/819). Every following century until al-Subki's time is shown to have had one great scholar, the reformer, and he is, of course, from the Shâfi'1 school; in al-Subki's book, this reformer normally gets a very long biography within that particular century. By choosing this particular structure for his biographical dictionary, then, al-Subki rendered a clear service to his school, in addition to serving the principle of ease and smoothness.

8. Centuries and decades refer to time, But other biographical dictionaries made place the basis of their structures, with or without considerations of time. Those works that took place as their sole criterion are the biographical dictionaries of cities, and those that took both time and place as their joint criteria are some of the biographical dictionaries of litterateurs.

The biographical dictionaries of cities are numerous in the Arabic Islamic library. We have dictionaries of the outstanding men of Damascus, Baghdad, Cairo, Aleppo, Jurjan, Herat, Naysabur, Isfahan, Granada, Bijayah, and others; even a small town like Darayya, in the vicinity of Damascus, found a historian who recorded the biographies of its illustrious men in ‘Abd al-Jabbar al-Khawlam (d. after 365/975), in his Ta’rikh Darayya. Two things must be noted about this category of biographical dictionaries. The first is that they begin to appear clearly only by the fourth/tenth century. [298] The second is that the first products in this category, al-Narshakhfs (d. after 322/943) Ta’rikh Bukhara, and Aba al-‘Arab Tamim’s (d. 333/954) Tabaqat ‘ulama’ Afriqiya wa-Tunis, were not centered around any of the larger centers of learning in the heart of the caliphal lands (Damascus, Baghdad, Cordoba, Cairo), but around farther and less central Islamic cities. These two things, when they are put together, are quite telling: the branch of “histories of cities” within the genre of biographical dictionaries is not an early one; it starts with the beginning of the weakening of the central caliphate and the emergence of other centers of political power in the Islamic empire. NarshakhFs book on the history of Bukhara is a case in point. Although its Arabic original has been lost (only a Persian abridgement has survived[299]), what is certainly known about it is that it was presented in 322/943 to the Samanid amir Nasr ibn Nah. As is well known, the Samanids, with their capital at Bukhara, had been one of the earliest assertive dynasties who in reality, though not in appearance, were practically independent of the central government in Baghdad. As I see it it was only natural that their assertiveness and practical independence should express itself in a separate history of the city of Bukhara. One finds a similar case in the later work of ‘Abd al-Ghafir ibn Isma’il al-FarisFs (529/1134), Kitab al-siyaq li-td’nkh Naysabur. This biographical history of the city of Nishapur did not get written until Nishapur had become a regional capital under the Seljuks. Abu al-‘Arab Tamim’s book on the scholars of Qayrawan and Tunis also has something to do with assertiveness, albeit in a different way. Abu al-‘Arab wrote his book in a distant province that had already been virtually independent from the central government in Baghdad for over a century, under the Aghlabids. But in the meantime, another power had come to take control in Tunis (in 909): the Ismâ'ilî Shi'ites—the Fatimids. As a staunch Sunni, Maliki scholar, Aba al-'Arab not only refused to admit the new political realities, he actually fought against them. And one way in which he showed his combative, assertive attitude was by writing a book on the scholars of his proud province in its good, pre-Shi'ite days. Thus, only Sunni, mainly Maliki, scholars are included in his book, and no Isma'ili Shi'ite ones are mentioned.

Once the "histories of cities" had become a fixed genre, other books on other cities followed. But Baghdad did not get its share until one century and a half after Bukhara, with al-Khatib al-Baghdadi's Ta rikh Baghdad, and Damascus had to wait over a century after that to get its own history with Ibn 'Asakir's (d. 571/1175) Ta'rlkh madinat Dimashq.

Finally, whereas most of the biographical dictionaries of cities include the biographies of persons of all disciplines who lived in those cities, there were some works whose biographies were restricted to people of specific disciplines or professions, within specific cities. A good example of this comes, once again, from Andalusian namely al-Khüshâm's (d. 366/976) book on the judges of Cordoba, Qudat Qurtubah. Though relatively early, this restriction to the genre never took root in Islamic writing, for understandable reasons, and the books that were produced along its lines remained very few.

9. The regional histories of literature were also late to appear, for reasons similar to those which led to the relatively late appearance of the genre of histories of cities, and none of them appears before the breakup of the central government in Baghdad and the emergence of mini-states, which were often ruled dynastically. The rulers of these states took it upon themselves to play the role of the patrons of art, in imitation of the former, reigning dynasty of the Abbasids and their magnanimous great viziers. Aba Manşür al-Tha'âlibî (d. 429/1037) was the first author to attempt such a regional history of literature. In his famous Yatimat al-dahr, he recorded the biographies of only contemporaneous and near-contemporaneous literary figures, those of the fourth/tenth and early fifth/eleventh centuries. To this general criterion of time, the more specific criterion of place is added, and is made to act as the basic structural element on the book. As the author says in his introduction, the Yatimah is divided into four “geographical” parts (with a strong “dynastic” slant to most of them):

a. the litterateurs of the Hamdanids and the poets of their court (i.e., Aleppo, the Jazlrah, and northern Syria) among others of the litterateurs of Syria, Mosul, and the Maghrib;

b. the htterateurs of Iraq and those connected with the Buyids;

c. the litterateurs of the provinces of al-Jabal, Fars, Jurjan, Tabaristan, and the city of Isfahan;

d. the litterateurs of the provinces of Khurasan, especially Nishapur, and Transoxiana. and those connected with the Samanids and the Ghaznavids. [300]

In each of the parts of this main structure, there are sections, or subdivisions, constructed along geographical lines; the biographies of the individual litterateurs foil into the various sections in accordance with the city or region with which they are most closely affiliated. Thus, we have a chapter on the poets of Jurjan, another on the poets of Baghdad, and so forth; even a relatively small town like Bust gets a separate section.

It is not surprising that a number of biographical dictionaries dealing with regional literary history appeared in Andalusia. Here this phenomenon expresses the same vein of self-assertion and rebellion against the accusation of servility to the East that we have met in the “continuation” sub-genre of biographical dictionaries. Ibn Bassam made this very clear in his introduction to al-Dhakhirah, as mentioned above.[301] His book is actually a clear example of a regional literary biographical dictionary which takes the criterion of place, within Andalusia, as a major structural criterion.[302] One gets the biographies of the Central Andalusians, including the Cordobans, first, then the Andalusians of the West, including the Sevilleans, then those of the East, including the Valencians, and finally the biographies of the non Andalusians who flourished in Andalusia.[303] A century later, another literary history of Andalusia was written, al-Mughribfi hula al-Maghrib, by Ibn Sa'îd al-AndalusI (d. 685/1286). This book also followed the regional divisions, beginning with Western Andalusia, followed by Central Andalusia and ending with Eastern Andalusia.[304]

10. The dictionaries which record the biographies of the Twelver Shi'ites and those of the Sufis require special attention, since their inner structures and the way these structures changed over time are culturally significant.

The first thing one notes about Twelver Shi'ite biographical dictionaries is that none of them appears before the beginning of the fourth/tenth century. This is as understandable as it is significant. The twelfth imam went into occultation in the second half of the third/ninth century, and some time was needed after that to figure out who was going to continue to believe in him, thereby finishing the cycle of adherence to the basic Imami cause. The fourth/ tenth century was also the period when Imami theology and law began to crystallize and be articulated in the works of such scholars as al-Kûlînî (d. 329/941) and al-Shaykh al-Mufid (d. 412/1022). That compiling biographical dictionaries came about at the same time or slightly thereafter is, thus, entirely understandable.

The first Twelver biographical dictionary we have is that of al-Kishshl (d. ca. 360/970), entitled Ikhtiyar ma' rifat al-rijal or Rijalal-Kishshl. The structure that the author chose for his book is very difficult to ascertain. At first sight the structure seems to be chronological, but then this principle falters here and there; at times one thinks that the order of the biographies follows a vague alphabetical arrangement, but then this principle also falters. Two things make the structure of the book even more obscure. These are the sparsity of dates in the biographies, and the fact that it is so filled with hadlth material that one almost loses sight of its essential biographical set-up. All these considerations are culturally significant. Above all, they indicate that, for the Twelver Shi’ites, the vision of what constituted a member of their community had not been sufficiently clarified yet, and that writing a biographical dictionary meant, at that time, embarking on a new genre unattempted before. In this particular respect, the multiplicity of criteria in the inner structure of al-Kishshi’s book can perhaps be compared to that of Ibn Sa’d’s Tabaqat’, after all, both were pioneering dictionaries in their respective spheres.

After al-Kishshl, the Twelver Shi’ite biographical dictionaries become clearer in inner structure. One sees this in the two dictionaries which succeeded Kishshfs work immediately, namely al-Najashfs (d. 450/1058) Rijal al-Najashl and ai-Tüsi’s (d. 460/1067) Rijal al-Tusi. Since these two authors were contemporaries, it is difficult to ascertain which of their books appeared first. However, judging by the structures of these books, it seems to me that Tûsi’s Rijal was compiled before al-Najashfs. The reason is that whereas al-Najashl arranged his biographies essentially alphabetically (according to the earlier Bukhari model), indicating a simplification and refinement of the genre within Twelver Shfism, al-Tüsî arranged them according to the rather more complex principle of “discipleship” to the various imams, beginning with the disciples of ‘Ali and ending with the disciples of the twelfth imam. AlTusfs arrangement, in principle, should have made his biographies roughly chronological in order. But this actually does not happen, especially since one person could have been the disciple of more than one imam, whence his biography would be repeated twice, three times, or even more. To this already complex set-up another factor is added, namely the manner in which the biographies are to be arranged within the discipleship of the individual imam. Al-Tüsî chose the rough alphabetical principle (all the people with the same first name are grouped together), thereby easing the flow of his biographies to some extent. The sum total of the situation is that al-Tüsî’s book reveals certain, if few, traits of struggle with the genre; whence my assumption that it was written before al-Najashfs only relatively smoothly structured book.

11. The biographical dictionaries of the Sufis are interesting in what they reveal. Like many other sub-genres of biographical dictionaries, they do not begin to appear until quite late, at the beginning of the fifth/eleventh century. As in the case of the Twelver Shi’ite biographical dictionaries, this is as understandable as it is significant. Sufism is a phenomenon that does not belong to the founding decades of Islam, but to a later period, after asceticism had taken root in society and had undergone a deep metamorphosis in the direction of spirituality and social and intellectual complexity. The first book we have of this genre, al-Sulamfs (d. 412/1021) Tabaqat al-şüfîyah, does not reveal a particular sensitivity to this issue of late date, although one does find in it a certain desire for “historicizing” Sufism. The biographies in the book are arranged chronologically, beginning with the earliest Sufi (al-Fudayl ibn ‘Iyad) and ending with contemporary Sufis (the last one is Abu ‘Abd Allah al-Dmawari), but no attempt is made to consider patricians like ɛA11 or al-Hasan al-Başrî as forerunners of Sufis or as Sufis proper. And the same principles are noted in some of the later dictionaries, such as al-Qushayrfs (d. 465/1072) al-Risalah al-qushayriyah. When, however, one reaches the work of Abu Nu’aym al-Isfahani (d. 430/1038)و his Hilyat al-awliya’, the situation changes completely. There, almost all the great figures of Islam who have been known for their outstanding piety, asceticism or great learning are considered “awliya” just like the Sufis. Thus, the biography of the Companion ‘Umar ibn al-Khattab stands side by side in the book with that of the Follower al-Hasan al-Başrî, the jurist al-Shâʏı’i, and the Sufi al-Junayd. The underlying assumption of the author is further strengthened by lengthy citations from the words/works of all those people, giving credibility to the criterion used. Over a century after Abu Nu’aym, Ibn al-Jawzi (d. 597/1200) had the opportunity to write a biographical dictionary of the Sufis, his Sifat al-safwah, in whose introduction he criticized Abu Nu’aym for placing so many non-Sufis among his “awliya’?’ He, however, not only followed the wide criterion of Aba Nu’aym, he widened it even further by including in his book a long biography of the Prophet, and a large number of biographies of people without names (for examples ‘ Abidah minjabal Lubnan). This way, Sufism, through the later expressions of the genre of biographical dictionaries, was given greater validity, legitimacy, and even roots, in the very foundation of Islam.

 Conclusions

I have tried to examine biographical dictionaries as a cultural and intellectual phenomenon in classical Islamic civilization, rather than as merely a large number of compilations within the Arabic Islamic library. This point of departure permitted me, first, to consider all the biographical dictionaries as variant expressions of one single genre, and, second, to relate the appearance (or lack thereof) of one sub-genre or another of biographical dictionaries to the progressive intellectual and cultural development of the Islamic community in the first nine centuries of Islam. There were several consequences for taking this approach, among them that this paper could not lay any claims to exhaustiveness whatsoever; a single example sufficiently representative of one facet or another of the genre under discussion would be enough. Furthermore, the discussion, in the latter part of the paper, of the biographical dictionaries in some specific areas (Twelver Shi'ism, Sufism) is also not exhaustive; one may wish to experiment with other specific types of biographical dictionaries (those on the philosophers and physicians, for example). But even there the results reached should not be significantly different from what the sample study here offers. On a constructive level, the approach has permitted me to draw some concltisions. The first of these is that the genre of biographical dictionaries emerged only at the time when Islamic civilization was starting to have a definite identity, one which was primarily religious, with a linguistic (Arabic-Qur'anic) and poetic touch to it. In the latter capacity, it portrayed its incorporation of the pre-Islamic Arabic tradition; in the former, although it perceived itself as an heir to the religious heritage of the Near East, it had a definite, specific, individual color to it: an Islamic one, with a new beginning to the tradition. It is because of this that the first biographical dictionary we have, Ibn Sad's Tabaqat, begins with the Sirah of the Prophet, and the Sirah assumes almost a quarter of the size of his multivolume book. But if the Prophet represents the main symbol of the new identity, others also are made to contribute to this identity and to pose as models for the new community through innumerable details of their lives, careers, behaviors, and attitudes. Moreover, those symbols are judged first and foremost in accordance with their temporal proximity to the new phase of human history; hence the introduction of the criterion of "sabiqah'' in the first, fundamental part of the book. The second part, based essentially on the criterion of place or locale, is also connected with the nature of the development of the new community. Its habitat now covers (after the conquests) a large area from Egypt in the west to Khurasan in the east. These new, pride-evoking physical realities bring with them, as the structure of Ibn Sa'd's biographical dictionary would indicate to US, other new realities which may not be as positive as the first, namely that they cause the Muslim authorities to live far apart from each other and to develop variant visions of the new religion; hence the primacy of the “narrator-source” criterion (within the geographical one) in the part on the Followers and their followers in the book. Even if perceived as regrettable, the fact is admitted. And admission means confidence: the variations can be recorded only because the finalization of the identity is already in place, on its way to being complete. Let US remember that Ibn Sa d wrote his book just at the time when the mihnah was underway, and when the opposition to its course, though small, was not unpromising. A new era was coming, and Ibn Sa’d’s biographical dictionary conveys a sense of the approach of the new identity of the majority of the Muslim community, along with the seeds of a final vision of Islam.

